He went to the spot where, four years before, had stood his home? For what? Had he hope that he could find there any one thing he had left on that night when he had walked out with Robert Greer to wreak a fiend's? Yes, there was still a belief in the man Maudit had left behind him—that old mother, or that his child was living, and that some portion of the fortune of his father therefore would be explained. He could believe that his friends, his acquaintance, even his wife, would drop away from him, but he could not believe that his mother would desert him in his great peril. With this in view he went to the place to find that a fine large new house stood on the spot that once held the neat frame building he called his home. He stared as though it were a mistake.

And then through all the neighborhood. Yes, there were a few of the old neighbors left. There was the same grocery on the corner, and the same thread-and-needle store opposite, kept by an elderly woman who had been friendly with his mother. He would go there and ask. The old lady was in the shop. Did she know any thing of a family of Maudits who once lived in a frame-house opposite? The old lady raised her head and looked under her spectacles at the hard grizzled man before her. Did she know the Maudits? She had known them years ago. But they're all gone—gone long ago. Did she know where they had gone? Yes, she could answer that question. Where? The hard, grizzled man stretched forward his head—"was dead." The man dropped his chin upon his breast, and caught by the counter, which he grasped with over his face. "Yes, she was dead, and not a bit too soon. Bless the poor thing, she'd suffered a month after they sent her son to the State Prison. Nobody knew exactly what he was sent for, and nobody in a hurry to find out, after the dreadful way it was. They had known the boy ever since he was as big as a baby, and you can't think ill of him. But" It killed the old lady. Dear me, how sick you look! It was said, too, that the old die, poor thing!" For though it was a terrible sad thing to have a son go to disgrace, she was thereby saved knowing of another son come to his end. That was a bad woman that son's wife. Her husband was scarce inside the State Prison when she began her wrong-doing, living, short with her child, in the name of Greer, Thomas Greer, who had been one of the chief witnesses against her husband.

Oh! how fast the man grew old; how the gravness spread into his eyes, his mouth, and his hands! How cold it seemed to get about where he sat; and how plain the old lady could have heard his teeth chatter but that she was a little deaf!

"To hails and to ride. Well, well! Not to be much longer in this world, I'm afraid, for I'm sure there were many folks about this neighborhood who said then, and would say now, that it was all a plain made up between Floss and her husband to get the husband out of the way, that he might have the woman."

It was well that the man sat in the shade of a piece of hanging muslin, and that nobody in the neighborhood knew him, or would know him by face and needles.

"That's the simple truth; though I think the want of her did not last long with him. It was not many months when he began to slacken off in that visits; and he was always out of a matter of course, began to run after her, to his office—so people said—and sometimes to the house. Then quarrels there were, as I know myself. I could see them of evenings, and hear them too, as I would sit here. I'm sorry for the poor child, and I'm sometimes. But at last the fellow wanted to get married, so I've heard, and the mother objected. I don't know, but she moved away with her child, and we never heard any more about her. But a while after I saw Mr. Greer, and missed her. Greer was married: that's all I know of the Maudits."

The old lady told a gossip who dropped in a few minutes later that she had just had a "dreadful scare" with a gentleman who came to call in there and asked about that Maudit family that used to be wanted there, and that she just told him that all she knew, to which he never spoke a word, but when she asked him what his name was, and what he wanted that for, he only put his hands to his staggered away for all the world as though he were tipsy.

The man did stagger blindly. He staggered to the spot of his crime. Why should he return to that place? Perhaps to see a well-dressed looking man sitting upon a stool, bending over a desk, in the counting-house that had been Greer's office, he had done the act that blasted his life—Thomas Greer, rather improved if any thing. There is an air of wealth about the appearance of him. Ah! there is one, at least, who has not forgotten Maudit—who only six years ago, "To hails and to ride. The Prisoner! He remembers his friend, and springs from the stool; but he is very white, and does not seem to be glad to see his friend after so long an absence. The appearance of these men back from the grave is startling. Greer, too, staggers; Greer does. Maudit's eyes have recovered their lustre; Greer's have grown dim and gray. Maudit's hands do not clutch; Greer's do. Maudit speaks firm:

"Not dead?"

Greer can not utter a word. There is no time for him to wait for composure. The hand of Nemesis is on his shoulder. He has committed the grip he clothes out the declaration that he does not know. He has forgotten that he has more false—that he may make reparation. The grip tightens—the knee of No. 123 is on his chest.

In the next hour the man who had been thought of a different style, too long for copying, the confidences of the wife of the "poor, misguided, unfortunate Death" occurred the day before at the foundry of Greer Brothers, the well-known machinists; Thomas Greer, a man well-dressed, was found dead in the office of the foundry, strangled by the ingenuity of his own watch-guard. "Died by the falcon across his neck; the strangest part being that one of his brothers and upward of forty men were at work in the adjoining shop, and did not hear the fall or the struggle, if there was any."

The deceased was highly respected in the trade, and leaves a wife and one child to mourn his loss.

JOHN PIERRE MAUDIT did not stagger when he walked away from the office of Greer Brothers. His step was firm, and he was not anxious to avoid the gaze of the passers-by, as on that day, four years before, when he had just gone over the same road. He felt calmer. He felt that he was growing suddenly younger. He did not take the byestreets. He saw many who had grown on in their daily avocations, and grown no older in that four years, while No. 123 was growing old within the prison walls. He knew them well, but his face was unknown to them. He went to that spot in West Broadway where that woman was killed by a blow from a hand unknown; there to learned the houses she had frequented, and visited them. They remembered the woman well. Yes: she had a child. She had given a away, they believed, to some wealthy couple; who had adopted it as their own. They thought the woman herself did not know where the child was, but believed it to be in prosperity. She was permitted to see it once a year, but not to know where it was. The woman did not seem to care, however, much about the child. The day she was to have seen it last she was drunk, and could not go. They never found out who killed her: thought it was a negro. Nobody cared, and nobody inquired. There was no money to be made by it.

Four years after this, Americans passing over the line of the Mexican and St. Petersburg Railroad would see that one of the most reliable engine-drivers on that road was an American. Not that it was a strange thing that Americans could be employed; they were plenty on the road. His Majesty the Emperor had more confidence in them than in any other. But this one was a skillful, steady man, and was always put on to drive the Imperial train, and called in when any special work was to be adjusted. He was a dark-eyed, mild-spoken man, very gray, and looked at least fifty, though only counting thirty-five. He always avoided his countrymen, and never could be engaged in conversation about himself.

Eight years, and they would be shown the same man holding the rank of Colonel of Engineers. He had become a naturalized Russian. He had lost fortunate in growing wealthy outside his profession, and in the service of Russia. He had married a Count.

Twelve years, and Le Nord announced the death, at St. Petersburg, of Colonel ——, of the Engineer Corps, an American by birth, but a naturalized Russian. "His immense fortune, which he acquired in America, was bequeathed to a Miss A——, the adopted daughter of a wealthy family in New York."

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

INDIAN CORN.

RECENT agricultural improvements enable us to grow this crop to great perfection and at slight expense. Artificial manures, such as bone-dust, hoofs, corn cleaners, and subsoil plows. From the last cause it appears that the corn crop does not average more than twenty-five bushels an acre. It is a well-settled fact that upward of one hundred bushels of excellent corn have been grown on an acre, and at small cost. Here is a difference of result worthy of serious consideration. We believe, however, that the Union is rapidly increasing less in the aggregate than formerly. Mr. Jay in his statistical view of the census of 1850 remarks: "The crop in 1840 was nearly four hundred millions of bushels; in 1850 it was within a fraction of six hundred millions, being a gain of fifty per cent., while the increase of the population, during the same period, was only 35 per cent." The estimated crop for 1855, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, was between seven and eight hundred millions, being nearly double that of 1840, and the crop for 1856 was estimated at fully eight hundred millions of bushels.

The culture applicable to the West and that to more exhausted districts must vary considerably. Some excellent corn crops are grown on clover sod and root land. Heavy soils should be avoided, unless drained and well fertilized. The cost of raising corn is diminished in proportion to the fine tilth and fertility of the soil. The old method of 100 bushels of shelled corn an acre, if the soil is good, gets twice as much for his labor as the man on whose land he only are raises 25. A well-prepared soil corn roots strike to a depth of several feet; and, with enough, but not too much, rain it will be large in proportion. It is not half the trouble to husk a large ear that it is to husk a small one. When the Indian corn crop of the east is kept up, corn may be grown on it for many years in succession without any serious injury to the crop. Soil, stiff or heavy, is much benefited by fall plowing and the application of long manure to retard it frosts. To have some manure every season on under-drained and subsoil-plowed land that will not require the whole of each year's crop to force such treatment. Most persons know how delicately the young corn plant comes forth in cold, wet weather. Well-drained soils, however, will give vigorous and thrifty plants when, very often, the crop proves a failure on other soils. It is especially true during their after-growth, if attacked by long-continued droughts. On properly under-drained soils the roots of the corn plant never suffers from drought. The moisture in the soil never ceases. It will be drawn up to the surface particles as it is from air on the surface of a cold pitcher on a hot summer's day.

Corn should not be planted on thickly on rich as poor soil, because the plants will grow more vigorously and resist drought.

Modes of culture must necessarily vary with localities. Where the soil is rich enough, it will be advisable to plant in hills, as it is then in a fully to try to grow corn without it. If there is not feed in the soil, within reach of the roots, the plants will be stunted, if not (unlike an animal) go elsewhere to look for it.

Some persons spread manure, in the fall, on the land intended for corn the following spring, which is spoken of by many as being good practice; but we think there is too much loss, especially on rolling lands, by the washing of rains. No doubt the mulch-like action of the manure is very beneficial to the soil, but good barn-yard manures are too costly for this use. It is a well-known fact in practical agriculture that the application of farm-yard manures is a sad waste for any crop that is not so good as to apply it for the green crop preceding, by that it may have time to become fully decomposed, and such portions not used by the green crop are in a readily available condition for the cereal; nor do we think the application of farm-yard manures in the spring the best practice, unless thoroughly composted and well decomposed; for we know of no instance of cereals being best from this mode of treatment, the finish or strength of wheat, rye, barley, or oats being invariably after green crops on soils well prepared.

An analysis of the grain of white flint corn will give of

Phosphates	about 55 per cent.
Starch	" 35 "

The leaves will give of

Silex	about 55 per cent.
Phosphates	" 11 "
Lime	" 8 "
Potash	" 6 "
Soda	" 3 "
Chlorine	" 10 "

The cob will give of

Silex	about 13 per cent.
Phosphates	" 10 "
Potash	" 35 "
Lime	" 41 "

We give the above figures of some of the most important substances for their value in reference in relation to the composition of the Indian corn plant. If there be any truth in the fact that the composition of a plant is a clew to its requirements as food in the soil, they will prove interesting and useful. It would appear from them that unleached woodashes (which contain much potash), the phosphates, and common salt, are excellent fertilizers for corn. We have found a top-dressing, before planting, of four or five bushels of refuse salt to the acre, as an excellent fertilizer and to destroy insects in the soil.

The alkalies of the above substances, or at least a portion of them, will unite with sand, or, more technically speaking, silex, forming soluble silicates, which, when dissolved in subjection to the plant, as tones do to the body of an animal. We have found lime with by most writers to be a mechanical and chemical, and by others for not being enough so; but we will avoid, as much as possible, leaving both opinions as they are. Liebig—writer's best friend—and making dogmatic assertions, being careful to give reasons, is the best of our safety, for all things not self-evident, so that they may know what importance should be attached to our sayings. Lime exists in all subjected to analysis, existed with guano, and this compound computed with lava in the form of dump and bricks mixed, is make an admirable special fertilizer for corn. Any free sulphuric acid is objectionable. It may be used in the ratio of 1 to 100 of soil at the time of planting, and at the first and second hoeings. When "marking out," to be used in the drill, we would advise to follow the one-horse plow with a lifting sub-soil plow, and as the corn is planted at the points where the lifting plow has been, it will follow these directions at least, one stroke deeply. If the soil is rich and in fine tilth, the ground loosened by the lifts are not sufficiently far apart, the light and air will be accessible to the roots of the corn.

Few farmers doubt the necessity of planting good seed. The corn which ripens earliest seems to insure this point with a large majority, as that the selection of the best and earliest ears would, at the time of the maturity of the crop, be perfect.

Corn is so easily hybridized that we have a large number of varieties suited to a great range of climate.

Of the sweet corns, we think Stowell's the best for eating or fodder and the garden, because of the large amount of saccharine matter it contains. When sown thick enough for soiling, the joints are tender and the leaves easily dried; and before growing any for soiling consider well the claims of the Chinese sugar-cane.

At the last meeting of the United States Agricultural Society a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. D. Lenox Gardiner for a basket of "Mexican corn" or "Old Colony Improved Corn," which was distributed, in equal parts, to the New York State Agricultural College, New York State Agricultural Farm, Pennsylvania Farm School, Experimental Farm of the Maryland Agricultural Society, and the Maryland Agricultural College. A number from Western Wisconsin spoke in terms of this variety

The injury done by crows in corn-fields is a great one and annoyance. Shaking seed on the ground for them, running twine on poles from one field of the other, and scarecrows, and having scarecrows, generally seem not to have the desired effect. We have been found that the whizzing of a ball shot from a musket or rifle through a flock of crows, will do more to frighten them than anything else of which we know.

When the corn appears no time should be lost in hoeing down weeds, and especially if quack or couch-grass makes its appearance. Keep the lifting subsoil plow and hoes now running freely between the rows, and the cultivator. By having the mould-board side of the shares of Knox's hoe on the inside, it may be run quite close to the plants without injuring them; but it is certain death to the weeds, because the surface soil is thrown to the centre and left again to be further pulverized. They can not withstand its fatal action. Very little handwork will be needed if the hoe is properly and used properly. Many of the cultivators used are objectionable because they have a shovel-like form, and would about as much as room to pass through as a drunken man.

When the ears are only a few inches high the lateral roots are several feet long; the common corn plow and subsoil plow have been objected to, lest the cutting of the roots, when using them, would be hurtful to the general prosperity of the plant. We have found no such result. The shortening in of the surface roots causes them to send forth new fibres, and those of greater depth to strike more deeply. The new fibres sent out from the shortened roots strike through portions of soil not reached by the others, and are nearer to the manure in the hill.

GOOD-NIGHT!

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XVI.

AFTER THE BATTLE.

HIRAM was summoned to the door by a violent ringing of the bell. Visions of prophecy —of—in fact, of any thing that might affect a testy gentleman of seventy-three, inclined to make incessant trips to the West Indies—rushed to his mind as he rushed to the door. He opened it in a hot haste.

There stood Hope Wayne, pale, her eyes flashing, her hand unglove. At the foot of the steps was the carriage, and in the carriage sat Mrs. Simcoe, with a bleeding boy's head resting upon her shoulder. The coachman stood at the carriage-door.

"Here, Hiram, help James to bring in this poor boy."

"Yes, miss," replied the man, as he ran down the steps.

The door was opened, and the coachman and Hiram lifted out the half-conscious Gabriel. He struggled to put his feet upon the ground, but he could not quite stand, and hung heavily upon the men.

"Bring him in," said Hope Wayne, as she watched her patient, while Mrs. Simcoe descended from the carriage, and Little Malacca came running up the avenue from the gate.

"Is he better, ma'am?" said the boy, addressing Hope, and taking off his cap, involuntarily.

"I think so. Come in and tell me who he is, and what it is all about."

"Yes, ma'am," replied Little Malacca, as he followed Mrs. Simcoe up the steps.

"I think he is only stunned, my dear," said Mrs. Simcoe. "He will soon be better. I will run up and get something for him."

She disappeared, and the men brought Gabriel into the hall and placed him upon a sofa. Hope turned to Little Malacca with an inquiring look, and the boy said, simply enough,

"Ah! Newt ran out of your gate and pelted us, and he and Gabriel quarrelled and then fought."

"A very silly business," replied Hope. "But I think he is better."

By this time Master Gabriel had opened his eyes clearly, and his mind was also awake to its situation. His chagrin was inexpressible. He had been first presented to the queen of his dreams as he lay bloody and senseless in a dusty road. He sat up and looked about him for a moment, and saw Mr. Bott and Mrs. Simcoe descending the stairs.

"It's all a conspiracy to get into the house, Mrs. Simcoe, ma'am. I'll have bull-dogs—I'll have blunderbusses and spring-guns, Mrs. Simcoe, ma'am! And what do you mean by fighting at my gate, Sir? What are you doing at my gate? Can't Mr. Gray keep his boys at home? Hope, go up stairs!" said the old gentleman, as he reached the foot of the staircase.

"Oh! thank you, Sir, I'm quite well again," said Gabriel, rising, pale and weak. "Come, Little Malacca. Good-morning, ma'am—good-morning, Sir!" And he leaned on the arm of his friend, bowed to the others, and turned to go, utterly mortified and forlorn.

"Stop," said Hope, coming forward. "You are not fit to go."

"Oh! indeed, I am quite well, thank you—quite." And he would have fallen fainting but that Hiram caught him, and laid him again upon the sofa.

"I don't talk. You shall tell all about it some other time. Come in, Hiram," she added, as she heard a knock.

The man entered, and Mrs. Simcoe went out, after having told him to undress the boy carefully and bathe his face and head. The hall was perfectly passive, Hiram was silent, quick, and careful, and in a few moments he closed the door softly behind him, and left Gabriel alone.

He was now entirely conscious, but very weak. His face was turned toward the window, which was open, and he watched the pine-trees that bordered gently in the afternoon breeze. He was profoundly still out of doors and in the house; and as he lay exhausted and alone in the hall a few days and months swam through his mind in misty confusion. Half-dozing, half-sleeping, every thing glimmered before him as the still hours stole by.

When he opened his eyes again it was darker, and he was lying on his back looking up at the heavy tester of the great bedstead from which hung the curtains, so that he could see glimpses into the chamber. It was large and lofty, and the walls were covered with paper that was designed with the story of Telemachus. His eyes wandered over it dreamily.

He could dimly see the beautiful Calypso—the sage Mentor—the eager pupil—pelted phantoms floating around him. He endeavored to brace the bursting of the sea upon the shore. The tears came to his eyes. The ghostly Calypso put aside the curtain of the bed, and Abel stretched out his hands.

"I must go," he murmured, as if he too were a phantom.

The lips of Calypso moved.

"Are you better?"

Gabriel was awake in a moment. It was Hope Wayne who spoke to him.

It surely was not his fault that he was in love. Boys of fifteen will always love girls who are older—who look upon them as children, and who will be only pained, if they are honest girls when they discover the feelings which they unconsciously kindled. Alas! they are not less devastating because unwittingly lighted. Hoppy if the devastation be only a spring breeze that ruffles the soil!

All that night as Gabriel lay in the bed at Pinewood he kept awaking, and could think of nothing but that he was actually in her house, and that hereafter he should have a right to come and see her.

When Abel Newt turned, upon hearing the condensed cry, and saw Hope Wayne looking upon the field of battle, his hands unclenched, he involuntarily pulled out his handkerchief and wiped his face, and then said,

"Don't be frightened, ladies, we've been foolish, and the boy is stunned. But I could not help it."

The coachman had opened the door by this time, and Gabriel and Hope had both alighted.

"Will you help the man put him in the carriage?" said Mrs. Simcoe to Abel.

"Certainly, Madame."

And he lifted the boy by the arms, and with James, the coachman, deposited him carefully upon the seat.

Abel was sadly discomposed by the furious encounter, but as he helped the ladies into the carriage, he said, deprecatingly,

"I am very sorry to make the acquaintance of Miss Wayne under such circumstances; but when she knows all she will discover that the unhappy difficulty was unavoidable."

He spoke rapidly, for there was no time to lose. The ladies bowed gravely and said nothing. Then Mr. Simcoe, Hope, and Abel went to their own and the next moment Abel was alone, Little Malacca having run off after the carriage. Abel followed it with his eyes, and with the most curious reflections. Hope Wayne had not betrayed that she had ever seen him before. If he had been the merest stranger her conduct would have been the same. Was it possible, he thought, that he had been mistaken? Was it possible that she had never remarked him, and that he was a stranger? He could not, he would not, believe it.

As he descended the hill slowly toward the village, still pondering, he met Hosea Wayne carrying a large bundle under his arm. He had his pipe in his mouth, for the oblation to Nicotina perpetually smoked upon Hosea's altar, and the old man accosted Abel as he came toward him.

"Wa'al, 'pears to me's been trouble somewhere," and he shook his head as he surveyed the disorder of Abel's person.

Abel smiled, and asked him where he was going.

"Only up to Pinewood. The ladies have been down and bought ye'this', and Granny's sendin' me 'long with it home. But what's the matter 'long o' you?"

"Nothing," said Abel.

"You've been fightin'," replied the old man; "and come to see you plain, 'pears to me you look darned het up in the face. Come now, who you been a-fightin' on?"

Abel smiled again.

"Tain't no use smilin'," said Hosea. "If yer won't answer to tell, that's the end on't; but smilin' doesn't do nothin'. If ye've been fightin,' and I know yer have, smilin' isn't no use. That's all on't."

The old man puffed placidly and was passing on. But Abel reflected that, as he was going to Pinewood, he might hear a prejudiced account of the affair; so he said, pleasantly,

"Well, Hosea, I have to talk about such things, but the truth is that Gabriel Bennet and I ran against each other, and he got mad and we had a fight."

"But he's smaller than you be," replied Hosea.

"I know it, but he struck me first. I didn't want to fight him, but he was like a mad bull."

Hosea puffed, and put down his bundle.

"Now that air 'pears strange, 'cause Gabriel Bennet's a dreadful quiet sort o' boy. Did ye only run again each other? how d'ye do it?"

"I was coming out of the gate and he was passing by, and I hit him."

"Hit him? ye ain't pardon or nothin'?"

"No, he was angry," said Abel, shortly.

"Wa'al!"

"Wa'al, I confess it, I sauced back, and then he came on."

"Where is he?"

"He's up at Pinewood."

"D'ye hurt him?"

"Yes, I knocked him down," said Abel, flushing.

Hosea smoked intently for a few moments.

"Boys will be boys, I s'pose," said he at last, taking up his bundle. "But ye're a man, about, Abel Newt. Don't let it vex ye, and ye needn't call yerself one no longer, 'cause 'tain't no use."

So saying, the old man resumed his loitering journey, and Abel walked rapidly homeward.

CHAPTER XVII.

OPPOSITIONS EVIL.

ABOUT ten o'clock in the evening Hope knocked gently at Gabriel's door. There was no reply. She opened the door softly and went in. A night-lamp was burning, and threw a pleasant light through the room. The windows were open, and the night-air sighed among the pine-trees near them.

Gabriel's head had turned toward the door, so that Hope saw it as she entered. He was sleeping peacefully. At that very moment he was dreaming of her.

Dreams his heart was satisfied and happy for Hope Wayne was walking with him by the sea, her hand in his: her heart his own. Time had no gaps, no time, in dreams, remember. Dreams are heaven.

She stood motionless lest the night-wind wake him. He did not stir, and she heard his low, regular breathing, and knew that all was well. Then she turned as noiselessly as she had entered, and went out, leaving him to peaceful sleep—the dreams —to the sighing of the pines.

Hope Wayne went quietly to her room, which was next to the one in which Gabriel lay. Her kind heart had sent her to see that he wanted nothing. She thought of him only as a boy who had had the worst of a quarrel, and she pitied him. Was it only pity for the victim that knocked gently at his door? Did she even suspect that she was really thinking of the conqueror when she went to comfort the conquered? that she was trying, somehow, to help Abel by doing all she could to alleviate the harm he had done?

Hope Wayne asked herself no questions. She was conscious of a curious excitement, and the sighing of the pines lulled her to sleep. But all night long she dreamed of her terror, and of Abel Newt, with bare head and clustering black hair, gracefully facing, and overthrowing, Hercules nearly! oh, so heroic! and so carefully helping to lay Gabriel in the carriage!

CHAPTER XVIII.

NEWS FROM HOME.

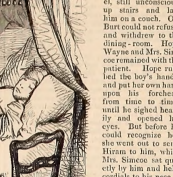
ABEL found a letter awaiting for him. He tore it open and read it. Let us look over his shoulder:

"MY DEAR ABEL,—You have now nearly reached the age at which, by your grandfather's direction, you were to leave school, and enter upon active life. Your grandfather, who had known and respected Mr. Gray in former years, left you, as you know, a sum sufficient for your education, upon condition of your being placed at Mr. Gray's until your majority—birthday. That time is approaching. Upon your nineteenth birthday you will leave school. Mr. Gray gives me the best accounts of you. My plans for you are not quite settled. What appears to me wise, I will state for you to think of college; and as you will undoubtedly be a business man, I see no need of your learning Greek or writing Latin poetry. At your age I was engaging my own living. Your mother and the family are well. Your affectionate father,

"BOSWORTH NEWT.

"P.S. Your mother wishes to add a line."

"DEAR ABEL,—I am very glad to hear from Mr. Gray of your fine progress in study, and know from your good character and diligence. It is so, my dear son, that you will repay your fond parents for their long years of anxiety. I trust you give care of your health and avoid reading. It is very necessary to improve the mind. I hope you attend to religion. It will help you if you keep a record of Dr. Peewee's texts, and write abstracts of his sermons. Grammar, too, and general reading. I hope that you are very self-possessed, which is really good news. My friend Mrs. Beacon was here last week, and she says you look beautifully! That is a great deal for her to admit, for her son Bowdoin is one of the most elegant and accomplished young men I have ever seen. He is very gentlemanly indeed. Pa and Alfred Dinks have been here for some time. My dear son, could you not learn to walk before you come home? It is considered very bad by some people. You must excuse me to put your arm round the lady's waist. But I think it is very foolish for any lady to set themselves up against the customs of society. I think if it is permitted in Paris and London, we needn't be so very particular about it in New York. Mr. Dinks and Mr. Beacon both waltz, and I assure you it is very distingué indeed. But be careful in learning. Your sister Fanny says the Boston young men generally stick out their chests dreadfully when they waltz, and look like owls spinning on invisible teetotums. She declares too that all the Boston girls are dowdy. But she is obliged to confess that Mr. Beacon and Mr. Dinks are as well-dressed and gentlemanly and decent as well as any young men can be. And as for the Boston Indies, Mr. Dinks tells Fanny that he has a cousin, a Miss Wayne, who lives in Delnfield, who might alter her opinion of the dowdiness of Boston girls. It seems she is a great horse-ess, and very beautiful; and it is said here (but you know how idle such gossip is) that she is going to marry her cousin, Alfred Dinks. He does not deny it. He merely laughs and shakes his head—the truth is, he hasn't much to say for himself. Bless me! I've got to take another sheet.



THE BATTLE OF THE PILLOWS.

"Now, Abel, my dear, do you know Miss Wayne? I have never heard you speak of her; and yet, if she lives in Delafield, you must know something about her. Your father is working hard at his business, but it is shocking how much money we have to spend to keep up our place in society properly. I know that he spends all his income every year; and if any thing should happen — I cry my eyes out to think of it. Miss Wayne, I say, is very handsome. Is she about your age. Is it true about her being an heiress?

"What is the news—let me see. Oh! your cousin, Laura Magot, is engaged, and she has made a capital match. She will be married on the next birthday; and the happy man is Mel-ich Whitlow. It is the first old Knickerbocker family. Fanny says she knows all about them—that she has them all at her fingers' ends. You see she is an historian. Is Fanny a friend of yours?

"Mr. Whitlow has at least five thousand dollars a year from his business now; and his aunt, Patience Doolittle, widow of Isaac Merchant, who has no children, is understood to prefer him to all her relations. She must have a little something; so there could be nothing better. We are, naturally, delighted. But what a pity Laura is not a little older, about Fanny's height; and as I was looking at Fanny, the other day, I thought how sorry it was for Mr. Whitlow that Laura was not just a little prettier. She has such a nose; and then her complexion! However, my dear Abel, there's nothing about such things, and, I have no doubt, it wickedly lasting at its worst, and in this very moment, for scribbling him such a long, rambling letter. What is Miss Wayne's first name? Is she an heiress? I hope you will forget to write me all you know. I am going to Saratoga in a few days, and I think you ought to drink the waters. I told Dr. Lush I was perfectly sure of it; so he told your father, and he has consented. I am very anxious that Dinner, the large, handsome woman from New Orleans, whom you met at the ball, and who was Uncle Magot's last summer? She has come on, and will be at the Springs this year. I am told Mr. Flemer is a very large gentleman, and weighs, some people say, in the country. Their eldest daughter, Grace, is a handsome girl. You had better write, I believe. What an heiress she will be! The Moultries from South Carolina are coming to the Springs. By-the-by, how old is Sligo Moultrie? He left Mr. Grey's only three or four years ago. Then there is Mrs. Gray and the Havana people coming. What jewels they wear! It will be very gay. Write me all you know, and I hope the little visit will do Fanny good. Dr. Maundy is giving us a series of sermons upon the different kinds of wood used in building Solomon's Temple. They are very interesting—and he has made a list of the different woods and such wary gestures, and he looks so gentlemanly in the pulpit, that I have no doubt he does a great deal of good. I think Fanny is always full. Your Uncle Lawrence has been to hear a preacher from Boston, who is a friend of Channing, and is very much pleased. Have you ever heard him? It seems he is very famous in his own way, and converts a host of rakes, or pollywogs, or atheists—I don't know which it is. I believe Channing writes sermons, but, and read essays instead of sermons. Your uncle insists upon it that you go to a church of his kind at Delafield. But I suppose Mr. Gray would not allow you to hear any thing that he thought very good. I would write to him, and from what I have heard of Dr. Peewee, I respect him very highly; and if you do make a utterance of his sermons, I will read them some time when you come home.

"Speaking of religion, I must tell you a little story, although it is rather naughty, which Fanny told me the other day. She was coming home from church with Mr. Gray, and as you know, her 'Miss Nervi, what do you do when you go into church and you don't know what to do?' and he did not understand him, and asked him what he meant. "Why,' said he, 'when we go into church, you know, we all go in and kneel down in front of the pew, or in our hands, for a little while, and Dr. Maundy says a little prayer, and then we all rise, and put his face into it for quite a long time. What do you do?' he asked; and so he really puzzled her. 'Why,' said she, gravely, 'Mr. Dinks, it is to say a short prayer.' 'Heavens!' said he, 'I am a better thought of that.' 'Why, what do you do then?' asked Fanny, curiously. 'Well,' answered Dinks, 'you know, I think it is a special thing to do; it's proper, and so forth; but I never know what prayers to say, and so when they did it; so I always put my head into my hat and count ten. I find it comes to about the same thing—I get through at the same time with other people.' He isn't very bright, but he is a good-natured fellow, and very gentlemanly, and I am told he is very rich. Fanny laughs at him—but I think she likes him very well. I wish you would find out whether he is single, and really is engaged to him. Here I am at the very end of my paper. Take care of yourself, my dear Abel, and remember the religion and the solid reading.

"Your affectionate mother,

"NANCY NEWE."

Abel read the letters, and stood looking at the floor, musingly. His school-days, then, were numbered; the stage was to be deepened and widened; the scenery and the figures so wonderfully changed! He was to step in a moment from school into the world. He was to lie down one night a boy and wake up a man the next morning.

The cloud of thoughts and fancies that filled his mind all drifted toward one point, and there I believe a sanguine upon which stood the only thing he could discern clearly, and that was the figure of Hope Wayne. Just as he thought he could reach her, was he to be torn away?

And who the dickens was Mr. Alfred Dinks? Good Mrs. Gray had heard of the flight from Little Almonca. She labored with Abel, but in vain. When she went to her room she told Mr. Gray of the conversation she had had. The husband listened with a twinkle in his eye.

"Don't you think he had better go, my dear?" asked Mrs. Gray. "I really think he will do harm to the younger boys. Somehow I don't know how to talk with him. He seems to slip away, as it were."

"My dear, you are quite right. I was thinking the very same thing myself; and I will write to Mr. Newe that Abel—"What's that?" cried he, suddenly, as a scuffling and trampling was heard from the adjoining room. Mrs. Gray and Mrs. Gray listened for a moment intently.

"Mischief, I'm afraid," said he; "I must go up and look into it."

CHAPTER XIX.

THE BATTLE OF THE PILLOWS.

The battle was never in high glee. It was a grand field-day of pillows and bolsters in Number Seven. Large boys and little boys were all engaged in the same work of pulling and tearing and dealing thumping blows on every side, tripping over their own night-shirts and each other, and combining in promiscuous heap upon the floor. Whang! whang! resounded the onset, and rebound. Paff! paff! went the fellow who could stand longest even upon his own bed and repel all assaults. The noise from the neighboring rooms seized their pillows as the battle-cry of the sounds, and crept quietly in to join the fray.

Tom Gale, Ben Hollis, Jack Bullock, Jim Greswick—all the big boys—were engaged. Jack Bullock, too, save that Gabriel was comfortable, could have joined Mr. Hic. He had been early on the ground; and when Green Bullock, Gabriel's brother, came in, finding large room a bolster that almost knocked his body, and quite knocked his temper, over. But the room was busy, and Green, who was a large lump, hardly placed to be blown out in any sudden emergency, was left to himself and his wrath in the universal confusion, to whom he owed his share. So he stalked about among the smaller boys, taking a general revenge, until Jim Greswick observed him and pursued him with such an incension and celerity that Green, finding expansing and pleased, stopped to watch the duel, and could not resist the temptation to administer a tremendous whack staggered the tyrant of the smaller boys.

"Hi-ci!" cried Abel Newt suddenly, making a flash at the lamp and blowing it out.

The confusion was redoubled. The boys who belonged in the room were in bed and asleep in a moment. The stranger boys, from the neighborhood, fled in a panic. Some fighting was cut off, crept under the beds and hardly breathed. Others, more capricious uniformity of snoring through the room.

Mr. Gray entered, softly turning the door. Perfect silence and uniform snoring met his ear every bed. Abel, in the corner bed, watched him with one eye—the other shammed.

"Oh," said Mr. Gray, rather too audibly, "I was mistaken."

He then closed the door. The next moment Abel opened it so softly and heard the master descend the stairs quietly. But his bashing retreat betrayed his purpose.

"Boys," said Abel, in a whisper, as he poked a match into a bolster and struck a light and lighted the lamp, "he's coming the gum-game. He'll be back immediately. Look out for him, boys."

There was a unanimous assent to the "fixing" from every part of the room. The pillows were thrown back between the beds and thrown under the beds and gathered round Abel. That young gentleman, standing on the foot-board of the bureau and stretched it just above the floor between the two beds that stood on each side of the room.

"Now," said he, "you, here—you Leek Treadwell—you come up here. Now, boys, at the moment you see Uncle Savoy's lamp, fling your pillow at it—mind!—the moment he opens the door. Then—then—then—Mr. Gray—Mr. Gray—"

Abel led the way.

"Boys," whispered he, "the moment we begin, Uncle Savoy 'll be on us. He's awful before he gets his coffee. Look out at the door this moment. Lie down! Lie down! Hallo, Gray! Gray! Lazy Gray! Gray!"

The boys obeyed. At the same moment Abel blew out his lamp, and crying "Hi! hi! Gray! Gray!" threw his pillow at the door with a thick. Muddock jumped up in the dark and threw his pillow at the door. Mr. Gray in the was yet flying through the room, Mr. Gray, who had returned, as Abel had suspected, to a station just outside, opened the door and lighted a lamp in hand.

Leek Treadwell remembered. Whack! went his pillow. Out went the lamp, and tumbled on the floor. Mr. Gray was left in the dark, in the darkness, half angry and confused. His foot caught in the cord—down he tumbled on the floor. It was a swindling.

"An attack! an attack! boys, here are the fellows from Number Six!" shouted Abel, as he jumped out of bed and banged the prostrate Uncle Savoy with his bolster. "Join in! join in! here's the leader; let him have it! Death to the sixers!" cried he, and the eager, laughing crew sprung to his side. They all hit at once, shouting and talking so as to drown any remonstrance. The volley was incessant, and poor Uncle Savoy stunned and bewildered so by it.

"I know him, though his back," cried Abel; "it's old Green Muddock. You lubber—you lout—did you think you could catch the sixers? For shame! you, boys, you! Let 'em have it!"

"Boys!" shouted Mr. Gray, in the dark, from the floor.

"Oh yes; we know all about that," cried Abel; "we've heard that before."

"Whack! whack! resounded the pillows.

"What fun! cocky, what fun!" cried the smaller boys, eager and trembling, but half afraid, as the battle went on.

"Boys, don't you know me?" roared Mr. Gray.

"Oh yes, perfectly," replied Abel. "You'd better try to talk like Mr. Grey. No, you don't, young man. He's asleep down stairs;" and he played away upon the enemy with unflagging vigor.

The feathers flew. The duet areas and filled the lungs of the warriors, who coughed, and laughed, and struck until they were ready to fall with their weapons. They settled many an old score in the fierce conflict with Uncle Savoy. He, meanwhile, had struggled up, and finding his way among the pillows to the door, threw it open. The light from the entry streamed by him into the room. No excuse or subterfuge was possible now. The boys could see him plainly enough. His coat was off, and his waistcoat; and dreadful was his air of wrath.

"Gracious, Mr. Gray! You? Why, Sir, how is this? What does it mean? We thought it was Green Muddock come in to fight with Abel, and in the most naturally astonished way in the world.

"Why, Mr. Grey!" echoed the chorus.

"Silence!" said Mr. Gray, in a hoarse tone of you. And mind! you shall hear of this, all of you!"

Mr. Gray did not dare to trust himself to say any thing more. He went down stairs, and shut several doors behind him with a bang.

"All those boys who think Uncle Savoy has had his deserts will hold up their right hands," said he, in a solemn whisper of the most awful pause and manner that the tired combatants paused with indignation upon the floor.

Then they crept off, and Abel, as the others fell asleep around him, lay reflecting upon this most eventful day.

"It is odd," thought he, smiling. "I feel I should have done the same thing again. I hope I shall always be able to settle my accounts as easily. If I am to leave school soon, I must begin at once to think of something to do."

Then his mind wandered into a maze of doubts and speculations, in the midst of which he fell asleep.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

The Flowering of the Lilacs—Provinciale at Paris—Turf contest with Champagne—The War Spirit in France—Garibaldi and Theirs on the Situation—Concert at Rothschild's—La Parade de Pincenel—Fashions in Dress—The Incline "Mortal Mixtures of Earth's Mould"—Steeple-chases at La Marche—Exhibition of Modern Paintings, etc.

PARIS, April 16, 1859.

The time has been, since I have known Paris, when in writing this date I should be reminded by the flowering chestnuts and lilacs that the farewell visits were being paid and farewell dinners exchanged, preparatory to every one's going into the country for the 1st of May, for "the flowering of the lilacs," as it was called; but now this is a thing entirely of the past, for the fashion of English habit in this respect. Few persons leave Paris before the end of June, and they return until the end of December. Thus, though the lilacs are in full bloom, no one has thought of enjoying them yet except in the gardens of the Tuileries. Then, too, the festival of Easter falls later this year than usual, and the Lent was more severe of us born; and as no one of the higher classes marry in Lent, there are all the aristocratic marriages to come next month, besides the balls and balls, and which could in no way be crowded into the Carnival. So Paris is very full for the addition we have the numerous purchasers and sight-seers from the country—those unmistakable provincials who fill the streets and the Bois, the tables of the restaurants, and seem so heartily to enjoy themselves, realizing probably, the truest bill of their whole lives in a visit to Paris.

I was the other day behind a party of these, who were evidently looking into the mysterious part of the garden of the Tuileries, where there is a caisse which is made to perform tricks, and is obviously short time, the most luxuriant turf—such as never before has been seen out of England—and which is the boast of the fashionable gentry. "These good folks were admiring it very much, and one of them, realizing probably, the chance to grow so well; and another said, quite seriously,

"They say it is because it is watered with vin de Champagne."

"It is not possible!" said a third. "But let us ask the gardener." And they called to a laborer who was watering the grass and put the question. He looked at them with the most unmoved and vacant expression of face as he answered, knowing well with whom he had to deal,

"Yes, it is true, and with vin de Champagne only once a week."

"There! I heard myself; so it is vrai as well as bien trouvé.

The Imperial family have left the Tuileries for one of their country residences. The Empress' health is again spoken of as giving much cause for anxiety, and it must be tried by this critical state of political affairs. Not but that the dislike to the idea of war is fast diminishing among the French-people, and certainly a military spirit, that though at first prudential and shop-keeping considerations seemed to prevail, there are gradually giving way before the seductive promise and prospect of military triumphs. Then again the united cry of defiance with which the whole of Germany has met the French pretension of interfering with the possession of one of their confederates has found an answering spirit in France, and the old battle-fields and the old battle-cries are not to be removed from this generation that their influence is not still to be felt. I dare say the Emperor, who as well understands the people he governs, calculated all this; and that he has not been driven to war by any European powers, he could lead this whole nation to adopt his views, which it violently opposed three months ago.

I recur thus to politics because they are now so interesting and exciting that every subject not faithfully reflect the aspect of things did I not do so. Every evening party assumes quite the air of a political club, for all the information about the seat, two, or three of the circle whom past experience or great mental qualities invest with a certain authority at such times; and then the listless approach no way of them really worthy to listen, and others pretending to be so, I have in this way had the pleasure of hearing Berryer, Guizot, and Thiers discourse upon "la question" as it is called; not to name others who are less well known.

I have been to more concerts in the week—one at the Rothschild's, another at the Duchess de Mouchy's—than I have already said there was to be told of such entertainments; and really at such rooms one becomes so used to hear sounds that one might almost wish that one's ideas of heaven could for a time be disconnected from them.

Thus, too, we have had the excitement of another race, and this time with the Opera Comique, called "La Pardon de Ploermel," the composer Meyerbeer. I was not at the first representation, which is described as a most brilliant and enthusiastic scene of enthusiasm, the Emperor and Empress applauding and encouraging from their box the performers most fit for receive a perfect storm of congratulations. But the artist of the telegraphic dispatches were sent off to all the capitals of Europe to describe this success; and I dare say if your Atlantic cable had not failed, you would by this time have had one at New York. I witnessed the fourth representation, and I must say there is reason to be pleased. There are some most striking melodies, and it is destined to great and lasting popularity. I suppose that before the end of the year you will have this music in New York—that wonderful city which seems to have the power to send out one upon to all that comes from Europe and to others upon its own vast American world, of which it is the metropolis.

The thought of this has brought up the recollection of an entertainment I was given a few years better, relating to the feminine fashions, which was that I said nothing of the change in the fashion of the sleeves! I shall be denied and sweeping—Light in the arm, fitted to the elbow they are and must be therefore. The skirts are not so much altered as being transposed into three, so my forgetfulness will not have totally misled any one. I am pleased to make things, for I have always observed in my youthful days, and in which fancy recalls all of "Mary's Lamb"—Isabel in that respect.

Of one of these I have never seen the loveliness equaled in any other "mortal mixture of earth's mould," and it was the first time I went to Ugly and saw the lovely heads of Correggio, and the greatest figure in which is the picture of the Virgin in presentation of the ideal of beauty, that I have beheld since sleep is rounded me of her. The greatest head and its carrying breeziness—low, very low, with forehead and the blue, blurest eyes, so hanging and so swelling—the long throat and form, and the whole idea and springing form! Yes, such an one was born among us—such a woman—such a love. I think you had the taste to appreciate her as she was worthy to be, for she was not was by one of us, and she was not to be won by the devoted adoration of years of life, swept out of existence in its prime, but never to be forgotten. And she was not to be won by us, I have inflicted upon you, apropos of this return to the "light sleeves."

I do not in any way thing to you of the steeple-chases at La Marche, which are part of the programme of Emperor's fête, and which are attended all the gay crowd of fashion in splendid equipages, sometimes with four and even six horses, for I assure you that the road from Paris to La Marche is to a race-course on a Sunday, which is the day always chosen for the occasion here for these fêtes. It is like better going to church twice, in the sober fashion of my fathers. Nor do I care much for the "sporting" pretensions, generally, to laugh at them. It is such a clumsy imitation of English supremacy in these matters, that it would be an act of arrogance of it seem so little understood, even by those who make use of them, and there seems so much unnecessary risk to the whole thing, that I leave them away from it. I know that the French have some good horses and riders, and that in Normandy last year, the principal English races were won by these; but there always seems something wrong in the French way of doing it. They don't know how to ride, and they don't understand it. They would ask if there would be no "representation," "something to look at," "some play performed."

We shall have, next week, the exhibition of modern pictures opened in the Crystal Palace, which will, perhaps, give me something to interest your readers, for this is rather a stupid letter, and this is a stupid season, the interregnum between winter and summer and the last weeks of Lent, when every one seems only bent upon church-going and repentance, and something is heard but the admission of the merits of favorite preachers, who preach, I suppose, much the same as they do in England.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SELF-MADE MEN.—Columbus was a weaver. Franklin was a journeyman printer. Marlboro, as well as Eugene Sue, was a footman. Napoleon, when young, was a peasant. Hotter V. was originally in hospital service. Rollin was the son of a cutler. Jerguson and Burns, Scottish poets, were shepherds. Keep was a slave. Mooney was a beggar. Daniel Defoe was apprenticed to a hosier. Demosthenes was the son of a cutler. Hogarth an engraver of pewter pots. Virgil was the son of a baker. Shakspeare's father was a wool-stapler. Ben Jonson was a bricklayer. Forson was the son of a parish clerk. Prideaux was employed in a tobacconist's College. Akenside was the son of a butcher. Kops was a tailor. Marmontel, a carpenter's son. Massinger, Clifford and Bloomfield, cobblers. Howard became apprenticed to a hatter. Hadley was the son of a soapboiler. Richard Arkwright was a barber for a number of years.

A gentleman in the city advertised a few days since in the Times for a boy. The next morning, on sallying out at his office, he found in front of the door a bantling, with this inscription on it: "Will this one answer?" On opening it, he found a nice fat specimen of the article which he advertised for, warmly done up in a blanket.

THE POWER OF OPTIONS.—Men are harassed, not by things themselves, but by opinions respecting them.—Epictetus.

HOSPITALITY.—Measure not thy entertainment of a guest by his station, but by his merit. Because he is a beggar not that thou art but a gentleman; otherwise, if with feasting him thou hast broken through the rules of the rapture, and, perchance, rather deridst than pity thee.—Publius.

GOOD-NATURE.—Good-nature is more agreeable in conversation than wit, and gives a certain air to the countenance, which is more amiable than beauty. It shows virtue in its fairest light; it makes it lovely to the eyes, from the deformity of vice; and makes our folly and imperfections supportable.—Addison.

THE A B C OF THE FIRST BATTLE OF THE SEASON.

A was an Angel of blushing eighteen,
B is the Ball at which first she was seen;
C is the Cheeks that charm'd at each;
D is the Dean-Swain with Frank in the Guards;
E is the Eye that's now laden every;
F is the Fan to speak volubly ever;
G is the Glove that's so tight;
H is the Hand that it hides all;
I is the foot that kind nature demanded,
J is the Jeweller that hasten'd to hand it;
K is the Kerchief, a rare work of art,
L is the lace that conquered the best part;
M is an old Maid that watch'd the girls dance;
N is the Noise here'd up at cock crowing;
O is the Olps, then just in the prime;
P is the Partner this wouldn't keep time;
Q's the Quadrille, let us hope 'twas the Lancers,
R is the Rogue that were made on the dancers;
S is the Supper they seem to have had;
T is the Twaddle they talk'd at the table;
U is the Uncle that thought 'twas a going;
V is the Voice the young lady said "no" in;
W is the Waltz—we all know the sin;
X is his Exit, which wasn't quite straight;
Y is the Yawning after the ball,
Z stands for Zero, and that's nothing at all.

"I saw an excellent thing in your pamphlet," said Daniel O'Connell to a fellow writer.

"Eh? What, sir?" was the eager rejoinder.

"A penny bun, my friend."

"You will see my feet no more," said a romantic young lady to her friends.

"Ah! alas, are you going to dye?"

A CANDID AND CONSCIENTIOUS WITNESS.—A witness, on entering the box, had a Testament presented to him, but he declined to take an oath. Being asked his reason for refusing, he naively replied, "I'll tell a lie wi' my mou' I know, and why not wi' my hand?"

A RECENT CONDITION.—One day, at the table of Carditol Hall, a gentleman, looking to another him, inquired of one of the strangers present, "Monsieur, vous mon, but how did you like your last dinner?" "Oh, very well when you set forth." "Items of your weight and size," was the hungry reply, "it all set crown."

ARISTOCRACY OF FASHION.—The Duchesses of Abergavny, wife to Lucius the Good, Duke of Bourbon, born 1760, is planted in a spot of white sand and all the rest down to him, powdered with gold flour-de-rys, and the other half to the south of gold, with a belt of the delicate in equivalence, doubtless on it, and from the waist a belt of gold crimson, with white bells. The sleeves were white to blue and gold, the other crimson and gold, in addition to the ornaments of the bosom. The ladies dresses and their heads so high, that they were obliged to wear a sort of curved horn on each side of the head, to support the enormous structure of false hair and feathers. And these are what are meant by the "horns of the devouse" so often referred to in old authors. It is said that when Isabel of Bavaria kept her court at Vincennes, A. D. 1410, it was necessary to have doors six feet high and seven high, and wider, to admit the head-dresses of the Queen and her ladies, which were all of this horned kind.

THE ADVANTAGES OF GOOD BREEDING.—Virtue and talents, though allowed to be considerable, will not be of much use to us unless we can procure those whom we have to converse with to allow us the character of agreeable companions. Nobody esteems himself or his performances, when he wears them awry. When polished and cut, then they give a lustre.—LOCKE.

"ODE" MARINE.—Truth is like a rock; you may keep it down while you please, and impose upon it, but it is sure to come up to the surface at last.

THE ARTIST.—A French bonnet-maker told a customer who complained of the price demanded for a new bonnet, "Consider, madam, it cost me three sleepless nights before I could invent it."

QUOTATIONS FOR DINNER-OUT.

Preferring anew from chin that's bare
To whiskers that in whisker's fair!

A CONCEITED MAN.—For my part, I think he is verily like a cock on a thistle, who sees not a pin to purpose to hear him crow.—ADAM BEDE.

AN OPINION ON THE FASHIONS.—"My son," said an old turbaned Turk, one day, taking his child by the hand in the streets of Cairo, and pointing out to him on the opposite side a European lady, "my son, look there! If the sense of Parisian costume; " my son, look there! If you ever forget God and the Prophet, you may come to look like that!"

PROPER COLOR FOR A FOLLOWER'S ATTIRE.—Invisible green.

A HIGH TORY DAME.—He that wears a tight hat is likely to have a narrow understanding.

LOVE, like a watt, is of gradual growth, and the older it is the more difficult to get rid of.

A dandy, who had a splendid mustache, being asked as a party to favor the company with a song, replied that "really—he—couldn't—without—the tone." A beauty, who was near, exclaimed, "Dear, how could he, when he has hair on his face?" A bachelor on your very lip? One has been since married to him—saved her right for her impudence.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A compound of Cocoa-nut Oil, &c., for dressing the Hair. For efficacy and agreeableness, it is without an equal.

It prevents the hair from falling off.
It promotes its healthy and vigorous growth.
It is not greasy or sticky.
It leaves no perceptible odor.
It softens the hair when hard and dry.
It soothes the irritated scalp skin.
It affords the richest lustre.
It remains longest in effect.
It costs fifty cents for a half pint bottle.

Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.

TESTIMONIAL.

BOSTON, July 19, 1857.

☞ MESSRS. J. BURNETT & CO.—I can not refuse to state the salutary effect in my own aggravated case, of your excellent Hair Oil.—COCOAINE.

For many months my hair had been falling off, until I was fearful of losing it entirely. The skin upon my head became gradually more and more inflamed, so that I could not touch it without pain. This irritated condition I attributed to the use of various advertised hair washes, which I have since been told contain corrosive sublimate.

By the advice of my physician, to whom you had shown your process of purifying the Oil, I commenced its use the last week in June. The first application allayed the irritation, and in the course of four days the redness and tenderness disappeared—the hair ceased to fall, and I have now a thick growth of new hair. I trust that others, similarly afflicted, will be induced to try the same remedy.

Yours, very truly,

SUSAN R. POPE.

Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.
Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A single application renders the hair (no matter how stiff and dry) soft and glossy for several days. It is conceded by all who have used it to be the best and cheapest Hair Dressing in the World.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.

For sale by druggists generally at 50 cents a bottle.

Public Speakers and Singers,

"BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES" contain ingredients acting specifically on the organs of the voice; they have an extraordinary tendency to all affections of the throat and lungs, restoring their healthy tone when relaxed, either from a cold, fatigue, or over-use of the voice, and produce a clear and distinct articulation.

Containing nothing that can injure the system, they can be taken at all times, especially for clearing and strengthening the voice.

I recommend their use to Public Speakers.
REV. E. H. CHAPIN, NEW YORK.

"Contain no Opium or any thing injurious."
DR. A. A. HAYES, CHEMIST, BOSTON.

For sale by Druggists.

New Books.

VOL. VII. HOUSEHOLD LIBRARY.

LIFE OF MAHOMET.

By EDWARD GIBBON
With Notes by
DEAN MILMAN AND DR. WILLIAM SMITH.
Illustrated with Engravings on Steel.
12mo, cloth, 50 cents.

Any enfeebled mind's Life of Gibbon is fully corrected by Dean Milman's Notes! We reprint from the last London edition just received in this country, which alone contains the very valuable Notes of Dr. Smith.

"What would Gibbon have said of that gorgeous coloring in which Gibbon has invested the dying forms of Paganism, and darken over opposite in his splendid view of the rise and progress of Mahometanism?

"Gibbon's History is a magnificent work enchantment upon the senses, with dramatic animation—their progress related in a full flow of the richest and most glowing style."—LORD BROUGHAM.

DELISSER & PROCTER, No. 560 Broadway.
Sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price.

NOVELLO'S

CENTENARY EDITIONS OF THE

ORATORIOS.

Original Edition.

Arranged and Edited by VINCENT NOVELLO.

HANDEL'S MESSIAH.....	75 cents.
" " Bound.....	$1 25.
All the Choruses (in score).....	50 cents.
HAYDN'S CREATION.....	75 cents.
" Bound.....	$1 25.
All the Choruses (in score).....	50 cents.

HAYDN'S SEASONS. Paper, $1 50; Bound, $1 63.
MENDELSSOHN'S ST. PAUL. Paper, 75 cents; Bound, $1 25.
MOART'S 12th MASS; HAYDN'S 3d MASS; BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN C, and MOZART'S REQUIEM MASS, each, in Paper, 75 cents; Bound, $1 00.
ROMBERG'S LAY OF THE BELL. Paper, 63 cents; Bound, $1 00.

All the Oratorios of the Great Masters in uniform style at similarly low prices.

Catalogues forwarded gratis.

N. B.—This is the only Cheap Edition of the Oratorios ever published in this country, any statements to the contrary being entirely unfounded. To his careful supervision this edition owes its pre-eminent purity of text and correctness.

WEBB & ALLEN,
1 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, N. Y.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS,
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS,
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS,

THE UNFAILING REMEDY
THE UNFAILING REMEDY
THE UNFAILING REMEDY
FOR
Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia,
Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia,
Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia,
Acidity, Flatulency,
Acidity, Flatulency,
Acidity, Flatulency,

Heart-Burn, Debility of the System,
Heart-Burn, Debility of the System,
Heart-Burn, Debility of the System,

JAUNDICE,
JAUNDICE,
JAUNDICE,

Sick Headache, Loss of Appetite,
Sick Headache, Loss of Appetite,
Sick Headache, Loss of Appetite,

LIVER COMPLAINT,
LIVER COMPLAINT,
LIVER COMPLAINT,

Fever and Ague, Bilious Complaints,
Fever and Ague, Bilious Complaints,
Fever and Ague, Bilious Complaints,

NEURALGIA, NERVOUSNESS,
NEURALGIA, NERVOUSNESS,
NEURALGIA, NERVOUSNESS,

OPPRESSION AFTER EATING,
OPPRESSION AFTER EATING,
OPPRESSION AFTER EATING,

FEMALE COMPLAINTS,
FEMALE COMPLAINTS,
FEMALE COMPLAINTS.

READ THE
Valuable Testimony.
Valuable Testimony.
Valuable Testimony.

When individuals of the highest respectability and influence voluntarily tender their services to the public in favor of a medicine which has cured them of a long-standing and distressing disease, they perform a service of inestimable importance to the country, and should proclaim his longer delay-ing to make use of

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

(From President Smith, of the Wesleyan University.)

STEN. V. FOWLE & CO.—Gentlemen: I first made use of the "OXYGENATED BITTERS" under the advice of my physician, in the month of January last. I had been troubled for several years from a form of dyspepsia, which baffled the skill of the most eminent physicians in the country. Confined to a rock, I was induced by the unpretending recommendations of Dr. Green "to try my bottle, and if no benefit was received to discontinue its use."

The use of one bottle warranted a further trial, to the extent of some three or four, with a careful observance of the accompanying directions. The result was an almost entire relief from the usual dyspeptic symptoms, and their depressing consequences. I believe that these Bitters produced an entire change in the habits of my system, and restored the vital energies of the digestive organs. I now deem myself as exempt from Dyspepsia as most persons are, and can recommend the Bitters to other members of my family.

Very respectfully yours,
AUGUSTUS W. SMITH.

Seth W. Fowle & Co., Proprietors,
BOSTON.

FOR SALE
Everywhere, Everywhere, Everywhere.

Most Patent Medicines are Humbugs;
but DR. TOBIAS'S VENETIAN HORSE LINIMENT is one of all we recommends it for, or the money will be refunded. It is known—and used in every State in the Union—as the best. If you have a pain or ache try a bottle, or sprain, bruise, &c. Price 25 and 50 cents and $1 per bottle. 56 Cortlandt Street, New York.
Sold by all the Druggists.

CURE FOR CONSTIPATION.

The Oriental Fruit Paste, or Aromatic Jelly of Figs and Senna,

Is a simple, pleasant, and effectious laxative medicine, good at all times.

Sold by Druggists every where.
J. J. W. NOEKROSS & CO., Wholesale Agents,
81 Nassau Street, New York.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.

We would call the attention of Druggists and the public to the card of Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co., expressing an opinion in which the public are liable, from the imitation of their celebrated "Cocoaine." This preparation for the hair has deservedly obtained a high reputation, and the spurious preparations which are put up to take the market have a tendency to detract from the high reputation of the genuine article.—Boston Journal.

WORTHY OF NOTE for Coughs, Colds, and Consumption.—Rev. Dr. ELIJAH HEDGES, New York, says: "I have used your Vegetable Pulmonary Balsam myself, with my family, for unsettled coughs and colds, and have known it to be used with good effect in the early stages of Pulmonary affections in families around me."

Owing to an unprecedented sale and popularity of the above unrivalled remedy, there are many counterfeits and imitations against which the public are cautioned.

Inquire for the "VEGETABLE PULMONARY BALSAM."

Prepared only by DR. SETH ARNOLD, Chemist,
Price, large bottles, $1; small, 50 cents.
BARNES & CARLE, Agents, New York.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

This compound will be found a great promoter of health, when taken in the spring, to expel the foul humors which fester in the blood at that season of the year. By the timely expulsion of them many rankling disorders are nipped in the bud. Manifesting, by the aid of this remedy, upon themselves from the outbreak of foul eruptions and ulcerous sores, through which the system will strive to rid itself of corruptions, if not assisted to do this through the natural channels of the blood, to the more concealed and formidable forms of internal organic derangement. Cleanse the vitiated blood whenever you find its impurities bursting through the skin in pimples, eruptions, or sores; cleanse it when you find it lie stagnated and sluggish in the veins; cleanse it whenever it is foul, and your feelings will tell you when. Keep the blood pure, and the health of the body will follow. Many will then enjoy better health, and live longer, for cleansing the blood. Keep the blood healthy, and all is well; but with the inpulses of life disordered, there can be no lasting health. Sooner or later something must go wrong, and the great machinery of life is disordered or overthrown.

IT CURES

SCROFULA AND SCROFULOUS COMPLAINTS, ERUPTIONS AND ERUPTIVE DISEASES, ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, TUMORS, SALT RHEUM, BOILS, TETTER AND TETTER DISEASE, ST. ANTHONY'S FIRE, ERYSIPELAS, SYPHILITIC AFFECTIONS, MERCURIAL DISEASE, DROPSY, NEURALGIA OR DISMEMBERMENT, HEART DISEASE, and INDIGESTION, EXHAUSTION, ROSE OR ST. ANTHONY'S FIRE, and indeed the whole class of complaints arising from IMPURITIES OF THE BLOOD.

In order to secure their complete eradication from the system, the sufferer should be particular in strictly adhering to directions on the bottle.

Prepared by
DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass.
Price $1 per Bottle; Bottles for $5
Sold by all Druggists every where.

New York Purchasing Agency,

W. H. APPLETON, 15 Nassau Street.

Persons desirous of sending to the United States for any article, can have it purchased at the lowest prices, by Book to a Steam-Engine, a Shawl to a Cooking-Stove. Their orders will be executed with the most careful attention, at 3 per cent. commission charge. Refers to G. L. Seguin, Sen., Consul for Long Island and Texas; to Lea, Gillet & Sons, Hastings, Plimpton & Co., New York; J. J. Dennistoun & Co., New Orleans.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR FLOWERS, FEATHERS, COMPLIMENTS, and BRIDAL SETS, at 251 Broadway, 2 doors from Franklin Street.

To all who use Horses.—DR. TOBIAS'S VENETIAN HORSE LINIMENT is warranted to cure, in only 30 cents, is warranted cheaper and superior than any article in the market. Sold by the sole Agents, Lamerson & all kinds, Colic, &c., &c. This is no humbug. Sold by all Druggists. Price 25 cents and 50 cents per bottle. Depot, 56 Cortlandt Street, New York.

Sold every where.

STATEN ISLAND

Fancy Dyeing Establishment.

Barrett Nephews & Co.,

Offices, 5 and 7 John Street.
(2 doors from Broadway),
New York.

To Housekeepers!!!—To prevent your linen from turning yellow, use Dr. Tobias's Venetian Horse Liniment. It is universally admitted to be the most concentrated and valuable Liniment in the world.

VALENTINE & BUTLER, No. 321 Broadway.

COCOAINE.

From the high respectability and great skill of Mr. Burnett as a chemist, we herald with pleasure the introduction of any thing coming from his hands. His celebrated toilet preparations have already obtained the popularity from one part of the Union to the other; and I cannot but congratulate the ladies that now no less once are always sure to give them the preference as standard articles for the toilet. Aside from their elegance, they are the purest and best articles known for the purposes for which they are recommended.—Atlthorn Gazette.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

PRICES REDUCED TO $50, $75, AND $125.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE,

the price of which is only $50, is a light and elegantly decorated Machine, capable of performing, in the best style, all the work of a family of ordinary size.

SINGER'S TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE MACHINE,

to be sold at $75, is a Machine entirely new in its arrangement; it is very beautiful, moves rapidly and very easily, and is capable of executing every embroidering purpose, in the very best and cheapest Machine ever offered to the public.

SINGER'S No. 1 STANDARD SHUTTLE MACHINE,

formerly sold at $125, but now reduced to $110, is unsurpassed in the world. Every sort of work can be done with it.

SINGER'S No. 2 STANDARD SHUTTLE MACHINE,

This is the favorite manufacturing Machine every where. Price, with table complete, $125.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which is a beautiful pictorial paper, entirely devoted to the subject. It will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
458 Broadway, New York.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano. Guano from Ichaboe Island, in the Indian Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at moderate and retail at less than two thirds the price of Peruvian. For particulars address C. E. MARSHALL, Pres't American Guano Co., 66 William Street, New York.

To Teachers.

My Correspondence with Schools will continue as heretofore, in the "Care of HARPER & BROTHERS, New York City." Circulars, containing Terms, Testimonials, and Post-Office Address of Schools, Educational Reports, &c., are ADDRESS. MARCUS WILLSON.

Rockbridge Alum Springs, Va.

ROUTE TO THE SPRINGS—FACILITY OF ACCESS.

This celebrated watering-place, although situated in the mountains of Virginia, 160 miles West of Richmond, and 40 Southwest of Staunton, is now brought, by the Virginia Central Railroad, within easy access of the Atlantic seaboard, and to the first of all the Western Springs reached by the traveler. The cars now run within five miles of it.

This is brought within 54 hours of New-York—and the Northern passenger, leaving Baltimore, or Washington, or Alexandria in the morning, and the Southern, breakfasting in Richmond, take but the same evening at the Rockbridge Springs.

☞ Let the Northern traveler be careful not to go as far South as Richmond, but, from Washington, take either the Alexandria and Orange Railroad to Gordonsville, which there connects with the Central.

The Southern visitor, to reach this place by the shortest and cheapest route, must be careful to come as far North as Richmond, making this a point whence he will come by the Central cars. From the Southwest it is approached by the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad to Bedford or Lynchburg.

The Natural Bridge being in the same county with this Spring, and to which it gives its name, is an object of great attraction to the visitors.

Medical Properties of the Water.

For 30 years or more these Springs (without any other sort of advertising than that afforded by the waters themselves, who have either experienced or witnessed the cures wrought by them) have gradually extended their fame throughout Virginia and the South, and the unanimous region is remarkable for the number and variety of its mineral and thermal waters, and for the disparagement to the very best of them to say that, for tonic and variety of its applicability to disease, and its power in many of the most obstinate and dangerous maladies, it stands without a rival.

The Proprietors have great pleasure in presenting the following letters from distinguished gentlemen of different States and professions. The first is from Dr. Cartwright, of New Orleans, whose eminence as a medical character, no less than his personal familiarity with the leading Mineral Springs of Europe and this country, stamps his opinion with the highest authority:

Dr. Cartwright's Letter.

NEW ORLEANS, July 28, 1858.

DEAR SIR:

Names are something, and the name "Alum," given to the Rockbridge Alum Springs, is significant in a high manner, as it conveys the erroneous idea that their medicinal virtues are due to alum, or to the sulphate of potash; whereas, the water, in addition to the alum, contains sulphate of iron, and is, in fact, one of the celebrated Mineral Springs of Virginia. Under the circumstance, give it a name that would not lead to error? Why not drop the word alum altogether, and call it Rockbridge water? The Rockbridge water may, with as much propriety, be called alkaline, as it contains more than common salt and alum can be had any where; no need of going to Rockbridge or Botetourt to get alum or salt for that. But the Rockbridge and the Rockbridge waters both contain a number of other ingredients, as iron, magnesia, and the salts of lime, magnesia, and soda, with more or less of the sulphates of potash and iron. The medicinal ingredients in the waters of Rockbridge and Bath Mineral Springs of England, are identical in their nature, and nearly so in their quantities; and the same remedies may be given with equal propriety in the one as in the other. Chapple is a chalybeate containing a little alum and common salt. It is nearly the same water as is Chapple Springs, internally and externally used, for long years because the best remedy for some eruptions, like septic taint, transparency, and tenderness character of the scrofulous ferruginous diathesis. The Springs in Virginia, attractive invalids to use them, as the same resource qualities in the Bath waters were the first known after the conquest of England.

Although the waters of both the Rockbridge and Bath are black and of rather repulsive appearance in the Springs. In this it is necessary to be on one's guard as a matter of diagnosis, as Upper Germany is covered with springs from a mixture of a similar geological formation with that of the mountain in the vicinity of Rockbridge Springs. The Sagoutes water has long been very popular for the cure of affections of the liver, dyspepsia, dyspepsia, chronic enteritis, and chronic dysentery. Alum is not the active ingredient in it that the most careful analysis has failed to find in it. The Rockbridge water contains alum, but less than I like water, but is richer in every thing else. It contains more iron, and is, in my opinion, more active, artificially, if that word is admissible. The Virginia water is largely recommended for the cure of diseases of the kidneys, bladder, urinary canal, and the diseases of the kidneys, liver alone, and chronic disfigurements of the skin, caused by diseased viscera.

The Springs of Spa, in Guertha, so celebrated throughout Europe for chronic visceral engorgements, intermittents, visceral catarrhs, and debility of the digestive organs, contain no other active principle than what may be supposed to be the water of the Rockbridge Springs, and might, with a small addition of alum, be made to resemble it; they hold in solution a considerable quantity of alum.

The waters of Pyrmont, in Germany, are famous in dyspeptic system, and in the cure of scorbutic affections, visceral engorgements, passive hemorrhages, and chronic diarrhœa. Epsom salts, or, what is the same thing, the sulphate of magnesia, alumina, chloride of sodium, and the peroxide of iron, all of which are found in them in larger proportions thirty times as much in the Rockbridge Springs, are the active principles which give to this water a character of a purgative, a much milder and safer one than the waters of Rockbridge.

In 1826, I made use of no water in Europe or America so much in medicinal virtues as that of the Rockbridge Springs. Since then I was first attracted to it some fifteen years ago, by chronic diarrhœa, and since that the Rockbridge Springs water has been composed of invaluable virtues, while those at the Springs, and in the vicinity of the Springs, have been found more beneficial in dyspepsia than health. Most of those other Springs in Virginia are too much alum and too little iron. The medicinal efficacy of their water in a variety of chronic affections will be found to be in the proportion of their iron to the amount of alum. Alum is more in accordance with the circumstances of living organisms than iron, but the richness of living seen in their true light is in the richness of all the elements of the organic and inorganic kingdoms in the composition of mineral waters which the most famous Springs of Europe contain.

Respectfully, your friend,

SAM'L A. CARTWRIGHT.

To Wm. Frazier, Esq.,
Rockbridge Springs, Rockbridge County, Va.

Extracts from a Letter of Rev. JAMES W. ALEXANDER, D. D., of New-York, published in the New York Observer.

THE ALUM SPRINGS OF VIRGINIA.—Much as has been said about the mineral and tonal wealth of Virginia, the resource of the country is greater than will ever be known except by visiting the Springs named above. As between the Springs of Virginia and those of Germany, I have not been frequently disturbed than here. My observation will apply principally to the Rockbridge Springs, as it is this only at which I have remained any considerable time. And my reason for adding a place in your columns will be, I am better that these waters are eminently fitted to relieve thousands of sufferers, whose case is seldom reached by artificial medicines.

The Rockbridge Alum Springs is in the same county with the famous Natural Bridge, but, in the Northern part of it, on the high road between Lexington and the celebrated Warm Springs, being about twenty miles from the latter. The Alum Springs derive their name from the great preponderant taste to the water, the medicinal qualities of the Springs are much more varied. Besides alum, they contain sulphate of iron, magnesia, and a few traces of lime, and the sulphates of potash, lime, and magnesia. The following statement is from the analyses of Professors Rogers and Hayes, in any degree approximate to the truth, which, from the nature of the case, is well known, that agents which are inert or hurtful in their combinations, may become active and curative in the proceeding from nature's laboratory. The same resident physician, who has had the charge of the Springs for a number of years, informs me that the mixture of nitrogen and oxygen make, in one gallon of the water, about a pint of gaseous matter, chiefly carbonic acid. This is, in my opinion, of great importance, as it is well known that the sulphuretted hydrogen of the Virginia White Sulphur Springs exists in a large degree in the Rockbridge Alum Springs, and that the sulphates of iron, are as strong and potent in the one as in the other. Hence, I am not surprised that by classes of sufferers we have had instantaneous from these Springs.

Many years ago it was known by hunters that an Alum Spring existed in the neighborhood. But no buildings were erected, people who had sickness, letters, sick themselves, went to the Springs, and found relief, and were cured. The next step was to enlarge cabins; and now, at last, we have a large, commodious, and elegant house of entertainment.

A dish-like vale, or basin, in the midst of hard but picturesque mountains, is the spot where the water which flows five chalybeate bowl in the rock, at the base of a hill of slate, not quite a quarter of a mile distant from the many square feet below, while it is surrounded by a crest of forest trees. The Springs are 1,200 feet above the ocean level, is begun by a number of brick cottages, here and there among the trees, all in connection with the main hotel. The verdure is rich, and the views of the North Mountains quite picturesque, and in the distance sublime.

If some lesser Springs, are pleasing: It is one of the singular advantages of the Rockbridge Springs, that they are not crowded. Last season, I think, one single gourd with one ince glass and tangled vine covered the whole. Around a thicket of trees, which, in the autumn, is gay with fine trees and enriched with a luxurious lines. The embodiments no longer I have seen, and, from the scarlet-mad lily, the fragrant agrostis cæruleis, the delicate spiranthes gracilis, and the splendid gentiana elegans, the gaudy cardinalis flower, and orange fungi and lichens, present their tints.

The alum waters (for the Springs vary in character) are, by the Professors Rogers, of the University of Virginia, Chemist, of Richmond, is published as follows:

"They are distinguished by the presence of alum, sulphate of iron, sulphate of magnesia, lime, and other malignant alterations of the mouth, and the sulphates of potash, soda, and chlorides of sodium and magnesium. They are laxative, and therefore, according to the doctrine of the secretions generally to a healthy condition, particularly in cases of fever, where there is a deficiency of secretion, excessive, or of bad quality. Its purgative action is considerably modified by the presence of alum, and especially by the tonic and astringent properties of the latter.

"They are useful in the general conditions of the constitution, involving, as their disease necessarily do, an unhealthy condition of the blood, and are, therefore, in the most powerful such astonishing cures; thus it is that it has cured scrofula in all its forms, and in every stage of its progress, from the first appearance of a purgative or scirrhous tumor, to the opening of the abscess, and the most unhealthy discharge, and the healing of the ulcer, and that with constipation or diarrhœa. Unlike most other mineral waters, it is equally useful in either state of the excesses of the year, and, when sent away in barrels or bottles, it improves by age, and is not injured by exposure to heat.

One or two surprising cases were pointed out to us at the Springs. One was that of a young lady, deaf from a fever, though much disfigured, is a marvel in respect to the restoration of hearing, and another was that of a child of system as to destroy half the upper jaw-bone, several of the teeth coming out with the pieces of bone. Both these children visited the Alum Springs for eight years, and is perfectly cured. Dr. Mitchell, of this city, has recommended the Alum Springs to many of his patients, and has never cancered sore on the nose, which had baffled all medical skill, and many other surprising instances of the cure of dyspepsia and chronic diarrhœas are occurring daily. The Alum Springs are not a universal panacea, nobody rece and knows all about them. They are not a mere fashionable resort, though fashion finds its votaries, as our guards and outlines. We have felt it to be a duty to make these remarks, as we have been frequently asked to give them.

The hotel is truly delightful; the company is usually of the best character, and the proprietors afford all facilities for the maintenance of health and comfort of their guests.

From DR. GRAHAM, late President of the Virginia Board of Public Works.

"The Rockbridge Alum Springs began to attract attention about the year 1832. Their waters are strongly impregnated with alum, sulphate of iron, lime, and camping out, sleeping for weeks in their wagons and on the ground, and drinking the water, were cured. The use of these waters in the cure of eruptive and cutaneous diseases, as well as in many of the diseases of the liver and digestive and indolent ulcers, among them many of a scrofulous character, is very remarkable.

"In consequence of these successful cures the reputation of these waters has extended to other countries, and other diseases were induced to give them a trial. Among these were dyspepsia and chronic diarrhœa, and they have been found to possess more remedial virtue, curing more obstinate cases of these diseases than any other mineral waters with which I am acquainted.

"As a cure for scrofula or King's Evil in its various stages of development, and for cutaneous diseases, and suppurating in small, flat pustules about the mouth and ears of children, and for chronic diarrhœa, dysentery, inflammation and ulceration of the glands and neck, the result has been astonishing. Cases of great debility and prostration of the system, from whatever cause originating, will find the tonic properties of these waters very beneficial and restorative.

"The reputation of these Springs is daily increasing, every year adds to the list of invalids who have there been effected. The visitors who frequent them entertain the highest opinion of the Alum Springs in the State, only excepting the White Sulphur."

Extracts from Letter from REV. DR. HALL of Trenton, N. J.

This Spring suffers disadvantage from the imperfect designation given in its name. The predominant taste is of alum, which is the largest ingredient of the mixture; but with it are combined iron, lime, magnesia, soda, with sulphuric, muriatic, and potash, and the chief solvents are carbonic and carbonic acid. It seems to be admirably adapted to the cases which I have seen in which they have been called to detect none of its most potent constituents. Certain it is that the Springs are a most efficient agent in restoring the digestive and bilious system, diseased or healthy, than can be selected from the whole list of Springs, or any ordinary calculation of their medicines.

To the intelligence of the plain observer, the arrangement describes itself as a mass of some of the most efficient medicines which the laboratory of a kind Providence has prepared for the relief of human ailments, and placed in the very bosom of the most exuberant vegetation, and at the springs of the mountains and the rate of the clouds.

The climate of the Rockbridge Alum Springs is reported to are all the scribe and circumscribe in general. It has cured many cases of consumption, and the most delightful accessible places of the seaboard. The ride over the mountains, passage of the Rockfish Gap; but it will keep at a distance from the Alum Springs. I am not in the habit of such cases of church and pastor; as we are, we have not been ill a day since we left home, and have been in the midst of the most malignant and malarious sickness with our countrymen from every quarter. The air of the mountains is very pure, under the exhilarating influence of a common faith and common affections, in the holy and reverend Old Church Lord's own day.

The following valuable letter is from Dr. MOORMAN, long the resident physician at the White Sulphur Springs, and author of many valuable works on the Mineral Springs of Virginia, a new edition of which is now in press:

OAKWOOD, March 24, 1857.

MY DEAR SIR:

I have received the pamphlet you were so kind as to send me, and thank you for the opportunity of perusing it. It contains much valuable matter in elucidation of the peculiar character of the Rockbridge Alum Water, in various obstinate diseases, and of which I shall avail myself in my forthcoming work, which, indeed, the publication has afforded me, personally, my new light as to the value of the Alum Springs. Heretofore, I had long appreciated it in all such cases before, and have long been in the habit of sending to them invalids from all parts of the Southern portion of the world. But, as affording convenient testimony, I shall be glad to receive it from an author.

It is a matter of no little importance that the public should be informed of the valuable discoveries incorporated by the Rockbridge Alum Waters in strumous diseases especially, and which have been long known to me, my profession, and never but in those waters has a tenable been found combining the active virtues of all their ores.

In my opinion I have expressed in my volume on this subject not to your judgment, in no way was useful in increasing or extending the public appreciation of the value of these waters, but more as a testing agent, it is, of course, very much at your service.

I remain, dear sir, very truly yours, &c.

J. J. MOORMAN.

To Wm. Frazier, Esq.

Extract from Dr. Moorman's New Work on the Mineral Waters of Virginia, page 376, et seq.

"The immediate effects of the waters under their full and kindly influences upon the system, are those of a gentle stimulation, producing the natural and healthful vegetable medicines of that class; but superior to them in the fact that they never leave the system in a state of reaction, or of debility, as do the latter, but more powers they receive the congestions of engorged viscera, and the morbid secretions, and excretions, and the healthful tone and activity to the tissue, they fill up the superficial capillaries of the skin, and give to the face a healthful glow of color, face and rich skin.

"They operate mildly, perhaps, two thirds of the persons that use them freely. Their action upon the kidneys is also considerable, and is very generally observed. Their action upon the skin is secondary, and is the result of the general impression of the system upon the functional organs, by receiving inflammation and congestion from the liver, and the other viscera, and restoring the healthful tone and action.

"Experience has fully shown that these waters are very effectual remedies in many diseases of the liver and the digestive system: lupus, and other malignant ulcerations, and in many diseases of the skin, and of the kidneys.

"In various chronic affections of the digestive organs, these waters are unsurpassing the virtues of any other mineralogously used.

"They are very valuable in neuralgic affections, particularly in persons, old or young, of scorbutic tendencies.

"Chronic diarrhœas they display acutely and happy effects.

"Being prone to produce a healthful action in the circulation, they are found very beneficial in chronic affections of the kidneys, bladder, urinary, and uterine organs.

"In several of the affections commonly known as female diseases they are very happily adapted. In irregularities of the menstrual flow, whether too profuse or scanty, they are an absolutely remedy, often curing that class of diseases which have been long considered incurable. In menorrhagia, unattended with pleurisy of the lungs, or tendency to it, and in those cases of amenorrhœa, they may be prescribed with great confidence. In leucorrhœa and prolapsus uteri, and in many other diseases of the uterine system, and in many of the nervous sympathetics, they may be used to eminent advantage. In the dysmenorrhœa of young persons of scrofulous habit, especially when the tendency is great to passive or profuse flow, they will be found of much advantage.

"In anæmic conditions generally, and in cases of debility and nervousness, the waters are peculiarly suited, and be administered with much confidence.

"In dyspepsia, which is perhaps with a strumous diathesis, may be treated by these waters to great advantage. Indeed, they will be found to be one of the best remedies for this disease.

"In Gastralgia, or nervous dyspepsia, they often act like a charm, relieving the pain, the nausea, and even the morbid secretions, and relieving it of its subacute and chronic character.

"They actively promote the appetite and invigorate the digestive powers.

"But it is especially in Scrofula that these waters have won their highest honors and established a reputation, not only among the best mineral waters of this country, but of the world. Their happy combination of tonic, alterative, diuretic, and aperient qualities, render them peculiarly appropriate to the cure of this disease, and especially in the various forms of strumous disease, such as tumors, white swellings, caries, ulcerations, fistulæ, lupus, and the various forms of cutaneous affections, whether exhibiting itself in the hardened and enlarged glands, and in the tumors of the joints, in the white swellings; in mesenteric indurations, or in its more intense and spreading development of adult life, they have been extensively used, and generally with great benefit to the sufferer.

If invalids who really need the waters would consult their own best interests, they would not defer their visit till the crowded months of July and August, but would, if possible, come in April, May, and June, when they can be in much better cared for and attended to. The water is never used to better advantage than in the spring and early summer months, while their power has been a year, in the history of the Springs-place, in which the accommodations for visitors equal those of the first places.

While its value as a medicinal agent is well established in the South, it has been one of the chief purposes to render it more and more attractive to the social, refined and cultivated people who usually, more and more, seek its quiet shades. Every effort is making to spare no reasonable pains or expense in catering for the tastes of such; and, besides affording the best medicinal waters, both for bathing and gentlemen, they have engaged a superior band from New York to furnish music as well for the lawn as the ball-room.

The water bottled at the spring is kept constantly on hand and for sale by HEADMAN & CO., druggists, New York; Bixie & Wyeth, druggists, Philadelphia; Coleman & Rodgers, druggists, Baltimore; Father & Winston, Richmond, Va.; R. S. Booker, Lynchburg, Va.; Haviland, Clark & Company, Mobile, Ala.; and James Symes, New Orleans. It may be ordered from any of these houses with perfect confidence in its purity and freshness.

Pamphlets, with all particulars and many certificates, sent by mail on application.

FRAZIER & RANDOLPH, Proprietors.

☞ Every number of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE contains from 30 to 50 pages—and from one half to one third more reading matter than any other Magazine.

Close of the Eighteenth Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR MAY

The Publishers believe that the Eighteen Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE now issued contain a larger amount of entertaining and instructive reading than can be found in any other periodical of the day.

Each Number has contained a part of THACKERAY'S Virginians, a story pronounced by many far superior in advance of its publication to anything that he has ever written. Each Number has contained a Novelette, and that of CHARLES LEVER'S heretofore unpublished story, "Davenport Dunn," is promised for the present; to be ORIGINAL, written by an American author, for HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

At no period since the commencement of the Magazine has it been more widely and cordially received by the reading public; and the Publishers refer to the contents of the numbers issued during the past year as evidence of the exertions made to meet the patronage of the American public.

From the London Literary Gazette, January 1st:

"We must refer in terms of eulogy to the high tone and sound sentiment which HARPER'S MAGAZINE is pursuing with a monthly circulation of about 150,000 copies. We have great hope to be found among the most high and general reading of the day. We speak of this work from evidence of our own eyes, and from the testimony of it has acquired in merited. Each Number contains fully as much good work—and it is conducted in itself the very monthly and the Publishers are entitled to the highest credit with the best features of the daily journal. It has great merit in the creation and dissemination of a love of pure literature."

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	3 00
Five Copies for One Year (each)	2 50

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $5.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. Postage, Thirty-six Cents a Year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

EVER CENTS A NUMBER; $3 00 A YEAR.

The Publishers have the pleasure of announcing that they have received from the pen of the Hon. JEFFERSON DAVIS, the early proof-sheets of MR. CHARLES DICKENS' New Story, entitled "TRUMPS," and "OUR MUTUAL CITIES," splendidly illustrated by MCLENAN, the publication of which will be commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

The Publishers also take pleasure in announcing that they have purchased the splendid Picture of the Imperial Festal Tale of American Life, entitled "TRUMPS," by WILLIAM LIGHTFOOT, Author of "The Polished Corner," and other Notes of a Visit to Cuba. The first Number appeared in HARPER'S WEEKLY for April 9.

The Tales by CHARLES DICKENS and WILKIE COLLINS have been being constantly reprinted and may be obtained of all Booksellers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY has now reached a very prosperous being in the country successfully POSTED UP TO THE TIMES, and, in addition to its literary merits, is the best illustrated ORGAN MATTER, or so fully illustrated a history of the times as HARPER'S WEEKLY has been. Every Agricultural ARTISTS AND ENGRAVERS for illustrating this publication, and no pains or expense is spared to render it the best in the United States. This is the CHEAPEST AND BEST family newspaper in the country, and the Publishers confidently request any other paper

THE AMERICAN STUDENT AT OXFORD.

ENRAGED PROCTOR. "Sir, you are Smoking in the High Street!"
FRESHMAN (from America.) "Wa-al, old hoss!—Guess I could ha' told yeow that!"

IRATE PROCTOR. "Sir, I sent you back to your College only five minutes ago, to invest yourself in your Academical Costume!"
FRESHMAN (from America, with affability.) "Yes! and here we are again! Isn't it odd?"

"You've no call to be afeard of my Dawg, Marm, if you will but keep yourn off of 'im!"

The Great Family Paper.
The Great Family Paper.
The Great Family Paper.
The Great Family Paper.
The Great Family Paper.

The Proprietor of the NEW YORK LEDGER has the pleasure of announcing that CHARLES DICKENS, who is universally conceded to be the most popular Author living, has been engaged to write a Tale expressly for the columns of the LEDGER, and that he is now at work upon it. Advance sheets of Mr. Dickens' stories have at different times been obtained by American publishers, but this is the first time that a Tale has been written expressly and solely for an American periodical by such an eminent European Author as Mr. DICKENS, and yet Mr. BONNER would not have the public suppose that he thinks there is any thing very remarkable about the engagement; it is only part and parcel of his policy.

The LEDGER has now a larger circulation than any ten literary papers in the country, and is constantly increasing. MR. BONNER secures the best talent, irrespective of cost, and is, consequently, enabled to make THE BEST PAPER.

Terms of the LEDGER, $2 a year; two copies, $3.

Address all Letters to

ROBERT BONNER,
Publisher,
44 Ann Street,
New York.

P. P. P.
PARK'S PRICKLY PLASTERS.

They sooth pain; they protect the chest; they extract the coagulated impurities and excesses from the system; they impart strength; they are divided in sections, and yield to the motion of the body; they are porous; all impure secretions pass off, and they can not become offensive, hence, are freely worn four times longer than any other plaster, and are cheaper at 25 cents than others at 10. Where these Plasters are, pain can not enter. Weak persons should use Park's delicious Rennet, or any affected with sick, dumb aches pains, should try them. You will then know what they are. They are a new feature in the science of medicine. All Druggists have them. Take no other. Each Plaster bears a Medicine Stamp and our Signature.

BARNES & PARK, 13 and 15 Park Row, N. Y.
JOHN P. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio.

PHALON & SON'S
COCOÏNE

FOR DRESSING AND PRESERVING THE HAIR.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
Price 25 and 50 Cents per Bottle.

J. RUSSELL SPALDING'S
ROSEMARY

is the best dressing for the hair known.
The Rosemary will restore hair to bald places.
The Rosemary will remove dandruff.
The Rosemary is the best thing for children's hair.
The Rosemary has not been and can not be surpassed, according to all a clean, healthy scalp and beautiful hair.
The Proprietor can furnish proof to sustain the assertions above. Beware of not adult the voluntary certificates from persons who have used it with success. If you are not satisfied, try it.
Every bottle, genuine, has the signature of the sole Proprietor, J. Russell Spalding, 21 Vesonet Street, Boston, Mass.
Sold by Dealers generally.

Howe's Universal Elliptic Spring Bed
Boston, from $4 50 to $6, at retail at No. 379 Broadway. Factories or send for circular.

PRINCE IMPERIAL
CHAMPAGNE.

FROM
DE VENOGE & CO., EPERNAY, FRANCE,
As used at the
IMPERIAL TABLES OF THE CONTINENT OF EUROPE.
Can be had at all the leading hotels, and from all the principal dealers throughout the country.

B. V. HAUGHWOUT, Sole Importer,
CORNER OF BROADWAY AND BROOME STREET.

From among numerous flattering testimonials I beg to submit the following, from some of the leading purchasers of Champagne in the City:

From the Howard Hotel.
New York, April 7th, 1859.

MR. B. V. HAUGHWOUT:
Dear Sir:—In reply to your inquiry relative to the merits of the PRINCE IMPERIAL CHAMPAGNE purchased from you, I take pleasure in stating that it has given entire satisfaction to my customers, and I consider it an excellent wine, and one which I can confidently recommend to the public.
Yours respectfully,
J. E. KINGSLEY.

From the St. Nicholas Hotel.
We have tried the PRINCE IMPERIAL CHAMPAGNE, and cordially endorse the above recommendation.
TREADWELL, WHITCOMB & CO.

From the Metropolitan Hotel.
Having tested the PRINCE IMPERIAL CHAMPAGNE, we have no hesitation in endorsing the foregoing statement.
GEORGE PITCHS.
S. LELAND & CO.

From the Astor House.
Those who have tried the wine like it very much.
C. A. STETSON.

From the Western Hotel.
I do, with pleasure, concur with the above.
T. D. WINCHESTER.

From the Jones House.
I cheerfully add my testimony to the above recommendations.
HENRY A. ELLIS.

I have sold a large quantity of PRINCE IMPERIAL CHAMPAGNE, which has given perfect satisfaction to my customers, and I consider it a very superior wine.
HENRY A. ELLIS.

Wholesale and Retail Grocer, 746 Broadway.

We have tried the PRINCE IMPERIAL CHAMPAGNE, and think well of it ourselves, and so also do our customers.
R. TUSSELL & CO., Maiden Lane,
Formerly Clark & Brown.

BAILEY & CO.,
619 CHESTNUT STREET,
Philadelphia.
(Adjoining U. S. Mint.)
The largest manufacturers of
BRITISH STANDARD SILVER WARE
in the United States.

Guaranteed to be of the above quality. All Silver Ware sold by them is manufactured on the premises—Amayed by J. C. Booth, Esq., of the U. S. Mint.
DIAMONDS, PEARLS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, PLATED WARES, BRONZES, &c.

DO YOU USE IT? TRY IT! TRY IT!
R. LYON'S
KATHAIRON
FOR THE HAIR
USED BY ALL AND SOLD EVERYWHERE.
ONLY 25 CENTS PER BOTTLE.

Strangers Visiting New York SHOULD VISIT GENIN'S BAZAAR,
507 & 513 Broadway, St. Nicholas Hotel,
Comprising TWENTY DEPARTMENTS in entry branch of business essential to the outfit of Ladies and children, and every article for the equipment of Gentlemen and Men of Fashion.
IT IS TRULY
ONE OF THE LIONS OF NEW YORK.
Communicating with the Bazaar, and forming the fourth Commissioner, is GENIN'S HAT STORE,
The largest Hat Store in America.
The GREATEST VARIETY of ORIGINAL STYLES to be found on this Continent.
Strangers coming to the city as buyers, or says "Lookers on in Vienna," should visit the BAZAAR and ONE OF THE CURIOSITIES OF TRADE, having no parallel or rival on either side of the Atlantic.

SHELDON & CO., 115 Nassau Street, N. Y.
Have just Published:
The "Precious Stones of the Heavenly Foundations." $1 00.
The Life and Times of Carey, Marshman, and Ward. 2 vols. $5 00.
Spurgeon's Sermons. 6th Series. $1 00.
The Losing and Taking of Heaven. $1 00.
The Pillow of Fire. $1 25.
The Baptist Church Directory. 63 cents.
Daily Thoughts for a Child. By Mrs. Thomas Godart. 40 cents.
Ready Next Week:
The Christian Graces. By Rev. J. P. Thompson, D.D. 75 cents.
The Bible in the East. By Rev. S. I. Prime, D.D. 75 cents.
Truth in Every Thing. By Mrs. Tilton Goldart. 60 cts.
The above, as well as all of our publications, sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the retail price.

Great French Novel
Now Ready.
THE ROMANCE
OF A
POOR YOUNG MAN.
By Octave Feuillet. Translated from the Seventh Paris Edition.
12mo, Cloth, Neatly, price $1 00.

"The Romance of a Poor Young Man' has recently appeared in Paris, and has been hailed by both French and English critics as perhaps the most striking and admirable work of fiction that has appeared in any country during the year 1858. Indeed, since the world started the novel-reading world, we hardly remember another production of the kind which, for beauty and interest, can be compared with this."—New York Tribune.

Booksellers are requested to order the $1 00 edition, which is the correct translation, published and sent by mail, postage free, by
RUDD & CARLETON, PUBLISHERS,
130 Grand Street, New York.

Now Ready, the Second Edition of GOETH'S POEMS AND BALLADS,
TRANSLATED BY
PROF. AYTOUN, of the Edinburgh University, and THEO. MARTIN.
12mo, Cloth, $1 25.
[From the London Saturday Review.]
No great poet has ever seemed to write like Goethe. The notes, the words, and the tones of the original are all reproduced by a version which is a miracle of imitative art. We regard the translations of Goethe's lyrics as the very best that have been executed of German or any other poet. They are likely to become classics.
("London Times.")
It is one of the most extraordinary feats in the way of translation that we know.
(From Lewes's Life and Works of Goethe.)
"They are instinct with life and beauty, against which no prejudice can stand. They give eternal form to feelings the most various, and to feelings that are true. They are gay, enjoyable, playful, tender, passionate, resentful, reflective, and picturesque; now simple as the tone which beats time in your head, now laden with weighty thought; at one moment reflecting with cheerful calm the wisdom of the world, at another, at another sobbing forth the sorrows which press a cry from the heart."
DELISSER & PROCTER,
19 Broadway, N. Y.
Copies sent per mail, prepaid, on receipt of price.

A Nuisance—Its Remedy.
"FELLOWS has dyed his beard locks and beards. A regiment may be encountered any fine day on Broad-way, with that dead color-bleached hue of the hair-dye green. Nobody is deceived. A dyed bean looks like the devil, confessedly, and speaking. Every barber has a sign of hair-dye. The quantity of that forlorn swindle sold must be immense."—Tribune.
That's a fact. You can always tell persons that use hair-dye. It is a nuisance, and a fraud, which one can not submit to. We will, however, just whisper to the gray-haired friends who wish to restore their hair to its natural color, that HERMETICAL RESTORATIVE, acting on the natural secretions at the roots of the hair, restores (not dyes) it to precisely its natural and original color. Try it."—Troy Whig.
Sold by every druggist. Price 50 cents a bottle.
W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

FRED. S. COZZENS,
WINE MERCHANT,
Offers for sale Vintages Wines of the finest qualities of his own importation.
RARE OLD BRANDIES,
SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND ISABELLA WINES,
from N. Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio.
73 WARREN STREET,
(Opposite Hudson River Railroad, New York.)

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.
We are sorry to perceive that shallow knave stepped to the nefariously of attempting to deprive Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co. of the just reward of their skill and enterprise, which is offered in the form of what is the justly celebrated and very valuable "COCOAINE," while it is quite another article, made in New York, and called, to avoid a positive imitation, "Cocoine."
This is a poor subterfuge, and should not be suffered to be practised to the injury of the very respectable and responsible gentlemen who have devoted so much time, care, and capital to inventing and making known the genuine article.—Boston Post.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency corner of Seventh and Louisiana streets of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 125.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TO OUR READERS.

THE proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY are happy to announce that they are making arrangements in Europe for the prompt illustration of the leading scenes of the

WAR IN EUROPE

by the first artists of the day.

Thus, in addition to the admirable serials by Charles Dickens and George Curtis, now in course of publication in the WEEKLY, subscribers will obtain a complete illustrated history of the war.

DEPARTURE OF ITALIAN VOLUNTEERS FROM LEGHORN.

In connection with the stirring movements now in progress in Italy, we present our readers with an engraving of the departure of a corps of volunteers from Leghorn to Genoa, on 4th ult. The public are already aware that since that date the spirit of independence has become so universal in Tuscany that the Grand Duke has been obliged to fly, leaving the country in the hands of the insurgents. All Tuscany is now animated by one spirit. A correspondent from Leghorn writes:

"On the morning of the 21st instant there was a review of more than five hundred volunteers. On the previous evening about five hundred and fifty, who had come by land, were pronounding the streets: about two score of them were the Tuscan, i. e., the Austrian uniform. They had broken away from Lucca with their arms, had forced their way with crossed bayonets through the Modenese territory of Massa, had been joined by some of the very soldiers of the Duke of Modena, and had come to Sarzana to lay down their arms before the Sardinian authorities, by whom they are now forwarded to the depôts of Como, Savigliano, and Acqui.

"The volunteers who have already entered the Piedmontese service," says a morning contemporary, "are more than eighteen thousand, and you may add to the number from seven hundred to one thousand new arrivals daily. I am assured, upon the very best authority, that the spirit of these adventurous young men is the very best imaginable. They arrive in this part of the country often after enduring a variety of hardships and dangers in their flight; most of them, also, severing those domestic ties and breaking through those habits and associations which rest the Italians to their native place more than any other people on the earth; and on reaching their depôts they all, even youths of family and education, willingly enter the ranks as mere private soldiers, and submit to an amount of drilling which would be intolerable to the hardiest recruits."

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

*Departure of Troops for the War—The Empress in Despair—Excitement at the Clubs—Our Correspondent leaves for Turin—American Marriages to Paris—How the Austrians crossed the Ticino?—Incrustations at the Théâtres—A Lord who never traveled by Railway—*Volau-vent—Ladies of the Corps de Ballet in Gauze—The Prince Imperial wants Excitement, etc.

PARIS, April 26, 1859.

IF not in war, we are in all the turmoil and excitement of it; the drums of passing soldiers resound in the streets—one hears on all sides of sorrowful mothers and distressed wives, in all stations of life, the humblest as well as the highest. One's sympathy, if strong for all, is strongest with the first, who are not sustained in the same degree by the hopes of glory and advancement which animate their lottses, and who are summoned every day from their occupations and their families (the soldiers of the reserve). Even the married men are only exempted for the present, but are told "to hold themselves in readiness." Even as I write there is a regiment passing, in complete marching order, on their way to the Lyons Railroad. It is a picture-que sight. The men have the usual excessive air of soldiers, and the smart officers look enchanted (whether by order or not one can not say). From time to time one of the men steps for en instant out the ranks to exchange a shake of the hand with some one of the gazers in the foot-path; and even in the short space which my windows command I have already witnessed more than one tearful woman's face. And one hears of such sorrowful partings among one's acquaintances. Even the fair Empress, it is said, weeps, and "will not be comforted," at the thought of the Emperor's departure, for she sees in danger to him every thing forfeited—her own position and the hoped-for heritage of her son.

To us, who are mere lookers-on, it is a moment of rare interest and excitement—a splendid game of chess. At my club we have subscribed and sent for a large strategic map of the supposed battlefields, which we shall contemplate at our ease. I, however, feel a strong desire to approach more nearly to the scene of action. I feel the want of change of air and scene. Paris is close, and dusty, and noisy. My neighbor, the musical Count, is more provoking than ever, and keeps on hammering and scraping upon his various instruments in a manner quite unbearable. No chance of his going to the wars—not he!

So I am only waiting to write this last letter, and with the already obtained permission of the editor of the World, to make over my pen, and its privilege of entertaining his readers, to a fair lady who has sometimes before assisted me in the task, and who is willing now to accept it entirely; and then I am off to Turin. I have an invitation to a friend's villa at Cannes, to which I can retreat when I have had enough of what is going on in Sardinia.

We have very warm weather again, which on Monday was very enjoyable in the Bois de Boulogne, where there were some very pretty races at the pretty race-course of that vicinity. It was a charming, animated scene, and an enormous display of luxury in dress and equipage; for now the spring toilets are in their full flush and blossoming, and the stands on this occasion were indeed living parterres of fashion and beauty. But I shall only hint at all this, en passant, for next week these thenes will be in worthier hands. I went yesterday to see the Exhibition of Living Artists, at the Crystal Palace, and my first feeling on entering was a sorrowful one at witnessing what seems such a waste of human labor and ingenuity with so little apparent result or advantage. There are, as usual in French exhibitions, several enormous battle-pieces, such as the "Gorge de Malakoff," and the "Charge at Bubilskaya," where "the horse and his rider," with and without heads, and in fierce array, seem produced again and again in strange confusion; but I have not sufficient pleasure in such pictures to linger long enough over them even to criticise them. Then there is a large picture of the "Burning of the steamer Austria," horrible even to glance at—which was all I did. There are a vast number of other large canvass of great pretension and little merit, and also an enormous number of representations of slightly-draped women (if draped they are at all). There are a few good portraits by Winterhalter and others. That of the Countess Walewski is charming,—very successful as a likeness, and very graceful and refined in expression; and so are those of the Count and Countess de Morny. But there are too many most extraordinary portraits; some in which the persons represented are so deficient in beauty that one wonders at their having the courage to show their living faces, much less their painted similitudes; and again there are beautiful creatures treated by artists in such a deplorable style, that one wonders again, and yet more.

For instance, there is our magnificent countrywoman, Madame [illegible], whom I call the Queen of Beauty, who has been painted in a sort of dreamy, cloudy way—which I know is a style, and which has its admirers, but which seems to me simply a ridiculous dash. The classical and delicate profile is there, and so is the superb form, with its rounded, gorgeous graces, but it does not remind one of a Rubbed or a Titian, as it should anyrather, it makes one think of how differently they would have represented such superb flesh and blood.

THE DEPARTURE OF ITALIAN VOLUNTEERS FROM LEGHORN.

The subject which divides with the war the attention of the fashionable world are the marriages. I do not think this year there are any among the Petits-Americain society; at least not to come off here. Mr. Livingstone I——'s marriage with the belle du ballet, the fair Furnell, is settled for the 1st of May, but will, I believe, take place at her father's seat in Ireland. It is a charming marriage, seeming to combine all the requisites of happiness, in well-assorted years and position, fortune on one side and beauty on the other.

I have just heard that, in spite of the numerous bolts of the printing and marriage offices, Austrians have not altered from their position, and have not crossed the Ticino. Indeed some are so bold as to say that there is a strong party in favor of a broken peace and successful negotiation. I cannot believe it. With such a superb army, equipped with such care and cost, and so eager and enthusiastic, I can not believe in any hesitation now on the part of the Austrians; and it seems so evident by their best policy to strike a decisive blow at Sardinia before the French can come to her rescue, that I am inclined to consider those as mere rumors for speculators, and made for the "Stock Exchange." As some one says, the Austrians have no money to pay their "return tickets," and so must thereforefight.

Others speak of difficulties and dissensions in Imperial and family councils at the Tuileries. The Imperial Guard, it is said, have already indicated decidedly the honor of being commanded by Prince Plon-Plon, who will find personal eager or ready to go to the war at all, and the Empress is fearful of doing so, leaving his loving cousin behind, as his plots and intrigues, and well-known ambitious character, render him dangerous to the Emperor's authority in his absence. It is said, I say, may, it only increases one's desire to see and hear for one's self on the real scene.

I have as yet met at Paris none English friends, who have, the most of them, never been here before, and who are reluctant to exchange their splendid to come now for my glowing descriptions of the lovely weather and the manifold attractions of the gay city in season. It was a most extraordinary sham I say that Lord E——(the father of my friend) did not come over here to see his son before, but that, in coming now, he traveled upon a railroad for the first time in his life. But I have several letters that are sent in England, who think nothing of risking their necks, five days in the week, in the hunting field, or in driving home dark nights from distant dinners and country balls, but who are too old-fashioned, and dread railroads and their accidents too much, and fight shy of innovations too much, to trust themselves and those dear to them to such uncertainties.

My Lady B——has been "on the Continent" in her youth, when persons of her rank (for she was a duke's daughter) lived in a style of state that we with post-horses. The two young ladies are charming, lively, well-educated girls, blooming with all the roses of their native Cornwall. They have never left everything for two short seasons in town —the "event" of each sister was presented. It is pleasant to witness their intense enjoyment of the novelty of being here; and their naive expression of the excitement of wonder and admiration with which they see are very amusing, and would banish ears even under grander circumstances than the dull and rain of the weather.

I had taken rooms for them at Maurice's Hotel, and the first day of their arrival we agreed all to dine at the table d'hôte there. The ladies were in their bonnets, as they had just arrived, and my Lord" would not make his appearance until after an elaborate toilet, particularly as he said he was quite certain he should not want any dinner, "sorry soups." So he came in rather late, freshly dressed and well scented, to descry and welcome me for him by the side of Lady B——and next to me. The first plat that was served to him after his dignified rejection of the soup was the favorite one of taking great credit to myself for not laughing aloud when he said to the solemn servant who handed it to him,

"Qui est cheéne?"

"Du poisson, mi Lor," was the grave reply, for they had already got hold of his title.

It was not till the servants at Maurice's were accustomed to the peculiar French of "old English gentlemen of unbridgid estate." Merry Julia and bright-eyed Fanny blushed not deeply before not laughing at this or country other mal-propos of "deare papa's." "Papa," they added, "we must not let him expose himself again at a table d'hôte."

I have, of course, made my friends to all the operas and theatres where it is permitted to the unpassy young ladies; but I must own my equanimity was that the first evening which they went to the Français together. I had secured a good box, and did not attend them, but was to go and fetch the ladies, as Lord B——was not well enough.

I had said, in a general way, "that it was not the custom or dress for the boxes at the Français, but imagine my consternation at finding my three friends in stunning dresses, young ladies in their usual white gowns, but absolutely with short sleeves and their lady mother décolletée and radiant in a blue silk dress! There was no help for it, and as I hastily explained to Julia that the white shoes must be changed, which was quickly done, and a lace shawl thrown over "mamma's" fair shoulders, not quite to her contentment, she exclaiming—"which was true,"—"that she never wore a high dress in an evening, and that to eat her dinner in one, she thought, would choke her." To this as it may, never did I feel conscious of looking so supremely ridiculous as in going up the stairs of the Français with Lady B——a stately person upon my arm, and her daughters following behind—two angels in white muslin.

Once in the box, it was not so bad. They all recognized their friend, and appreciated the perfection of the performance; and though I was greatly delighted to explain the jokes to Lady B——(or to proceed to do so), I did not mind that, nor her repeated exclamations "at the want of taste in French ladies in going to the play such dowdies."

Lord B——scorns the "acting," but delights in the ballet at the opera; nor did he at all object to the very serial dresses of the ladies of the corps de ballet in "Herculaneum," though really I, busy with his daughters, felt somewhat ashamed when Psyche in only a gauze chemise with golden wings, and Miss Aurora in only a tunic of the same transparent material, with golden bars, pour tout habillement. Not so mi Lor; he seemed to consider this a work of fine art, and he had paid his box-keeper, and for which he had his money's worth.

The Court has returned already from their country residence, driven in, I should think, by the bad weather, or by the necessity of the Emperor's being at home. He has, of course, numerous wives, though they do say it is because the little Prince is delicate. "Only," there is something satirical diary in this a little fellow who goes every day to the Bois de Boulogne, and sees there all that world of life, but it is an amusing anecdote nevertheless, and so truly like a French child. A little French girl, if you but will, will have you "not to trouble her dress," and the Imperial Prince may be allowed to find the country dull.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1859.

EFFECT OF A EUROPEAN WAR ON THE UNITED STATES.

EVER since the war in Europe has become a comparative certainty, economists and merchants have been anxiously considering what effects it will produce upon this country. It is quite certain that, under no circumstances, can we become involved in it; the only point of contact between the United States and the belligerent nations of the commerce. How far and in what way that commerce will be more or much affected by the war is a problem of paramount interest to all of us.

The commerce of the United States, during the last prosperous year we had, consisted of the following articles of demand. By commission, breadstuffs, provisions, specie, tobacco, lumber, manufactures, etc., etc., for $300,000,000. By freight, which constitutes about half the cotton manufactures of Great Britain, will consume just as much cotton goods during the war as before. The same argument will apply to France. It is evident, therefore, that, the demand remaining the same, the supply of foreign cotton goods will only be diminished—for a time, or two at least—by the reduced capacity of production; while the high prices will operate as a stimulating increased production here to supply the manufactured demand. In other words, and in fine, the effect of the war on the supply of cotton in Europe will be to reduce it; but the reduction will be no more than proportionate to the amount of labor diverted from manufacture by the war, and will be at least balanced by the increased demand for consumption in the American mills. This year, for instance, we shall need and absorb 3,000,000 bales, and retain 650,000 @ 750,000. If the war continues, our consumption may amount to a million bales or a million and a quarter.

The effect of war on breadstuffs and provisions is exactly the reverse. Famine will take place in those articles since war became imminent. War tends to enhance the market value of bread and meat, by withdrawing the labor of supply and increasing the demand. Soldiers in the field consume far more food than men engaged in peaceful pursuits. They not only feed well, or they will not fight. They will not stint themselves, for to the State which pays, the multiplication of armies, and the high prices of warfare involve enormous waste. Perhaps it would not be too much to say that one hundred soldiers in the field consume and destroy food enough for two hundred mechanics or laborers. On the other hand, it is obvious that many diverse of the articles which form a pump must cause a proportionate decrease of farm produce. It is doubtful whether Great Britain and Ireland combined, with their 30,000,000 adult males engaged in farm labor; if 50,000 of these are taken from the plow and set to work instead, will be able to infer that, so long as the war lasts, the demand for American breadstuffs and provisions will increase. We are able to sell all that we can spare, and at high prices.

With regard to our other exports—specie excepted—the war can not make much difference. Of the various manufactured goods which we export, India rubber shoes are the only article of which Europe is a consumer; the others go to various parts of the American continent, to Asia, and to Australia, and their export can not be affected by the war. There is no probability that war will diminish the number of whalers, and hardly fill the orders for ice. The apprehensions that the foreign demand for their staple will decline. The same and the previous remark applies to fish, oil, rice, and other of our minor exports. In the event of any trouble in the Baltic, there would be an increased demand for our lumber in the maritime states of Europe; otherwise, the trade could not be materially affected.

Our specie export must be considered, in deference to public prejudice, in a separate manner. When sound commercial principles obtain universally, the export of specie, like the export of any other article, will be regarded as a gain and not as a loss; there will be no more fears expressed as a reference to the probable effects of a drain of specie than are entertained at present in consequence of the large foreign demand for cotton, and which is correct. But as the education of the public mind has not progressed far enough to render bank panics impossible, it is a question, merely, whether, in the event of war in Europe, there is any prospect that our supply of specie can be taken from us, or reduced to what public prejudice pronounces a safe home reserve?

Two propositions are clear, as the outset. The war will not extend for ever, which, in the old phrase, is its "sinew." But the foreign world can take from us only as much gold as it pays for in the shape of foreign merchandise, and no more.

The United States ship to the foreign world about as much specie as it receives. Our gold and merchandise fall short of their imports of foreign goods and wares. During the two or three years previous to the present our excess of value of our imports from $90,000,000 to $60,000,000, and accordingly we shipped that amount of specie, and no more. This year we shall import $75,000,000 or thereabouts per annum, and we could have afforded to ship more. The question whether we will ship more or less than that the ensuing year can only be determined by the relative amounts of our imports and exports of produce and manufactures. Last year, the exports of 1859 are large, in excess of any previous year. But on the other hand, the net yield of the cotton crop will be greatly in excess of that of any other year; and though the export of breadstuffs, in consequence of the large crop last year, will be small, yet, with the most nominal—say 85,000 barrels flour and 600,000 bushels wheat to Great Britain from this port alone—the export of provisions from the new crop are excellent, the area sown is unprecedentedly large, and the crops have been proportions, and the prospect is fair for high prices. We do not believe that the imports of the calendar year 1859 will be greatly in excess of those of the great fiscal year 1856-'57; and the chances are that the export of cotton, provisions, and breadstuffs will be greater than that of that year. If this be so, the specie export will be less than that of 1856-'57, and will not exceed, after the usual drain to California yield, after paying all balances to Europe. If our expectation is unfounded, our specie export could still be considerably less than that of 1856-'57 without drawing a dollar from the Atlantic States.

It is hardly necessary to allude to the opinion which we see mentioned in some papers, to the effect that the necessities of Europe will draw our specie to a most undesirable point of trade. It is really ludicrous to notice the importance attached by some people to the movements of the bullion which, in the single item destination, by its ipse dixit, could control the laws of trade. Europe may, of course, by offering a premium for specie, cause it to be exported freely from this country; but until the can grow her own corn and cotton, it will, in such a case, necessarily cost enough to pay for those indispensable commodities.

An opinion is very generally entertained among financiers, which, if correct, would go to prove that our gold export, instead of increasing, must diminish. A general European war must divert millions of armies, and the labor of millions of farmers from the production of European securities. The very prospect of such a war must alarm numbers of capitalists, who have their gold in foreign investments, will and lead some so safe or so lucrative as United States and other first-class American securities. Already we notice that this is the case. Whether inevitable, the new Government loan has advanced to 104½. If, under the pressure of foreign requirements and general distrust, the rich men of England and the Continent sent over here only as much money as they have in the funds, our specie export would probably be reduced at least one-third.

On the whole, though every humane man will deplore the fatality which leads a hundred millions of intelligent human beings to go to war with each other, and the misery and desolation over the most glorious part of the earth's surface, in a commercial point of view we see very little reason why the impending war can prove injurious to the United States. It can not materially diminish the market for cotton, though it may transfer part of the demand from Europe to the United States; it must increase the demand for breadstuffs and provisions; it must give employment to our shipping, and increase the flow of immigration; and, if it lasts long, it is quite likely to hasten the individual wealth which this country will become the banker of a large portion of the civilized world.

THE BRITISH PANIC ABOUT FRANCE.

THE great British public and their chosen organ, the London Times, are visited by periodical panics in reference to the designs of the French. It is a fixed idea in the British mind that the French nation and their ruler, the Emperor Napoleon, are aiming at the conquest or humiliation of England. No matter how utterly at variance such a policy may be with the interests of France, and no matter how completely it is contradicted by the words and deeds of the French Government, John Bull —like the man in the old tale—persists on being outraged, and will not be pacified.

The delusion is no new thing. It is now obvious to all unbiased readers of history that if there was one object above all others on which the older Napoleon had set his heart, it was an alliance with Great Britain. He never attained that object, mainly because the English were so stubbornly set on disbelieving his word, misreading his promises, and misinterpreting his acts, that, say or do what he might to conciliate them, he always found them his implacable enemies and his wanton traducers. They were honest in their hate. They could not be convinced but that he sought the conquest of their island. It was a monomaniac delusion, as we all know. But all England shared it; and even to this day it is part and parcel of the patriotic creed of nine out of every ten Englishmen.

Very few readers of the public have forgotten the awful predictions of the Times at the time Louis Napoleon became Emperor. Even Junius—that prince of polished scurrility—appears moderate and inoffensive when contrasted with the attacks on Napoleon which were published daily in the London papers six and seven years ago. Every species of calumny and insult that ingenuity could invent or genius bark were leveled at this single man for week after week, and month after month and year after year. He could not make a speech without being pronounced a liar, a cheat, and a scoundrel. He could not put down a red republican riot without being told that he was a murderer of the blackest dye. When the Emperor and the respectable London journals calmly proceeded to vilify his own and his wife's private character with an influence unprecedented in virulence and decency which they dared not have used in speaking of any British subject, however humble. And all this time, to keep the British temper at quarreling pitch, England was daily assured that a thousand indications made it certain that Napoleon was planning a descent on Great Britain.

All this Napoleon required, first, by resolute calmness, next, by proving in a thousand ways his defensive alliance with Great Britain, and by going to war with Russia to prevent her interfering with the British-ordered route to the East. It might have been supposed that this would have silenced the hate and spite of even the Times. But, on the contrary, the calumnies only grew more intense. Though the French had no contemporaneous accounts of the war in their newspapers, and those few field of battle letters exclusively abandoned to their allies; though even the British correspondents admitted that the English were not at the front, and could have been overwhelmed at Inkermann owing to their old blunders but for Bosquet and the French, and delayed at the Fall of Sebastopol several weeks by failing to take the Redan; though the French management of their troops was as skilful and admirable as that of the English was clumsy and disgraceful; and, though in the face of all these shortcomings of the English, not one word of reproach or complaint, not one sneer ever appeared in a French print: yet the British writing, raging and fuming as it was constantly and assiduously endeavored to make it appear that the British had been cheated by their allies; that the disgraces—which were confessed from their own errors and bad generalship—were the fruit of French tricks; and that Napoleon, who threw away 100,000,000 of money and 100,000 men to fight England's battle, was not her sincere ally. Even when there was actually nothing more to suffer for, the British persisted in asserting that the treaty of Paris was forced on the English by Napoleon, who betrayed them for the friendship of Russia.

Next came the affair of the colonels. An attempt of an atrocious nature had been made to murder the Emperor, and nearly proved successful. The assassins had lived in England, met and conspired in England. The instruments of death had been manufactured in England, and shipped from England. The money which sustained the murderers had been raised in England. The details of the conspiracy and the men who would have reaped the profit had the bombs done their work, were the guests of the English people, the protégés of the leaders of English politics, valued contributors to the English press. When the attempt was made there was no outcry in England. People were shocked, but there was no indignation. On the contrary, when a fellow who had at least connived at the atrocious crime, if, indeed, he was not an active accomplice, was arrested and tried, British sentiment took his part openly, overawed court and jury, and made a hero of him when he was acquitted. Was it surprising under the circumstances that the French colonels should express a pretty lively indignation at such conduct on the part of a friendly people? If the case had been reversed, and the assassins had attempted the life of Queen Victoria, and the Paris mob had glorified them and overawed the court where they were tried, would the British soldiers have been moved to express their addresses? We think they would have used language far stronger than that of the colonels. But on the first outburst of anger on the part of the latter the English set up their old howl about a French invasion, the London Times called for more soldiers and sailors, and, as a consequence, the London correspondent of our New York Commercial Advertiser, actually fixed the time of the French invasion, and told us that we might Britain at sixty days from the day on which he wrote to our venerable contemporary.

Well, this night-fever died like the others, and though the English were deeply grieved that the French should dare to improve the port of Cherbourg; though Admiralty Board was lacerated by the affront put upon the Queen by the Emperor in inviting her to come and see the harbor from a safe harbor whose waters were before, John Bull after a time allowed himself to be calmed. To be sure, Mr. Roebuck, not to hold type of his countrymen in most respects, did come back from France where he had been most hospitably feasted, and wined, and entertained, and abuse the Emperor roundly. But the public generally were quiet.

Now, John Bull is disturbed broken out afresh. France has determined to settle the Italian question once for all, and to stop up that spring of incessant quarrel. To do so she must naturally, she has made a convention with Russia to the effect that the war shall be confined to Italy, and that England shall not be let to do her fair play between France and Austria. Some word of this convention reaching England, the Times and the British press raised a terrible outcry. In their blind fury they make out that the convention is a treaty offensive and defensive, that Napoleon has come to terms with all the Emperor to be used against England, and that Denmark has presented the Emperor with her half dozen of ships of the line lest it should this the Times asserts unequivocally, the stock exchange believes, at a cost of 52 members, and poor Mr. Bruce has been driven out of office by rivals of his wrath on Napoleon in the columns of our respected contemporary.

It is to be hoped, now that the facts are disproved. Denmark shows that she has made no such alliance; no matter. The Russian Ambassador officially declares that no such convention plates no design hostile to Great Britain; he is not listened to. Common sense points out the utter absurdity of such a convention as that Napoleon must wet his feet there in order trying to soothe them. Like Moliere's Imaginary Invalid, they are ready to knock any man down who is in skepticism about their dreadful sufferings.

A few weeks hence the furor will subside, and the French alliance will again be postponed. But the play is too popular to be withdrawn permanently from the bills. It will be reproduced from time to time, to the infinite satisfaction of the British, for many a year to come —until, indeed, the Englishman of the Rochback and Sampson type be wholly defunct.

THE LOUNGER.

DR. PRIMROSE AT HOME AGAIN.

DR. and MRS. PRIMROSE, with the girls, have gone home. Mrs. Primrose was not a little angry, it would have been the damp weather which prevented the Doctor's return to his favorite work; and which drowned out so many of the anniversaries. Indeed, the Doctor was heard to say, in an impatient moment of his wife's journey, "I'll be me! rain again!"

But he was instantly ashamed of himself, and, looking at his wife, he said, "I know it, my dear —it was beautiful weather, and I am an ungrateful, surly dog. I shall rail the next time I am inclined to punish me."

That is not quite in which Dr. Primrose went to all the anniversaries, especially to that of the American Tract Society, in which he found brotherly love and good humor in full blossom, to a quite remarkable degree. He went into the Palace Garden at exactly the moment when the dinner was half invited to agree with Mr. Ketchum, and with Mr. Nathan Bangs, and many others, and came out of the meeting firmly resolved that there were two sides to every question.

Dismissing the Doctor—and the girls as they passed the City Assembly Rooms, he ran up and stood for a time before the door to satisfy himself whether the feet of Mr. Garrison and Mr. Phillips were really cloven. Somebody was speaking, but Dr. Primrose could not carry. He merely observed that it was the most fervent and exquisite oratory he had ever heard, and could not believe his reverend brother Prime, who told him he had been listening to Phillips. "Impossible, Sir," replied Dr. Brewer; "for it was a man who believed what he was saying."

He never heard music more touching than that of the blind scholars as they sang to Dr. Alexander, nor saw a lovelier spectacle than the Sunday-school children by thousands. He heard with delight how far the Bible had been carried, and his heart overflowed with sympathy for the mariner and orphan.

In fact, every cord of Dr. Primrose's heart was thrilled and responded. He ventured to dine at Delmonico's, was delighted with every thing but the bill. Yet he cheerfully paid it, and told mother she must cut off the puddings for a week at home. He was much troubled by the mosquitoes. He would look at him and stand ready with a napkin, but if he were going to flirt him out with it like a mosquito the moment he was done eating. But he took advantage of the man's being called off by somebody else to run suddenly, and so escaped extinction.

But, at Mrs. Primrose, with the girls, went home with a very confused idea of the city's great and the societies and its speaking. These things, however, they were sure of: it had rained, mother had pealed her best bonnet, and they had eaten a capital dinner at Delmonico's.

THE WAR.

THE war is the inevitable topic. The London Illustrated News laughs at the lawyers who declared that the attention of the four quarters of the globe was concentrated upon the Washington Treaty business. And well it might; for the attention of the world is concentrated upon a readjustment of the map of Europe.

The nations are undoubtedly going to fight. In the war spirit they are invoked, and it will not be laid except by blood and the smell of powder. And since war is inevitable, it is delightful to know that although it is to blame, Austria, France and Sardinia will strike the first blow; and they will each invoke the blessing of God upon their arms before they draw the sword with immense reluctance, and only after a profound conviction that the peace of the world, the peace of Europe, and the happiness of mankind could be preserved in no other way. Each one of them is so colored and written as to say that only a magnanimous nation could. Each has been its most sacred rights and the faith of treaties invoked until it is tiresome. Each one says, Regrets, rebuffs, deplore; but Gedenreich Lebe hoch! Viva la France! Viva l'Italie! and the world knows who shall drive out the French it is asked, with singular politeness, by the London Times.

But never in our time—never since the victory of Waterloo—has England stood in so unhandsome a situation as she has been entirely through her. She has been left aside. There is an evident political paralysis in the air, a want of intelligence in the Government, and chagrin in the papers. It is not because the sentiment of the English governance is not that of the English people? There always been a strong Italian sympathy on the part of that people, and the Government has learned toward Austria, but taken no firm position any where. No wonder that the English finds fell, and English diplomacy failed, and the London journals could not conceal their growls at France.

The electricity is with the Emperor of the Ferrea left, will show what is the real sentiment of the country. As Lord Derby said at the Mayor's dinner, the Ministers do not know whether they are in or out.

EXIT THE GRAND DUKE.

THE revolution of 1848 began with the singularly ridiculous retirement of the Duke of Orleans departing from his palace, no man pursuing, under the name of Mr. Smith, with a baggy umbrella under his arm.

The war of 1859 opens with a similar spectacle. The poor old Grand Duke of Tuscany, who always seems to be a personally benign old gentleman, but who has the least stomach of any potentate on record, has gone off to Bohemia with his family, as packing his trunk or running a successor.

So far as appears, a tolerable farmer of prairie was spoiled in Leopold. Twenty years ago the tourists in Europe used to entertain us with accounts of the mild paternity of the Grand Ornament—Leopold being papa—as were regaled with stories of the mild paternity of every well reared rash milk—and sold such butter—and how neat his farms were—and how like any ordinary human being he looked in his shirt sleeves. How big his grand Ducal hals under his hat, was not to be distinguished from any other easy-going old gentleman.

And he gave such pretty balls—and was so wellbehaved in Italian grand circle out in the opera. Their style in a carriage overflowing with offspring and grandchildren was so thoroughly simple and blissful. Tuscany figured as a kind of Elysium. It was one of Claude Lorraine's pictures come true, and Leopold was the sermon of good intentions incarnate.

Suddenly came the thunder clap of '48, and the scene shepherd shivered and fled. The Austrians brought him back again surrounded with their bayonets. He told me to the Tuscans on a small scale, as Louis Napoleon did to the French upon a great one. He revoked their Constitution. He was at once cowardly and treacherous, as weak men always are.

But the people were used to him—and to the Austrian soldiers. The fires of the revolution died out, and the easy old and reactionary still, it seems ago, his officers came to him and told him they could not answer for their soldiers if he did not take the Italian side. "Gracious me!" cried his serene Highness, and departed.

Weakness in responsible situations generally results in the most atrocious crime. That old, dull, Windsor farmer, George Third, who used to walk on the terrace with a regiment of children, and was such an example (as was fondly viewed by John Bull) of all the family and Christian and rustic graces, was the meanest tyrant in England since James Second—and that was much less than Stuart. Other qualities are wanted in Kings and Grand Dukes than lymph, oil, and philopregnativeness.

THE POET PERCIVAL.

TICKNOR & FIELDS are constantly showering blue and gold drops from Parnassus. They have already issued a lovely Flora of the birds and people who write poetic prose. A lover could hardly give a more elegant present.

The last volumes are Owen Meredith's poems, and Percival's, and Mrs. Jameson's studies and stories. The first is Bulwer Lytton, son of the novelist, who has great opulence and facility, and whose first volume of poems was highly praised in England. But they have too strong a flavor of Browning to please any one who is familiar with that writer. The Percival has a great deal pleasing, and this little volume has her portrait upon the Hesse of Titian and Adelaide Kemble, both of which are good.

The chief name of the three is Percival, whose complete poetical works are now, for the first time, collected. He was a man of singular gifts and personal attraction, learned and eccentric.

Twenty-five years ago he was counted among our chief poets. Bryant, Halleck, Dana, and Percival were the four. The rest were the Mr. Cheekbooks and newspapers. Of late years Percival has doubtless fallen from his original rank; and yet no man who would have books that fairly represent our literature can dispense with Percival's poems.

PEOPLE VERSUS KINGS.

IT all the war rumors there is not much said of the people. And yet, from the present order of things is destroyed in Europe, as it is like very soon to be, the people will be the power whose sole desire will change the face of the world. Kings may desire some change beside that from King Log to King Stork.

In fact, every revolutionary movement in Europe now must be regarded only as a step, more or less direct, in the great progress of Liberty. The French have an expression that the Revolution is in permanence. It undoubtedly is so. Our own country and England—the two freest and of different forms of constitutional governments of liberal and human institutions—have had the greatest prosperity and vast practical freedom which the mass of the populations enjoy, are perpetual reminders to the eye and to the mind of the oppressed mind of populations of a more desirable condition than their own, which actually exist, and of which many individual friends and neighbors of theirs are parts.

The incessant restlessness of Europe is the symptom of the revolution. No treaties, no accommodations, no coups d'état, can suppress it for a year by year people become more intelligent, and in the degree that any State becomes intelligent it becomes free.

The result of the war of '59 will be precisely what that of 1848 was—a wider emancipation of the people of Europe, and a consequent advance in the possibility and practicability of political reform. If France will be merely the master of Italy, it will be the conjunction of two revolutionary people. Even if France and Austria divide Europe between them, they will merely precipitate the struggle which the first Napoleon foretold—that between civilization and barbarism.

Does any body doubt which will win?

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

STEAM SCORE, New York, writes the Weekly to publish a Chronological History of the Kings of England. It may be enough to say that the publication will be commenced in these columns simultaneously with that of Guizot's Chronological History. Every correspondent might consult Hume or Liddell's Chronology.

A. MAC.—Certainly not. Nobody in his senses can say that people ought to do as they would be done by he "a milksop." So will he do those he can't control. A man?

CHRAYFA says that there is no herb of that name in Northern India, and he and his friends disagree about the pronunciation. The rule is to pronounce it as he, if the native pronunciation is not known, to follow the English analogy. In the case of the Hindoo name, as our correspondent thinks, Ki-ray-ya, he Kriya, is the best known.

A FIRE-HORSE (Grand Lake, N. B.) asks if Sydney Yendys is a real name, and mentions that Yendys is very fortunate in having such a husband. Yendys is a poet who writes under that title in Sydney Dobell. As to the real existence of Yendys, and Yendys's husband, we cannot write belong to the music of the Furies, or Destinies, or Graces, or any other of the myths of the Empire. The Mr. Lever connected with a translatable Dickens company is not the novelist, and we do not know whether he is related to Harry Lorrequer.

THE Lounger has accordingly written the Lounger a courteous letter heartily sympathizing with "A Word to Home" in the Weekly for May 7, which is a word about Democracy and Servants.

—Two youths in Oakland College, Claiborne County, Mississippi, will receive the Lounger's warmest wishes for his gentle readers as partners in the game of life. But the Lounger can only warn all fair dames against young gentlemen who woo by proxy.

—ERIE STUART, who asks about certain poems, will probably see them in print, if he only waits long enough and generously contributes the stamps of those columns.

—DEPOSITOR IN CHEM (St. Louis) sends some matching poetry, and warrants 20,000,000 lines per hour of the same sort. There are plenty of machines who can send the machine artistic. The Lounger is very sure the Editor of the Weekly would be happy to receive another kind.

BISHOP DOANE.

We place before our readers a portrait of this distinguished Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, whose lamented death occurred on the 27th of April. We feel bound, as faithful remembrancers of the times, to accompany this picture with a brief sketch of the Bishop's life and character. We look at him in a point of view different from that in which he is generally regarded. As our paper is a secular one, and not the organ of any church or denomination, it would hardly fall within our proper sphere to notice one who was only remarkable, as a bishop, for his zeal and success in advancing his own church and diocese. But there is a greatness in manhood which reaches beyond the bounds of all sectarianism, either in religion or politics. There are, now and then, men in the world who, however they may stand opposed to us in their principles and practices, make us feel and even "a man's a man for a' that!" Such a man was Bishop Doane. And as we strive by impartial views to draw pictures from the life of busy action before us, we look at him, not as dressed in the robes of his episcopal office, but as clothed in those attributes of humanity which make him especially a man of mark in his day and generation. He stands before us not merely as the bold, resolute, uncompromising advocate of certain religious principles—though we like him none the worse for that—but we see in him a type of our age and country, a conductor in the great moving train of progress, whom cry was ever "Go ahead!"

George Washington Doane was born in Trenton, New Jersey, on the 27th of May, 1799. His early education was obtained in New York, where he was prepared for college by that well-known teacher, the Rev. Dr. Barry. He graduated with honor at Union College, Schenectady, at the early age of nineteen. He first commenced the study of law in New York, but soon turned his devotion to theology. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Hobart, in 1821, and priest in 1823. During the time of his preparation, and for some time after entering the ministry, he exercised the hardly less important office of a teacher in this city. He thus employed the early vigor of his life for a great end; and, while yet a boy, took a man's hold of his duty. With the American spirit he became a master at an age when many are yet in their pupilage; augmented himself and others at a time of life when most young men require to be supported.

For nearly three years he exercised his ministry in Trinity parish, New York, and in that sphere of duty gave full promise of his future distinction. In 1824 he was appointed Professor of Belles Lettres in Washington College (now Trinity College), Hartford. In 1828 he went to Boston as assistant-minister in Trinity Church; and in 1830 he became rector of that important parish. From this field of duty he was called, in 1832, to the episcopate of New Jersey, and was consecrated bishop October 31, 1832. He was made also, at Burlington, and on the death of the venerable Dr. Wharton, in 1833, he was elected rector of St. Mary's Church in that place.

It was in his two-fold office of bishop and rector that the true energy of his character developed itself, and brought forth abounding fruits of vigorous and energetic life. But the cares and labors of this Bishop were especially devoted to the great work of education. His far-reaching vision perceived what power and influence for good would thus be attained.

It was in pushing on this work, almost unaided, and in that self-relying, trusting, American spirit, which is almost reckless of risk, that he became involved in those pecuniary difficulties which brought upon him so much suffering and trial. But it is now acknowledged that he brought all this evil on himself for no selfish or personal ends. Aye, St. Mary's Hall—the largest and most successful female school in the land—and Burlington College stand as monuments and witnesses of his labors and sufferings. Bishop Doane is admitted by all who had the least knowledge of his life to have been one of the most laborious and self-sacrificing men of our busy working age and country. He did not confine his cares or labors to his own diocese, but extended them to all the general interests of the Episcopal Church, and left his impress on them all. His heart and soul were in the missionary work, especially in the foreign missionary field of that Church.

To this hurried view of the life of this devoted Bishop we must add a brief notice of his character. There was in him a harmonious blending of the most opposite characteristics. His nature was a strange intermingling of the strongest and gentlest qualities. He triumphed in all his difficulties, not more by the power of a fearless heart and a mighty intellect than by the affection he inspired, which drew close around him a body-guard of friends whose devotion nothing could shake. Among these were men of the highest station and character. He was most hospitable and liberal in his disposition, and all he had was ever freely shared with others. There was no reserve about him, either in speech or manner. He had in a marked degree that freedom-easy way with high and low, rich or poor, which is said to be one of the products of true Americanism. There was an unaffected independence about him which required no formal declaration to make it manifest.

His intellectual character had the same remarkable blending of strength and gentleness, of power and sweetness, which distinguished his moral nature. This was seen in his preaching, in his published sermons and addresses, and in his poetry. His bold thought is set off with the lightest and gentlest touches of grace and beauty. While he was most powerful in debate, a match for a whole convention, he would go home after some stirring exhibition of his might and power, and breathe out the tenderness of his heart in stanzas to "the first violets of spring," or the flowers that bloomed on his mother's grave. One of the most practical, down-right, hard-working of men, he had an imagination which surrounded his daily life with the brightest images of poesy. Had he not yoked his Pegasus to an omnibus, what flights was it fitted for! If he had not chained himself to the hardest routine of duty, in the more pleasant fields of imagination he might have soared to the highest place among our living American poets.

THE LATE BISHOP DOANE.—[FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE.]

In one of his early poems he seems to define the character he would aim at, and the path he would pursue in life. The figure he employs shows his American spirit:

"What is that, mother?
The eagle, boy,
Proudly careering his course of joy,
Firm in his own mountain vigor relying,
Breasting the dark storm, the red bolt defying:
His wing on the wind, and his eye on the sun,
He swerves not a hair, but bears onward, right on.
Boy, may the eagle's flight ever be thine,
Onward and upward, true to the line!"

Such in truth was he from his earliest life, a type of the true American character, self-relying and undaunted. He was, in the best sense, a self-made man. He never depended on patronage; he made his own way,

"Firm in his own mountain vigor relying."

Smitten with sickness from exposure in his visitation of his diocese, he only laid aside his robes of office to come home and die. His life of toil and care ended in a quiet and triumphant death, with words of peace and faith upon his dying lips. He sleeps, at his own desire, by his mother's side, beneath the shadow of St. Mary's Church, his best and fittest monument.

A JINGLING PICK AT PIKE'S PEAK.

BY C. H. WEBB.

I must own to a pique, Mr. Pike,
And you're the cause of the same;
That my faith in this last golden "strike"
Is meagre and weak.
I believe that your newspaper glories,
After all, are but typeical stories,
And pinchbeck at best!
That so far from a golden-paved ground,
Indeed there will scarcely be found
An ounce in the lap of the West.
And my Muse pities much, though she mocks,
All these rattle-brained seekers of "rocks,"
Who are leaving their shovels and their stocks,
Enticed from their farms and their flocks
By the glittering plume of your crest.

Here I'll give you my opinion,
Though its gist you may not like—
All the gold of your dominion,
In "coal," "scale," or "chunk,"
Would not poise one wild-goose pinion—

You're a sort of Peter Funk,
I think, Mr. Pike!
And your victims all are going, going, going
To the Peak to dig and dig;
When, in fact, they should be hoeing, hoeing, hoeing
Some potato-patch near by.

Ay, they're rushing day by day,
When the chance is more than fair,
Stead of bringing dust away,
That they leave their own dust there.

Let them go with cradle, ladle,
Those chaps that like to roam.
There's a certain little cradle
I hope to rock at home.

What a curséd "yellow-fever!"
He that has a wife—to leave her
In quest of this gammon!
Small matter what his fate is
Who thus would immolate his Lares and Penates
On altar of Mammon!

Oh! out upon such dreams
Of auriferous streams,
The "deposits" and—stuff:
He that goes to this Peak
In the course of a week
Will have peaked enough!

And now my eager friend,
If a moment thou wilt lend
That long ear of thine,
I'll tell it about mettle
Where you, John, James, or Peter
Can find a rich mine:
In the field there by your door
Lies a wealth of gold in store
Which will rise at your touch;
With yourself rests the spade,
And if the mine be mute
To yield little or much.

For there's virgin wealth in virgin soil,
There's a manly health in manly toil:
And speaking the plain truth forcing the sod,
You're serving at once yourself and your God.

THE NEW YORK LAW INSTITUTE.

The engraving given below is a view of the new rooms of the New York Law Institute.

The New York Law Institute was founded January 19, 1828. The original members were nineteen in number, among whom were Chancellor Kent, John Duer, chief justice of the Superior Court; James J. Roosevelt, now a Justice of the Supreme Court; William Johnson, well known as the compiler of the most valuable series of the New York Law Reports; also Messrs. David B. Ogden, James W. Gerard, Daniel Lord, Samuel Stephens, and others, since eminent members of the profession. The object of the Institute was the establishment of a Law Library for the use of the profession in the city of New York. In about two years from its first organization it had purchased a very fair Law Library.

When the Library was first founded an arrangement was made with the Corporation of the city, by which it was agreed that the Corporation should provide rooms for the use of the Institute, free of charge, and that the Library should be free to the courts and public officers of the city. Under this arrangement rooms were assigned to the Library, at first in the small room in the easterly basement of the City Hall, and afterward in the building known as the New City Hall. In 1854, however, this building took fire, from an overheated furnace-flue, and was burned; since which time the accommodations in the public buildings at the disposal of the Corporation have been so limited that the Law Institute has been compelled to shift for itself. For the most of the time since the fire of 1854 the Institute has occupied hired rooms in Chambers Street, and here, in 1856, the Library was a second time injured by fire. The personal damage on both occasions was, we believe, fully covered by insurance; but a hint of Chancellor Kent, and some fine paintings destroyed in 1858, can not be replaced.

Upon the recent removal of the United States Courts to the building in Chambers Street formerly known as Burton's Theatre, arrangements were made by which the Institute have a fine use of the spacious and elegant room represented in the annexed cut. They have been conveniently fitted up and furnished, at an expense of little less than $9000; and a few days since the opening of the new apartments was celebrated by a meeting of the profession and an appropriate address by Hon. John W. Edmonds, ex-Justice of the Supreme Court.

The Library of the Institute now numbers nearly 8000 volumes, valued at about $15,000. It is especially rich in English and American Reports, all of which now in course of publication are procured with the utmost promptness and regularity; and the collection, as a whole, has been gathered with special reference to the wants of the profession in daily practice. The funds for the payment of expenses and the purchase of new books are derived from the sale of shares and an annual assessment upon the shareholders; and, of course, the privileges of the Library, with a few honorary exceptions, are confined to the proprietors.

LIBRARY OF THE NEW YORK LAW INSTITUTE.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

In Three Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

IF Printed from early Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers pay the Author

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK I.

RECALLED TO LIFE.

CHAPTER V.

THE WINE-SHOP.

A LARGE cask of wine had been dropped and broken in the street. The accident had happened in getting it out of a cart; the cask had tumbled out with a run, the hoops had burst, and it lay on the stones just outside the door of the wine-shop, shattered like a walnut-shell.

All the people within reach had suspended their business, or their idleness, to run to the spot and drink the wine. The sweepings, irregular stones of the street, pointing every way, and designed, one might have thought, expressly to lame all living creatures that approached them, had dammed it into little pools; these were surrounded, each by its own jostling group or crowd, according to its size. Some men kneeled down, made scoops of their two hands joined, and, sipped, or tried to help women, who bent over their shoulders, to sip, before the wine had all run out between their fingers. Others, men and women, dipped in the puddles with little mugs of mutilated earthen-ware, or even with handkerchiefs from women's heads, which were squeezed dry into infants' mouths; others made small mud embankments, to stem the wine as it ran; others, diverted by lookers-on up at high windows, darted here and there, to cut off little streams of wine that started away in new directions; others devoted themselves to the sodden and lee-dyed pieces of the cask, licking, and even champing the moister wine-rotted fragments with eager relish. There was no drainage to carry off the wine, and not only did it all get taken up, but so much mud got taken up along with it, that there might have been a scavenger in the street, if any body acquainted with it could have believed in such a miraculous presence.

A shrill sound of laughter and of amused voices—voices of men, women, and children—resounded in the street while this wine-game lasted. There was little roughness in the sport, and much playfulness. There was a special companionship in it, an observable inclination on the part of every one to join some other one, which led, especially among the lackier or lighter-hearted, to frolicsome embracings, shakings of lealths, shaking of hands, and even joining of hands and dancing, a dozen together. When the wine was gone, and the places where it had been most abundant were raked into a gridiron-pattern by fingers, these demonstrations ceased, as suddenly as they had broken out. The man who had left his saw sticking in the fire-wood was drawing it backward and forward again; the woman who had left on a doy-step the little pot of hot ashes, at her own door, was fain to soften the pain in her own stunned fingers and toes, or in those of her child, returned to it; men with bare arms, matted locks, and cadaverous faces, who had emerged into the bitter light from cellars, moved away to their several dens; and a gloom gathered on the scene that seemed more natural to it than sunshine.

The wine was red wine, and had stained the ground of the narrow street in the suburb of Saint Antoine, in Paris, where it was spilled. It had stained many hands, too, and many faces, and many naked feet, and many wooden shoes. The hands of the man who sawed the wood, left red marks on the billets; and the feet of the woman who nursed her baby, was stained with the stain of the old rag she wound about her head again. Those who had been greedy with the staves of the cask, had acquired a tigerish smear about the mouth; and one tall joker so besmirched, his head more out of a long squalid bag of a night-cap than in it, scrawled upon a wall with his finger dipped in muddy wine lees—BLOOD.

The time was to come, when that wine too would be spilled on the street-stones, and when the stain of it would be red upon many there.

And now that the cloud settled on Saint Antoine, which a momentary gleam had driven from his sacred countenance, the darkness of it was heavy—cold, dirt, sickness, ignorance, and want, were the lords in waiting on the smith Spare-nothing—nobles of great power all of them; but, most especially, the last. Samples of a people that had undergone a terrible grinding and re-grinding in the mill, and certainly not in the fabulous mill which ground old people young, shivered at every corner, passed in and out at every door-way, looked from every window, fluttered in every vestige of a garment that the wind shook. The mill which had worked them down, was the mill that grinds young people old; the children had anxious faces and grave voices; and upon them, and upon the grown faces, and plowed long and deep furrow of age and coming up afresh, was the sign, Hunger. It was prevalent every where. Hunger was pushed out of the mill hungry, by the wretched clothing that hung upon poles and lines; Hunger was patched into them with straw and rag and wood and paper; Hunger was repeated in every fragment of the small modicum of fire-wood that the man sawed off; Hunger stared down from the smokeless chimneys, and stared up from the filthy street that had no offal, among its refuse, of any thing to eat. Hunger was the inscription on the baker's shelves, written in every small loaf of his scanty stock of bad bread; at the sausage-shop, in every dead-dog preparation that was offered for sale. Hunger rattled its dry bones among the roasting chestnuts in the turned cylinder; Hunger was shred into atomies in every fruit-and-herb porringer of husky chips of potato, fried with some reluctant drops of oil.

Its abiding-place was in all things fitted to it. A narrow, winding street, full of offense and stench, with other narrow, winding streets diverging, all peopled by rags and night-caps, and disease, and life-long labor, and hunger, and all visible things with a brooding look upon them that looked ill. In the hunted air of the people there was yet some wild-beast thought of the possibility of turning at bay. Depressed and forlorn as the mass looked, eyes of fire were not wanting among them; nor compressed lips, white with what they suppressed; nor hands knotted into the likeness of the gallows-rope they massed about, enduring, or inflicting. The trade signs (and they were almost as many as the shops) were, all grim illustrations of Want. The butcher and the patkman pointed up only the leanest scraps of meat; the baker, the coarsest of meagre loaves. The people rudely pictured as drinking at the wine-shops, crooked over their scanty measures of thin wine and beer, and were gloweringly confidential together. Nothing was represented in a flourishing condition, save tools and weapons; but the cutler's knives and axes were sharp and bright, the smith's hammers were heavy, and the gunmaker's stock was murderous. The crippling stones of the pavement, with their scanty wild reservoirs of mud and water, had no footways, but broke off abruptly in the kennel. The kennel, to make amends, ran down the middle of the street—when it ran at all: which was only after heavy rain, and then it ran, by many eccentric fits, into the houses. Across the streets, at wide intervals, one clumsy lamp was slung by a rope and pulley; at night, when the lamplighter had gone down, and lighted, and hoisted them again, a feeble grove of dim wicks swung in a sickly manner overhead, as if they were at sea. Indeed they were at sea, and the ship and crew were in peril of tempest.

HE "SCRAWLED UPON A WALL WITH HIS FINGER DIPPED IN MUDDY WINE LEES—BLOOD."

For, the time was to come, when the gaunt scarecrows of that region should have watched the lamp-lighter, in their idleness and hunger, so long as to conceive the idea of improving on his method, and hanging up men by those ropes and pulleys, to flare upon the darkness of their condition. But the time was not come yet; and every wind that blew over Evrmonde shook the rags of the scarecrows in vain, for the birds, fine of song and feather, took no warning.

The wine-shop was a corner shop, better than most others in its appearance and degree, and the master of the wine-shop had stood outside it, in a yellow waistcoat and green breeches, looking on at the struggle for the lost wine. "It's not my affair," said he, with a final shrug of his shoulders. "The people from the market did it. Let them bring another."

There, his eyes happening to catch the tall joker writing up his joke, he called to him across the way,

"Say then, my Gaspard, what do you do there?"

The fellow pointed to his joke with immense significence, as is often the way with his tribe. It missed its mark, and completely failed, as is often the way with his tribe too.

"What now? Are you a subject for the mad-hospital?" said the wine-shop keeper, crossing the road, and obliterating the jest with a handful of mud, picked up for the purpose, and smeared over it. "Why do you write in the public streets? Is there—is there not—house enough for that?"

A WHITE-HAIRED MAN SAT ON A LOW BENCH, STOOPING FORWARD AND VERY BUSY, MAKING SHOES.

In his expostulation he dropped his cleaner hand (perhaps accidently, perhaps not) upon the joker's heart. The joker rapped it with his own, took a nimble spring upward, and came down in a fantastic dancing attitude, with one of his stained shoes jerked off his foot into his hand, and held out. A joker of an extremely, not to say wolfishly, practical character, he looked, under those circumstances.

"Put it on, put it on," said the other. "Call wine, wine; and finish there." With that advice, he wiped his soiled hand upon the joker's dress, such as it was—quite deliberately, as having effected the hand on his account; and then recrossed the road and entered the wine-shop.

This wine-shop keeper was a bull-necked, matted-looking man of thirty, and he should have been of a hot temperament, for, although it was a bitter day, he wore no coat, but carried one slung over his shoulder. His shirt-sleeves were rolled up, too, and his brown arms were bare to the elbows. Neither did he wear any thing more on his head than his own crisply-curling short dark hair. He was a dark man altogether, with good eyes and a good bold breadth between them. Good-humored-looking on the whole, but implacable-looking, too; evidently a man of a strong resolution and a set purpose; a man not desirable to be met, rushing down a narrow pass with a gulf on either side, for nothing would turn the man.

Madame Defarge, his wife, sat in the shop behind the counter as he came in. Madame Defarge was a stout woman of about his own age, with a watchful eye that seldom seemed to look at any thing, a large hand heavily ringed, a steady face, strong features, and great composure of manner. There was a character about Madame Defarge, from which one might have predicated that she did not often make mistakes against herself in any of the reckonings over which she presided. Madame Defarge being sensitive to cold, was wrapped in fur, and had a quantity of bright shawl twined about her head, though not to the concealment of her large ear-rings. Her knitting was before her, but she had laid it down to pick her teeth with a toothpick. Thus engaged, with her right elbow supported by her left hand, Madame Defarge said nothing when her husband came in, but coughed just one grain of cough. This, in combination with the lifting of her darkly defined eyebrows over her toothpick by the breadth of a line, suggested to her husband that he would do well to look round the wine-shop among his customers, for any new customer who had dropped in while he stepped over the way.

The wine-shop keeper accordingly rolled his eyes about until they rested upon a decent gentleman and a young lady, who were seated in a corner. Other company were there: two playing cards, two playing dominoes, three standing by the counter lengthening out a short supply of wine. As he passed behind the counter, he took notice that the elderly gentleman said in a look to the young lady, "This is one man."

"What the devil do you do in that galley there, f'r' said Monsieur Defarge to himself; "I don't know you."

But he feigned not to notice the two strangers, and fell into discourse with the three customers of customers who were drinking at the counter.

"How goes it, Jacques?" said one of these three to Monsieur Defarge. "Is all the spilled wine swallowed?"

"Every drop, Jacques," answered Monsieur Defarge.

When this interchange of Christian name was effected, Madame Defarge, picking her teeth with her toothpick, coughed another grain of cough, and raised her eyebrows by the breadth of another line.

"It is not often," said the second of the three, addressing Monsieur Defarge, "that many of these miserable beasts know the taste of wine, or of any thing but black bread and death. Is it not so, Jacques?"

"It is so, Jacques," Monsieur Defarge returned.

At this second interchange of the Christian name, Madame Defarge, still using her toothpick with profound composure, coughed another grain of cough, and raised her eyebrows by the breadth of another line.

The last of the three now said his say, as he put down his empty drinking vessel and smacked his lips.

"Ah! so much the worse! A bitter taste it is that such poor cattle always have in their mouths, and hard lives they live, Jacques. Right, Jacques?"

"You are right, Jacques," was the response of Monsieur Defarge.

This third interchange of the Christian name was completed at the moment when Madame Defarge put her toothpick by, kept her eyebrows up, and slightly resisted to her cough.

"Hold my cup, Therese!" muttered her husband. "Gentlemen—my wife!"

The three customers pulled off their hats to Madame Defarge, with three flourishes. She acknowledged their homage by bending her head, and giving them a quick look. Then she directed, in a casual manner, round the wineshop, took up her knitting with the disengaged calmness and repose of spirit, and became absorbed in it.

"Gentlemen," said her husband, who had kept his bright eye observantly upon her, "good day! The chamber, furnished behind his back, that you wished to see, and were inquiring for when I stepped out, is on the first floor. To the door-way of the staircase gives on the little court-yard close to the left here," pointing with his hand, "near to the window of my establishment. But, now that I remember, one of you has already been there, and can show the way. Gentlemen, adieu!"

They paid for their wine, and left the place. The eyes of Monsieur Defarge were upon his wife at her knitting, when the elderly gentleman accosted from his corner, and begged the favor of a word.

"Willingly, Sir," said Monsieur Defarge, and quietly stepped with him to the door.

Their conference was very short, but very decided. Almost in the first word Monsieur Defarge started and became deeply attentive. It had not lasted a minute, when he nodded and went out. The gentleman then beckoned to the young lady, and they, too, went out. Madame Defarge knitted on steadily, with nothing in her eyebrows, and saw nothing.

Mr. Jarvis Lorry and Miss Manette, emerging from the wine-shop, joined Monsieur Defarge in the door-way to which he had directed his other customers just before. In the court-yard a stinking little black court-yard, and was the general public entrance to a great pile of houses, inhabited by a crowd of poor people. Some hanging clothes-lines were dancing in the gloomy tile-paved staircase, Monsieur Defarge had left the door open close to the child of his old master, and put her hand to his lips. It was a gentle action, but not at all open to remark: a very slight exercise of formation had come over him in a few seconds. He had no good-humor in his face, nor any openness of aspect left, but had become a secret, sharp, dangerous man.

"It is very high; it is a little difficult. Better to begin slowly." Thus, Monsieur Defarge, in a stern voice, to Mr. Lorry, as they began ascending the stairs.

"Is he alone?" the latter whispered.

"Alone! God help him who should be with him!" said the other, in the same low voice.

"Is he always alone, then?"

"Yes."

"Of his own desire?"

"Of his own necessity. As he was, when I first saw him after they found me and demanded to know if I could take him, and keep him safe; he must be discreet—as he was then, so he is now."

"He is greatly changed?"

"Changed!"

The keeper of the wine-shop stopped to strike the wall with his hand, and mutter a tremendous curse. No direct answer could have been half so forcible. Mr. Lorry's spirit sank within him, and heavier, as he and his two companions ascended higher and higher.

Such a staircase, with its accessories, in the older and more crowded part of Paris, would be in most places, bad enough; but, at that time, it was vile indeed to unaccustomed and unhardened senses. Every little habitation within the great foul nest of one high building—that is to say, every room within every door that opened on the general staircase—left its own heap of refuse on its own landing, besides flinging other refuse from its own windows. The uncontrollable and hopeless sum of decomposing animal and vegetable would have polluted the air, even if poverty and misery had not loaded it with their intolerable impurities; the two bad sources combined made it almost insupportable. Through such an atmosphere as a step-dark shed by every door, poison, the way lay. Yielding to his own disturbance of mind, and to his young companion's agitation, which became greater every instant, Mr. Jarvis Lorry twice stopped to rest. Each time, a person coming down stairs made way for him, by which any languishing good air that were left uncorrupted seemed to escape, and a spoiled and sickly vapors seemed to crawl in. Through the rusted bars, tastes, rather than glimpses, were caught of the jumbled neighborhood; and nothing within range, nearer or lower than the summits of the two great towers of Notre-Dame, had any promise on it of healthy life or wholesome aspirations.

At last, the top of the staircase was gained, and they stopped for the third time. There was yet an upper staircase, of a steeper inclination and of contracted dimensions, to be ascended before the garret story was reached. The keeper of the wine-shop, always going a little in advance, and always going on the side which Mr. Lorry took, as though he dreaded that the latter might put any question by the young lady, turned himself about here, and, carefully feeling in the pockets of the coat he carried over his shoulder, took out a key.

"The door is locked, then, my friend?" said Mr. Lorry, surprised.

"Ay. Yes," was the grim reply of Monsieur Defarge.

"You think it necessary to keep the unfortunate gentleman so retired?"

"I think it necessary to turn the key." Monsieur Defarge whispered it closer in his ear, and frowned heavily.

"Why?"

"Why! Because he has lived so long, locked up, that he would be frightened—naze—tear mad in open day-light, coming out to I know not what harm—if his door was left open."

"Is it possible?" exclaimed Mr. Lorry.

"Is it possible!" repeated Defarge, bitterly. "Yes. And a bountiful world we live in, when it is possible, and when many other such things are possible, and not only possible, but done, done, see you!—under that sky there, every day. Long live the Sky that looks down on it!"

This dialogue had been held in so very low a whisper that not a word of it had reached the young lady's ears. But by this time she trembled under such strong emotion, and her face expressed such deep woe, and such pity for a broken life, so unspeakably sorrowful, that Mr. Lorry felt it incumbent on him to pay her some regard and offer some words of reassurance.

"Courage, dear miss! Courage! Business! The sight of you is good for him—good for us. He cannot be hurt now by any inconvenience, and he may be much the better for seeing you. Courage!"

As Mr. Lorry said it in a manner, it is but passing the room door, and the worst is over. Then, he said the same words to encourage his own failing heart, and he set his teeth hard and took out the key.

He put it in the door, and locked it in the door, and took out the key again, and held it in his hand. All this he did mechanically, and with as loud and harsh an accompaniment of noise as he could make. Finally, he walked across the room with a measured tread to where the window was. He stopped and looked out.

The garret, built to be a dry depository for fire-wood and the like, was dim and dark; for the window, of dormer shape, was in truth a door in the roof, with a little crane over it for the hoisting up of stores from the street; unglazed and closing up the middle in two pieces, like any other door of French construction. To exclude the cold one half of this door was fast closed, and the other was opened but a very little way. Such a scanty portion of light was admitted through these means that it was difficult, on first coming in, to see any things: and long habit alone could have slowly formed in any one the ability to see any thing requiring accuracy in such obscurity. Yet work of this kind was being done in the garret; for, with his back turned to the door, and his face towards the window, where the keeper of the wine-shop stood looking at him, a man was stooping over a low bench, stooping forward and very busy, making shoes.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

EFFECT OF THE WAR NEWS.

The effects of the war news have been felt in our commercial and financial markets. The cotton market has been depressed and unsettled. Dealers and speculators have withdrawn from the field, and Boston and Western brands have advanced about a dollar. Wheat has been in good demand and active, with prices firm, Milwaukee closing at a large advance, but Genesee, which for months has been the favorite, declining. Beef, especially the better grades, was in demand, and have been sold freely at higher prices. Owing to the advance of grain, whisky has been in active demand, advanced from 2 to five cents per gallon, having closed yesterday at thirty cents. Iron has been in good demand, and pig is quoted at $30 cash, and duped Cuba molasses, largely employed in its distillation, has been in demand. Coal has been in active demand. Rice has also advanced, owing to the war feeling and increased demand. Sugars have been in moderate demand, excitement in Wall Street, and stocks have again suffered from speculative depression, and considerable excitement among the stock-brokers, the most important being the Bank and Land Shares.

KNOW-NOTHINGISM IN MASSACHUSETTS.

The amendment to the Constitution of Massachusetts against the State Constitution so as to require foreigners to reside five years in the country before naturalization as being entitled to vote. The vote was rather light, but the friends consider that the Know-Nothing amendment is adopted by a very large majority.

DEATH OF HENRY GRINNELL.

We learn that the Imperial Geographical Society of Berlin has announced, through the Prussian Consul-General to Washington, to Mr. Henry Grinnell, the distinguished American merchant, for his services in the explorations to the Arctic regions, toward the outfit of which he so liberally contributed, a gold medal, accompanied by a letter from the Secretary, of which the following is a translation:

"Vienna, April 7, 1859.

"To the Hon. Henry Grinnell, Vice-President of the American Geographical Society, New York:

"Sir,—It has become my official and pleasant duty to inform you that the Imperial Geographical Society, at their meeting on the 5th of March, awarded to you the Humboldt Monetary Medal.

"The reasons which you have always manifested in the advancement of science, renders me the hope that the Society will entertain confident that you will likewise receive this distinction with friendly favor, and I therefore "Allow me to express to you the sentiments of my highest consideration and esteem.

"The First Secretary of the Imperial Geographical Society,

"E. A. PANTENIUS."

ANOTHER SICKLES TRAGEDY.

A fatal accident recently resulted at the Law School shooting affair between Messrs. Sickles and Butler. Students were illustrating the Washington affair, when the young man who was playing the part of Sickles, and picked out a pistol, which he did not know was loaded, and shot his fellow-student dead through the chest. Mr. Tap took it coolly, and died in a few minutes after. The shot was purely accidental. It was at first thought Mr. Burke would recover, but mortification had taken place. Mr. Tap had suffered so much in mind that he was in a measure prepared to die.

The Hon. Daniel E. Sickles arrived in this city on Tuesday last, and left for Albany. He resides at or near former residence, on the Bloomingdale Road.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR.

AUSTRIA'S ULTIMATUM TO SARDINIA.

Correspondence has been published between Count Buol and Sardinia.

The latter, upon having been hitherto disappointed, the Emperor, my august master, has deigned to order me to demand of your Majesty if you believe the declaration of his Sardinian Majesty to alter the resolution which it has taken to disarm.

"Such, M. le Comte, is the object of the mission with which I am charged. I beg that your excellency will give its speedy solution, and that you will be pleased to inform me of the government consents—yes, or no—to put a formal stop to the preparations which Sardinia has for the last few months been making."

The Count de Cavour has to whom you will be good enough, M. le Comte, to hand your reply, has orders to hold himself at your disposal, and leave duly. If, at the expiration of that period, he receives no answer, or one which is not entirely satisfactory, he is instructed to quit Turin, the consequences which this refusal will entail will fall exclusively upon the shoulders of the Sardinian Cabinet. After having vainly exhausted all conciliatory means of arriving at a peaceful solution of the question, the Emperor will have fulfilled a duty which his conscience and honor impose upon him with great regret, to have recourse to force of arms to decide it.

"In the hope that the reply which I solicit from your excellency will be favorable to our views, I pray you to trust to the maintenance of peace, I take this opportunity," &c., &c.

SARDINIA'S REPLY.

A dispatch from Turin, dated the 26th ultimo, says:

"In reply to the proposition by the King of Sardinia to the Austrian Government, that a Congress should assemble, the following is a summary:

"Count Buol declares the demand to disarm as an outrage on himself and the nation, and has therefore repelled it as demanded by Austria. The Count Buol concludes by a cry of anguish, and says: I will be your captive. I have served your cause on the field of battle, at the side of my illustrious father. This time you will not, you say, your ambassador, Count Cavour, shall receive your compassions on the Tchernaya, whom the Emperor has sent to support and defend our just and enduring cause. Forward to victory! Let our banners announce to you that our cause is just, and we—God be thanked—are ready!"

VICTOR EMANUEL MADE DICTATOR.

Immediately afterward the following law for the concession of extraordinary powers to the King's government during the war was passed by the Chambers:

"ARTICLE 1. In case of war, the Austrian war clause, the King shall be invested with all the legislative and executive powers, and shall be, under the Ministerial responsibility, to perform by simple royal decrees all the acts necessary to the defense of the country and of its institutions.

"Art. 2. The constitutional institutions remaining intangible, the King's government during the war shall have the faculty to make dispositions for the temporary limitation of the liberty of the press and of individual liberty."

THE PASSAGE OF THE TICINO BY THE AUSTRIANS.

During the night of the 30th ult., the Austrian army, amounting to 120,000 men, under the command in chief of General Count Gyulai, passed the Ticino in three large corps d'armée, namely:

A second of 50,000, commanded by General Count Stadion.

A third of 30,000, under General Zobel.

A fourth, composed of the reserve, under Duke of Modena, which was left behind at Novara.

They took the road toward Novara, the place where the Austrians under General Radetzky defeated the Sardinians under Charles Albert in 1849.

REVOLUTION IN TUSCANY.

Nearly all the provinces of the Tuscan troops (15,000 men) proceeded themselves before the Grand Duke's palace, and declared he had ceased to reign, the result of the army there was only one way, viz., to march to Florence and defend the hesitating King of Etruria against himself.

The Grand Duke immediately sent for the Marquis of Ridolfi, and charged him to form a new ministry, with a view of giving the reforms wanted.

The Marquis undertook the task, but undertook it on the ask or save the dynasty, except on two conditions:

First. The abdication of the Grand Duke.

Second. A declaration of war against Austria, and an alliance with France and Sardinia.

The Grand Duke refused these conditions, and declared he would rather abdicate than consent to lead the people to do what they pleased.

The Marquis then declared for himself upon the protection of the foreign troops, and the Grand Duke, by a military decree, had been proclaimed Tuscany, and Victor Emanuel Dictator of Italy.

FRENCH TROOPS IN SARDINIA.

The correspondent of a French paper writes on 28th ult.: "The Emperor has received the following letter from the corps d'armée of Marshal Canrobert, have crossed Mont Cenis and entered Italy. The first French troops in Turin by railroad. General M'Mahon, coming directly from Chambery, has established his head-quarters in the city the part of Genoa. His troops were on board of the 26th and 27th, and on the 28th, at 10 A. M., the first ships and two steamers arrived. The bets of the Germans in the Grand Concert of the Kursaal are considerable. The Grand Duke of Baden is present."

"It is reckoned that we have at the present hour between 50,000 and 60,000 men in Piedmont. It is believed and that this number is increasing every day, almost hour by hour, and that by the end of the month of May there will number seventy-five or eighty thousand men. General Niel has arrived at Alessandria, General Forey at Genoa, in Turin."

NEGOTIATION NOT ENDED YET.

The Times Paris correspondent, writing on the evening of Thursday, says: "Count Walewski left Paris this and the telegraph wires between Paris and Vienna are constantly occupied. As the mediation proposed by the position of England, some say, might be accepted on the conditions which I mentioned to you in my last. Nothing is said of a proposal that Austria shall pay an indemnity to Sardinia, but it is supposed that she will ask for defending herself." The writer remarks, "It is entirely false that the Austrians have already crossed the Po and the Austrians remained on their side of the river during the late thaw remained.

MOVEMENTS OF THE FRENCH ARMIES.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says will be conspicuous chiefly for its imposing force of heavy cavalry. It is composed of the whole strength of cavalry of many of infantry.

The Imperial Guards left Toulon on Tuesday the 3th ult., for Genoa. They were filled with troops.

The Emperor will not cross the Alps by the route of the Alps will be of the most formidable character. It will consist of 120,000 men, supported by a force of 60,000 men in reserves of cavalry, and the artillery to match. Fourteen days of the twenty-one will be occupied in passing the last part of the Army of the Alps.

The object of the Emperor in the French as a basis of operation, whence they can descend upon the plains of Lombardy, and not to attack the Austrian heights at Susa (Suits foot of Mont Cenis), and the Austrians have had time to fall himself obliged to send a French army of occupation into Piedmont, and that he has taken this step with a view of being in time to protect his ally against the attack of Austria.

The Cabinet of London replied that under the existing circumstances England could not intervene.

WAR PREPARATIONS IN FRANCE.

On the 27th the Corps Legislatif assembled to receive communications from the Government. The Minister of War, Walewski read to the Chambers an exposition of the military and naval forces of France, and the reasons why they were to be so large. The Minister said that the army was never more war, it was because he had been forced and Austria to arm. The Minister continued as follows: "In the negotiations every possible moderation (Long and Emperor, and the Government, and the Corps Legislatif, expressed the hope that war would be limited to Italy. The Minister then asked the Chambers to vote a loan of five hundred millions francs (£20,000,000, and for raising the contingent of 1858 to 140,000 men.

THE EMPEROR'S PREPARATIONS FOR LEAVING PARIS.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Times writes: "The Emperor has sent off his baggage, and is only delaying his departure for the purpose of seeing the Empress safely established in Paris. Every thing is complete, and the Emperor has only to say the word to leave. All the various coachmakers you see congregating outside of all kinds—some for hire, some for baggage, some for ordinary traveling, but for rough usage—are in the employ of different grooms officers putting up the finest vehicles before. Every where is in nothing but war in the build-

FRENCH EXPENDITURES.

The Herald correspondent, alluding to the severe cold of the previous two or three days, writes: "Last night, the shivering Parisians, as they walked briskly pursuing down the Boulevards, as yours do this cold weather, at the rate of eight, was to convey ideas to the water's edge and thence to the plains of Italy. Young and old leave their occupations to form ranks, and learn the use of arms, while the noble science of heavy marching order, with miles flying and awful exercise of martial music, is taught. These are occasions when the Gallic blood can no more restrain its impulses than the sea its waves burst from the ranks of gazers, and fling themselves bodily into arms of failure, husbands, fathers, and last, not least, lovers. Strong men grasp boys by the hands of old comrades, and bid them "God speed." Here and there it is a father and son that grasp the musket, and young men receive from their mother's embrace, while big tears roll down their manly cheeks, a sacred token of remembrance, a lock of hair, or her very last kiss to his eye-lashes as they close in the sleep of death, or "remember me." "Remember, remember, my son," is the cry of the mother, as the last shout from end to end along that phalanx of spectators, "Vive l'Empereur! Vive l'Armée!" is heard, and the corps responded to again and again by each company before it assigns to the general. Then the rolling and balconies of the lofty houses the cry is again echoed, as the last company of the regiment passes.

ADDRESS AT THE TUILERIES.

He adds: "Owing to the construction of the Tuileries, the Emperor was suddenly descried holding up in his arms the young heir of all his hopes, who, with joy in his eyes, was waving a 'forget me not' in the other, stiched back in outbreak of tears from soldiers and spectators as made the arcades of the Rue Rivoli tremble at their beat. The incident was evidently inspired by the sight of the young prince at the gate on the same level with the crowd—and, in fact, mingled up with them—and the Emperor instantly assented in the name of the regiment to salute his Majesty, returning in return from highest point of the palace at the hand, and an embrace from the child. The whole pause of people, armed and unarmed, was one of the admiration of real devotion to the dynasty in the person of the child, and of astounding the paraphernalia of rank, fragrance of nothing but the sentiment of the moment. The Empress, out of the door, appeared the cynosure of all eyes. Her front hair bandeau also came down, dishevelled as it always, by her ride the young Jules, trotting hand passed over her face, and was all there. The Emperor mounted his horse, standing close to the gallant legions as they passed, she gracefully waving her hand to the last file. Many a dark son of Gaul, high clerk bested, and well-to-do merchant, with more heads than hairs, took off his head check and kindling glance as this unwonted sight met his eye, and this Napoleonic scene of the day in the grandeur! Vive le Prince Impérial! left no mistake as to the sentiment of his fellow-men.

A CANTINIERE AND THE EMPRESS.

The Times correspondent adds: "The different regiments of the Imperial Guard left yesterday, and each sergt regiment stopped at the Tuileries to salute the Empress. The whole of the Guard are kept at the palace when the regiments go out on duty the Empress always reviews them, and Prince came out to salute them. The Emperor stood with the Prince on his shoulder, and the Empress with her hands full. The soldiers cheered as they passed, and the Prince waved his cap. A touching incident occurred on Saturday, as one of the regiments of the Guard passed under the Empress. The cantinière of this regiment, on coming up opposite the palace, at the moment when the Emperor and Majesty, inquired if it was not there that was to be found the Secretary of the Empress. Receiving for answering an affirmative reply, she stepped out of the ranks, leading by the hand a little girl of about four years of age, and entering the bureau, exclaimed, 'Gentlemen, I have no pen to write with, and cannot find one here. I know she will be very much disappointed, but I cannot help it.' She was about to leave, when the Empress, who had overheard her, called her back, and gave her her own pen, with which she wrote her name. The Empress took her by the hand, and accompanied her to the door, where she left her child, and gave orders that she should be well taken care of till the cantinière comes back from the war."

FRENCH FINANCES.

The Herald correspondent writes: "As to resources for the war, a loan of 500 millions is talked of, although the Government have ample means for present purposes. The sum set down for the extraordinary budget is 60,000,000 francs. The bank, for the renewal of its charter, owes 140,000,000 francs, which will be immediately appropriated. Besides, there are 75,000,000 francs the taxes asked for less than a year ago. The 1st of July the treasury bills amount to 200,000,000 francs. Now, 500,000,000 francs can be obtained directly. 'Never,' says the Journal des Débats, 'has a similar crisis taken place at the service of a generous cause financial resources more ample and more easy.' The 5 per cent. is at par at present accord, and the bill for the loan of 500,000,000 francs is only to be presented to-morrow."

PARIS WITHOUT A GARRISON.

"Paris is in the meantime perfectly tranquil, as shall describe without a garrison, a fact which speaks trumpet-tongued of the full reliance of the people on the Army. Paris is entirely not only of the war but of his dynasty. Wives, as President of the Provinces, and the Empress at the head of deputies, is the guardian of the Emperor's throne. Nor is much exaggerated in the diplomatic crypt, but to be a prince must be born to it, and not to be made to it for the last month. When he is asked what he thinks of the Emperor, he says, 'He is a man of genius.' As to the war, a question that is put to every one, high and low, he has invariably the same answer: 'Well, really, I have not been able to make up my mind.'

"Another speech, said to have been addressed by Lord Malmesbury to the Austrian ambassador at London after Austria's final refusal, and current in the diplomatic circle here at Paris, is this: 'Count, you have lost the game.' In high language well: as upon the dictionary, and look for the analogous word in the English vocabulary, and write for the conduct of Austria."

WAR PREPARATIONS IN GERMANY.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times, writing on the 3d inst., says: "The question of the war is now discussed with great energy in all parts of Germany, and Bavaria has already issued her order for the levy of her full contingent preparation. On the 2d inst. the manager of the Prussian railroads received orders to hold himself in readiness special trains, full of troops, were about to pass through. Hungary, likewise, has received orders to be about to make the 50th corps d'armée mobile. The King of Prussia will not leave for Coblentz before the end of a few days, and probably not the Archduke Albrecht at all. Count Clam has been arrested at Dresden, on his way to his city, while he was passing the Saxon frontier. Letters have also been intercepted from the Austrian envoy at Berlin, which have been forwarded to Vienna. It is said that a certain understanding between the two monarchs on the Austrian frontier will be possible for both to be kept to suppose state."

MILITARY PREPARATIONS IN ENGLAND.

In England orders had been given at Woolwich for the hasty preparation of war materials, ready for any sudden emergency; and the artillery at Portsmouth were summoned by telegraph to assist at the operations were announced in the 30th ult. The London Advertiser in London publishes from the London dispatches about the following sort ten thousand men for the navy, and offering a bounty of ten pounds for every able-bodied seaman who enter the service. The Channel squadron, which had been sent to the Mediterranean to be the headquarters of the British; and on the 9th four new ships-of-the-line were placed in commission. The formation of volunteer rifle corps throughout England was being strongly urged on the Government.

ENGLAND TO REMAIN NEUTRAL.

In the course of a late speech, referring to an attack made upon him by a member of the opposition, Lord Derby said: "That noble lord supposes we have said that I thought it the duty of England to maintain a passive state of armed neutrality, in order that we might take the part of whichever of the belligerents we believed was in the right. I am sure that I have said nothing of the kind. My wish we have shown for Austria, there can be no doubt, but I have never said that we were to go to war with France. We have always said that we did not believe in the opportunity of saying that emphatic, and that we should not be justified in going to war better than our view. I think that if the works which I used in the House of Commons would be found in the public book we have seen that it was impossible that they could have said that meaning. I have said that the line of policy we intended to maintain a strict neutrality; but when a question or more than one side of a question arose, we strongly engaged in, when war was not only imminent but had actually commenced between two powers, we had upon the shores of the Mediterranean, it was incumbent upon us to consider whether the time had not arrived when special interests we have involved them, looking to our great possessions and the military positions we occupy in the Mediterranean, it was our duty to be able to maintain and defend the security of those possessions, and preserve the British flag and British power from the possibility of insult amidst any of the contingencies which might arise in the course of war. I have also stated that we should maintain that armed neutrality for the purposes of defense. I have said that if, in the course of these quarrels, whatever we may think of them in point of justice, we found that the honor of the crown, material interests or national honor which calls for our determination, we should be prepared to act in accordance with principle, I never said that we were to go to war, but we ought to be for purposes of maintaining that position which we had taken up, and which we had declared that we are determined to hold—namely, that of perfect and entire neutrality. We have not given any opinion as to the engagements and no promises, and completely at liberty to take that course which we think best for the time. I have said the arms—of England in such a manner and in such a manner as the circumstances of the time, looking to the circumstances of the time, by the interests, the honor, and the dignity of the country."

MR. BRIGHT ON THE WAR.

In the course of a speech which Mr. Bright said: "Now, when it is not a question of Russia and the Turk, or Austria and Italy, or France and Austria, but France, Austria, whatever be your opinion, whatever be the opinion of any class of your countrymen, I say, I have always stood that I am committed irreversibly, so far as I have any influence, to the opinion that we ought to follow any meddling whatsoever. I am remain in the House of Commons—I am not sure that I am not—I have not the capacity we have been bestowed upon me; or I can leave it, and I can go into retirement, and I can live upon my private enjoyments, and I can live upon my private enjoyments, and I can live upon manufacturing pursuits; but there is one thing I will not do, and that is, I will not be a party to the intriguing place-holders or intriguing place-hunters amongst us, to lead this country into war, with its misery, its crime, its cruelty, its waste, its debt, its taxation, its frightful agony which it entails upon the people. I value the sword, I value the comfort, the lives, the happiness of my countrymen, and I will never, never, never for one single moment, at the behest of power, or at the call of popular clamor, be induced to consent that any one man be able to charge me with being accessory to a war which I believe to be unjust, and which I believe to be condemned by the common people on the altar of sanguinary war."

THE FRENCH-RUSSIAN TREATY WAS DISCOVERED.

The London Times says: "We believe we are correct in stating that before the war there existed a secret treaty between France and Russia. By the first, Russia binds herself, in the event of a European war, to march on Austria, to assist her by the co-operation of her fleets in the Baltic and Black Sea, and by her armies. We are not aware of the nature of the loan this 50,000 men upon the common frontiers. Whether the treaty has been signed or declare war against Austria within fifteen days after the commencement of the war between France and Austria, we know the dates at which the treaty was signed. We have also reason to believe that the first has been in existence for several years. The existence of this secret treaty is elementary, is that which it asserted was concluded on the 3d of last June."

HOW THE FRANCO-RUSSIAN TREATY WAS DISCOVERED.

Mr. Sampson writes: "The discovery of the treaty between France and Russia is understood to have been made by the Prussian Government, through its secret service, it rarely known to fail. The rumor is that it is signed on the 3d of June, and that it is for ten years, and that the price is considered to be extremely low."

THE PRUSSIAN MOBILIZATION.

Mr. Sampson writes: "There is also a report, considered to be well founded, that Prussia has entered into a combination. This union of the three principal naval powers of continental Europe is a fact of great weight. It is there that will thus come into operation are not wanted to the Government, and the Government of the Czar of Lombardy, so far the simple purpose of subjugating Austria, a power that has already a large army in the Mediterranean. It is the development of a plot for a combined attack upon England."

THE PANIC IN THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

The London correspondent of the Herald furnishes us with the following: "The panic of last Friday in the stock exchange was a most singular affair. It was caused by a report that the Emperor of the French had been assassinated among the dealers—one of them to the Emperor's death. The effect was tremendous, and there have been indescribable.

"Consols, on the day, were quoted 93¼ at the departure of the last steamer, have since touched 93¼. The subsequent fall has been to 92¾, and the market is very heavy, and very unstable. For a large description of securities it has been a most disastrous week. Railways, as a class, have suffered much, and the Great Western, which, on the 1st of January, was quoted 80, has fallen to 72. The Grand Junction railway stock, the best paying of all the railways, has also suffered greatly. The canal and prosperities, and which was recently at 95 has fallen to 90, and is heavy at that rate. Foreign securities, Altogether, the depreciation in the funded and share securities held in this country cannot be less than 20 per cent, days may be estimated at at least equal to $500,000,000, dollars. Should peace be restored, there will be a great downfall, although their eventual prospects must be improved by the war. Should it continue, the prospects are quoted at 45 discount.

"The most remarkable feature about the panic was an announcement that French gold was being purchased in large quantities for the secret service of the aggressive plans of the Emperor Napoleon."

THE ATTITUDE OF PRUSSIA.

The Herald correspondent writes: "The military preparations of Prussia are on a vast scale. Her troops and had reserved for the last extremity, were undoubtedly ordered to the Rhine, and the mobilization of the army was received from the Archduke Albert, and which showed that the Government was determined to make a stand, and to a state of supreme intolerable both to his fiery temper and to the object of his love. The Prince Regent and his drinking a decisive step. The Prince Regent and his Ministers were animated strongly with the Archduke, pointing out to him that by such a course Austria would forfeit every sympathies she enjoyed as a Power attacked by unjust aggression, or at least without sufficient reason, and would incur the responsibility of disturbing the tranquility of Europe by an unjustifiable aggression. Moreover, by the policy of pacific negotiation, at a moment when England and France were unprepared for war, Austria would contribute to the Austrian monarchy—had come forward with a plan of action. This was the mobilization of the army of Prussia. The proud and headstrong character of Francis Joseph is so well known, however, that such considerations could not be expected to have much influence on him, and the commencement of hostilities being therefore imminent, Prussia was diligently mustering. Prussia herself for a contingency which she had vainly hoped to avoid."

PRUSSIA WILL REMAIN NEUTRAL.

The Vienna official organ says: "During the attempts at mediation to which Prussia was especially called, both as a party to the treaties of Vienna and as entertaining the most amicable relations with all the Powers concerned, Austria could not hesitate for a moment registered the consideration of her duties as a member of the German Confederacy. She was aware the delay to which the organization of the Confederacy for the defense of the German territory was subjected. Prussia has not only made the proposals necessary for that purpose, but actively contributed to the preliminary steps necessary undertaken. The state of affairs having meanwhile undergone a change, Prussia has, in the name of the Confederacy, addressed to the Austrian Court a request to propose to the Confederacy a collective measure in the interest of its security, and preceded that proposal by placing three army corps in readiness for war. In laying this order, Prussia, as the Austrian Court knows, was guided by the desire of maintaining the honor and dignity of the Confederacy in the hitherto peaceful arrangements in the neighboring States, and of enabling it to act with energy and success in safety if endangered by the course of events. The readiness for war (Kriegsbereitschaft) of three corps d'armée formed no part of Prussia to the forces of the German Confederacy, and could not therefore be regarded as a warlike measure. Such, for example, as to be taken by the other members of that body, are entirely in harmony with the defensive character of the Confederacy, and presuppose the spirit of every offensive tendency—Prussia, still adhering to her policy of peace, and to the principles of moderation, continues to bring about a solution of the present European difficulties, in accordance with her own interests and those of her German allies."

ENGLAND.

THE ELECTIONS.

The Herald correspondent writes: "In the English election both parties claim the victory. It is difficult to say, but, as his conduct in dissolving Parliament at the critical time was a much regretted, as the meeting he is sure to be upon."

FRANCE.

LOVE, JEALOUSY, AND MURDER.

The Count de Lagrange, who died a few days ago tried a peasant named Huguette, of Flize, for an attempt at murder. Twenty years ago, when the latter was about two years of age, he paid remarkable attention to a little girl named Marie, whose only crime was the misfortune of a farmer of the village, and as they both grew older, it became a matter of course that they should become the girl's parents made no objection to his visiting at their house, and when he asked for her hand in marriage, they received to break off with him, because he was poor, and they wished to see their daughter become possessor of some property, they thought that the young man would be a good match for their only daughter. The girl herself, though she had really received the addresses of Huguette, had not the courage to refuse the wishes of her parents, and she at last allowed herself to be plunged into despair at this decision, and constantly entreated her father to reconsider his decision, but he kept him as her lover; but she always refused. He then repeated his proposals of marriage, and was met by a family, but they were not regarded. At length, on the 4th of March last, the girl was found murdered in a field, where the parents had retired as the girl's husband, and near a river, with her throat cut from ear to ear. Justice, in a state of great agitation, flung upon the window and cried out, 'I have killed her, I have killed her!' and the girl said, 'I have killed her because she would not marry me.' The prisoner followed her unobserved into the bushes, carrying with him a concealed weapon, and after a deadly cowardly conspiracy he found the waist he implored her to fly with him. She refused, as he expected she would, and he intended that if she did not comply with it he would kill her. The girl, on refusing, fled from him, but he fired at the gun at her twice, but without killing her. The girl's brother, however, who was accompanying her, rushed on the boyish, was slightly wounded in the hand by some of the shot. The girl, on seeing this, fled from him in flight, but was captured. In his defense all that he could say was that he was mad with love and jealousy. The jury declared him guilty, with extenuating circumstances, and he was sentenced to work for seven years' hard labor.

CRUSADE AGAINST SIZED STAYS.

A regular crusade has been entered into by the doctors of Paris against the fashion of tight lacing. It was brought in with the new cut of dress now in vogue. Although the doctors have not yet been able to succeed in the abolition of the fashion, they have succeeded in the adoption of a dress which the ladies employed in one of the fashionable establishments of Paris have made fashions. Those young ladies, whose sole business was to show off the new dresses, have, by their graceful forms of the imagination of the proprietors are displayed, along with each dress, a pair of stays. The stays, we could be borne, had gradually accustomed themselves to the dress to which they belong. The consequence is, a blood-vessel was the consequence; and, in the other, suggestion of the doctors, laid off the victim in a few hours.—Court Journal.

AUSTRIA.

WOMEN-WHIPPING IN ITALY.

On the 11th January, 1859, regulation was issued by order of the Lieutenant Field Marshal, the Government of Lombardy, the Chevalier de Villata, providing for the punishment by whipping of women who should be found assisted in the courts of the Government. By this order the red lash is applied to the naked shoulders on examination or a punishment decreed by the courts. The whip applied to the naked shoulders of the victim at the jailer, or by some competent person designated by the jailer. The number of lashes, and other circumstances of such whipping are left to the discretion of VICTOR EMANUEL, KING OF SARDINIA.

THE CRISIS IN ITALY.

THE accompanying portraits of the Emperor of Austria and King of Sardinia, as well as the views on the Ticino, the fortress of Alessandria and of the citadel of Milan, form part of the history of the times, and are worthy of preservation by all our subscribers. During the war which is about to begin, the places which we illustrate are likely to become classic sites, while the men may win historic fame.

To begin with the King of Sardinia, who—together with his minister Count Cavour, whose portrait and biography we gave in No. 175—has had the credit or discredit of commencing the present strife.

Victor Emanuel the Second, King of Sardinia, comes of a race older even than the Bourbons, though, like other old properties, it has been a good deal knocked about in its journey down the Vale of Time. Deep in the dark ages, his ancestors were Counts of Savoy, and waged fierce wars with adjacent barons as the custom of those days was. A neighboring feudal realm—a principality, Piedmont—passed, in course of time, partly by conquest, but more directly by a mariage de convenance, under the sway of a poor cousin of the Savoy Dukes. The cousin dying, and his issue failing at last, the elder branch of the house annexed Piedmont. Greed of territory thus awakened, the house presently laid hands on Montferrat; and, by-and-by, good luck favoring the Dukes, Sicily fell into their grasp. This distant island they wisely exchange: for the more convenient isle of Sardinia, the flourishing and populous; and when, in 1815, the little territorial arrangements of Napoleon First were so rudely overset by the allied sovereigns, the ruler of Piedmont—then known as King of Sardinia—was reinstated in his possessions, which his heir rules to this day; to wit: an area of territory half as large as Michigan or Illinois, with a population of five millions of souls.

Victor Emanuel is the son of that famous but unlucky Charles Albert who, in 1848, by his precipitate movements against Austria, so gravely injured the cause of Italian Independence. At the time Charles Albert raised the standard of Italian unity and independence, his son—the present King—was twenty-eight years of age. He took the command of one of the two divisions into which the little Sardinian army was divided, and distinguished himself by conspicuous gallantry throughout the campaign. On the memorable days at Verona, Peschiera, and the Mincio, Victor Emanuel gave ample proof not only of bravery but of skill and remarkable coolness. It was all, as every one knows, of no avail. The superior power of Austria crushed the Piedmontese; and, after a year of harassing warfare, the King of Sardinia gave up the contest and his throne, and his son, Victor Emanuel, reigned in his stead.

As a monarch he is well spoken of by political writers. He is trained by none of the pernicious vices which so frequently render monarchy contemptible. A fondness for the fair sex is the only foible which his enemies have ever had to his charge. His public policy has raised Sardinia to a very high rank among European States. Her credit stands high; her people are happy and prosperous; her trade is increasing; liberty of speech and of the press prevail within her borders; the power of the Church has been curtailed. The most conspicuous feature of Victor Emanuel's foreign policy has been his alliance with the maritime Powers in the struggle against Russia. This adroit step is now bearing its fruit.

In the event of war, Victor Emanuel is to command the Sardinian army in person.

The Emperor of Austria has thus far occupied very little of the world's attention. He is quite a youngman, only twenty-eight years of age, but is an older sovereign than either of his rivals. When he was eighteen years old his uncle, the Emperor Ferdinand, abdicated; and his father, the Archduke, declining to accept the honors and cares of royalty, young Francis Joseph was declared to be of age and crowned Emperor.

He has never come before the public except in connection with graceful acts. We have heard of his marriage to a sweet and amiable girl, Aurelia Elizveria; of his fondness for his children; of his distress when his little daughter died; of the acts of personal kindness by which he strove to win back the Hungarians to loyalty. This is about all that has been made public in connection with his name. He is now said to be animated by the most violent desire for war, and will perhaps take the field in person.

It may be well to remember that, though the Emperor of Austria is absolute, he is guided by a corps of ministers who are trained from their youth to their business, and are perhaps the most skillful diplomatists and tacticians in Europe. They are chosen without regard to rank, and promoted on the ground of merit only.

There is little to be said about the views. One of our engravings represents a scene in the neighborhood of Alessandria, which is one of the strongest places in Piedmont, and the point to which the Italians will naturally retreat in case of a defeat in the field.

Enormous sums of money have been spent in fortifying this place: the order with which the people are working will convey to the beholder some idea of the enthusiasm aroused among the Sardinians by the present struggle.

The bridge over the Ticino will be one of the points most warmly contested when the Austrians attempt to invade Piedmont, or the Piedmontese Lombardy. In a few days we may hear of a desperate contest at this spot.

The scene at Milan needs no description. It is a dull military court-yard. But there many and many a gallant Italian patriot has paid the forfeit of his life for his patriotism; there the Germans have gathered for hours, many years before sweeping on some fair Italian city or province. Should the French and Piedmontese prove successful, this court-yard will perhaps become the theatre of spectacles which may teach Austria how bitterly her name and her rule are hated at Milan.

A few historical memoranda of the history of Austrian dominion in Italy may not be out of place.

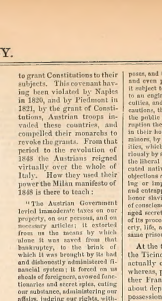
It was in 1708 that Austria made its first definite acquisition of territory in Italy. This was the Duchy of Mantua, which was seized by the Austrian Emperor Joseph I. Lombardy, or the Milanese, followed next in 1714. It had long before been a part of the empire, but had fluctuated between Austria, Spain, and independence for two or three centuries. In 1714, by the treaty of Baden, Milan was declared part of the Austrian empire. In 1797 Austria obtained, by the treaty of Campo Formio with France, Venice and the Venetian territory. These various possessions, with small slices of adjacent territory, were confirmed to Austria by the treaties of 1815, after the fall of Napoleon.

Ever since then Austria has been the mistress of Italy. In 1816 Austria compelled the Kings of Naples, Sardinia, and the rulers of every other Italian State, to enter into a formal stipulation not to grant Constitutions to their subjects. This covenant having been violated by Naples in 1820, and by Piedmont in 1821, by the grant of Constitutions, Austrian troops invaded these countries, and compelled their monarchs to revoke the grants. From that period to the revolution of 1848 the Austrians reigned virtually over the whole of Italy. How they used their power the Milan manifesto of 1848 is there to teach:

"The Austrian Government levied immoderate taxes on our property, on our persons, and on necessary articles: it extorted from us the means by which alone it was saved from that bankruptcy, to the brink of which it was brought by its bad and dishonestly administered financial system: it forced on us rebuffs of foreigners, avowed fomentators and secret spies, cutting our substances, administering our affairs, judging our rights, without knowing either our language or our customs: it imposed on us foreign laws, inextricable from their multiplicity, and an intricate, endless system of proceeding in criminal cases, in which there was nothing either true or solemn except the prison and the gallows; the executioner and the gallows: it spread round us censuring nets of civil and ecclesiastical, military and judicial regulations, all converging to Vienna, which alone engrossed the monopoly of thought, of will, and of judgment; it forbade the development of our commerce and our industry, to favor the interests of other provinces, and of Government manufactures, the speculations of Viennese oligarchs; it subjected our municipal institutions, the heart of our country and the proof of national good sense, to a petty, harassing control, conceived for fiscal purposes, and tending only to fetter us: it enslaved religion, and even public benevolence of its free course, making it subject to administrative interference, and turning it to an engine of Government. It was after endless difficulties, and only after having recourse to the lowest persuasions, that private individuals were permitted to help the public wants, and preserve from contagion and neglect the poor abandoned to themselves in the streets, in their hovels, or in prison. It seized the property of minors, by forcing guardians to invest it in public securities, which were to be dealt with arbitrarily and suspiciously by secret agents of the Government: it subjected the liberal arts to the most vexatious restraints; it prosecuted native knowledge; it raised the most ridiculous objections and the most odious difficulties against private, big or importing printed foreign books: it persecuted and entrapped our most distinguished men, and raised to honor slavish understandings; it systematized the sale of consciences, and organized an array of spies; it reasoned secret informations, and made suspicions the rule of its proceedings; it gave the police full power over liberty, life, and property, and threw the patriot into the same prison with the assassin."

At the time we write, the Austrians have crossed the Ticino, and the war may be presumed to have actually commenced. It is quite noticeable that whereas, pending the preliminary negotiations, neither France nor even Sardinia hinted any thing about depriving Austria of any part of her Italian possessions, the cry now is for "Italian Independence," which of course involves the expulsion of the foreigner from Milan. That this is the design of the French is quite evident; that the people of Italy hope and expect the same thing, there can be no question. Already we hear that Mantua and Tuscany have risen in arms, expelled the Austrians and their rulers, and joined the national Italian cause. Another mail or two will, in all probability, bring us intelligence of similar movements at Venice, Milan, and throughout the Papal legations: the fire is kindled: who shall say where it will stop?

The leading British journal, in which hatred and dissent of Louis Napoleon overpower every other feeling, labors strenuously to convince us that the real aim of the French Emperor is not the expulsion of the Austrians from Italy, but the conclusion of a treaty with them, after the first battle, and the combination of all the foreign powers of Europe against Great Britain. It is very easy to make prophecies. So far as the facts indicate, the Emperor Napoleon has, at present, no desire beyond that of freeing Italy.



FRANCIS JOSEPH, EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA.

PLACE D'ARMES BEFORE THE CITADEL OF MILAN.

BRIDGE OVER THE TICINO, CONNECTING LOMBARDY WITH PIEDMONT.

CONSTRUCTION OF SARDINIAN FORTIFICATIONS NEAR ALESSANDRIA.

THE DOLL THAT LOST HER SQUEAK.

A LETTER FROM GRANDMAMMA.

My little Anna tells me in the letter
She sent from California last week
(And sadly does that great misfortune fret her),
"Dolly has lost her squeak."

Have you forgotten when you bought that baby
I said her "cry" was nothing but a creak,
And that you'd keep her but a short time, maybe,
Before she'd lose her squeak?

I think it was a great mistake to buy it:
Such dolls are always badly made and weak.
And yours especially—you won't deny it—
Had not a pleasant squeak.

Throw her away; to keep her would be folly.
The rest of your dear doll-ites left by her cheek;
And who is there admires a failed dolly,
Or one that's lost her squeak?

Perhaps you think that if to me you send it,
As I have pulled my many a hole and leak,
Like broken china I would try to mend it;
Yes, even to mend a squeak!

But now I think of it—you must remember
Of crying babies how I used to speak
Over and over, saying, last September,
I did not like it much.

Let children, who themselves are fond of crying,
Indulge these baby fancies, whims, or freaks:
I've not the least objection to their buying
Legions of dolls with squeaks.

But you, a traveler and courageous-hearted—
You, who in danger scorned to cry and shriek—
You, who have crossed the ocean since we parted,
And never gave one squeak?

Far be from you, my lady and my darling,
My little woman, patient, brave, and meek,
To covet crying babies, always snarling,
At every squeeze who squeak.

The time may come a better doll I'll buy you
In every top-boy I will search and seek.
But what shall console you yet deep you,
Save babies with a squeak?

I'll find a doll with real hair and curly,
With muslin dress, untainted by roll or streak,
Bright-eyed, red-cheeked, and with a bosom portly,
Superior to a squeak.

Well stuffed with bran, with cotton, or with woolen,
Shall be her body, solid, firm, and sleek,
And with no joints parts to push or pull in,
No wires to make a squeak.

As large as Mary's, Harriet's, or Fanny's,
Or any other of their clique,
A doll shall cross the Isthmus and be Annie's
That will not, can not squeak.

Though the greatest ocean-waves she must be tossed on,
Cheer up, my darling, don't pipe and shriek!
She shall be yours, if such there be in Boston—
A doll without a squeak.

THROUGH THE STRAIT GATE.

BY CAROLINE CHESEBRO.

JEAN HEINE'S vineyard, planted with many a docket and misgiving, was for three years the subject of questioning amusement and sly ridicule among the farmers of Montegale. In the fourth year, however, fruit began to ripen on the vines, and the grim, determined features of Heine's face and character to relax. In this last experiment of a dry, parsimonious heart he thought he saw the signal of his harsh fate's relenting; and, encouraged by the sight, he took to work with renewed vigor and expectation. His summer was prominent at last.

He gave his evidences of reception and perception quite in Nature's way. She sets her birds to singing, and causes the crops to stir. His heart seemed released from the icy bands that bound it; and though never a gossip, such utterance as he indulged modified the sternness of his countenance; and then, as year by year passed on, and the vineyard prospered beyond all expectation, the mountain dreamily changed, until he became in some sort the burglar and expounder of Providence.

In journeying to Innsbruck, and in contact with contractors for distant markets, now ideas, enlarged notions of comfort and the necessities of life, were forced upon Heine. He gave bold and manly welcome to these thoughts and notions; by the renewing of their mind, his neighbors saw in a man of no small something worthy imitation; there was ascertained a possibility of expanding the mountain dreamily.

Jean Heine had a little son, Adolph by name, to whom his mother had given, for inheritance, a face like the vision of an angel—one of the least conceptive, beyond dispute. Emilie's infinite sentiment, her unconscious appreciation of truth and love, was glorified in him; but in this radiant image an unconscious, if not fatal, child force, as it looked out from underneath the broad-brimmed old straw hat, the lofty white forehead, the reddish-brown curls of the round cheeks, the delightful mass of chestnut hair, the large and deep-blue eyes, above all, to watch his movements and to hear his voice—this was to apprehend a solemn accusation of delight—an apprehension worth one's journeying from valley-lands, even such as Ring with the laughter and are bright with the beauty of young children, to the savage hill-country where poverty fights for its daily bread.

This child, Adolph, was four years old when a traveler, worn and weary, aged also, perhaps, not as a shelter under Heine's porch.

Emilie was gifted. His gray hair and exhaustion spoke for him with more authority than he ever spoke for himself; and she placed before the stranger a brown loaf and a bowl of milk. While he partook of her hospitality he was thoughtfully observant of the boy playing about; and the mother, quick and eloquent in speech when her lad furnished a text, found no difficulty in giving a family history to the old man. He was in the habit of looking into the human heart and the nature of things; and hearing Emilia's report of long years of hardship and misfortune, and of brightening prospects and promised prosperity, he thought that she spoke of Jean herself, and of Adolph, in the summer of whose birth the idea of a vineyard had first occurred to Jean; hearing of the child's talk, and listening attentively, the old man answered her, so solemnly that she could never forget the words: "Yet; no doubt this is the best thing in saving of you both. I have looked with my eyes, and I know that a child is the greatest blessing God can give to man or woman. The lad has eternal life in him. He will open the Strait Gate for you."

He spoke with such fervor that, though Emilie was a Jew, and quick to catch truth, and also, with a readiness in her inclinement that pleased and surprised him, she was never reconciled, and never forgiven by the astonishment into a reverie from which she did not return to things and duties till long after the stranger had risen and gone his way.

But for the broken loaf and the empty bowl, Emilie might have believed that she had slept and dreamed on the hillside; and even on summer days not incredible feat.

When Jean came home she reported the visit and the old man's words; but he was tired, and did not seem to be much impressed by the message. For Emilie, she kept the saying in her heart, nearly believed that a child is the greatest blessing God can give to man or woman.

She treasured every word the old man had spoken. He was travel-worn, ate rye and skim and often answered. The deep impression made upon her of a fear that had frequently tormented her, and driven her to prayer, to ask, with more confidence, that God would protect Adolph; for the protection of the neighbors was not always to be relied on, and the circumstantial, that long life was not for this fair child. He was so bright, so beautiful, so wise, who could believe that he would not live in the world long?

But having asked for her son's life, Emilie's faith was not sufficient. She could not go her way, leaving the event to her Lord. If importunity had any advantage in addressing, to ask, implicitly, that should not be wanting. And some accident, some sudden surprise or calamity they could not provide against, would, in a moment, remove the threat of a life that was all her life. Poor love! it will not content itself with accepting the gift it desire, and then, with law-abiding "With Thee?" wait till time reveals. Nay! but "Oh that Thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down, behold and do!" And the stillness of eternity grows with more solemn awe, and the ear of love, to see, for it is just beyond our vision that His power is at work, and His angels of life and death are moving to and fro. Heavenly eyes see, and the soul shall see even with them into the rose's heart, or across the desert, and through the mirage, and the mirage beguiles, serves in the conviction that He doeth all things well.

Therefore the eyes of Emilie, foul mother! did establish itself upon this stranger's prophecy: Adolph should live.

One day in autumn, just after the grape-gathering, while Jean was walking over the grassed, shaking hills that made the vineyard, the winter set in, Adolph came running and leaping along the hill-side, like a young deer, with joy and life and expectation. He had found something curious down there in the glen. Could father tell him what it was? Such a shape and so large! Never a child could father guess? The boy held up his little hand, clenched, as if Heine must not guess it: he did so with gentle force, and there—indeed!

Great was the little one's delight when he saw his father surprise.

"It looks like a bird turned to stone," said Jean. And he was not far strange likely, for the boy looked indeed like a bird, with wings of green and white, and bold breast, on its finger, and laughed with Adolph; but their laughter was not long.

"Where did my son find this?"

"Oh, in the glen," answered he. I went for the red lumortal. We are getting ready for winter, mamma and I; and there is ever so much down there."

"But you brought no flowers with you."

"Ah! them stick. When I go back I will fancy thing; I wanted you to tell me—"

"Come, then, my lad, we'll see. Besides, we must get the lumortal."

Then Jean put the bit of ore in his pocket, and they took their course down the hill, the boy, dark glen where the everlasting flourished.

And this was not Heine's land, but belonged to neighbor Vochte.

Father and son walked together through the glen, and the lovely specimens of mineral lay side by side on the ground, and was able to receive the magic influence of the sun's benignant power and fragrance. As for Jean, he had often thought of making neighbor Vochte an offer for this very strip of land, knowing that it was worthless to him, because it lay might secure it at a low price; some day its best ores would come to be discovered.

This very fall, indeed, he had considered the purchase, and had concluded to defer it yet a while.

But now, as he walked along the margin of the stream to the spot Adolph pointed out, and observed in different places broad patches of this white metal, he remembered that its bed long ago observed it, but never until now had it excited a suspicion as the testimony of great treasure hidden in the ground. While Adolph was gathering the immortelle he examined the hill-side. Presently he heard the lad calling to him, and went to help him gather the crimson flowers. While thus occupied he told Adolph he had often thought to buy this glen, and cut away the trees and plant grapevines; to the waste land should be turned to use. But he also told his son that, should he ever make that purchase, he would leave room for the immortal—the pretty flowers should have their shade and solitude, and nothing must disturb them. And while he spoke Jean held in his broad, hard hand a flower and the little hand of Adolph, and they walked together from the shadow out into the sunshine.

There Jean Heine paused, and for the last time reflected. Then he resumed his walk, and answered all the innumerable questions of his little son, until they came to the summit of the slope, and on the level land his cottage stood. Waiting there, he said,

"Go home now to your mother, and trim the house with flowers, my son. I am going to talk with neighbor Vochte. Maybe we will agree about the land. But you are to say nothing about that, Adolph, when I come home; you must not ask me no questions. If I have bought the glen, I shall tell you. If I do not, then it is of no consequence, for you will always have your playground and the everlastings just the same."

Then Heine kissed his little son, and the lad ran home to his mother.

This Vochte was a poor farmer, who merely managed to support existence by years. He was a much older man than Heine—not a lover of our Jean. He had watched with jealousy the daily speculations of his neighbor—the beginning and the progress, the frequent disaster and the present prosperity. And he was not prolific of these observations, though they were careful and profound. He had no children of his own, and never had excited merely his will toward the man whose enterprise had stirred him to exertion and excited him to hope. In each effort he seemed to plunge into deeper poverty; and for him, poor miserable wretch! several "deeper misfortunes" were in store.

Heine's visit occasioned considerable stir in Vochte's family. He would have had it no other. Here, for the first time, was evidence of a man of existing importance. Still, with humility, he waived the signs of importance, and sat down in the midst of poverty, distress, and discontent as if himself a dweller among their fastnesses. When Vochte asked about the vineyard Heine was not backward—said merely the truth: that his gains were well-earned—by the sweat of his brow, and by prayer. It might be ruin for him to continue his enterprise, but it certainly would be ransom should he stop where he was. He did talk but not the words of elated success. Such prosperity as he here spoke of had unknown perils, and he was humble in spirit.

But he meant to add a little to his farm this autumn, Heine said. He had been looking about today. He could see by the eye of eternal land lying to the right of his vineyard, and was tempted to buy it. So he had thought of Vochte's property. Vochte's glen, and remembered that they had already spoken to each other of that unpromising tract, which was fertile in but one thing—a valuable for grape-culture. He would not mind a little extra trouble, and additional hard labor, if he could further his fortune. Had neighbor Vochte still a wish to part with the glen?

Neighbor Vochte looked at the proposal with an eagerness that betrayed a fear: Heine might repent, and revoke his generous proposition. He and his wife had bitter recollection of last winter's terrors; all summer they had toiled in their unprofitable soil that the autumn store might not be theirs through the winter from starvation, and their barns were not overflowing now, when the harvest was over. They had nothing to barter with Heine, and the sale was effected, money counted and paid down in their hands, and Heine left the land and a man then as Jean Heine! But as he crossed the threshold of that miserable den, and looked back for an instant to review their parting compliments, the rags and squalor, the misery and trouble, the prophetic shadow stood before him as a thing that he bemeaned somewhat gravely.

At his door he met Adolph. "Is mamma out?" said he, but not to speak; he only came to look in his father's face. Nothing could he learn by such inquiry. Jean Heine said,

"The glen is yours, Adolph; and we will never destroy the everlasting. How could we? I have bought the land."

But the old Adolph discovered was a fact without a comment.

Until very late in autumn, the agent who purchased Heine's grapes, hailed for a night at Heine's house on his way through the hill country. The house was warm and well lighted, as indeed he always earned it when he slept under Heine's roof; for Jean had an inquiring mind, and the agent was a man of extensive information, whose studies, though frequently interrupted by thirsts, were always resumed with delight and profit.

On this night Heine had a special aim in his interrogatory: was bent on acquiring all information possible concerning the working of copper-mines, and, as he anticipated, Mr. Roland was able to tell him much. For his business abroad in his course of his long experience he had come to regard himself as a piece of circulating information, and my one was free to command his resources; but how was he astonished to hear his guerist say in the end of their long talk:

"You must wait till after daybreak, Roland before you examine your journey. I have something to show you—a copper-mine!"

To the amazed inquiry that followed he answered that he had bought a small tract of land since Mr. Roland traveled that way last, and intended to clear the undergrowth; but in cutting away some of the trees he had obtained sufficient evidence that the soil was full of copper.

The result of the investigation made next morning was as follows: Mr. Roland gave up the journey he had projected, and returned to town.

All winter he was engaged in negotiations, carrying on a correspondence with Heine. Twice he came to Montegale with other gentlemen, geologists and scientific persons, who had opinions of weight. A mystery was gathering, and like a cloud around Montegale; the neighbors could not penetrate it; but what food they had for talk and speculation through the long cold winter!

By spring negotiations were brought to a conclusion. Heine sold his land to Jean, was the richest man to be found within fifty miles. A company of engineers came up from the lowlands; miners followed in their train; the quiet of the farming country was broken. Cottages were built, a furnace was put up; rumor said, moreover, they was rumor of a school-house and a church. And because Jean Heine had bought a bit of neighbor Vochte's land.

Did every man and woman that looked into Heine's satisfied face congratulate him? Ah, no; his speculation became known? Did any one excuse him of talking advantage of a neighbor's need, buying land where value he was aware, well, though its owner did not guess it, at a price a million times below its worth? Did any one blame Heine? Do you suppose inhabited that country? Not angels, any friends, nor they whose charity thinketh no evil.

Heine had the penalty of sudden gigantic prosperity to pay; and with prompt alacrity to afford. For he had some pride, some kindly feeling, some notion of integrity. It was hard to have that pride wounded, that kindly feeling misunderstood, that integrity denied. But he could keep silence while envy and wrath and malice showered their invectives. He anticipated a reaction. Montegale was not quite proved an infernal region to his mind.

The reaction came—not in the form hoped for, variously urged; by the cordial praise and acutement acts of Heine's deserted friends—again whom the highlanders could not array themselves with any strength of animosity; by Heine's free use of his money, which he spent with large hand. The weak became intimidated by the constant nerve. he rendered by this means, and by the riches of the whole neighborhood at heart; the jealous were brought over to his interest unawares; the unpicioned were won by his liberality. Every year Montegale, bearing away the imprecations of his old neighbor's head and heart, lost its former confidence, and favor: one by one he won them. That Heine's place as the great man of the region became void seemed to be the eye of Vochte glared visibly the token of a great inward fire raging toward destruction, and that through his hatred of Heine seemed his sole desire and aim.

Heine built a fine house on the site of the old, and surrounded it with grounds that were broad and not sufficient; nowhere was any lack. Much curiosity was excited by reference to the mansion and its owner. People came from a distance to visit the works. Hundreds of workmen found employment, and Heine's fame as a benefactor was enlarged its borders. All the neighboring lands increased greatly in value—even Vochte's lands. Nature did not seclude herself within the premises of Heine; she smiled on all these poor men. Yes, on all, though many of them were ungrateful to their souls into her favor. The more intelligent of the old settlers came to see that the new-comer was benefactor of the region—strangers always called him so. There was no withstanding the onward stride of affairs.

Emilie was the happiest of the future of Adolph—thinking of this mainly through all then prosperousness. She believed that the old Jew's seer's prophecy had cognizance of these events, and that they prepared the way for his future. On that favor she had no doubt—not the least. She was of worthy, and hardly even Vochte would have had a story instead of a love in his heart. So, to other eyes than those of love that mother and son were marvelous.

And the old man's prophecy was—eternal life!

Deck the house with the immortal—the flower everlasting. They shall be glowing symbols. Dream on of your son's eternal life, fond Emilie! Heine's is a prosperous house. Jean Heine! But neither shall they hinder the fearful swaying of the lofty pines (under no wind of heaven—not even Jehovah's—to be felt) that stand solemn in the glen, this young Adolph, when the pines were uprooted; but the mother, with her beautiful daughter, struck down evidently with instant death, by blow even from on the blue heaven, they young Adolph, when the pines were uprooted; under the pine-trees in the glen, he whose sole achievement in this world was to live.

The miners found him there, and they made a bier of green branches, and carried him to his father.

She followed him through the Strait Gate.

Autumn winds and rains left the mountain full of riches; but his wife and his child had wandered far beyond his sight; hand in hand, in the Strait Gate—and the angels were there.

But the Gate was shut to him. Yes, he said—forever shut to him. And he thought of neighbor Vochte, when he passed that sentence on himself; and was not reassured when he considered Wall Street and State lunatic asylums; for he knew what was in the world—this copper-mine had been in Wall Street; and the asylums have a cure for men like neighbor Vochte.

From sympathizing with Vochte, as the people in the vicinity were at first disposed to do, they began at length to laugh at him! Their derision could tered him the more; and his face darkened to a fearful shadow when men began to sun themselves in the light of Heine's prosperity. But Heine, for his part, had never, till Emilie's death, ceased from his endeavors to conciliate this man, and to benefit his family. Often he had, directly, and through others, offered him large sums of money, which he said might be considered, did Vechte so prefer, as payment for the land; but all this was indignantly rejected—Vechte preferred his poverty and wrath. Now and then, in view of Heine's growing opulence and their failure, Heine said he knew not why he should distress himself for the sake of one who made himself a fool; but do you suppose that such conclusion proved shelving? that he could rest in it? or that, now his son was grown, he was willing to see the lot within the Strait Gate beckoning to him, a dreadful reflection, that of not being able to dispute the passage with the aspect of a devil, did not frighten him from off the ground?

The days of Heine's mourning passed strangely away. He attended as usual to the conduct of affairs—made no exhibition of his grief. Yet not without a shudder could he think of his old enemy now remember how, in the last days, Emilie had walked joyfully along the paths of righteousness and peace, seeking to learn, from the sacred characters and revelations of the Book, what to believe, when had gone, making ready to follow him speedily, if it only might be to, without astonishment, ask—"Whither they have gone I can never follow. Narrow is the path, and strait the gate—few there be that find it. It is small, and I am not worthy through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven."

Yet to be lost in Emilie forever; to behold no more his glorious young son; to have no joy forever, save his day of dreaming, in which he used to perpetuate their names by the unwasting marble!

Though Heine complimented not of his calamities, nature ere long betrayed him. Pain, and weakness, and pain; nights of wakefulness and days of misery for this strong man, who had been wont mournful woman! And still it was long after his changing face and person began to excite remark and sympathy ere he could be induced to give any warning to escape from Montecute or die.

How could he abandon his child, Louis? He allowed himself to be persuaded, and hastened preparations needful for the journey.

In a year's time Jean Heine returned to Montecute restored to something like his usual health and energy. He returned as if to greet the living —it was but to visualize the living—for, upon his passport, if it might be, presents himself to the Lord Keeper. How often, even while he thought of neighbor Vechte, in spite of his indignation, he had prayed that that thing so difficult, as even the passage of a camel through a needle's eye, might be accomplished for him! Nay, by-and-by must it be.

It chanced that Heine stood by the graves of his wife and son when, for the first time since his return, his hortified eyes fell on the spectral figure of his ancient enemy. It was he to whom Heine owed his trouble—he, which made him quake at this moment, though he said it not, which had thrown the barrier between them (the unsolicited graves), and offered his hand to the dead. But Heine could not decline it. He, from the depth of his degradation, could see this clear shining truth, "I am a worm, and no more."

Jean Heine, as he gazed upon him, seemed spellbound. "Vechte," said he, at length, "between us silence with desperate will, "a thousand worlds could not pay for this! Vechte, you were degraded enough to begin with, besides that your own hand brought you forward toward heaven—have I cast you down to hell?"

The old man laughed—he hardly heeded the question; he had obtained in that moment a still more weighty one—he saw that Heine was unprotected, and he could rejoice at that.

"Come," he said, in a whisper, "this place," said Jean. Vechte's laughter seemed to have answered him. "Come, let us talk of your son—your living son. Tell me of him, neighbor, in sum speak to me of him. You named him Adolph; he was born I remember that summer, when—"

But the old man thrust Jean's hand away as if destruction were in his touch. Heine did not retreat the one inch, but stood, as the old man, trembling, half-blind Vechte, and heard the wrathful utterance he gave to his hate; the blasphemy and cursing. Confess to such a monster!

He walked by Vechte's side till there was a subject given in the flow of the awful speech.

"Adolph!" he said, "Adolph, who had listened, was struck, to the speech that broke from Heine.

"Yes, no," I mean not that. I never beggared you. But for the sake of that name I have thrown away every thing, and your blood seems to be on my hand.

Hearing this, Vechte broke out again, after his former style, only now there seemed to be triumph lurking in his despair. Now at last should the world judge between them, and his wrongs would be avenged.

His imprecation was not yet at an end—unloosing seemed the fiery flood of hate that broke forth with volcanic energy and terrible sound—when Heine stem that flood, nor should he ever have stayed it, but that it was so strange and horrendous a sound as that of forgiveness.

But Vechte's triumph was short-lived. He went home to tell how God had avenged him, to prepare the proclamation that should bring disgrace on the proud name of Heine. But, crossing his threshold, he fell dead, before a word of exposure escaped him. He was found a lifeless inherited the wrath of Heine. For Jean the Strait Gate opened.

A PERILOUS HOUR.

I WAS apprenticed to a decorative painter; but getting of a bad habit of smoking, I left my master before my time was out.

After some years of backsliding about I got tired of a maritime life, and having married and determined to stick to the shore, I got work with a builder whose premises lay on a reeking high chimneys. I had always a very cool head, and could stand on the narrowest ledge no more dizzy, and so I was soon a favorite hand with my master.

He had on one occasion to fasten a lightningconductor which had sprung near the top of a very high chimney, and as I was the only man about who was James Colly to do it, as the most daring of his men. About half a dozen of us went that morning with a hand-cart, containing the necessary ropes, blocks, the kits, and a box or cradle. Having flown the kits, and dropped its line across the top of the chimney, we soon drew up a rope, at the end of which was a block, through which ran the rope whereby we got up the cradle.

Colly had only been married a fortnight; and as we stopped that morning for breakfast, somebody asked him if he hadn't a last dying speech to leave for his wife; and then Mr. Stanning having shaken hands with us, we got up the cradle, and Colly was drawn slowly up. It was known all over the town that we were engaged on the job, and when as the day was not named. I did not expect we should have had many spectators; but as we got higher, and the cradle swung clear of the roofs, that the streets were already thronged with starers. Colly was very quiet, and as he looked over the side to the people he said, unapplosly, that this was no time for such folly, and that he thought I might think of better things. I was not much given to sipping fools, who, he dared say, destined no better than to see us all smashed to pieces.

I had come up in the best heart, thinking, indeed, nothing about the danger we incurred; but as we drew nearer and nearer to the top, I felt that nothing, as it seemed, belonging to this world near as we but this narrow rope, I began to see the peril of the undertaking. What Colly thought of I don't know—he sat at the bottom of the cradle, never looking over the side, and I dare say would do better to keep his eyes about him, so that he might never need to look down.

Good Heaven! what was this? Here we were within a yard of the top projecting coping, and still they were stopping—actually stopping—to rest by the boat. I guessed in a moment that they wished me out on board, and that while I was engaged at that window the rope would be broken when the cradle came to the block. I sprang up, and catching the projecting coping, swung myself on the coping. Colly, too, sprang up and followed me. In a few days I was at work again, and the cradle, up, till the rope sang again with the strain there was upon it.

I then stepped, and cradle, hauling-line, and the main rope with its block, fell down. Thus were we two poor men left in a most desperate situation.

Poor Colly was completely dazed with affright; and the moment we got down he went off home, and only a foot and a half broad, he called out, "Where is the key?" "It's knee and a half," I said. And so I said, very solemnly, "Sit down, Jem; God will hear us if we pray to him sitting down."

The rain fell in torrents. "Where water is this rod?" he asked, in a very hollow voice, though he was looking straight at me, and I was sitting close to his squint, and he couldn't sit steady, but swayed his body backward and forward, so that I felt certain he would fall off the rope.

"Come, Jem, lad," I said, thinking to take the fright off him; "it's kneed and a half."

A SHADOW.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XX.

BEGINNING TO SKETCH.

THE next morning when Gabriel declared that he was perfectly well and had better return, nobody opposed his departure. Hope Wayne indeed ordered the carriage so readily that the poor boy's heart sank. Yet Hope pitied Gabriel sincerely. She wished he had not been injured, because then there would have been nobody guilty of injuring him; and she was quite willing he should go, because his presence reminded her too forcibly of what she wanted to forget.

The poor boy drove dismally away. What a dreadful thing it is to be young, thought he. ²

After he had gone Hope Wayne sat upon the lawn reading. Suddenly a shadow fell across the page, and looking up she saw Abel Newt standing beside her. He had his cap in one hand and a port-folio in the other. The blood—impetuous tell-tale!—rushed from Hope's cheek to her heart; then rushed back again to hang out signs of surprise, not of distress.

Rising from the lawn and bowing gravely she turned toward the house.

"Miss Wayne," said Abel, in a voice which was very musical and very low. She stopped. "I hope you have not already convicted and sentenced me."

He smiled a little as he spoke, not familiarly, not presumptuously, but with an air which indicated his entire ability to justify himself. Hope said:

"I have no wish to be unjust."

"May I then plead my own cause?"

"I must go into the house—I will call my grandfather, whom I suppose you wish to see."

"I am here by his permission, and I hope you will not regard me as an intruder."

"Certainly not, if he knows you are here;" and Hope lingered to hear if he had any thing more to say.

It was a very sudden affair. We were both hot and angry; but he is entirely in the wrong, and I should have done nothing had he not struck me, and felt upon me so that I was obliged to defend myself."

"Yes—to be sure —in that case," said Hope, still lingering, and remarking the music of his voice. Abel continued—"I while the girl's eyes saw how well he looked upon him—how the clustering black hair—the rich, dark complexion—the light of intelligence playing upon his face—his dress careful but graceful—and the port-folio which betokened interview to be no design or expectation of course, but a mere chance encounter.

"I am very sorry you should have had the pain of seeing such a spectacle, and I am ashamed my first introduction to you should have been at such a time."

Hope Wayne lingered, looking on the ground.

"I think, indeed, that you owe me an opportunity of making a better impression."

"Hope! Hope!" came from the sound of a distant voice calling in the garden.

Hope Wayne turned her head toward the voice, but her eyes looked upon the ground, and her feet still lingered.

"I have known you so long, and yet have never spoken to you," said the musical voice at her side; "I have seen you sometimes in church, and I have even tried sometimes—I confess it—to catch a glance from you as you came out. But I am not angry—am I?"

"Hope! Hope!" called the voice from the garden.

Hope looked dreamily in that direction, not as if she heard it, but as if she were listening to something in her mind.

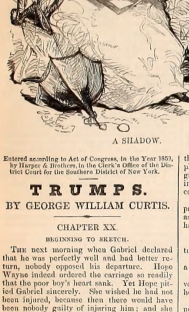
"Now I meet you here on this lovely lawn in your own beautiful home, and you know your grandfather permits me to sketch the place?"

"Do you draw, Mr. Newt?" asked Hope Wayne, in a tone which seemed to Abel to trickle along his nerves, so exquisitely he longed was the pleasure it gave him to hear her call him by name. How did she know it? thought he.

"Yes, I draw, and am very fond of it," he answered, as he untied his port-folio. "You know your grandfather permits me to sketch the place?"

"Do you draw, Mr. Newt?" asked Hope Wayne, in a tone which seemed to Abel to trickle along his nerves, so exquisitely he longed was the pleasure it gave him to hear her call him by name. How did she know it? thought he.

"Yes, I draw, and am very fond of it," he answered, as he untied his port-folio. "You know your grandfather permits me to sketch the place?"



OUT OF MY HOUSE!

"Why so?"

"Because we never can draw any thing as handsome as it seems to us. You can go and see the pond with your own eyes, and then no picture will seem word for word. He passed.

"There is another reason, too, I suppose."

"What is that?" asked Hope, looking at her companion.

"Well," he answered, smiling, "because life in books is always so much better than real life?"

"Is it so?" said Hope, musingly.

"Yes, certainly. People are always brave and beautiful and good, in books. An author may make them do and say just what he and all the world want them to, and it all seems right. And then they do such splendidly impossible things"

"How do they?"

"Why, now, if you and I were in a book at this moment instead of standing on this lawn, I might be a knight slaying a great dragon that was just coming to destroy you, and you—"

"Hope, Hope!" rang the voice nearer and more imperiously.

"And I—might be saved by another knight dashing in upon you, like that voice upon your sentence," said Hope, smiling.

"No, no," answered Abel, laughing, "that shouldn't be in the book. I should slay the great dragon who would desolate all Delafield with the smoking of his scaly tail, then you would place a wreath upon my head, and all the people would come out and salute me for saving the Princess whom they loved, and I"—said Abel, after a momentary pause, a shade more gravely, and in a tone a little lower—"and I, as I rode away, should not wonder that they loved her."

He looked across the lawn under the pinetrees as if he were thinking of some story that he had been actually reading. Hope smiled no longer, but said, quietly:

"Now, now I am wanted. I must go in. Good-morning!" And she moved away.

"Perhaps your cousin Alfred Dinks has arrived," said Abel, carelessly, as he closed his port-folio.

Hope Wayne stopped, and, standing very erect, turned and looked at him. Of how much subtler meaning tones are than words! There was perhaps significance in that idle remark of Abel's.

"Do you know my cousin, Mr. Dinks?"

"Not at all."

"How did you know that I had such a cousin?"

"I heard it somewhere," answered Abel, gently and carelessly, but looking at Hope with a curious glance which seemed to her to penetrate every pore in her body. That glance was just what Abel could have said: "And I heard you were engaged to him."

There was nothing more for Hope to ask. Her womanly instinct assured her that any other question would indicate that she had perceived under the words a meaning in Abel's voice—and perhaps even suggest to him that there was more reason for that meaning. So she said, with a half smile,

"I suppose it is no secret that Alfred Dinks is my cousin," and, bowing to Abel, she went swiftly over the lawn toward the house.

Abel stood her as she went. She disappeared and he walked toward the lower side of the lawn.—Papa asks me what I think I had better do in living?—He looked around the beautiful place in which he stood. He saw the glancing lawn—the skirting hedge—the tufted and drooping and spreading trees stretching away in little groves—the stately house—the gardens beyond—beyond it—

"I think I had better be the owner of Pinewood."

Saying this to himself, with that sneering smile, he sat down upon the lawn, and, opening his port-folio again, began to sketch.

CHAPTER XXI.

A VERDICT AND A SENTENCE.

THAT music lingered in her ear—that grace upon her eye—that manly confidence and cheerfulness in her memory.

Hope Wayne did not agree with Abel Newt that life was so much better in books. There was nothing better in my book she had ever read than the little conversation with the handsome youth which she had had that morning upon the lawn. She did not say so to herself. But she was not likely to complain again to Mrs. Simcoe of the want of society.

When she went into the house she found no one until she knocked at Mrs. Simcoe's door.

"Aunty, did you call me?"

"Yes, Hope.

"I was on the lawn, Aunty."

"I know it, Hope."

The young lady did not ask her why she had not sought her there, but she asked, "What do you want, Aunty?"

"Your aunt, Mrs. Dinks, invites you to go with her and pass the next winter in New York."

Hope made no reply.

"You see, my dear, society was nearer than we thought."

"Yes, Aunty, so I find," said Hope, abstractedly. After a moment she added: "But I think it's very pleasant here."

"My dear Hope, how long is it since you complained to me that you wanted society?"

"I know, dear Aunty," replied Hope, blushing and confused. "Yes, I know, but then—"

"Then what?"

"Why, that was some time ago."

"Well!"

"Well, Aunty, since then—"

Poor Hope! She knew not what to say. It was too late to recall it. She stopped, and looked proudly at Mrs. Simcoe as if she had no right to have heard the word or to have looked into her heart.

"Since then?" asked Mrs. Simcoe.

"I have changed my mind," said Hope, calmly.

The elder woman looked quietly out of the window. Does not one woman know another woman? Were not words between these two a needless waste of a ridiculously transparent veil?

"I saw you talking with Abel Newt on the lawn. Why did he strike that boy?" asked Mrs. Simcoe, still gazing at the distant hills.

"He had to defend himself," said Hope, rapidly.

"Couldn't a young man protect himself against a boy without assuming him?" He might easily have killed him," said Mrs. Simcoe, in the same dry tone.

"It was very unfortunate, and Mr. Newt says so; but I don't think he is to bear every thing."

"What did the other do?"

"He insulted him."

"Indeed!"

The tone in which the elderly woman spoke was trying. Hope was flushed and warm and disconcerted. There was so much skepticism and contempt in the single word "indeed," as Mrs. Simcoe pronounced it, that Hope was really angry with her.

"I don't see why you should treat Mr. Newt in that manner," said she, haughtily.

"In what manner, Hope?" asked the other, calmly, fixing her eyes upon her companion.

"In that sneering, contemptuous manner," replied Hope, loftily. "Here is a young man who has had an unfortunate quarrel, in which he happens to get the better of his opponent, who chances to be younger. He helps him carefully into the carriage. He explains as well as he can, and to-day he comes to explain further, and you treat him as before him; you misunderstand and misrepresent him. It is unkind, Aunty, unkind."

Hope was almost sobbing.

"Has he once said he was sorry?" asked Mrs. Simcoe. "Has he told you so this morning?"

"Of course he is sorry, Aunty. How could he help it? Do you suppose he is a brute? Do you suppose he hasn't ordinary human feeling? Why do you treat him so?"

Hope asked the question almost fiercely.

Mrs. Simcoe sat profoundly still. O bars and bolts! O garden walls and hedges! O sittings in stately parlors and overseeing daily lessons from young teachers! O barricades and fortifications! They had all come to this.

Mrs. Simcoe said nothing. Her face seemed to grow even more rigid as she sat. But suddenly turning to the proud young girl who stood at her side, her bosom heaving with passion, she drew her toward her by both hands, pulled her down close to hers, and kissed her.

GOOD-BY!

Hope sank on her knees by the side of Aunty's chair.

All the pride in her heart was melted, and poured out of her eyes. She buried her face upon Mrs. Simcoe's shoulder, and her passion crept and sobbed itself away. She did not understand what it was, nor why. A little while before, upon the lawn, she had been so happy. Now it seemed as if her heart were breaking. When she grew calmer, Mrs. Simcoe parted the fair young face between her hands, and kissing it once more with a strange earnestness, said, slowly,

"Hope, my child, we must all walk the path alone. But you, too, will find that your best affections are but tents of a night."

"Aunty, Aunty, what do you mean?" asked Hope, who had risen and saw that sorrow was speaking, and now stood beside her, pale and proud.

"I mean, Hope, that you are in love with Abel Newyear."

Hope's hands dropped at her side. She stepped back a little. A feeling of inexpressible solitude fell upon her—of alienation from her grandfather, and of an inexplicable separation from her old nurse—a feeling as if she suddenly stood alone in the world—as if she had ceased to be a girl.

"Aunty, is it wrong to love him?"

Before Mrs. Simcoe could answer there was a knock at the door. It was Hiram, who announced the victim of yesterday's battle, saying in the parlor he was to wait for Miss Wayne.

"Yes, Hiram." He bowed and withdrew. Hope Wayne stood a little while silent in a little while, then, with the calm, lofty air—almost and loftier than ever—she went down and found Gabriel Snow. He came to thank her—to say how much better he was—how sorry that he should have had the misfortune to have been fighting almost before her very eyes.

"I suppose I was very foolish and furious," said he. "Abel ran against me, and I got very angry and struck him. I know now that I know it was, and I am very sorry. But, ma'am, I hope you won't—he—he—I mean, won't—"

It was too late before. That unlucky ma'am" had choked all his other words. Hope was so lofty and splendid in her pride and scorn before him that he was impressed with a kind of awe. But the moment he had said the word he gasped that second so much older—the instant he had spoken to her as if he were only a little boy and she a woman—that he was quite confused. He staggered and stumbled in his sentence until Hope graciously said,

"I blame nobody."

But poor Gabriel's speech was gone. His mouth was pinched and his eyes dim. He could not think of a word to say; and, twisting and fumbling his cap, did not look at Hope.

"There, Miss Wayne!" suddenly said a voice at the door.

Hope and Gabriel turned at the same moment, and beheld Abel Newt entering the room gayly, with a sketch in his hand. He nodded to Gabriel without speaking, but went directly to Hope and showed her the drawing.

"There, that will do for the framing; will it not?"

It was a bold, dashing sketch. The pinetrees, the windows, the piazzas—yes, she saw them all. They had a new charm in her eyes.

"That tree comes a little nearer that window," said she.

"How do you know it does?' he replied. "Yes, who only draw from books?"

"I think I ought to know the tree that I see every day at my own window?"

"Oh! that is your window!"

Gabriel was confounded at this sudden incursion and apparent resumption of a previous conversation. As he was not observed by them, he remained Abel sketching on the lawn. But Abel, sketching on the lawn, had observed Gabriel running up the steps and had been surprised in to ask Miss Wayne's opinion of his drawing. He chatted merrily on:

"Why, there's your grandpapa when he was a little grandboy and had an old grandpapa to pet him," said he, pointing at the sketch; and he had remarked upon his previous visit in that parlor. "What a fortunate thing it was that I was to see. Gracious! 'twas before the Revolution. Ah! now, if he could only speak and tell us just what he saw in those times—what he thought—how big him—what he had for breakfast, for instance. What delicious dear ridiculous conversation with all their flowery embroidery, cost a yard, say—yes, yes, and what book that is—and who gave him the hoop—"

He rattled on. Never in Hope's lifetime had such sounds of gay speech been heard in the well-arranged and well-behaved parlor. They seemed to light it up. The rapid talk bubbled like music.

"Hoop and hook—book and hoop! Oh, yes, good boy, very good boy," said he, and added, "I should think it was a portrait of the young Dr. Dresser—the new Peewee, Miss Wayne," said the audacious youth, sliding as it were unconsciously and naturally into greater familiarity.

"Ah! I know you're laughing at me inwardly heart, for you never look away from him. What on earth can they all think?"

What a contrast to Gabriel's awkward silence of the moment before! So natural, too; such an easy flow! such a handsome face! such a musical voice!

In the midst of it all Hiram was heard remonstrating outside:

"Don't, Sir, don't! You'll—you'll—something will happen, Sir."

There was a moment's scuffling and trampling, and Christopher Dart, restrained by Hiram, burst into the room. The old man was white with wrath. He had his cane in one hand, and Hiram held the other hand and arm.

He had come in from the garden, and as he stopped in the dining-room to take a little trip to the West Indies he had heard voices in the drawing-room. Summoning Hiram to know if they were visitors, he had learned the awful truth which apprised him that his Hesperidian wall was down, and that the ruthless hand at that moment might be shaking his precious fruit from the boughs. To save his own life himself left the open door. Do you think, then, it helps a man's temper to be so furious with himself as with other people? He burst into the room.

There stood Hope: Abel at her side, in the merry midst of his talk, with a pencil in one hand, his port-folio under his arm, and his finger pointed toward the portrait; Gabriel, at a little distance, confoundedly and abashed at the incongruous between Hope and Abel of which he had so precipitately assisted. The poor boy! forgotten by Hope, and purposely trampled down by the cane and a stretch.

"Hope, go up stairs!" shouted the old gentleman. "And what are you doing in my house, you scoundrel?"

He lifted his cane as he came toward them.

I have all his fighting business yesterday was a conspiracy—a wicked plot against my peace of house!" I've a mind to break your impudent noses!"

"Sir," said Abel, "you gave me leave to come here and sketch."

"Did I give you leave to come into my parlor and bring boys with you, Sir, and take up the time of my daughter?" he replied, "I say, up stairs!"

"Only thought, Sir—" began Abel.

"Now, in Heaven's name, don't make me angry, Sir!" burst in the old gentleman, almost choking at the word. "Don't make me angry, Sir? What business have you to think, Sir? You're a boy, Sir—a school-boy, Sir! Are you going to depart with me from my house? I'll take back my permission. Go, both of you! and never let me see you here again. Abel turned at the door, and bowed gravely to Hope.

"Remember, Sir," cried the old man, "I take back my permission."

"I understand, Sir," replied Abel, bowing to him once more.

He closed the door; and as he did so it seemed to Hope Wayne as if the sunshine were extinguished.

CHAPTER XXII.

HELP, HO!

ABEL NEWT was fully aware that his time was short. His father-in-law had spared him of his presently leaving school. To leave school—to leave Hope! Might it not be to lose Hope Wayne? He was banished from Pinewood. There were flaming swords of fire guarding every one that Eden-gate. Two days were passing. The summer is ending, thought he, and I am by no means saved.

He thought of these things constantly. Indolent, luxurious, self-indulgent, at the age of eighteen, and now getting on for twenty-one, a man in purpose and perception. If he could only compass that point! He had not been only dispense with all the drudging steps by which he foresaw that otherwise he must climb somewhere up into that Eden. Could he gain Hope Wayne, secure the future! This was the lovely young girl to whom the pine tree he walked around it on the shore. This was the beautiful castle that peered above the tree-tops as he rambled in the woods. Was she to be his not? Could he misinterpret that interview upon the beach? Was it not plain that she was she preferred him to all others of whom he knew? To be sure, how about Alfred Dinks? that somebody who had been left out in the cold? He only wondered how he himself could communicate with the distant bars and flames might be overcome, but how overcome maidenly reserve and obedience? Powder can not explode flit, nor a spark ignite, without a match. How should he contrive to see her—to speak to her?

He asked himself the question as he strolled along the road a few days after the scenes that have been related, and was startled out of his strolling that day, Gabriel among them. Neither Abel nor Gabriel had communicated their visit to Pinewood and its catastrophe. It was a secret better buried in their own bosoms. Abel's dislike to the other was increased and embittered by the ignominy of the expulsion by Mr. Dart, of which Gabriel had been the sole companion but a witness. It was an indignity that made Abel tingle whenever he thought of it. That the fellow should thinking of it too, and laughing at him in his sleeve, and he longed to thrash him. But Gabriel had a sudden consciousness. He was thinking only of Hope Wayne, and laughing at himself for thinking of her.

The boys were strolling in different parts of the village. Abel, into whose mind had stolen that thought of the possible laughter in Gabriel's sleeve, pulled out his handkerchief suddenly, and waved it with an indignant flourish in the clear air. At the moment a carriage had overtaken him and was passing. The horses, startled at the flutter, fell to waving their head-chief, shied and broke into a run. The coachman tried in vain to control them. They sprang forward and had their heads in a moment.

Abel looked up, and saw that it was the Burt carriage dashing down the road. He flew after, and every boy followed. The horses, maddened by the cries of the coachman and passers-by, by the rattling of the carriage, and their own excitement and speed, plunged on with fearful eagerness. And the carriage flew by; two faces were seen at the window—both calm, but one terrified. They were those of Hope and Mrs. Simcoe.

"Stop 'em! stop 'em!" rang the cry along the village street; and the sleepy villagers looked from the windows or came to the door—the women clutching their babies in their arms, the men leaving whatever they were doing and joining the chase.

"God save the dear, pooty thing!" cried Marm Wrawley, as the noise passed her door, and she and Devon ran to see. "Devon, pooty thing!" And she rubbed her hands as if she were in pain.

Hiram had not stop to punch his pipe. He did not even declare that it was no use—but he opened off at as seventy years of practice in him—seventy years that had only frosted his head, and not his heart. The whole village was in motion. Every body knew Miss Wayne—every body loved her. How fearful to think what might happen to her!

Both she and Mrs. Simcoe sat quietly in the carriage. They knew it was madness to leap—that their only chance lay in remaining perfectly quiet. They both knew the danger—they knew the awful slaughter's that was going on the edge of death or accident. How strange Hope's eyes were! How strangely she looked the familiar houses—the trees—the signs—the fences—as they swept by! How peaceful and secure they were! How strangely they seemed! She read the names distinctly. She thought of little incidents connected with all the places. Her mind and memory and perception were perfectly clear—but her hands were clenched and her cheek pale and pale with vague terror. Mrs. Simcoe sat beside her, thinking now of Hope's hands, but neither of them spoke.

The carriage struck a stone, and the crowd thundered at the new sw k rock and swing—a furious course. The mad horses bet flew more wildly. Mrs. Simcoe opened Hope's hand, and murmured, almost inaudibly,

"'Christ shall bless thy going out, Shall bless thy coming in.' Kindly compass thou about, Lord, whom we saved from sin."

"That corner! that corner!" shouted the throng, as the horses neared a sudden turn into a side-road, by which they would escape the making, frightened by the persons who came running toward them from the village street. Among these was Gabriel, who, hearing the confused murmur that rang down the road, turned and captured the carriage that was whirled along at the mercy of wild horses. He seemed to his companions to fly to the team—to himself he seemed to be standing still.

"Carefully, carefully!" cried the others, as they saw his purpose. "Now, now! Well done, lad!"

Gabriel did not hear. He only saw the fatal corner. He only knew that Hope Wayne was in danger—that the carriage, already swaying, would be overturned—might be dashed in pieces, and Hope—

He came near as the horses were about turning. The street toward which they were heading was narrow, and on the other corner from that there was a well. They were turning toward Gabriel down the main road—but just as he came up to them he threw himself with all his might toward the animals' heads. The startled horses half-recoiled, turned sharply and suddenly—almost themselves jumped the well—and the carriage stood still. In a moment a dozen men had secured them, and the danger was past.

The door was opened and the ladies stepped out. Mrs. Simcoe was pale, but had nearly fainted quailed. The faith that sustains a woman's heart in the hour when them be thinking herself with her his finger-tips.

"Dear child!" she said to Hope, when they both knew that the danger was over, and her lips moved in silent prayer and thanksgiving.

Hope looked very trembling and silent. In her inmost heart she hoped it was Abel Newt who had saved them. But in all the throng she did not see him. She looked, but he was not apparent.

"Here is your preserver, ma'am," said Dilbery, the tavern-keeper, pushing Gabriel forward. Mrs. Simcoe seriously smiled. She put out her hand to him kindly—and Hope's grave sweetness, told him how great was their indebtedness. The boy bowed and looked at her earnestly.

"Are you hurt?"

"Oh! no, not at all," replied Hope, smiling, which she exerted herself to do, because she noticed that Gabriel looked pale, as if he had showed some sign of pain—or disappointment —or what?

"We are perfectly well, thanks to you."

"What started the horses?" asked Gabriel.

"I'm sure I don't know," replied Hope.

"Abel Newt started them," said Mrs. Simcoe. Hope reddened and looked at her companion. "What do you mean, Aunty?" asked she, haughtily.

Mrs. Simcoe was explaining when Abel came up, out of breath and alarmed. In a moment he saw that there had been no injury. Hope's cheek rose and the color slowly died away from her cheeks. He eagerly asked how it happened, and was confounded by hearing that he was the cause.

"How strange it is," said he, in a low voice, to Hope, as the people buried themselves in looking after the horses and carriage and Gabriel talked to Mrs. Simcoe, with whom he found conversation so much easier. "How strange it is that just as I was wondering when and where and how I should see you again, I should meet you in this way, Miss Wayne!"

Pleased, still weak and trembling, pale and flushed by turns, Hope listened to him.

"Where can I see you?" he pleaded; "certainly your grandfather was unkind—"

Hope shook her head slowly. Abel watched every movement—every look—every fluctuating change of manner and color, and his heart was almost bidden meaning.

"I can see you nowhere but at home it

He did not reply. She sat silent. She wished he would speak. The silence was dreadful. She could not bear it.

"I am very sorry," said she, in a whisper, her eyes fastened upon the ground, her hands playing with her handkerchief.

"I hope so, too," he said, quietly, with a tone of sadness, not of reproach. There was another painful pause.

"I hope so, because I am going away," said Abel.

"Where are you going?"

"Home."

"Why?"

"In a few weeks."

"Where is your home?"

In New York."

It was very much to the point. Yet both of them wished to say so much more; and neither of them dared!

Miss Hope!" he whispered Abel.

Hope heard the musical whisper. She perceived the audacity of the familiarity, but she had not with it the power to resent. She bent her head a little lower, as if listening more intently.

"May I see you before I go?"

Hope was silent. Dr. Livingstone relates that when the lion had struck him with his paw, with a certain economy, he lay in a kind of paralysis, of which he would have been cured in a moment more if the lion devoured.

"Hope," said Mrs. Simcoe, "the horses will be brought up. We had better walk home. Hiram, my dear—"

"I can only see you at home," Hope said, in her voice, so low, so clear.

"Then we part here forever," he replied. "I am sorry."

Abel's reason was no reproach; it was only a deep sadness that softened his musical voice. Is there a woman living who does not know that at that moment Hope Wayne would willingly have sunk at his feet? Not because a man is in love with her and a woman will come to him. Oh no! not that; but because the loftiest and proudest and the loftiest and least selfish of all passions is the love of woman!

"Forever," he repeated slowly, with low, remorseless music.

Hope Wayne trembled, but he did not see it.

"I am sorry, too," she said, in a hurried whisper, as she moved slowly toward Mrs. Simcoe. Abel Newt was disappointed.

"Good-by forever, Miss Wayne," he said. He could see now Hope's pale face and her hand the more formal address, and knew by it that he was offended.

"Good-by" was all he caught as Hope Wayne took Mrs. Simcoe's arm and walked away.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

WEEDS AND WEEDING.

Inasmuch as talking of what crops should be grown, we will now say a few words what should not be grown. No vile weeds should take the place of useful and valuable plants. To describe those which infest our fields would involve the labor and space which belong rather to a book than a single article, but some few remarks doubtless think they know too much of them already. A luxuriant growth of large weeds is by no means a sign of poor soil. On a barren soil no plant can grow. Who does not remember the rich crops of weeds that we had he was about to buy for a large thistle to which he might tie his horse? Although there was something in the thistle to which the many farmers nowadays who wish they had no thistles. True, these known as the Canada thistle, are very good fodder, if cut at the right time, but we have better plants for this purpose. And its roots are beautiful, but we are tired of them; there is nor will their fragrance atone for their mischief. The good, honest farmer who has a crop of weeds and thistles' stings when binding them in a sheaf of wheat or oats, but sometimes it would be more profitable to cut the coarse wheat and have thistles. We know of a place where, not long ago, there was a large field of them, which was cut for hay, as soon as the leave ever seen. They were cut and saved for fodder, but the neighbors of the man on whose land they grew, did not like the seed in their fields.

Many of the brambles that haunt the toil in vast districts may, if cut at the proper time, be viewed as noxious weeds, all impressing the mind of the tiller of the soil with the divine command: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread."

Experiments have been made by many agriculturists to find out the increase of crop caused by careful weeding; but we have not space to tell much about them. In some cases, all other things being equal, the crop has been doubled on an acre of land kept clean, as compared with one overgrown with weeds.

Weeds are robbers. They steal the food ready-to-hand by the crops they infest, and will soon take it away. So take the means by which they live." Every weed in a pump taking water from the soil, which it pours out by the pores of its leaves. The earth gives more moisture, and the weeds suck it up; if it did not, they would be scorched to death by the sun, as they are when pulled from the soil and thrown out to rot. Where they are beyond number they keep out the air and light, and the plants intended to be grown as a paying crop are weakly, sickly, spindling, and too often a failure. But some are so well satisfied to have the crops keep forth thieves and children that they don't trouble themselves or the thistles.

May it not be one of the wise provisions of nature, that weeds should haunt rich and fine cultivated fields and defy the efforts of the husbandman—for their presence is to use that soil and know, etc., on the soil, thus liberating pent-up food in its particles. When the land is being plowed, though it may seem to be turned over in masses by the mould-board, the grains of earth rub against each other, and this rubbing process causes a separation of slight quantities at least of elements before locked up. However small the quantity may be in a pound of soil, the rubbing together of thousands of tons, as in the case of an ordinary-sized field, may become a matter of great consideration. And the amount of surface on which roots can act becomes greater, for be it remembered, that the tearing a clod of earth in two exposes new surfaces: so is it with a particle of soil. But the plow in loosening and rubbing the particles together gives the whole more loose, and the air can come in and go out, emitting and enriching the soil by the things which it leaves in it. The principles here referred to are true of any land when disturbed by any implement, and may it not be a wise provision of Nature that weeds stimulate industry in favor of the best remedial culture; that persisting the agency of Providence in the natural world to perform functions with greater speed, the combined influences of which are ever at work in the relating processes that increase the availability of the soil's elements, and especially when a preparation is made for those that are taken from it in the shape of vegetables and animals.

There is an adage which has more truth than poetry:

"One year's seeding
Makes seven years' weeding."

The letting of a weed go to seed is a crime which ought to be punished by law. A farmer, the owner of a whole neighborhood, may cultivate in the best manner, and sweep all weed seed from some ill-managed district may come on the wings of the wind to infest their land. This is very true of the seeds of the thistle, for they have what may be called downy wings, by which they float on the slightest breeze. As Sir John Sinclair, who was too well known as a writer and man of the world to make it necessary for us to say any thing of him, expressed himself on this subject, "We have ample of legislative interference. "In several countries the Legislature has interposed in some degree to the destruction of weeds. By a regulation in France, a farmer may sue his neighbor who neglects to destroy the thistles on the side of the proper road, and may employ people to do it at the other's expense. In Denmark this is done by oblige the farmers to rent up the Corn Marigold, Chrysanthemum segetum, &c. But the oldest regulation for that purpose was probably in Scotland, a statute of King Robert II., about the year 1370, having been directed against that weed which was considered to be particularly pernicious to the corn-field. The statute is very short and ably expressed. It discourages that none be sown "who possess land or lordship with weeds, and introduces into them a hurt of evermore." Barnabas Googe, who lived in 1570, thinks corn were fined a sharp for such sluts. Under the authority of that law, Sir William Grierson, a Scottish baron, was accustomed to hold his courts for the express purpose of fining the farmers in those parishes whose crops there broke or spread of that weed were found. In districts where careful culture is practiced weeds are little known; but in the parishes where they are spread by careless and far between slovenly sons them carefully; may be untiring in their efforts, and labor in pulling out and cutting down every intruder found among their crops, along the sides of open drains, fences, and the highway, and the seeds of weeds from the lands of their less careful neighbors find a genial soil in those parts where they rob the crops of the food necessary for their support, and do all the other injury of which we have spoken. In the best-tilled grounds the seeds have not been themselves, but the former often sown there carefully; for they may be carried by the winds from the hedges and other rough places, though they MAY.

Mount oil away, and gentle May
Come more returns with roses glistening;
Pure skin the air, the skies are fair,
The Tiptop winds seem mute and listening;
In shady bowers, through sunny hours,
The young birds chirp and coo together,
And soap and teeth from bliss lay forth,
Sweet harbinger of Summer weather!

Already now, on Care's rough brow,
A softer summer-beam is playing,
As mute and smile to conquer guile
Of sea-shores are in fancy straying.
Away then toil, for now and old
Of Gotham, soon we hope to wander,
To press the turf and breathe the surf
But mist and mows have runs to ponder:

Hope on—for—for all will know
The dangers linked with summer weather;
Let all precaute, we would make sure
Of comfort, health, and joy together.
A stock of three light Summer Clothes
Sold by SMITH BROTHERS for CASH PAYMENT;
No sore or MAN whatever can
CATCH COLDS AND FEVER IN SUCH RAIMENT!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140 Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.
} NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

NOVELLO'S

CENTENARY EDITIONS OF THE

ORATORIOS.

Original Edition.

Arranged and Edited by VINCENT NOVELLO.

HANDEL'S MESSIAH..... 75 cents.
" Bound..... $1.25.
All the Choruses (in score)..... 50 cents.

HAYDN'S CREATION..... 75 cents.
" Bound..... $1.25.
All the Choruses (in score)..... 50 cents.

HAYDN'S SEASONS. Paper, $1 25; Bound, $1 63.
MENDELSSOHN'S ST. PAUL. Paper, 75 cents; Bound, $1 25.

MOZART'S 12th MASS: HAYDN'S 2d MASS: BEETHOVEN'S MASS in C: CHERUBINI'S REQUIEM MASS, each, in Paper, 75 cents; Bound, $1 00.

SOMEBODY'S LAY OF THE BELL. Paper, 42 cents; Bound, $1 00.

All the Oratorios of the Great Masters in uniform style at similarly low prices.

Catalogues forwarded gratis.

N. B.—This is the only Cheap Edition of the Oratorios ever edited by Vincent Novello. Each number is complete in itself, and may be had separately. On his careful supervision this edition owes its pre-eminent purity of text and correctness.

WEBB & ALLEN,
1 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, N. Y.

THE ECONOMIST

COOKING STOVE,

FOR WOOD OR COAL,

WITH A SAND OVEN.

This is the most valuable improvement that has been made in Cooking Stoves during the past twenty years.

THE SAND OVEN

Equalizes the heat on the same principle as the Bunsen Oven on common stoves.

THE SAND OVEN

Retains the heat long after the fire has gone out.

THE ECONOMIST

Wrarrants the Sand Oven, and defies competition.

Write the Sand Oven, is out of reach of them.

THE ECONOMIST

Is the most economical stove in the world.

THE ECONOMIST

Has a most powerful draft for boiling.

THE ECONOMIST

Heats water for the Bathing Room, &c., as quickly as any Range, and at half the cost for fuel.

Do not fail to examine it! It is manufactured by

W. & J. TREADWELL, PECK & NORTON,
ALBANY, N. Y.,

And for sale everywhere.

Something New.

Agents wanted, to go into a New and Honorable Business, which will pay from $15 to $30 weekly.

No Humbug.

Satisfaction guaranteed. Send stamp for particulars, which are free.

S. M. NYRICK & CO., Lynn, Mass.

To all who use Horses.—DR. TOBIAS'S VENETIAN HORSE LINIMENT, in pint bottles, price only 75 cents, is warranted cheaper and superior than any article of the kind in market. Sold by druggists generally. Depot 56 Maiden Lane, cor. Gold, N. Y. This is no humbug article—but a reliable and well-tested one for itself. None genuine unless signed "DR. T. TOBIAS." Depot, 56 Maiden Lane, New York. Sold every where.

$15 Worth of Music for 25 Cents.

The success of the "Gentle Annie Melodist" is unprecedented. More than Fifty Thousand copies have already been sold, and, from present indications, the sale will reach 100,000 copies this year. Encouraged by this success, the publishers have issued the containing the Words and Music of fifty of the very best Songs, among which will be found songs Thou Il Tarry-to, Apalin, Long, long weary day, We met by chance, Beautiful Venice, Bonny Eloise, Ellen Bayne, I'm not myself at all, Charity, I see her still in my dreams, Widow Machree, Nancy Lee, I do still greatly, Old Playground, &c., &c.

Gentle Annie Melodist, No. 2,

Gentle Annie Melodist, No. 1, 25 Cents.
Gentle Annie Melodist, No. 2, 25 Cents,

Sent by mail, postage paid, to any address. Sheet Music, Music Books, Violins and Violin Strings sent by mail, and postage pre-paid, where the price is sent with the order.

FIRTH, POND & CO.,
No. 547 Broadway, New York.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

PRIVATE LIBRARIES.

SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

The very general interest which at this time seems to be taken in establishing

Public Libraries,

in nearly all our cities, towns and villages, prompts us to call the attention of committees starting in so desirable purchasing of books for such purposes, to our very extensive and unequalled assortment of the same. Our own large and popular list of publications furnishes us, through the medium of exchange with other publishers, with facilities unequaled by any other house, in Boston or New York, for procuring at the lowest net prices what we will enable us to defy competition. Having special arrangements with all the large English houses, agents in the country, we shall always be in immediate receipt of every new and desirable work as soon as published, and can supply them at our counter most of

HISTORICAL, RELIGIOUS,
SCIENTIFIC, EDUCATIONAL,
AND
MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS,

will be found unsurpassed by any in the country.

We have recently established relations with prominent publishers in

LONDON, PARIS, and LEIPSIG, which will supply us with early copies of such foreign publications as will be popular and desirable, and enable us to order, with the certainty of a prompt return, any work not in stock by the first steamer.

We would invite purchasers of books for Libraries to an examination of our stock, and the correspondence of will find the former as extensive and varied, and the latter as low, if not lower, than they can find elsewhere.

TO CLERGYMEN,

we will offer rare inducements—furnishing them with such books as they may select from our stock, by the single copy, at our lowest wholesale prices; and beg to assure them that their orders by mail will receive immediate and special attention.

TO TEACHERS:

All the varieties of Text Books essentially on hand, and any information relative to them cheerfully furnished. Catalogues of our publications will be sent by mail to any person, free of charge, upon application.

PHILLIPS, SAMPSON & CO.,

13 Winter Street,
BOSTON, MASS.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 pages, and 1100 beautiful illustrations. This work will be sold by subscription only. Agents of whom a special District will be given. Rare inducements offered. Apply immediately, as the Canvass may soon be under way.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR FLOWERS, FEATHERS, COFFURES, and BRIDAL SETS, at

361 Broadway, 4 doors from Franklin Street.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,

Nature's True Restorative.

THE BEST, SAFEST, AND PUREST

Tonic and Alterative ever Prepared.

It is recommended for the healing medical authorities, and is highly approved by all who have tried it. Delicate feeling find it a perfect restoration; and persons who lead a sedentary life will find their nervous and general system invigorated by its occasional use.

Prepared by A. R. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street (corner of Williams), New York.

Handel's Oratorio, "The Messiah."

A New and Cheap Edition of this Great Sacred Oratorio, "The Messiah." Price 75 cents. Superbly bound in Crimson Cloth, Embossed, $1 25. Just published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

MEDICO-PHYSIOLOGICAL BOOK, thirty-M. fifth Edition, over 400 pages, 18mo, cloth, and about 100 Electrotype Engravings. Price $1. By a celebrated Physician, (the Author of Dr. Bergen, now of New York City. This interesting book should be in the hands of every man and woman in the land. Invalids by all have sought for in vain in any other. Sent, and mailed to any part of the country, by the AUTHOR AND & CO., No. 69 Walker Street, New York.

Café de Costa Rica C&C

THIS SUPERIOR Strengthened delicately-flavored Mountain COFFEE For sale by CORNELL & CO No. 6 Dover Street.

FIREWORKS.

Hadfield's Firework Agency.

Removed from the 21st Stand, corner of Spruce and Nassau, to

No. 24 John Street,

Between Broadway and Nassau Streets.

Public and Family Exhibitions furnished on

☞ All works warranted. ☜

GEORGE PARSONS, Agent.

A Book for the Drawing-Room, the Artist, or the Mechanic.

THE LONDON ART JOURNAL.

A MONTHLY SHILLING SERIES OF CTS. OF THE Fine Arts, the Arts Industrial, and the Arts of Design and Manufacture. Every part contains a large THREE HIGHLY FINISHED STEEL ENGRAVINGS. Two of Family Exhibition pictures, one of a work of sculpture. The literary contributions include NOTICES OF EXHIBITIONS, LIVES OF BRITISH ARTISTS, ILLUSTRATED, together with a large mass of information on subjects matters connected with PAINTING, SCULPTURE, &c., &c., and forms a complete monthly record of the Fine Arts and Arts of Industry.

VICTUE, EMMINS & CO., 26 John Street, N. Y.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

PRICES REDUCED to $50, $75, $110, and $125.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE,

the price of which is only $50, is a light and elegantly decorated Machine, capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

SINGER'S TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE MACHINE,

to be sold at $75, is a Machine entirely new to its arrangements, is very beautiful, moves rapidly and very easily, and, for family use and light manufacturing purposes, is the very best and cheapest Machine ever offered to the public.

SINGER'S No. 1 STANDARD SHUTTLE MACHINE,

formerly sold at $125, but now reduced to $110, is known all over the world. Every sort of work can be done with it.

SINGER'S No. 2 STANDARD SHUTTLE MACHINE.

This is the favorite manufacturing Machine every where. Price, with table complete, $125.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co's Gazette, which is a beautiful pictorial paper, entirely devoted to the subject. It will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
458 Broadway, New York.

CURE FOR CONSTIPATION.

The Oriental Fruit Paste, or Aromatic Confection of Figs and Senna.

Is a simple and efficacious laxative medicine, pleasant to the taste, and perfectly safe.

Sold by Druggists every where.

J. W. FOLSOM'S & CO., Wholesale Agents,
91 Fulton Street, New York.

Dyspepsia! Dyspepsia!! Dyspepsia!!!

WHAT IS IT? How Cured?

Dyspepsia is our National Disease — weak stomach, feeble digestion, distress after eating, costive habit, bilious complaint, nervous debility, and many other maladies are symptoms of low spirits, bad taste, and bad breath. Yet how few know that they have Dyspepsia! Consequently, remedies are consulted, resort is had to cathartics or bracing tonics. Such a condition was never cured by either practice, whose only office is to weaken the digestion and impair the integrity of the entire assimilative system.

DR. HUMPHREYS' HOMEOPATHIC DYSPEPSIA CURE — a simple medicated sugar (globule), acts directly on the seat of the disease, and by restoring the tone and vitality of the digestive organs, from which result good appetite, regular habits, a clear head, and buoyant spirits. Such a medicine is a gem, and only requires to be known to be appreciated.

Price, $1 per vial, with Book of Directions.

N. B.—A full set of HUMPHREYS' HOMEOPATHIC SPECIFICS, in Morocco Case, with Manual of Homœopathic Remedies, in large vials, morocco case, $5; do. in plain case, $4; Manual of 10 large sized book, $3.

These Remedies, by the single box or case, are sent by mail, or express, free of charge, to any address, on receipt of the price. Address

DR. F. HUMPHREYS & CO.,
No. 562 Broadway, New York.

Sold by all Druggists.

Most Patent Medicines are Humbugs;

but DR. TOBIAS' warrants his VENETIAN LINIMENT to do all he recommends it for, or the money will be refunded by his Agents—one will be found in every town in the States. If you have a pain or ache try a bottle, it stops pain instantly. Price 25 and 50 cents per bottle. Depot, 56 Maiden Lane, New York.

Sold by all the Druggists.

Beautiful Music.

We will send to any address any of the following pieces on receipt of the marked price: "Linda has departed," new Song by S. C. Foster, 25 cents; "The Home where Roses grew," Song by Millard, 25 cents; "Glen Schottisch," by Kleber, 30 cents.

Music or Musical Works published in Europe or America, and reprints Violin and Guitar Strings, sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of the price. Careful selections made for Teachers, Seminaries, &c.

JUST PUBLISHED:

Handel's Oratorio of the MESSIAH. Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.

FIRTH, POND & CO.,
547 Broadway,
NEW YORK.

Catarrh! Catarrh! Catarrh!

What is it? How Cured?

Thousands of persons suffer all sorts of annoyance from Catarrh. Most people know what its inconvenience and results are, and pray for some way it can be cured. It is simply a chronic irritation, and often enlargement of follicles and consequent thickening of the mucous membrane, lining the nasal cavities, frontal sinuses, and posterior nares, and sometimes extending into the throat and lungs. From this result tightness and other workings of the head, hawking and spitting, or profuse flow of mucus, loss of smell, nasal voice, and often impaired hearing and vision.

The old remedies for this repulsive nuisance were also to say thing for it. Nasal injections and inhalations are so patient, so inconvenient, and so only partially curative. Yet HUMPHREYS' CATARRH SPECIFIC, a simple SUGAR PILL, taken internally, relieves these local troubles with the milder cases; cures at once all colds in the head, and radically cures the worst cases of this most obstinate cases, as is proved by the experience of hundreds.

Price, $1 per vial, with directions.

Catarrh! Catarrh! Catarrh!

Fifty Cents per Box.

N. B.—A full set of HUMPHREYS' HOMEOPATHIC SPECIFICS, with book of Directions, and twenty different Remedies, in large vials, morocco case, $5; do., in plain case, $4. Family case of fifteen boxes and Book, $3.

These Remedies, by the single box or case, are sent by mail or express, free of charge, to any address, on receipt of the price. Address

DR. F. HUMPHREYS & CO.,
No. 562 Broadway, New York.

Sold by all Druggists.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 70 to 80 pages—and from one-third to one half—more reading than any other in the country.

Commencement of Volume XIX.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR JUNE.

CONTENTS:

ARTIST'S EXCURSION OVER THE BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD. Illustrated by POPE CRAYON.

Illustrated by Twenty-five Engravings.

SONNET. By FANE BENJAMIN.

MY GRANDMOTHER'S PICTURE.

Illustrated by Twelve Engravings.

THE BED RIVER EXPEDITION. Concluded.

Illustrated by Twelve Engravings.

JESSIE'S COUNTERTIME.

THE LADY WITH THE BALMORAL.

STARTING. By LOUISE MORTON.

HEMLOCK HOLLOW.

WILLIAM PITT. By LORD MACAULAY.

A WRETCHED NIGHT.

THE LITTLE PEACE. By W. M. THACKERAY.

Illustrations.—Master Micky Warlington.—A Great Lady.—Jesse Pierce.

CHAPTER LXXII. In which my Lady is on the Top of the Ladder.

CHAPTER LXXIII. We keep Christmas at Castlewood.

CHAPTER LXXIV. News from Canada.

CHAPTER LXXV. The Old Lion at Home.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

SCENES FROM MASTER CHARLEY'S LOVE LIFE.

Illustrations.—Master Charley falls in Love.—Jessie.—Confidences.—Mr. Augustus Adolphus Simpson.—Glue.—The Course of True Love, etc.—Separation.—Love Letters.—A Rhapsody.

FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

Illustrations.—Dinner Toilet.—Traveling Costume.—Bindy Cap.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $5.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-two Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER! $2 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for Six Months 2 00
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Two Copies for One Year 4 00
Three Copies for One Year 6 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . . 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY OR TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

☞ Persons living in the City of New York wishing to subscribe to HARPER'S WEEKLY will do well to call, and leave their names and residences, with the subscription money, in the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

OUR NEW HOME.

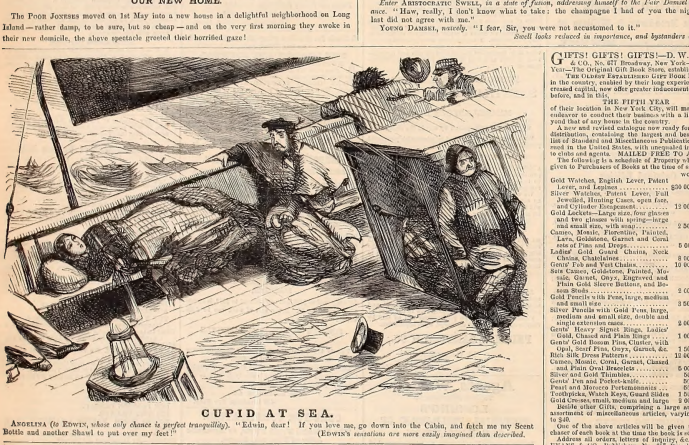
THE POOR JOURNOS moved on 1st May into a new house in a delightful neighborhood on Long Island—rather damp, to be sure, but so cheap—and on the very first morning they awoke in their new domicile, the above spectacle greeted their horrified gaze!

SCENE IN A PUBLIC REFRESHMENT ROOM.

Enter AESTHETICAPTIC SWELL, in a state of fusion, addressing himself to the Ever Devoted in attendance. "How, really, I don't know what to take: the champagne I had of you the night before last did not agree with me."

YOUNG DAMSEL, naively. "I fear, Sir, you were not accustomed to it."

Swell looks reduced in importance, and bystanders chuckle.



CUPID AT SEA.

ANGELINA (to EDWIN, whose only chance is perfect tranquillity). "Edwin, dear! If you love me, go down into the Cabin, and fetch me my Scent Bottle and another Shawl to put over my feet!" (EDWIN'S sensations are more easily imagined than described.

GIFTS! GIFTS! GIFTS!—D. W. EVANS & CO., No. 617 Broadway, New York—The Fifth Year—The Original Gift Book Store, established 1854.

THE OLDEST ESTABLISHED GIFT BOOK HOUSE in the country, enabled by their long experience and increased capital, now offer greater inducements than ever before, and in this,

THE FIFTH YEAR

of their location in New York City, will make it their endeavor to conduct their business with a liberality beyond that of any house in the country.

A new and revised catalogue now ready for gratuitous distribution, containing the choicest and best selected list of Standard and Miscellaneous Publications ever issued in the United States, with unequaled inducements to clubs and agents. MAILED FREE TO ALL.

The following is a schedule of Property which will be given to Purchasers of Books at the time of sale:

	WORTH FROM
Gold Watches, English Lever, Patent Lever, and Lepines	$50 00 to $100 00
Silver Watches, Patent Lever, Full Jewelled, Hunting Cases, open face, and Quintette Escapements	12 00 to 40 00
Gold Lockets—Large size, four glasses and two glasses with spring—large and small size, with snap	2 50 to 12 00
Gold Sleeve Buttons, Plain, Painted, Lava, Goldstone, Garnet and Coral	5 00 to 25 00
Sets of Pins and Drops	5 00 to 25 00
Ladies' Gold Guard Chains, Neck Chains, Chatelaines	8 00 to 10 00
Gents' Fob and Vest Chains	12 00 to 30 00
Sets Cameo, Goldstone, Painted, Mosaic, Garnet, Onyx, Engraved and Plain Gold Sleeve Buttons, and Studs	2 00 to 5 00
Gold Pencils with Pens, large, medium and small size	3 50 to 7 50
Silver Pencils with Gold Pens, large, medium and small size, double and single extension cases	2 00 to 5 00
Gents' Heavy Signet Rings, Ladies' Gold, Chased and Plain Rings	1 00 to 7 50
Gents' Gold Bosom Pins, Cluster, with Opal, Scarf Pins, Onyx, Garnet, &c.	1 50 to 6 00
Rich Silk Dress Patterns	12 00 to 50 00
Cameo, Mosaic, Coral, Garnet, Chased and Plain Oval Bracelets	5 00 to 20 00
Silver and Gold Thimbles	50 to 2 00
Gents' Pen and Pocket-knife	50 to 1 50
Pearl and Morocco Portemonnaies	1 00 to 3 00
Toothpicks, Watch Keys, Guard Slides	1 50 to 3 50
Gold Spectacles and Eye Glasses	2 50 to 7 50

Besides other Gifts, comprising a large and valuable assortment of miscellaneous articles, varying from $1 to $40.

One of the above articles will be given to the purchaser of each book at the time the book is sold.

Address all orders, letters of inquiry, &c., to D. W. EVANS & CO., Publishers, No. 617 Broadway, N. Y. City.

DO YOU USE IT? TRY IT! TRY IT!

LYON'S KATHAIRON FOR THE HAIR

USED BY ALL! SOLD EVERYWHERE.

ONLY 25 CENTS PER BOTTLE.

THOMAS HOOPER, No. 159 Fulton Street, Manufacturer and Dealer in Looking-glasses, Picture Frames, Oil Paintings, Engravings, &c. A word to the wise, &c.

JAMES E. CALDWELL & CO.,

822 Chestnut Street,

Opposite Girard House,

Philadelphia.

Fine Watches,
Rich Jewelry,
Silver Ware, Sterling.
Clocks and Bronze,

Chicfly of our own importation and manufacture.

Strangers visiting the city are invited to visit our establishment.

To Teachers.

My Correspondents are requested to address me, hereafter, to the "CARE OF HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK CITY." Educational Circulars, Annual Post-Office Address of Schools, Educational Reports, &c., are solicited. MARCIUS WILLSON.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

'OLD DOMINION.'

If you want DELICIOUS COFFEE always, and at a saving of from three to fifty per cent., get an "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT. Over forty different styles and varieties are manufactured. The "OLD DOMINION" TEA POT takes only half the usual quantity of Tea. Requires no cotton or flannel bag—is easily washed, and never daily a table luxury prized above all others.

☞ Sold by Dealers in Housekeeping articles, and Storekeepers generally.

ARTHUR, BURNHAM, & GILROY,
111 and 113 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia,
Manufacturers under the Patent for the United States.
Also, Manufacturers under the Patent of ARTHUR'S SELF-SEALING FRUIT CANS AND JARS.

NEVER SAY DYE.

To a person whose hair is gray, we recommend them to use HUNDEBERT'S INIMITABLE RESTORATIVE, which will give it the color of youth, and render it soft and luxuriant. It never fails.

Price fifty cents a bottle. Sold everywhere.
W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

To Housekeepers!!!—To prevent your house from being entered by burglars, use the Patent Rotary Lock, which is universally admitted to be the most convenient as well as secure lock ever invented.
VALENTINE & BUTLER, No. 327 Broadway.

409 BROADWAY.

F.Y.S.

DALLOU'S FRENCH YOKE SHIRT EMPORIUM,
409 Broadway,
Premium Shirt Manufacturers.

Shirts made to order from Scientific Measures, of the best materials, sewed by hand, and warranted to fit, at less than the usual prices.

DALLOU BROTHERS, 409 Broadway, N. Y.

$32 50 PER QUARTER ASHLAND INST. and MUSICAL ACADEMY, Cobleskill Stockton, Rockwood. Students received any time. For particulars, address Rev. H.N. BY. FOX, A.M., Ashland, N. Y., or D. G. HUBBARD, Esq., 52 Broadway.

Purchasing and Commission Agency.

J. AUG. DIX,
116 Broadway, New York.

I will purchase any Article that may be wanted for family use or to sell again, or find a market for Produce or Manufactured Goods, at more than usual rates. Refer to Harper & Brothers. See what "The Lounger" says in No. 193 of Harper's Weekly, and remember!

FINKLE & LYON'S
FAMILY
SEWING MACHINES.

Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other Sewing Machine in this Market, or money refunded.

F. S.—Send for Circular.

MILTON PINKLE,
LEWIS LYON, } 503 BROADWAY.

J. RUSSELL SPALDING'S
ROSEMARY

is the best dressing for the hair known.

The Rosemary will restore hair to bald heads.

The Rosemary will remove dandruff.

The Rosemary is the best thing for children.

The Rosemary has not been and can not be surpassed, according to all a clean, healthy scalp and beautiful hair.

The Proprietor can furnish proof to sustain the assertions above. Room will not admit the voluntary certificates from persons who have used it with success. If you are not satisfied, try it.

Every bottle, genuine, has the signature of the sole Proprietor, J. Russell Spalding, 73 Tremont Street, Boston, Mass.

Sold by Dealers generally.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—NO. 126.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

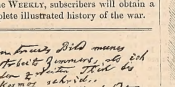
TO OUR READERS.

THE proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY are happy to announce that they are making arrangements in Europe for the prompt illustration of the leading scenes of the

WAR IN EUROPE

by the first artists of the day.

Thus, in addition to the admirable serials by Charles Dickens and George W. Curtis, now in course of publication in the WEEKLY, subscribers will obtain a complete illustrated history of the war.



BARON HUMBOLDT'S AUTOGRAPH.

THE LATE BARON HUMBOLDT.

NOT many months since we published a touching tribute from the pen of Baron Humboldt to the memory of his old friend and fellow-traveler, Aimé Bonpland. The great German expressed almost a sad surprise that it should be his destiny to outlive so many of his contemporaries, and foretold his own speedy release from the labors he loved so well. The prophecy has been fulfilled. On the 6th May, in the city of Berlin, Alexander Von Humboldt died, at the age of ninety years.

The common consent of the civilized world permits us to pronounce him the greatest man of his age. Few, if any, possessed so varied a range of attainments; no one ever used vast knowledge more nobly than he. The sciences—astronomy, chemistry, geology, mineralogy, natural history, physics, anatomy—were not more familiar to him than politics, law, and belles lettres; in all he was a master. Whether we consider the sum of his additions to the general stock of known facts, or the valuable generalizations and laws which he deduced from the discoveries of others, we shall find it difficult to name any philosopher of the present day who can be compared to him. Personal advantages enhanced the fame of his mental triumphs. After a youth spent in the successful pursuit of knowledge under surprising difficulties and in spite of formidable dangers, he enjoyed a serene and beautiful old age, and set an example of rare industry, and unvaried equanimity at a time of life when neither the faculties nor the temper are expected to be bright. Unlike many benefactors of humanity, he was fortunate enough to reap his reward in his lifetime. He saw his fame surpass that of conquerors and monarchs, and received, for the last quarter of his life, a homage more universal than any other man of his day. No funeral honors or posthumous eulogies can enhance the veneration with which the name of Humboldt has been worshiped for a quarter of a century throughout the civilized world.

He was born at Berlin on September 14, 1769; his father was a soldier of distinction and a man of wealth. Left fatherless at the age of ten, Frederich Heinrich Alexander—this was his names—was carefully educated by judicious relatives, and spent a creditable career at the universities of Berlin and Göttingen. His taste for scientific pursuits led him to devote especial attention to geology and mineralogy; and, after a couple of years' study at Freiburg, he became, at the age of 23, a director of the works at Baireuth. He had previously traveled extensively through Germany, Holland, and England, and had published a small work on the basaltic rocks on the Rhine. His labors at Baireuth increased his love for science: he made himself master of all that was then known of electricity, galvanism, botany, and geology; and the death of his mother placing him in possession of Independent property, he sold his estates, threw up his situation, and determined to devote himself to science.

THE LATE BARON HUMBOLDT.

HUMBOLDT IN HIS STUDY AT BERLIN.

Having decided to be a master a new field for his researches, he was somewhat embarrassed in his selection. War was raging throughout Europe at the time. He proposed to explore successively Southern Italy, and actually set out with a friend; but the British cruisers compelled the abandonment of the enterprise. He planned a tour through North Africa, and set as far as Marseilles; but the war again interfered, and he abandoned the project. He had met at Paris the late M. Bonpland, then apparently unalterable in a determination to go to South America; but the war put a stop to this too. Almost in despair, he and Bonpland resolved to devote themselves to a series of scientific experiments and observations in Spain, and left France accordingly. While they were in Spain the government of that country became acquainted with Humboldt's extraordinary attainments, and anticipated his fondest hopes by soliciting him to undertake the exploration of Spanish America. It need not be added that the offer was joyfully accepted.

On June 4, 1799, Humboldt sailed from Coruna on his grand voyage. Even to give a brief summary of the results of his five years' journeyings would exhaust far more than the space allotted to this article. It is sufficient to say that, having touched at Teneriffe, and obtained some valuable observations of and from the Peak, the travellers next landed at Cumana, in the middle of July, and devoted eighteen months to a thorough exploration of the wilderness which now constitutes the State of Venezuela, laying down the true course of the Orinoco and other rivers, and collecting the materials for an accurate account of the physical geography of that section of country. From Cumana he went to Cuba, traveled over the island, and made so thorough an examination of its resources and peculiarities that his work on it is still and is, in the most valuable we have. In March, 1801, he left Cuba for the main land, investigated the two Panama his starting-point. Accident drove him further south. He made Bogota his point of departure, and from thence, in spite of the hostile savages, crossed the Continent to the Pacific, and carefully surveyed Peru, Chili, and the whole western slope of the Andes. It was during this tour that he made his famous ascent of Chimborazo; he attained an elevation of 19,300 feet—over two miles above the level of the sea; and amidst mists and cold so intense that the blood started from the eyes and ears, planted his instruments on a rock which the wind had bared of the eternal snow, and collected a mass of data with an unprecedented series of observations. In Chili he was enabled to study the phenomena of earthquakes, in the midst of the last studied meteoric showers; his views on these important subjects have never been controverted. After spending twenty-two months in South America he repaired to Mexico, visited its great volcanoes, labored in the course of several of its rivers and mountain ranges, and obtained a thorough knowledge of the country. From Mexico he sailed, by way of Havana, to Philadelphia, and spent a couple of months in this country; from whence, at length, in July, 1804, he sailed for Europe, with the fruits of five years' indefatigable and intelligent travel—such a store of facts, drawings, and observations as previous travelers had not been able to collect.

Some idea of the value of his American harvest may be gathered from the fact that his published account of his travels in South America and Mexico comprises seventeen volumes folio, eleven volumes quarto, and costs $2000 a copy. It took him twelve years to write.

After the completion of this gigantic labor he traveled through parts of Italy which he had not seen, and spent some time at Rome as the guest of his brother Wilhelm. He was enabled to witness a great number of brilliant and almost unparalleled valuable observations. In 1818 he finally took up his residence at Berlin, where he was eagerly welcomed by the King and Court as he had been by the savans. The Prussians were so proud of him, and so fearful of losing him—of course Humboldt never held out to him to settle in France—that he was made a minister of State, and positively commanded that no favor would be too great for him to ask. He had no political ambition, however, and was happy to be able to proceed with his labors.

In 1829 the Emperor of Russia resolved to have a survey made of his Asiatic possessions, and invited Humboldt the direction of the work. The offer was accepted, and in company with two distinguished savans, Humboldt traveled through all parts of Tartary, spending nine months in collecting ample materials for an account of the physical geography of Central Asia. His travels were published by the Russian Government in a magnificent form, and at his return made a series of investigations undertaken which have been of great use to science. Nicholas would gladly have retained Humboldt in Russia, but found him inflexibly attached to his native land.

On his return home Humboldt found the revolutions of 1830 in progress, and filled his first dispatches from Paris, on the eve of the fall of Charles, to recognize Louis Philippe. He was much occupied then and for some years afterward in political concerns. With the King of Prussia he lived on terms of almost brotherly intimacy; and though his political opinions were widely at variance for his sovereign—he was, in fact, a thorough republican—he represented Prussia faithfully and honorably on several momentous occasions. The crisis of 1848 is said to have led to some decided expression of his liberal views, and for a time to have estranged him from his royal friend; but the separation was brief—the King was a very good man at bottom, and meant well—he could not live without Humboldt, who, for his part, was so much engrossed with scientific concerns as to be rarely anxious about politics.

Shortly after his return from Russia he planned his magnum opus, which, he intended, should contain the sum of his acquirements, and should demonstrate the harmonies of the universe. To this great work he gave the appropriate title of "Cosmos"—the World. He began it in 1831; but it was not until 1845 that he was interrupted, and the first volume did not appear till many years afterward. The fifth was published shortly before his death. The work is so well known as to need no description here. It is enough to say that it is the latest—the sum and summation of the knowledge of the most comprehensive mind of the present age.

The problem he sought to solve—demonstration of the perfect unity of the divine purpose, and the harmony of all the diverse laws—must long be considered the highest in yet attempted, and the sum of what we know is small in comparison with that which we have yet to learn. Only the one who wants to know how much the human mind grasps, and how far the human mind can extend the limit of knowledge, will find what he seeks in "Cosmos."

One of the most striking characteristics of Humboldt was the remarkable quickness with which he turned every thing to practical account—incidents and disappointments. Every man was for him a teacher of something; every object a theme for study; every event a new problem to be solved and stored away in the proper shelf in his capacious mind. Tocqueville says of him, that "in the midst of the events of war from embarking on his American expedition, he occupied himself in ascertaining the weight of the cannon balls which were fired, and calmed on soundings, he examined the weeds collected on the lead to get some light on the question of the coloring of plants; the haze that for many hours concealed from his sight the Peak of Teneriffe induced observations upon the refraction of atmosphere on vision." Our countryman, Mr. Taylor, who visited him at Berlin, thought only a few hours in his company, that the capacious scholar had pumped him dry about Central America; but he was mistaken, for, on his return home, an urgent note reached him from Humboldt imploring him to say where he got the diseased ear of corn pictured in Nicaragua!

Between Americans and Humboldt there ever existed a strong bond of sympathy. His early travels; the respect shown him on his visit to this country; his republican opinions, which, in accordance with some of our greatest men, always led him to feel a strong affection for the United States, and to show in practical ways his kindly remembrance of foreigners generally. It is not enough to say that to say that he patronized Gay the American people. No foreigner enjoyed such general veneration in this country as Baron Humboldt. The general which was made of his death, and the steps taken to his patriotism was one of the many evidences of the unbounded esteem in which he was held on this side the water.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1859.

OUR MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR.

THE map of Italy which we print this week should be carefully kept in every family. Without such a map the events of the war will be unintelligible. And we are able to say that no map of the seat of war can be bought in this country which for clearness and accuracy can compare with the one which the subscriber to Harper's Weekly receives this week.

THE EMPEROR IN THE FIELD.

THE Emperor Napoleon the Third has taken the command of the army of Italy, and intends to conduct the campaign in person. It has been remarked of him that, though he has crowned the warlike of life, he has never fought. Marlborough was when he commenced his brilliant military career; he is younger by many years than Colin Campbell, Pelissier, Havelock, Zachary Taylor, and many other eminent soldiers were, when they first assumed the direction of great armies. It is true that he, too, has lacked the apprenticeship which is essential to a right understanding of the science of war. When quite a young man he was most largely engaged in the military movements in Italy than his biographers care to confess. His brother was shot dead at Antwerp in his arms. He himself, after a perilous if not a brilliant campaign, owed his escape out of the hands of his present enemies solely to the swiftness of the steeds of his mother. Again, in Switzerland, he learned the trade of an artilleryman practically and assiduously. Since his accession to power he has made several inventions in the shape of cannons, gun-boat equipments, and batteries, which are highly considered even by persons who have no object in flattering him.

There is, therefore, no presumption in his assuming the command of the great French army of liberation. He will do at least as well as Louis Philippe or the present King of Prussia if he be as able a soldier as he is a statesman, he will do better.

So far as his personal interests are concerned, the step is adroit. It places him in the foremost rank of popular heroes. Under whatever auspices this war begins, it must, sooner or later, assume the shape of a contest between the peoples and the dynasties of Europe. The liberation of Tuscany, Parma, and the Legations are the first step; the expulsion of the Austrians from Lombardy the second; who shall say what will be the third and the fourth? Hatred and dread of the French may, for a time, keep the Germans loyal to their sovereigns, but can believe that the fiery Democrats, who set Germany in a blaze only eleven years ago, can long going to sit by quietly, and listen unmoved to the triumphant shouts of liberated, independent Italy? It would be as contrary to the principles of human nature as to the facts of history to expect Monica and Vienna to remain peaceful and loyal while Milan, Venice, and Florence are conquering their freedom.

The prospect is that the war now commencing is to be another war of independence in central and southern Europe—the war of the peoples against the dynasties; and the prospect, further, is that Napoleon the Third is going to be the hero of the war and the champion of independence.

Of course there is something very anomalous to our eyes in the Emperor of France going to war to give to Italy the freedom which he denies to his own country. The spirit is an irregular that many well-meaning and intelligent persons deny point-blank that Napoleon can mean what he says. We must look for some after-scheme of a Machiavelic and ambitious character.

It belongs to God alone to judge men's hearts, and we do not presume to act in the place of the Emperor of the French. This much, however, must be plain to him as to us: It was the conquests and the glory of Napoleon the First that Napoleon which ruined him, as the same policy would now infallibly ruin his nephew. The conquest of Italy will not be that of the French empire. It would set all Europe against the Napoleon dynasty, and sooner or later would ensure its downfall. The liberation of Italy, on the contrary, and its reorganization under a native government, through the aid of France, would strengthen Napoleon greatly.

We think that Napoleon's interest will prove a sufficient guarantee for his moderation. It would be very dangerous to him to have there any some reasons for hoping that the reorganization of Italy will be followed by the reorganization of France; that the independence of the Italian States will be the precursor of the independence of the French citizen. Candor compels the avowal, that such reasons do not exist. Not the first step has been taken toward the revival of those municipal liberties which once secured freedom to France, and the want of which has been the ruin of every French Government for the past seventy years.

Possibly, in that deep dark mind which none can fathom, there may lie hid some scheme for the elevation of the French people to the rank of citizenship. Perhaps, on the plains of Italy, that wonderfully far-seeing man may be maturing a purpose for raising his subjects from their present helpless condition. This alone is yet wanting to his fame. But truth extorts the confession that no shadow of any such coming event has yet been cast on the political horizon.

THE GRAIN CROP OF 1859.

For the past two years the grain crop of the Northern and Western States has been poor. The crop of 1858 is generally admitted to have been only half an average. The consequence is, that the West is in a condition of great depression and misery; that Western debtors are unable to satisfy their creditors in New York and elsewhere; and that hundreds of thousands of families throughout the Western States are living in great privation.

It is, under these circumstances, peculiarly gratifying to all classes that the prospect of the Western crop for the current year are very promising. Last fall the season was quite favorable for the sowing of the winter crop. The weather was open, and in every respect what might have been desired. The number of labourers thrown out of employment by the recession enabled farmers to lay under cultivation a much larger area than was ever sown before. Farmers who usually plant fifty acres with winter wheat, last fall planted seventy-five and a hundred; smaller agriculturists in proportion. For this reason where the crop is good it has been peculiarly favorable. There has been neither too little nor too much snow: neither too severe frosts nor too warm weather. The farmers in Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, and Iowa say that if they had had the choice of the weather granted to them they could not have had any thing more favorable than the reality.

The good fortune of the winter sill holds good. The spring has been early, genial, and genial. Every thing indicates so early a harvest that the wheat will escape the drought which usually occurs toward the close of summer. From all accounts it appears that the harvests of corn and grain of all kinds are more advanced than they have been for years at this season.

The only remaining risk arises from the fly. With regard to this dreaded enemy of the farmer, it is said that the rapid alternations of warm and cold weather during a part of the winter must have operated in favor of the farmer. Agricultural authorities assert that the alternate frosts and thaws must have destroyed the bulk of the eggs from which the fly tribe would otherwise have been recruited this summer. If this be so, we may confidently look forward to one of the best harvests ever known in this country.

It is not possible to conceive any so desirable an event for the United States as a good Western grain crop this year. Without such a crop the condition of the West must be disastrous in the extreme. With its aid—as the short supply in Europe now bids fair to insure—it will fair prices to the farmer—the West will revive as rapidly as it declined; and the whole country will participate in the revival.

DESPERATION OF AUSTRIA.

THE empire of Austria presents the singular spectacle of one of the richest nations in the world constantly on the verge of bankruptcy for all possible pastimes—a foreign war—by an act of bankruptcy.

Austria is said to contain more real wealth than France, the United States, or Great Britain; yet her financial system has always been a failure—that, even in peace times, the revenue falls short of her annual expenditure by some $25,000,000; and though her debt is only about $1,000,000,000—say that it forms only about one sixth that of Great Britain—she has never been able to borrow except at a ruinous sacrifice. Her debt is now said to be about to rise to the enormous sum of $25,000,000, and only obtained it through the aid of Rothschild. A few months ago she advertised for a loan of $5,000,000, which the banks in Europe would take it. The Rothschilds at last consented to do their best to negotiate it at the high premium of 10 per cent, or 50 cents on the dollar; but no one came forward, and the scrip was returned to Vienna.

The Bank of Austria is the chief object of all the financial institutions of Europe to resume specie payments after the crisis of 1857. And hence, when its business has only just got into working order, it has been directed by the Government to suspend specie payments—an operation soon announced of irredeemable paper. Another faithful soldiers are not only to fight in a cause which can hardly inspire them with much enthusiasm, but are to be satisfied with getting their pay in a currency which, of course, will be largely depreciated.

There is at least this merit in the policy of the Government at Vienna: war can do no more wicked thing than it has already done. Generally speaking, bankruptcy is a consequence of unsuccessful war; in this instance, Austria commences herself bankrupt at the outset.

THE NATIONAL FINANCES.

A few months ago, when there seemed to be a prospect that Congress would adjourn without passing a law authorizing the reissue of the Treasury Notes, the whole country was convulsed with alarm at the idea that the United States would shortly be bankrupt. It was once dreamed that Mr. Cobb would sit in the by work by day through the summer without borrowing more money.

We have now the Treasury balance-sheet to 1st April; and from this it appears that so far from issuing any of the authorized twenty millions of new Treasury Notes, the Secretary has actually paid off three millions of the old ones. The receipts from the customs have so far exceeded the estimates that he considers sum will think that there will be no necessity for the Secretary to take any action upon the Treasury Note Law of last year.

It is impossible to say what the summer may bring forth; from present appearances, the fall trade will be large, and the receipts from our customs proportionate. At any rate, the Secretary can now reissue between three and four millions of Treasury Notes without increasing the floating debt of the government beyond what it was before Congress met; he has, besides, a large sum in hand to meet the interest of the loan of 1858. With these resources it is not likely that he will be compelled, in any event, to issue more than the amount Congress authorized him to borrow.

The fact is a striking commentary on the recuperative energies of the people. Only eighteen months ago bankers starved the mercantile and banking community in the face; and the Government was obliged to borrow to get its current expenses. In another eighteen months the prospect is, that we shall be quite as independent of loans as that the Government will be buying its securities at a premium.

SWITZERLAND.

We have received a letter—too long to print—from M. Constant Hilaire, complaining of what he terms by us, some weeks since, to the effect that Switzerland was under the French thumb. Our correspondent ably and eloquently vindicates the Swiss from the charge of being subservient to France: we hope that he is as right in fact as he is warm in tone. He mentions one fact that is highly honorable to the Swiss. Out of two hundred and three hundred newspapers and periodicals published in Switzerland, he says, not one is the organ of a foreign government. No Swiss editor has ever sold his pen.

THE LOUNGER.

HUMBOLDT.

On the 18th of March, 1848, the revolution which had commenced in Paris on the 24th of February reached Berlin. There had been deep and general excitement among all classes since the news from France, and the King and Council had finally granted an order for the assembly of the Congress. The people of Berlin, at noon of Saturday the 18th, assembled to the palace to return thanks in person to the wrong-headed monarch who has been recently wishing his face in vermicelli soup at Florence. The King and Queen appeared at a window in the court. Suddenly there was a misapprehension on one side—some mistake never very well explained—and at three o'clock in the afternoon the multitude swept back, storming through the sentries street "Under the Lindens." At it dashed angrily by, sweeping and muttering, the shops were all closed and the doors and windows of private houses bolted and barred. Iron railings were torn up to serve for cannons, pavements were piled into barricades, and by five o'clock the rear of the royal cannon and the relentless crackle of battalion volleys proclaimed the actual revolution.

The Government yielded, as all the Governments were obliged to do, to that overwhelming popular assent. There was an armed lull of several days, during which the armed citizens mounted guard over the public property; and a state functionary was deemed to those who fell in the struggle.

It was a splendid and mournful spectacle. Thousands and thousands of brave and noble soldiers, with all their pomp of banners and uniform and glittering weapons. Then the Prussian National Guard, more splendid still, and more resolute. Then the magnificent royal equipages, the gilt and the plumes and the prancing panels, and all of it the carriage of Majesty itself. Then, walking bareheaded and garnished with brilliant orders, the King's ministers and council, and among them a white-headed man, with a single order around his neck hanging by a ribbon, and a modest fold of in front and his eyes cast down—walked a man more illustrious than any king in the world, Frederick Henry Alexander von Humboldt.

He was then seventy-nine years old, and although he had never been a conspicuous politician he had filled various important political trusts, he had profound political convictions, and he was the special friend of the King. A place was kept for him at the royal table, and at Potsdam, in the King's summer-house, a room was specially furnished in a cool, rustic manner—was shown to visitors as the room of his Excellency the Baron von Humboldt. His elder brother William, one of the noblest of men, and among the ablest of the last generation of European statesmen, is associated with Potsdam and the council of the last King Frederic William III.

And now, after a life of immense and incessant study, travel, and thought, during which he has made colossal contributions to every department of human science—a life contemporaneous with many of the greatest events and men of history—a life universally loved, and without even the stain, which is not even tarnished by detraction—famous in all countries, honored and loved in all—having shown how rich in result and how lovely in action human life may be made—the reverend head now—the eyes that have looked upon the world with love close—the hand which has put on permanent record the grandest results of natural laws falls gently from its office, and death solemnly stills the great heart that had beat for all mankind.

Humboldt was the man of our age. He ascended to the highest fame, not by the splendor of a creative genius, nor by the magnificence of military ambition and dominion, but by the profound love of truth which has opened the portcullis of nature, and the unerring glance with which he pierced through the phenomena of nature to those usually content to rest, until he perceived the harmonious principle that underlies creation. History does not show us a more symmetrical and satisfactory character. There have been many scholars, many lovers of science, many philosophers, but there have not been many who, excelling in all, subordinated the results, not to personal aggrandizement, but to the service of mankind.

THE EIGHT HONORABLE VIVIAN GREY.

Last week we ventured the surmise that the elections in England would show a warmer sympathy with Italy than with Austria, and we are glad it is express. But we have shared the usual fate of political prophets. We were profoundly mistaken; for the new Parliament will contain an opinion of twenty-five members to the ministerial side.

Of course many considerations control this result. The boldness of Mr. Bright's late sentiments, of which he does not hesitate to proclaim that institutions very openly and frankly, has doubtless frightened many worthy people, who possibly suspect that he longs to see the dear little Queen brought to Tower-hill. In fact, in returning thanks for his election, Mr. Bright himself was obliged to say that he was as fond of the monarchy as any other man—meaning, of course, the monarchy as he understands it.

So one will be more secretly proud of the result of this election than the old Tory chief, the Right Honorable Vivian Grey, Chancellor of the Exchequer—sometimes known, and especially to the late Sir Robert Peel, as Benjamin Disraeli, Esquire, M. P. for Buckinghamshire. When he made his first speech in Parliament he was hissed and hooted down. But he shook his fist at the house and cried "Hear should you hear me hiss." Then, in 1852, just ten years afterward, Sir Robert Peel, the most British of modern English statesmen, confessed that he feared the speeches of no member but Mr. Disraeli.

In 1849 a British merchant said to the Lounger in Hamburg—"Pooh! we like to see him very well, but England will never make a Prime Minister out of a novelist." This was true for three years. But in 1852 the novelist was Chancellor for nine months in Lord Derby's administration; and last year, when Palmerston retired, he came in again with the Tories, and has now, he has proved at a general election. It is a great triumph for the Right Honorable Vivian Grey.

He has written, in his time, many books about Italy in "Contarini Fleming," and others of his early days, which, however, we suppose, will be no fine things now, or suggest the doing?

CHAMPIONSHIP.

When the Rent River Pet challenges the North River Darling to a contest to determine the championship of the rivers, the question is not in favor of the one who first breaks the other's nose; it seems to be a very simple proposition. The only point to be settled is whose nose was broken last. There can be no dispute beyond that. If it were the Pet's, the Darling is the champion; if the Darling's, then Pet is unquestioned chief.

But these gentlemen are never willing to leave it so settled. There is always a controversy as to the conquest of some advantage on the part of the champion. In the Pet's case, it might be the sun in his eyes. If Darling's, his foot slipped just as he was going to win. There results, of course, a fresh challenge, and a renewed contest. The result be the same, there is just as much reason for the second victory as there was the first. If it be different, there must be a rubber battle.

To accord, now, from the ring to the saloon, from the battle-field to the council, is an easy step to pass from the ring to the race-course, from the fist to the jockey, from the sport of brutes, we find the same principle accompanying us.

But when Mr. Phelan and Mr. Secretor after the challenge, and the race, and the challenge repetition, engage in a contest at the most beautiful of all courses, the sea, Mr. Secretor, or any other circumstance which, if it were really injurious, it was his business to know and state in advance.

The Lounger has not the slightest desire to fair game fairly play-it. It left Mr. Phelan victorious in the first race, and it wishes to see him victorious in another, and he might play twenty others. But it was agreed that for the purpose in view he should play but one race. Shall he play it unfairly? That is the only question.

THE GIPSY'S FROLIC.

Blossoms, gipsy, flowers, and frolics naturally come in with the warm, budding, darting sensations of days. What more delightful than to be merry at Mount Vernon! Think what a charming spot for picnics and consequent gipsys! Picnics at Mount Vernon—the 5th of January. Still more consequent payments of delightful little sums to the ladies who patronize them.

"Ah! ole! four-penny! Here we are again!" said Mr. Speaker.

Does not the heart seriously suspect Mount Vernon is to be put down? Does any body imagine that the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association, with their strings are going to draw them until the purse is full? We wish to ask every man in the country to-day to go to Mount Vernon and see Mrs. Ritchey's last tent gift to his sex—and then put it to him whether he can longer withhold his subscription in the fact that the ladies of the country are standing in this summer sun waiting for the balance of one subscription to make it satisfactory?

Let those who have given once, give again; and let those who have given again, give more. It is a rule that works admirably in all such cases.

If, however, any American citizen is so lunatic as to say that the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association's worth for his money in this matter—if any body is so mad as to suppose that the association is getting two or ten dollars' worth of enjoyment, let him know that the ladies have provided even for such incredible cases and that he can have his cases longer.

Let those of Washington! what exquisite emotions—but to proceed.

On Thursday and Friday evenings, 3d and 24th June, the Washington Assembly Rooms, late Barton's, Theatre have generously given it to the ladies for the benefit of the Mount Vernon fund—and that handsome and commodious temple, Dr. Ward's opera of The Gipsy's Frolic will be performed—a drama of sentiment and fun and all that is delicate, which will be, of course, as unique as all the influences and the circumstances can call to make it.

All patriots and right-minded persons, every body who loves the memory of Washington, who loves to see the old mansion kept up, who loves and desires to hear a charming opera charmingly performed, people with the most accomplished manners in the city, all such persons are expected to take five seats, and to bring all their friends on each evening.

And if there be any body so lost to the finer sensibilities of our common nature, so recreant to the ardent impulse of a pure patriotism, so unmindful of the fact of which Mr. Graham so aptly reminded us in his late argument, that General Washington was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, that he is, indeed, the American with soul so dead who never to himself has said as he stood in Mount Vernon or thought of Mount Vernon, This is (or ought to be) my country native country's property—then, in Heaven's name, let him button up his miserable pocket and stay at home!

THE LATE DR. ABBOTT.

No American traveller of late years in Egypt but will recall the cheerful, genial society of Henry Abbott, nor hear without respect of his recent death. The Lounger remembers vividly a certain evening at Thebes with Abbott, on the Untarsaint in Cairo, after the arrival of the overland mail on its way to Constantinople. He was confounded by the astonishing fluency and correctness with which as complete an Oriental gentleman as he ever saw, in full turbaned and flowing robes, would English. He also took a hand at whist with the air of a man who had always played it in the Divan. And when games were over, and smoking chibouques and midnight had set in, the e was no one of all who were there prepared to enjoy life more entirely and intelligently than the Oriental gentleman, who was no other than Henry Abbott. At that time the famous hippopotamus, which made so great a sensation when it was exhibited in London, was in Dr. Abbott's possession at Cairo. There was also a logs giraffe also, and several antelopes. Within the house was his superb Egyptian collection.

A few years since Dr. Abbott came to this country, bringing his collection with him, for which he had declined very liberal offers in Europe. Sir Gardner Wilkinson, perhaps the most eminent authority, calls it, upon the whole, the best in the world. At first the collection is a fortune, and it can be purchased for $25,000. The New York Historical Society have it in charge.

Dr. Abbott and family set himself at home in the vilcit of American life. All his tastes and habits were conformed to oriental simplicity and repose, and he had married an Eastern woman. At the earliest moment, therefore, he returned to his familiar Egyptian surroundings, and immediately began the trouble and fruitless efforts of his visit to New York. He was summoned hither by the death of a brother of unusual lust, and on the 30th of March he died at Kafr-el-Ash in Egypt. The American traveller in Egypt, silent hand, will find one friend the less; and all who remember him there will always remember him kindly.

A WORD WITH A CERTAIN PERSON.

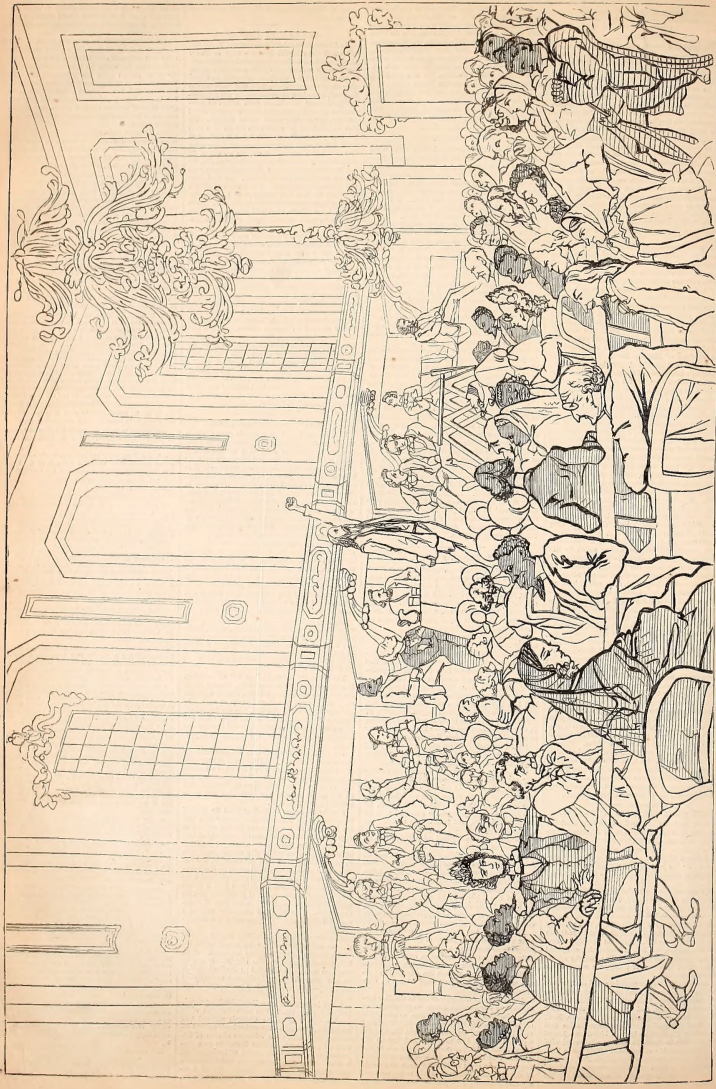
Is a certain city lives a certain person who is twenty years old, who is a bookkeeper at a certain house where he receives a certain salary, and who is also a talented literary person, years which he supports his mother and sister as well as himself. He may presently (as all sub-book-keepers do) be promoted to be chief book-keeper in the office; but beyond that he can not advance. He must look for other means of increasing his income he does not surrender any brilliant prospects, and that, as he has a strong taste for literary pursuits, and is desirous to make money, he might justly devote himself to the literary career.

He supposes that he may acquire a knowledge of Phonography—and so, becoming a reporter, reach at last the editorial chair; or he may devote his leisure hours to certain light periodicals, or pursuing some course of reading and study—writing occasionally for the press.

Before deciding this question, let a certain person read the letter which Charles Lamb wrote to Samuel Barnett on the 9th of January, 1823:

"Keep to your bank, and the bank will keep you. Trust not to the public: you may bang, starve, drown yourself, for that matter, and what cares the public? . . . 'A little grumbling is a wholesome medicine for the mind,' and so is a little starving and disappointment, but one full meal or draught of life gives a supple suckers."

The word "unlearning" is full of meaning. If a certain person were supporting himself alone by literary pursuits, he would very possibly advise a certain person to hold fast his situation and to let his manuscript remain unpublished. But, if



Yᵉ ABOLITIONISTS IN COUNCIL—Yᵉ ORATOR OF Yᵉ DAY DENOUNCING Yᵉ UNION, MAY, 1859.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

HOPE'S LOVE-LETTER.

CHAPTER XXIII.

SO-CI-E-TY?

Tan family of Newt is one of the oldest in the country; and, what is more, it is one of those "fine" old families of which much may be learned by an attentive listener. There are even traces of the Newts before the Revolution; and the only question is, whether they came over with Hendrick Christiaensen, or whether they were not left upon the island by Hendrick Hudson himself. The latter is the more popular theory with the family, which has always been strongly Democratic in politics.

Tradition declares that the family has been uniformly respectable but honest—so respectable, indeed, that Mr. Boniface Newt, a celebrated New York merchant and a Tammany Sachem, thirty or forty years ago, had a crest. He had even buttons for his coachman's coat with a stag's head engraved upon them. The same device was upon his seal-ring. It appeared upon his carriage-door. It figured on the edges of his dinner-service. It was worked into the green glass of the door that led from his dining-room to the back stairs. He had his paper stamped with it; and a great many of his neighbors, thinking it a neat and becoming ornament, imitated him in its generous use.

Mr. Newt's family had a crest also. She was a Magee—author of the fine old families who came over at the earliest possible period. The Magees, however, had no buttons upon their coachman's coat; one coachman for which purpose was perhaps, that they had no coachman. But when the ladies of the family drove about, shopping or shopping they hired a carriage, and insisted that the driver should brush his hat and black his boots; so that it was very rarely that who knew that it was a livery equipage.

Their friends did, of course; but there were a great many people from the country who found at it in passing with the same emotion with which they would have contemplated a private carriage; which was highly gratifying to the feelings of the Magees.

Their friends knew it, but friends never resent such spurs such things. There was old Mrs. Degon—howgate Mrs. Degon, she called—aunt of Mr. Newt, who never said, "I see the Magees have hired a hackney-coach for the ladies to make calls in. They quarrelled with nothing over his last bill. Medora Magee has turned her last year's silk—which is a little stained and worn—but then it does just as well."

By-and-by her nephew Boniface married Mrs. Dix's sister, Nancy.

It was Mrs. Degon who sat with Mrs. Newt in her parlor, and said to her,

"So your son Abel is coming home. I'm glad to hear it. I hope he knows how to waltz, and isn't awkward. There are some very good matches to be made, and I like to have a young man settle early. It's better for his morals. Men are bad people, my dear. I think Miss Chubleigh would do very well for Abel. She has a foolish affair with that Colonel Jones, but it's all over. Why on earth do girls fall in love with officers? They never have any pay worth speaking of, and a girl must tramp all over the land, and live I don't know how. Pshaw! it's a wretched business. How's Mr. Dinks? I saw him and Fanny waltzing last month at the Delmonge. Who are the Shrimps? Somebody says something about the immense fortune of old Shrimp has made in the oil trade. You should have seen Mrs. Winslow Orty passing cards for the Shrimps. I really believe she counted the spoons. What an eye that woman has—and what a tongue! Are you really going to Saratoga? Will Boniface let you? He is the kindest man! He is so generous that I sometimes fear somebody'll be taking advantage of him. But gracious me! how hot it is!"

It was warm, and Mrs. Degon fanned herself. When she and Mrs. Newt met there was a tremendous struggle to get the first innings of the conversation, and neither surrendered, the ground until fairly forced off by breathlessness and exhaustion.

"Yes, we shall go to Saratoga," said Mrs. Newt, "and I want Abel to come so as to take him. There'll be a very pleasant season. What a pity you can't go! However, people must regard their time of life, and take care of their health. There's old Mrs. Octoyne says she shall never give up. She says she means to live out her great-grand-daughter next winter, and says she has no life but society. I suppose you know Herbert Octoyne is engaged to one of the Shrimps. They keep their carriage, and the style seems very pretty. Herbert tells the young men that the Shrimps are a fine old family, which has been long out of society, having no daughters to marry, so they have not been obliged to show themselves. But I don't know about visiting them. However, I suppose we shall. Herbert Octoyne will give 'em fun, by, if they really haven't it; and the Octoynes won't be sorry for her money. What a pretty shawl! Did you hear that Mellish Whitlow has given Louisa a diamond pin which cost him a hundred dollars? Extravagant fellow! Yet I like to have young men do these things sometimes, you know. I do think it's such a pity about Luna's nose—"

"She can smell with it, mother; and what else do you want of a nose?"

It was Miss Fanny Newt who spoke, and who had entered the room during the conversation. She was a tall, self-possessed young woman of about twenty, with firm, dark eyes, dark hair, and dark hair, and that kind of composure of manner which is called repose in drawing-rooms and boldness in bar-rooms.

"Gracious, Fanny, how you do disturb one! I didn't know you were here. Don't be ridiculous. Of course she can smell with it. But that isn't all you want of a nose, is it?"

"I suppose you want it to turn up at some people," replied Miss Fanny, smoothing her dress, and looking in the glass. "I suppose Mrs. Degon knows how to ring now?"

Aunt Degon looked puzzled at this question.

"My dear, what do you mean?" she said, fanning herself violently. "I hope I never say any thing that isn't true about people. I'm sure it should be very sorry if I wounded any one's feelings. There's Mrs. Kite—you know, Joseph Kite's wife, the man they said really did cheat his creditors, and I'm sure I don't know what to it; well, Kitty Kite, my dear, does do and say the most extraordinary things sometimes. At the Shrimps' ball, when you were waltzing with Mr. Dinks, I heard her say to Mrs. Orty, 'Do look at Fanny Newt waltzing with Dinks.' It was dreadful to hear her say such things, my dear; and then to see Miss Kite herself—and you! It was cruel—it was really unfeeling."

Fanny did not wince. She merely said,

"How old are you, Aunt Degon?"

"Well, let me see; she's ten or a dozen years younger than I am."

"Oh! well, aunt, people at her time of life can't see or hear much, you know. They ought to be in bed—and they do not bottle up feet, and not obtrude themselves among people who are young enough to have some little left of sensos," replied Miss Fanny, carelessly arranging a stray lock of hair.

"Indeed, Miss, you would like to shove all the married people into the wall, or into their graves," retorted Mrs. Degon, indignantly.

"Oh no, dear aunt, only into their beds—and that not until they are supernumerated, which, you know, all people never find out for themselves," answered Fanny, smiling sweetly and calmly upon Mrs. Degon.

"What a country it is, aunt!" said Mrs. Newt, looking at Fanny with a look of admiration. "Do you suppose young ladies ever fling into their own hands? Dear me! dear me! how they do rule us!"

Miss Newt made no observation, but took up a gayly-bound book from the table, and looked carelessly into it. Mrs. Degon rose to go. She had somewhat recovered her composure.

"Don't think I believed it, dear," said she to Fanny, in whom, perhaps, she recognized some of the family character. "No; you may be sure I said to every body in the room that I didn't believe what Mrs. Kite said, that you were huggin' Mr. Dinks in the waltz. I spoke right up to every body I know, and they all said they didn't believe it."

"How kind it was of you, dear Aunt Degon!" said Fanny, as she rose to salute her departing relative, "and how generous people were not to believe it! But I couldn't persuade them that your beautiful lace-edging on your dress was real Mechlin, although I tried very hard. They said it was natural in me to insist upon its genuineness as your grand-niece; and it was no matter at all, because old ladies could get no set they pleased—but for all that it was not Mechlin. I must have told as many as thirty people that they were wrong. But people's eyes are so sharp—it's really dreadful. Good-morning, darling Aunt Degon?"

"Fanny dear," said her mother, as the door closed upon Mrs. Degon, who departed speechless and in what may be called a simmering state of anger, "I should like to know of you, for two. I really hope to hear something about this Miss Orty's ball. Do you suppose Alfred Dinks is eternally engaged to her?"

"How should I know, mother?"

"Why, my dear, you have been so intimate with him."

"My dear mother, how can any body be intimate with Alfred Dinks? You might as well talk of breathing in a vacuum."

"But, Fanny, he is a very good sort of young man—so respectable, and with such good manners, and he has a very pretty fortune—"

Mrs. Newt was interrupted by the servant, who announced Mr. Wetherley.

Poor Mr. Wetherley—Mr. Zephyr Wetherley! He was one of those youths who float in society like notes in a sunbeam. You can see individuum them. They are always to be seen floating every where. Catch one, and you have caught all. Catch one, and you do not know it, for you can not feel it. They are the souls and life of society—the privates; people who are mentioned in a lump after a ball as cavalum soldiers are mentioned after a battle. And yet they have feelings, they have blood, heart, hands and feet—feet especially. They have family matters with the world and other people in it. They are dear to sisters. They are the pride of mothers. They have emotions. In their little way they have experience. They go through a series of sensations—the parody of humanity.

Was it not inevitable that Zephyr Wetherley should conceive himself to be in love with Fanny Newt?

Poor Mr. Wetherley! He entered the room and bowed. Miss Newt, seeing that it was one of her daughter's visitors, left the room. Miss Fanny sat looking at the young man with her black eyes so calmly that she seemed to him to be sitting a great way off in a cool darkness. Miss Fanny was not fond of Mr. Wetherley, although she had seen plainly enough the indications of his feeling for her. This morning he was well gloved and booted. His costume was unexceptionable. Society of that day boasted of no more finished man than Zephyr Wetherley. His judgment in a case of cravat was unerring. He had been in Europe, and was quoted when waistcoats were in debate. He had been very attentive to Mr. Alfred Dinks and Mr. Bowdoin Beacon, the two Boston youths who had been charming society during the season that was now over. He was even a little jealous of Mr. Dinks.

After Mrs Newt had left the room Mr. Wetherley fell into confusion. He stammered, of course, upon the weather immediately—while Fanny, taking a book, looked casually into it with a slight air of ennui.

"Have you read this?" said she to Mr. Wetherley.

"No—I suppose not—eh! what is it?" replied Zephyr, who was not a reading man.

"It is John Neal's 'Rachel Dyer.'"

"Oh, indeed! No, indeed. I have not read it?"

"What have you read, Mr. Wetherley?" inquired Fanny, looking through the book which she held in her hand.

"Oh, indeed"—he began. Then he seemed to undergo some internal spasm. He dropped his hat, slid his chair to the side of Fanny's, and said, "Miss Newt, how can you ask me at such a moment?"

Miss Fanny looked at him with a perfectly unruffled face.

"What's the matter with the moment, Mr. Wetherley?"

"Ah, Miss Newt, how can you when you know my feelings? Did you not carry my bouquet at the ball last evening? Have you not long authorized me by your treatment to declare—"

"Stop, Mr. Wetherley," said Fanny, calmly. "The day is warm—let us be cool. Don't say any thing which you will regret to remember. Don't mistake any thing that I have done as an indication of—"

"Oh, Miss Newt," interrupted Zephyr, "how can you ever find such things? Heart me, but even now I assure you that I most deeply, tenderly, truly—"

"Mr. Wetherley," said Fanny, patting down the book and speaking very firmly, "I really can not sit still and hear you proceed. You are laboring under a great misapprehension. You must be aware that I have never in the slightest way given you occasion to believe that I—"

"I must speak!" burst in the impassioned Zephyr. "My feelings forbid forbearance. Great Heavens! Miss Newt, you really have no idea—I am sure you have no idea—you can not have any idea of the ardor with which for a long, long time I have—"

"Mr. Wetherley," said Fanny Newt, darker and cooler than ever, "it is useless to prolong this conversation. I can not consent to hear you declare that—"

FANNY NEWT AND MR. WETHERLEY.

"But you haven't heard me declare it," replied Zephyr, vehemently. "It's the very thing I am trying to do, and you won't let me. You keep cutting me off just as I am saying how I—"

"You need go no farther, Sir," said Miss Newt, coldly, rising and standing by the table; while Zephyr Wetherley red and hot and confused, crushed his handkerchief into a ball, and swept his hand through his hair, tugging his foot, and rubbing his fingers together. "I understand, Sir, what you wish to say, and I desire to tell you that you shall—"

"Just what I don't want to hear! Oh dear me! Please, please, Miss Newt!" entreated Zephyr Wetherley.

"Mr. Wetherley," interrupted the other imperiously, "you wish to ask me to marry you. I desire to spare you the pain of my answer to that question by preventing you asking it."

Mr. Wetherley looked confused. He wrinkled his brows a moment, as he stared at the floor and at Miss Newt—he looked foolish and mortified.

"But—but—but—" stammered he. "Well—but—well—but—haven't you something to reserved the question?" inquired he, with gleams of doubtful intelligence shooting across his face.

Fanny Newt smiled icily.

"As you please," said she.

Poor Zephyr was bewildered.

"It is very confusing, somehow, Miss Newt, isn't it?" said he, wiping his face.

"Yes, Mr. Wetherley; one should always look before he leaps."

"Leaps—oh, indeed, yes. A man had better look out or—"

"Or he'll catch a Tartar!" said a clear, strange voice.

Fanny Newt and Wetherley turned simultaneously toward the speaker. It was a young man, with clustering black hair and sparkling eyes, in a traveling dress. He stood in the back room, in the rear of which was a conservatory.

"Abel!" said his sister, running toward him, and pulling him forward.

"Mr. Wetherley, this is my brother, Mr. Abel Newt.

The young men bowed.

"Oh, indeed!" said Zephyr. "How'd he come here listening?"

"Chance, chance, Mr. Wetherley. I have just returned from school. Pretty tough old school-boy, hey? Well, it's all the grandpa's doing. Grandpas are astonishing beings, Mr. Wetherley. Now there was—"

"Oh, indeed! Really, I must be going. Good-morning, Miss Newt. Good-morning, Sir." And exit Zephyr Wetherley.

The brother and sister laughed.

"Sensible fellow," said Abel; "he flies the grandpas."

"How did you come here, you wretch!" asked Fanny, "listening to my secrets?"

"My dear child, I arrived this morning, only half an hour ago. I let myself in by my pass-key, and, hearing voices in the parlor, I went round by the conservatory to spy out the land. Then and there I beheld this spectacle. Fanny, you're shameful."

Miss Newt made a demure courtesy.

"So you've really come home for good? Well, Abel, I'm glad. Now you're here I shall have a man of my own to advise me next winter. And there's to be the handsome Boston bride here, you know, next season."

"Who is she?" said Abel, laughing, sinking into a chair. "Mother wrote me you said that Boston girls are dowdy. Who is the star dowdy of next winter?"

"Mrs. Alfred Dinks," replied Fanny, carelessly, but looking with her keenest glance at Abel.

He sprang up and began to say something; but his sister's eye arrested him.

"Oh yes," said he, hurriedly—"Dinks, I've heard about Alfred Dinks. What a devil of a name!"

"Come, dear, you'd better go up stairs and see mamma," said Fanny; "and I'm so sorry you missed Aunt Dugan. She was here this morning, lovely as ever. But I think the velvet is wearing off her claws. She has a most scratchy style of conversation. However, what would society be except for claws? Claws in velvet, of course. And the time you know they're sharp—and they feel so soft!"

Fanny Nest laughed a cold little laugh. Abel went out of the room.

"Master Abel, then, does know Miss Hope Wayne," said she to herself. "He more than knows her—he loves her—or thinks he does. Wouldn't he have known if she had been engaged to her cousin?"

She pondered a little while.

"I don't believe," thought Miss Fanny, "that she is engaged to him."

Miss Fanny was pleased with that thought, because she meant to be engaged to him herself, if it proved to be true, as every body declared, that he had ten or fifteen thousand a year. Upon such unusual terms who would not consent to breathe in a vacuum?

CHAPTER XXIV.

A WARNING AND A LOVE-LETTER.

THE day before he left Delafield Abel Nest went into Marm Wumley's shop. She was sitting by the door. Hosea smoked by the window.

"Marm Wumley, may I ask a favor?" said Abel.

"Sartain, Mr. Abel. What d'ye want me to do?"

"Marm Wumley, I want you to let me just leave a little note for you to slip into the next parcel you send up to Pinewood. You send every few days, don't you?"

"Oh, three times; sometimes e'en'mos' every day. I've got nothin' here now that the old man's a-goin' along up with, Sundays."

Hosea pulled placidly at the window, and looked and listened.

"You've no objection, Hosea?" said Abel.

"I see no harm into it," replied the old man. "But why don't you carry it yourself?"

"Because old Mr. Burt doesn't want to have fellows round his place."

"Lord! Lord!" ejaculated Hosea; "when will people learn wisdom? Yer can't shet out the sun, nor e'en yer shet out the moon. Yer can't oughter know that his grand-daughter'll fall in love. When one's young will folks learn 'tain't no use? I learned it long ago. Ef yer've got any thing to send I'll take it, or it's all right and proper."

Abel flouted the idea of any impropriety. He explained to the old man that it was a matter of life in which he took leave of Miss Wayne. "There," said he, "I'll just put it into this bundle, and she'll find it, I'm sure, when she looks for her woolsey. Good-by, Hosea."

He went out and disappeared. Marm Wumley asked her spouse if he thought it quite right to carry notes from young men to young women.

"Bless you!" replied he, "it's for all the chap won't tell a girl when he's in love with her, sometimes either? For all she won't, I'm no way. I'd jes as lieve help him say it as not. Saying ain't nothin'; it's only the doin'. I shall take it up and give the parcel a bit o' my mind."

Puff—puff—puff. Hosea Wumley smiled as if, in such a plain case as this, it was entirely unnecessary to repeat his usual formula.

When he came to Pinewood he asked to see Miss Hope alone. The old man looked at her loudly as he handed her the bundle.

"Yer'll find a note in that air," said he.

"A note, Hosea—who from?"

"Yer'll find out fast enough. Only don't open the bundle till yer've spoke alone. And, Miss Hope, ought ter pardon an old man for speaking his mind?"

Hope Wayne looked at him pleasantly, and answered,

"I could easily promise to pardon every thing we could say to me."

"Wa'al, then, this 'ere note comes from somebody who don't love no longer. He's an old, old, outher; but he's dreffle sly. That's all. Good-mornin', Miss Hope. He's sly."

Hosea strode along at the young girl for several minutes, and slowly shook his head, doubtfully.

"No," said he to himself at length as he turned away—"no—no. Yer may build walls high's the sky, and give strict orders to the block in the face, and warn folks and warn 'em over again, but all fixed fence ain't no use. It all go on jes the same. 'Tain't no use at all—'tain't no use!"

The old man went out and lighted his pipe in the kitchen, and puffed vehemently as he passed down the road.

Hope Wayne went to her room and opened the bundle. She found the note and read it.

"I can not bear to part so, and to depart without seeing you again. Perhaps you think me a mere school-boy whom you can forget to-morrow. But I am older than boys generally are when they leave school. I feel as much a man as if I were forty, and, Miss Wayne, I shall not forget you to-morrow. I wish I could have seen more of you, for I am sure that our tastes would sympathize in so many ways. Will you pardon me if I say that I fell deep surprise you are to many of the heartless and wicked conventions of society which are so injurious to character? You say that your nature loves books, and from the same sources I know you have learned how little freedom of friendship there is in the world, and yet how much misery that freedom would prevent. Your grandfather was perhaps wise in secluding you. But I think we should have been friends could we have known each other. I am going. I know not what I shall do. I am young, and long years of toil lie before me. You are beautiful and your career begins. How often I shall hear of you! How glad I shall be of your happiness! Of me you will not hear—unless some day I should realize my dream and make a name of which to woman need be ashamed. Good-by, Miss Wayne. Sometimes, in the intervals of study or dull duty, of these golden years—of this quiet village—of the lawn on which we met—of the shade in which I have so often overshipped. Think of me as kindly as you can—of one whose life will be spent in the fiery feeling of what you would have approved—of one whose first dream must be his last, whom many years must pass by, too, ere his true memory has forever won. Good-by! And as you sit by the window shaded by the vine, listen to its rustling, and let its sad tone remind you sometimes of what might have been."

The last word of the page was a line—"Yours ever."

Hope mechanically turned and read it.

"If Miss Wayne should ever have occasion to call upon my services I shall be glad to understand the care of Boniface Newt, Esq, will be sure to find me."

Hope smiled. She held the paper in her hand and sat motionless for a long time. Was it an improper letter? Was it a note that every one might properly read? He declared nothing—he claimed nothing—he renounced nothing. He was modest and manly. He regretted the want of free friendship in the world —who does not? He thought Hope was superior between young people of different sexes. He was so gentle and considerate—she remembered all that handsome face. And he was thoughtful and respectful—she heard again the low music of that voice. He was—he was—and then in the girl's reverie as she held the letter like the charm in her hand—listened to her siren fancy as it sang of the future, Hope saw, floating like paper with a burning and flashing face, although no one was looking, pressed it to her lips and ardently to her lips?

CHAPTER XXV.

A NEW YORK MERCHANT.

MR. LAWRENCE NEWT sat in his office. It was upon Seven Street, and the windows looked out upon the shipping in the East River—upon the Brooklyn shore, and the numerous docks to the left town of Brooklyn opposite, with its ranges of spires. He heard the sullen ring of the shoe upon the carbon of the stevedores—the bustle of the carts and the hum and scuffle of the passers-by. He sat at his table by the window. He had taken the stream—the little steamers that puffed alongside bringing the passengers, that, he said was not fair, pulling and shoving the huge hulks into a space large enough for them to manage themselves in.

Sometimes he watched the parting of passengers at the wharf when the vessel was to start, and he could sail from her berth. The vast sails were slowly unfurled, were shaken out, rapidly filled with the breeze, and slowly the hulk then filled round and full with the gentle, steady wind. But more often Newt looked out absently, for he thought of fine ladies taking their hair out of curl-papers, and putting and smoothing and rolling it again with the long white and jeweled fingers until the curls stood round and full and ready for company.

Then the ship moved slowly, almost imperceptibly, from the wharf—so slowly, so imperceptibly, that the change in the broad shipping city was sliding away from them. The merchant saw the ship, laden, lessening, moved over her bow southward and outward, and glide gently down the river. Her hull was soon lost to the eyes, but the white sails, gradually lessening as at the mast-head over the masts of the other vessels. While he looked it vanished—the ship was gone.

Often enough Mr. Lawrence Newt stood leaning his head against the window-frame in his office after the ship had disappeared, and seemed to be looking for it. But his eyes were not upon the softy town of Brooklyn. But he saw neither. Faster than ship ever sailed—or wind blew—or bird flashed—was the thought that rushed Newt startled, and the merchant, seemingly leaning against the office-window, but really leaning upon easily sitting under palm-trees, or dandling in a palanquin, or chatting in a strange tongue, or gazing in awe upon some vast cathedral, while the villagers of Chamouni have ever seen.

And what was the thought that so commanded to himself to press?—and what were those eyes, soft doubts of exquisite darkness, into which through his own sad secret to be sinking?

There were clerks busily writing in the outer office. It was dark in the counting-room. Mr. Newt first occupied the rooms, and Thomas Tiny, the book-keeper, who had the lightest office, and then the eyes of Vendyke, the salesperson clerk, were giving out. Young Venables, a kind of outdoor assistant-clerk, was sickly and infirm father upon his five hundred dollars a year.

"Eyes giving out in my service, Thomas Tiny? I am ashamed of myself."

And Lawrence Newt hired the adjoining office upon the front, knocked down all the walls, and introduced so much daylight that it shone not only into the eyes of young Venables, but into those of his mother and sister and infirm father.

It was scratch, scratch, scratch, all day long in the clerks' office. Messengers were coming and going. Samples were bringing in. Draymen came for orders. Apple-women and pie-men dropped in about noon, and there were plenty of cheap apples and cheap jokes when the peddlers were young and pretty. There is something so blithe in mere youth! Every clerk jokes so naturally with a pretty peddler! Country merchants, and feeder merchants, who went into Mr. Lawrence Newt's room. They talked China news and South American news and Mediterranean news. Their conversation was full of romantic names, and mentioned places that had historic interest and historic associations. They joked complacent jokes. They gossiped a little when business had been discussed. Nathaniel Whitlow was really to marry Magot's daughter, and the Doolittle money would go to the Magots. Mr. Van Nest and old Jacob Vanboozenberg had actually left off knee-breeches and white cravats and wore fit-to-dress coats. Jacob Van Nest came into the Bank in modern costume. And there was no doubt that Mrs. Dopp would cushion her at the Church. Winslow's wife said she saw it with her own eyes.

The gossip had not so poetic a flavor as the business talk. But it is sweet to know that there is a world outside of the office. Every man breathes the same air. Scandal, like the sun, shines for all. It knows no rent. No guinea-copher, on the grand tour from a distant planet, could doubt that it was confined to petticoats and pantaloons, until he went back into offices and banks down town.

Mr. Lawrence Newt's talk ceased with that about business. When the other set in, his mind seemed to set out. He stirred the fire if it were low. He looked out into the street-office. He had a word for Venables. Had Miss Venables seen the novel by Mr. Dickens, which is called "Pelham," and will be amusing to read aloud in the family. Will Mr. Venables call at Mr. Lawrence Newt's shop, have the book sent to Mr. Lawrence Newt, and present it, with Mr. Newt's compliments? In his study, in the warmer sense he opened the window, when it happened to be closed, and stood by it, or leaned out of it, and looked down on the ships and the streets, and listened to the sailors swearing when he could not hear the swearing—and more or three hundred thousand dollars each, talking about Mrs. Dopp's cotton lace!

One day he left the office writing letters. The state of the office, outside and in, might be called busy and lively. There was a certain commotion of the intensest activity in that particular spot, of the mystery which is called business. Mr. Lawrence Newt, who had been more willing workers; did not see a row of remember faces with their heads bowed over the books in odoriferous red Russia binding, and little books in leather covers, and invoices and bills and letters. He left the office-room of Lawrence Newt.

He descended the office and stood at the door impressed by the silent activity he beheld. He did not speak; the younger clerks looked up a moment—then went on with their work. They clerkly packet-day.

Thomas Tiny looked at last, and said,

"Well, Sir?"

"Any Late Mr. Newt, Sir?"

"In the other room," said Mr. Tray, with his goose-quill in his mouth, nodding his head to the left-hand wall, and then holding his pen with the ink in it poised above the paper, he added, gravely, "Well, Sir? Be short. It's packet-day."

"I want a place, Sir."

"What kind of a place?"

"In a store, Sir."

"I'm sorry I'm all full. But sit down while I finish these letters. Then we'll talk about it."

LITERARY.

THE April number of the QUARTERLY JOURNAL OF AGRICULTURE, published by the United States Agricultural Society, has been received. It is sent free of charge to all its members, and contains a vast amount of matter of the most interesting character which we learn that they have been actively and usefully engaged in the cause of enlightened agriculture. During the second day's session a very interesting lecture was delivered on the subject of Forestry, by Professor Gamage, which was illustrated by experiments. Professor Jewett read the address delivered before the society on the third day's session, delivered a valuable lecture on Meteorology as connected with Agriculture, which will be published by the Society, and a great number of essays placed at the disposal of the Executive Board.

We find in the pages of the periodical before us a paper on Agricultural Statistics, from the American Geographical and Statistical Society to the United States Agricultural Society, making suggestions to the latter of the importance of complete Agricultural schedules for the census of 1860. Valuable remarks are appended to this communication by the editor. We also find a very interesting article on the Domestication of the Elk, and a valuable Report of the Agricultural Exhibitions of 1858. All the extracts are selected with great care. In short, the number of this valuable journal is complete, and reflects much credit on Mr. Ben Perley Poore.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS FROM PIKE'S PEAK.

THE St. Joseph correspondent of the St. Louis Democrat notices the arrival at that place of 100 PIKE'S PEAKERS, who give deplorable accounts of mining grounds, and outfitting on the Plains. His estimate that 30,000 persons are now on their way, all or most of whom, destitute of experience and necessaries of life, are perfectly reckless. Desperate threats are made of burning Omaha, St. Joseph, and other towns, in case of the non-appearance of the deception used to induce emigration. Two thousand wagons passed through St. Joseph on Friday, for a single day, and the crowd of emigrants increased. Parties have closed up their business and fled, fearful of being left behind in the general exodus.

The Rocky Mountain News of April 28, the first paper published in the mining region, received. It contains a voluminous gold news, all of a favorable character.

LOUIS NAPOLEON.

Count CAVOUR, the Sardinian Prime Minister, has written the following letter to our Minister in this city:

TURIN, April 20, 1859.—SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have received your letter of the 16th inst. dated New York, the 7th of last month, and I thank you for the kind expressions of sympathy which you have been pleased to express, so honorable to yourself and the country you represent in the United States.

"Certainly the offer made by the Italian refugees in the United States to the King of Sardinia and Italy, in case of war between Piedmont and Austria, proves a generous sentiment, and I feel deeply grateful to the Government by which such a noble offer is made. But it is not in the power of the Italians, and even of the Italians in America, that even in case of such contributions as the one you mention, the war could be carried on with the immediate activity and on the scale which the present circumstances of the Sardinian army. These elements of success depend upon the Government alone. What it really needs is not so much military assistance as money. What I have the honor to write to you is not a matter of speculation, but the sentiments that inspired it, the Sardinian Government and people consider it necessary to be fully accepted, there being, as above stated, already here a patriotic contribution in progress.

"I believe that the greater part of our countrymen who have emigrated to the United States will return home by remaining in the United States, and using their influence in favor of the cause. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"Receive, then, the assurances of my high consideration. CAVOUR."

RISE IN THE MISSISSIPPI.

A rise in the River Mississippi, almost unprecedented in the annals of history, has been commenced and is at each hour. It rose so fast that the men who were engaged in the construction of the breakwater in front of Grenada threw what were unable to do so before the water reached them. The rise has commenced now just one year of another. In the events of a few hours in the month of May, 1858, the water rose from 15 to 30 feet, covering the whole of the low lands on the Arkansas side for miles in extent. We had the curiosity to measure accurately the rise in the river during the first 24 hours of its commencement, and found it to be two inches. It could not be ascertained whether the rise was greater or less, however, for the total rise in the twenty-four hours ending at 10 o'clock on the morning of the 24th was but 2 inches. From 10 o'clock to 4 o'clock—six hours—the rise was 4 inches, and from 4 o'clock to midnight the flood declining or at a stand this morning. The last boat from Memphis reports the water at the head of navigation of the Lower Missouri and its tributaries, but another and extensive rise is looked for in the Upper Mississippi. The rise in the Ohio is also unprecedented. There is no mistake about so awful flood coming from all along the Mississippi valley, in the Ohio and its tributaries, the swelling fast, and at St. Paul the rise has taken a new start, and is coming down with a rush. We have no information that the Illinois is swelling, not only at his low's end, but from Kaskaskia to the head-waters.

PERSONAL.

Raffaele Settembrini, the chief officer of the Gobernetti conspiracy, and one of the most able writers and orations son of one of the Bandas exiles who were recently released from the prisons of Ischia, by the King of Naples, at the request of the British Government, has been a resident of Corfu, but failed, after which he went to Malta, and from there to Genoa, where he was engaged to bring the exiles to this country, and when the latter arrived in Genoa, Settembrini was engaged by the chief of the ship against bringing the exiles to the Latin States, and through some unknown circumstances the vessel entered Cork harbor, where the exiles were lost sight of.

The Rev. Dr. Cummings, of this city, delivered an address before the Alumni of the Theological Seminary, in the corner-stone of the House of the Angel Guardian of Orphans, in Brooklyn, on Thursday afternoon. The house was in readiness for the reception of 100 children. Mr. Astor had generously represented the nature of the work, and Mr. Low, in a few appropriate words, laid the corner-stone beneficiaries of the institution.

The Rev. Dr. Bethune, of Philadelphia, has recovered $1500 from her lover, Smoak, the son of a substantial farmer, for breach of promise. Smoak is a fine looking young fellow. It is said that both Miss Gow and Mr. Smoak have been married before.

Mrs. Charles Williams, who was one hundred and one years old on the 1st of May, is still living in Boston, Connecticut. Up to the 1st of May, she was about her house, washing and doing all the work for herself and family. Between the 1st and 10th of May she was taken sick, and died after a few days of long sickness, of yarn spun by herself and knit into stockings for her family. Colonel Williams was said at her father's house one night during the Revolutionary war, when a messenger came in with a message from Washington, and she says that he sat down and "talked all night." Her husband was a Revolutionary soldier, and when asked, in answer to an inquiry, "What sort of a looking man he was?" she said, "Why he was a tall, slender man, he wore his hair in locks curled, knotted and queued, white skin, and as handsome as a picture."

The Rev. Dr. Burbidge, Rector of Bangor, Maine, has been elected Bishop of the Diocese of Eastern Maine, and will, we presume, accept the office. He is a native of Ireland, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He came to this country in 1837, and has been settled in Bangor ever since.

The Senior Class will invite the President, the Rev. Dr. Woolsey, to deliver the Valedictory Address to the Class of 1859.

Miss Way and Professor Wilson left New Orleans for Europe, in the steamer Rowena, down the river, but brought in a tree, and they had to remain till night, and then they left the steamer and went on board a ship that was to descend on account of the darkness. Finally, when they came to the mouth of the river, they left the ship, and went in search of help. The steamer Rowena left them.

Mr. Thomas Bell, the partner of Boston, in the manufacture of the statue of Washington, for Boston, has resolved recently exhibited in Faneuil Hall. The statue is to be placed in the State House. It is to be 6 feet 6 inches in height, and will be raised by a fair in October. The next object is to make a statue of Webster, in bronze, for the New England Society of this city.

Mr. George Ticknor, brother of Senator Sumner, has been selected by the city authorities of Boston to deliver the oration at the forthcoming anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill, on the 17th of June. The oration is the first honor. We believe it is fifty-one years ago that Edward Everett delivered the oration, and that Daniel Webster delivered a fourth-of-July oration before the Republican Association of Boston.

Intelligence has recently been received of the death of Dr. Henry Abbott, at Kafe-di-kain, on the 30th of March last. He had been for a long time ill, and has gradually been sinking since the death of his brother, Dr. George Abbott, at Alexandria, in January, a loss which he felt deeply. Dr. Abbott originally entered the service of Mehemet Ali as a surgeon, but afterward settled at Cairo as a physician, where he married an Eastern lady. It was here that he made the valuable Egyptian collection, which is well known as the best in the world. He was a gentleman of high birth, and used it in the pursuit of his exhibition. It is hoped that this collection, which probably cost him £20,000, and which is said to be unrivalled in the New York Historical Society, as it can be purchased for only $30,000.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR.

NO BATTLE YET.

By the City of Baltimore we have dates to 11th May. There had been only the feeble brushing of skirmishers and the Allies. The movements of the former were intended to cover the flank movement of the latter, and they are effected. The Austrians apparently exhibited irresolution, and kept occupying places and then abandoning them. The Allies were making no material change in affairs since the departure of the Cousin. Heavy rains had prevailed, and continued up to the latest accounts. The Austrians were fortifying their position on the Sesia. The armies were sufficiently much from sickness. The latest Turin telegram says that the Austrians were pressing the Sesia in force. The news from Vienna explains that the Austrians had taken up a position between the Po and the Sesia, and that in the weather before resuming the offensive. The Austrians were exposed to very great hardships, and were suffering severely under rain. The Austrians had destroyed the bridge of Piacenza. The Pope had protested against this action, and Austria was to protest. The Austrian General, Delia Marmora, had made the River Dora his strategical line.

SKIRMISH ON THE PO.

The Austrians had crossed the Po near Casilo, and advanced toward Asola.

They also made an unsuccessful attack upon the same point on the evening of the 27 May. The hundred Austrians who had crossed the river were compelled to retreat. It commenced on the afternoon of the 26th, and lasted for an hour and a half. The Piedmontese had but few wounded, while the Austrians suffered severely.

For centra, the official bulletin from General Giulay reports: "Our Advanced Guard has made a demonstration near Casale and Frascinelo. Our side had twenty wounded. Near Cremona we have thrown a corps over the Po, have crossed it, and fortified the head of the bridge. Yesterday, our advanced post there was attacked with troops come in addition with some ammunition wagons, and compelled to retire. Twenty-three men were killed and 114 wounded."

ARMY MOVEMENTS.

The Austrians, on the 3d, commenced a movement from the direction of Mortara, Vigevano, and Pavia.

An official bulletin, issued at Turin on the 4th, says the Austrians have increased their force considerably, and constructed redoubts works. They have also occupied Trino and Palestro. They have fortified Vercelli and Casino. They withdrew their advanced posts from Casale and Frascinelo. The bridge of the bridges over the Sesia at Piacenza. They have also evacuated the fortifications of the houses erected upon the fortifications.

THEIR STRATEGICAL MANŒUVRES.

The Italian says: "Austria continues her efforts on that Piedmont is making arrangements for preventing the Austrians from crossing the Sesia, which is strongly in the mountainous part of the district of Novara. A battery of artillery and some troops have arrived at Domo d'Ossola; united with the National Guard, which is strongly organized in the valley, they constitute a force quite sufficient to prevent the Austrians from attempting to occupy Bolla, Baceno, etc., with several battalions of volunteers.

"The various bulletins that have reached us from Turin state that the Allied troops continue to occupy the position and war material of Acceneo. They have also occupied Morbeno with several thousand men. Besides the troops stationed at Piacenza have left, and the Austrian authorities have proclaimed martial law in that city. Several and squarter of French troops at Turino and Genoa continue to exhibit the extraordinary movement of the people. The Austrians have entered the Duchy of Modena at the Pass of Pietra Mala, and occupied Fivizzano on the 3d. The French Consul at Genoa has announced that, during the temporary absence of General La Marmora, General Cialdini will control the Departments of War and Marine."

WHAT THEY ARE GOING TO DO.

A Turin letter says: "If the Austrians have but 124,000 men on the field, as we are told, no doubt the Pieces-Sardaniens are 200,000 strong (all told by telltale), are not inferior in numbers. The Austrians have the advantage of position, and, according to the opinion of those who are best acquainted with the ground, are on the side the Montferrat hills, and Novi and Alessandria on the other side of the Po, and that the Austrian position of Novara is not a feint; and that the real attack will be made upon the Piedmontese right and centre, and the left by the horse; but it was very evident that the first mishap advance of the Austrians would cause the Allies to look to her fors at Casale, nor yet attack Novi without leaving the risk of an attack from Alessandria. The Austrians, with a rush of cannon, rapid, and almost without cannon."

WHY THEY WERE SO SLOW.

The tardiness of the Austrians in changing the attack excited much surprise, and was variously speculated upon. The London Times says: "The Austrians do not escape the opportunity which they at first possessed. The reason is probably given by the artillery and ammunition waggons by Sardinia, aided by heavy rains, which obliged the troops in some parts to halt for days."

APPEAL OF THE AUSTRIAN EMPEROR TO HIS TROOPS.

On the 27th inst., the Emperor Francis Joseph issued the following address to the forces forming the Second Army of Italy, under the command of the Archduke Albert and Field Marshal Count Giulay:

"After fruitless attempts to secure peace for my Empire, without compromising my honor, I am compelled to have recourse to arms.

"With confidence I confide the rights of Austria to the best hands—to the hands of a tried and gallant army.

"Your fidelity and bravery your courage, perseverance, the justice of the cause which you defend, and a glorious past, promises to me success.

Soldiers of the Second Army! it is for you to secure victory to the sacred flag of Austria. I rely on you, and invoke the blessing of God and the each favor of your Emperor.

PROCLAMATION OF THE INVADERS.

General Giulai has issued the following:

TO THE PEOPLE OF SARDINIA.—In crossing your frontiers, it is not my object, my people of Sardinia, to assail your arms, but against a small destructive party, misled by its leaders, which oppresses you by the most frightful acts of crime, and attacks the rights of the sovereign Princes, and even those of Austria. The imperial eagles, if you salute them as their arrival without anger and without fear, will bring you peace, order, tranquillity, moderation, and the peaceful citizen may be assured that liberty, honor, the laws, and property will be respected by the presence of my soldiers in your dwellings. The constant discipline, which in the imperial troops is equal to their bravery, is a guarantee of my word. Interpreting to you the generous sentiments of my august Emperor and master, I, while treading your soil, proclaim and repeat that this war is intended neither against the people nor against the nation, but against a destructive party, which, under the specious mask of liberty, would bring you to ruin, and, in fact, to the God of armies was not also the God of nations. When your adversary and ours shall have been vanquished, when order and peace shall have been restored, you, who may now call us your enemies, will soon consider us to your liberators and friends.

MOVEMENTS OF FRANCIS JOSEPH.

A letter from Vienna of the 6th says: "The departure of the Emperor Francis Joseph for the army of Italy will be said, himself in a few days. His Majesty will accompany the Emperor to Munich and Ratisbonne, and will then proceed by rail; but according to other accounts also the Emperor will go to Berlin, and afterward by way of Dresden to Ratisbonne, where he will join the Emperor, and from Innspruck will proceed to Verona to join the Army."

FRENCH DECLARATION OF WAR.

The Moniteur has published a decree of Austria, issuing her army to maintain the integrity of the Italian territory, and declaring, according to the Austrian Constitution Treaties and justice, and menaces our frontiers. The Emperor Napoleon has issued a proclamation to his nation. Piedmont having accepted the conditions which would have secured peace, Austria has refused them, and remains of this sudden invasion! It is that Austria has taken the initiative in hostilities, and has given our entire rights to the Alps, or Italy must be free to the shores of the Adriatic. Such is the glorious programme of the war. Victory which remains independent endangers her power.

"The Emperor Napoleon has left Paris for the seat of war, and every Frenchman will feel that his destiny is in the hands of the Emperor. Let France and the army remember that the Emperor has never failed in political policy. I observe the troubles on condition that the Emperor Napoleon will be against the ambition of Austria and the rights of neutral Powers; but I boldly declare that Austria has declared war against France, and I glad with our cure, and who groan under foreign oppression.

"France has shown her hatred of anarchy. She has been placed in the front rank of civilized nations. She has dare into neutrality the shelters of disorder and the intrigues of revolution. She has given to Europe the incontestably most comforting with our enemies; but she has not forgotten that the sword is only drawn for the sake of peace. Our object is to restore Italy to herself, and not the improvement of the human ever; and when she shall have the control of her own destinies, Europe will breathe.

WHAT IS THE EMPEROR'S OBJECT?

"The object of this war, then, is to restore Italy to herself, not to change the face of the map of Europe; and we shall then have upon our frontiers a friendly people, who will owe their liberty to our blood, and who will unite Italy to France disaster or to disturb the power of Austria. We do not make war upon Germany. We respect Germany, and we wish that she may be powerful, which weighs upon the whole Peninsula, and to help in the regeneration of a people of 25,000,000 inhabitants.

"We are going, then, to seek upon this classic ground, illustrated by so many victories, the footsteps of our fathers. Like them, we will fight for civilization.

Long going soon to place myself at the head of the army of Italy, I leave the Empress Regent, my wife, surrounded by the experience and the enlightenment of the best servants of the Empire, and by the wisdom of the Senate and the Corps Legislatif. I have given to my ministers the orders necessary to secure the safety of the interior and the defence of the country. I rely on the patriotism which I confide them to the patriotism of the National Guard: I confide them to the patriotism of the National Guard: I confide to the brave soldiers of the army of reserve the sacredness them with that affection and devotion of which they will receive so many proofs.

"Courage then, and union.

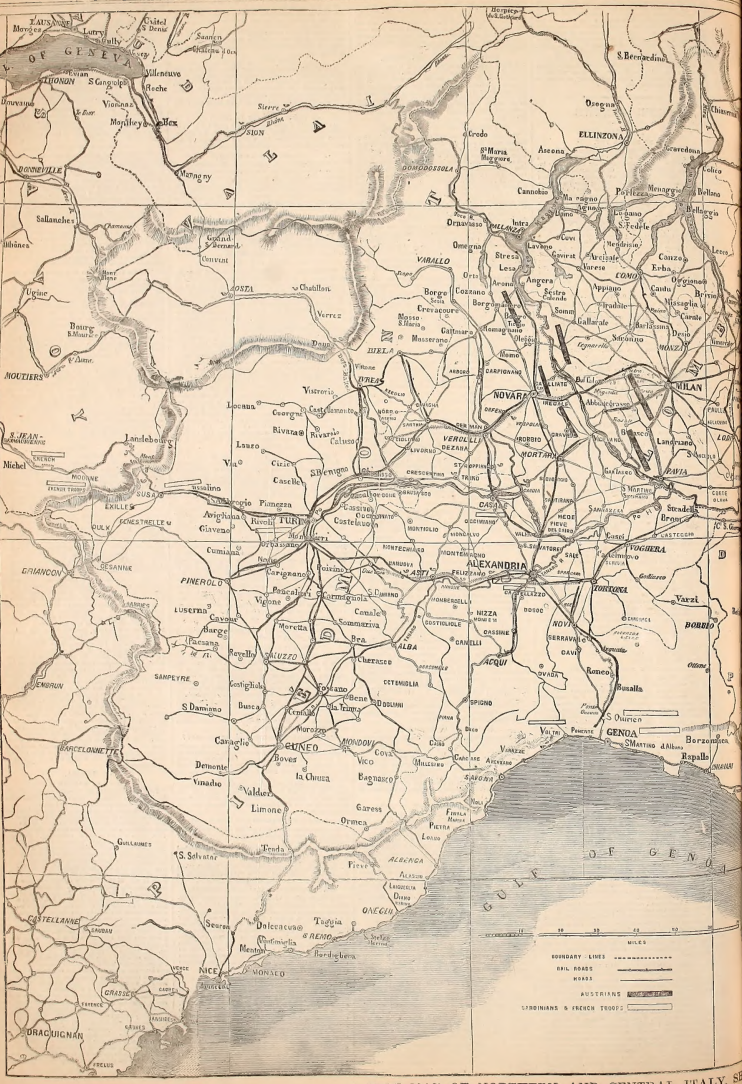
"May the people of France hasten to share the world that she has not degenerated. Providence will bless our efforts, because they are made for a great end. With rests on justice, humanity, love of country, and loyalty.

"NAPOLEON.

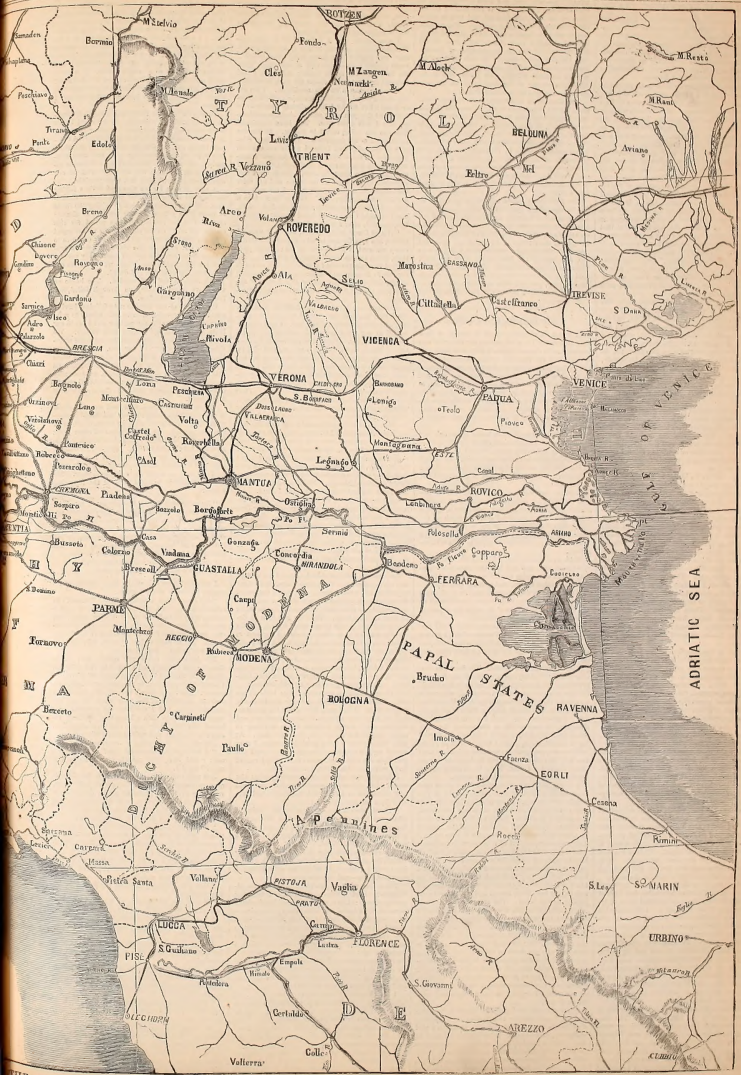
"PARIS, May 3, 1859."

MOVEMENTS OF THE FRENCH.

After the official announcement of the declaration of war, the Moniteur published a decree, and the official communication of the Minister of State. If I may be allowed to say that the Emperor Napoleon has assumed the chimerical hope that Austria would, I will say, while our illustrious Sovereign is about to place himself at the head of with commands will maintain the glory of the French Empire, and the Empress Regent, with the assistance of the will not shrink from any act of civil courage or devotion to the Empire. Between them and us—happiness! between them and us—happiness!—for this is a just war; between them and us—happiness! for this is a just war; between them and us—happiness! for this is a just war; between them and us—happiness!



A NEW MAP OF NORTHERN AND CENTRAL ITALY, SH



THE SEAT OF WAR, POSITION OF THE ARMIES, ETC.

OUR MAP OF NORTHERN ITALY.

We have gone to very considerable expense for the purpose of presenting our readers with an accurate, and, at the same time, a comprehensive map of the present seat of war in Europe—Northern Italy. The map on the preceding pages comprehends the whole region of country on which the present war will probably be waged; our subscribers should keep it for future reference.

The States which figure on the map are Piedmont and Lombardy in the north; and south of those, Parma, Modena, Ferrara, Lucca, and part of Tuscany and the Papal States. On the north we have glimpses of Switzerland and the Tyrol; on the west the Alps shut out the scene from France; on the east we see the Adriatic. The war will evidently be confined within these limits.

No part of the world is such classic ground as this. At the dawning of history a story was told the Gauls and Romans contending on the battle-fields of Northern Italy, building a Milan and fighting on the Po. Hannibal's passage of the Alps also was as momentous as the crossing of the same river by the Austrians a month since. It was on Cisalpine Gaul that many of the great contests which led to the overthrow of the Roman republic were waged; it was in the same country that Christianity won some of its first great victories; it was there that the Goths and Vandals also were quenched in blood; it was there that Francis the First "lost all save honor;" there that Napoleon won his name and fame; and there, now at last, that the great contest for the liberty of Italy is to be fought out. Surely, it is a land of most classic ground elsewhere?

Independently of its historic associations, this Northern Italy is a noble region. The territory comprised in Lombardy, Venice, Piedmont, and Savoy, Parma, Modena, and Tuscany, is nearly not quite as large as the State of New York, contains a population of nearly 13,000,000 souls, and has only 4,000,000—Austrians—are free from the direct or indirect sway of Austria. Lombardy, which is part of the Austrian Empire, is described in some respects the finest country—in point of natural advantages—in the world, with a population of 2,500,000. It owes both taste or thrice as many.

Owing to the peculiar physical geography of the country it enjoys every variety of climate. It is but a few hours' journey from the frozen fields of perpetual snow in the Alps of the north to lovely slopes on which the orange and the olive ripen in the open air; and a few hours' more journey still brings the traveler into a perfectly tropical region, under a torrid sun.

The valley of the Po is the temperate zone of this miniature world, and, under a good government, it would be one of the most prosperous countries on the globe. The soil, naturally a rich alluvium, has been improved by the most careful tivated with care. Excellent wheat and all kinds of cereals are produced in abundance; the fruits are very choice; the grazing facilities are unsurpassed in great perfection. Neither Europe nor America contains silver mines like the Sardinian, and none healthy than the vicinity of Milan. Of late years industry has been still more successful than agriculture in Lombardy, the largest cotton mills in Austria are situated in Italy. It is in Lombardy that the great silk, and also the great woollen factories which yield so large a revenue to the Austrian exchequer. There too are rich mines of various metals, which have been worked with profit for centuries. It was this rich back country which made Venice so powerful in the middle ages.

Piedmont, or the Kingdom of Sardinia—which constitutes the other half of Northern Italy—is not so favored a region. A great part of its soil is unfertile and unproductive, in whole strips of land is cold and damp. Another large section is low and hot; rice is grown there, and is unhealthy. Between these, however, and especially behind Genoa, there is a fine tract of country in which wheat is successfully raised, and also mulberry, grapes, olives, etc. Latterly industry and economy have flourished exceedingly in Piedmont. Its silk ranks very high; its olive oils are eagerly sought for; the commerce of Genoa is large and increasing. Its manufactures have taken after their neighbors across the Ticino the remarkable advantages of constitutional and free political action with which they have used it is a complete answer to those who believe that the Italian is not susceptible of self-government.

The Duchy of Parma, which, though only about as large as Rhode Island, contains more inhabitants than New Jersey, is also a fine State, teeming with "corn, wine, and oil," and well adapted for successful industry. Under a good government it would soon thrive exceedingly. Modena is about the same size, with a like population. It is a more mountainous and less fertile; still produces a good deal of silk, and has a surplus of cereals.

Tuscany, which presently comes under our notice, on an area of 8500 square miles, has aspired at large as Piedmont

At the end of that period my business, now again highly prosperous, called me to Paris; and, strange as it may seem, it was there I first began to understand the riddle. The manner in which I gained the first clew to it was as strange as the place.

I happened to pass a hair-dresser's shop one morning, and saw exhibiting in the window a complete wig of curls of exquisite beauty. Now, as I had not then—however it may be now—begun to take a personal interest in wigs, I was surprised that the one in question was evidently intended to obviate nature's ungraciousness to a lady, not a gentleman. I should undoubtedly have passed on, but a "barber's curls" is perfect unicorns, notwithstanding their marvelous head. I had seen them at their colors. They were of the exact, the very peculiar shade of the ringlet which I had now seen, for exactly three and sixpence, on sale.

I stepped into the shop and asked to see the curls, compared them with the ringlet, and found the match perfect. I was convinced that nature could succeed but once in blending so rare a hue, and that the solution to the enigma was at hand. I questioned the barber as to whence he had obtained the hair. His answer puzzled me. It had been given to him, he said, a week or two before, by a poor girl in distress—she had suffered it to be clipped from her head for the sake of what it would bring. He knew nothing more, except that she was American, and lodged in Rue ——. Failing to get much information, I purchased the wig, and returning home, sent for Jim. This worthy and mattered-faced barber was now fast reaching with me as fictotum, acquitting himself of the various duties of groom, valet, confidential friend, and important personage generally, to his own infinite satisfaction. I perceived that he might be of use in the matter in hand.

"Jim," said I, taking a half-eagle from my pocket, "I mistake, Jim, to stimulate fidelity like yours by a bribe, but—"

"Lor, Sah, dat ain't no bibe; dat's a five-dollu go' piece."

"I know that, Jim; but it's filthy lucre, as they say, 'chiefly'—"

"Brees you, Sah, Jim ain't so all-fired 'chuine' dey all pass, any way, if some is a little dirty. Never you mind dat, Sah; I'll look de rich all to rights, Sah!"

"But you don't take my idea, Jim. I like to be served for love as well as hire, and I don't like to hurt your feelings by a doubt—"

"Ain't no doubt 'bout dat, Sah," said Jim, ringing the coin on the table. "Dere's de right ring 'bout it."

Perceiving I was putting entirely too fine a point upon it, I recommenced—

"Ah, right, Jim. But bring your intellects to bear on this point, will you? This money is not yours yet, and is not going to be, unless you serve me who the lady was that sold these curls—do you see?—to the barber in Rue ——. So be off; and if you find her, Jim, I'll double that five in yours."

"O Lor! Sah, now you touches my feelins! you does indeed! De heart is my bussum sin't made as stone altogedder! I'll find her, Sah, sure and sartin, on de ground or on de water!"

Jim's stimulated faculties, and my own not-to-be-moderated impatience, left me little time for reflection to be obtained from quarters inaccessible to me, per sea at least on the right track.

In short, I found my man quickly, and found her more than all my wildest fancies had suggested. I found her a highly-bred lady, in whose veins, as she was, but beautiful also, and in deep distress.

She had been travelling in Europe with her mother, a widow, absent a year. Returning, they had been great reached them of the total loss of their large fortune by the convulsion in the money-market, together with the rascality of the person who held it in trust. The shock of this sudden disaster was a death-blow to the mother, who died on the day I had been delicate. She died a few months later, leaving her young daughter alone and friendless amongst a thin wilderness, more full of dangers to a friendless girl than the jungles of India to the benighted wanderer. But Adèle was not of the class usually to be thrugh "gentle armor" of purity and innocence, and, like Una in the same, passed unscathed through many perils. She had struggled nobly. She was without any near relatives in the world, and though she had many friends, was unknown to her friends in America, at that time of general panic for bad the thoughts for others in misfortune, and very scrve to save them-selves. She had been woefully disappointed in her expectation of aid and sympathy. Mortified and disgusted herself by the sale of her paintings and drawings, and by the needle-work, her last resource in her destitution, she had disposed of her mother's wardrobe, and most of her own—had parted with her jewels and trinkets—and even, at last, with the curls and very ringlets from her dear head in her despairing destitution!

Her loveliness, her modesty, and her distress touched me so that I took her at once into my heart of hearts. I longed to be her kind comfort her—to make that sweet mouth, with its patient and sad expression, smile as it was meant to smile, to make those thoughtful eyes brighten, and to bring the color, even though it were but by a blush, back into those pale cheeks. Loving her, she was all, more than all, my heart and imagination craved; she satisfied me entirely.

My wooing was a short one, but not without its difficulties. Adèle was very proud and shy, and I had enough to do to silence her scruples. I had at last often to remind her how her generosity had saved me from ruin, and that therefore all the fortune I had to offer her was, in truth, only her own returned.

But you can guess how it ended. I was very much in earnest, Adèle very lonely and desolate; and we had some romance in the past to fall back upon. In two weeks she was my wife, and we were on our way back to America.

Of course, wise people shook their heads, foolish ones consoled, and the world stared. But Adèle and I were happy, and what did we care? Better still, time has proved that a hasty match is not necessarily a foolish one. My wife Adèle and I have now been married nearly ten years, and though we flatter ourselves we are not yet in our dotage, we certainly are foolish enough to sentimentalize a little occasionally. I still cherish very tenderly a certain long auburn curl, and indeed a whole handful of them—to say nothing of an old wig, which, though now somewhat dusty, with every prospect of much more so in future, still is prefer, I can not bear to have flung out as rubbish.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

WEEDS AND WEEDING.

Second Article.

Our remarks of last week on this subject prepare the way for what we have to say on the destructive of weeds.

One of the best ways to get rid of weeds is not to let them grow. The ripest pasturage, and the soil, when they are about to appear, is a sure means to prevent their growth. An illustration of this we may be found in our gardens. Here, as in common acrolls, or other hoe, be used between and keep more or less constantly at the soil of the weed rows be left untouched, and after a few days, especially in moist weather, the latter will be a bed of young weeds, which may be cut down with very gratifying clean. This fact holds true of any row of crops grown in the field as well as those grown in the garden, and shows the necessity of the prompt use of implements for disturbance of the soil. Putting off this work for a day or a few days is also the cause of great expense in cleaning the land. Such treatment as we have given to a single acre early would be much benefited by a good plowing in early spring and the frequent use of the cultivator. Such treatment would keep down the weeds, as fast as they appear, to be destroyed, and all seeds would be prevented from maturing. Instead of this, all of the soil would be so disturbed as to prevent plants growing from them. But the farmer will say that this would be to make it impossible for that season at least, to grow root crops profitably; for the labor of hoeing would be enough to swarm the young crop with these intruders. Would the land be in such condition, at the next summer fallow, or seed the land to clover with a cereal crop.

We know of no better implement for destroying weeds among row crops than Knox's horse-hoe. Its construction is very simple—consisting of the handles and beam are like those of an ordinary plow, having two arms of wood extending from the rear of the beam, with a piece of iron across at the end, running back like the sides of the letter V. At the point where these two pieces of wood meet is a cutter, or coiter, which enters the ground to steady the machine during its action. At each side of the beam, and in the rear of the coiter plow, is the rear of the beam, and directly under the handles, is a small iron plow, or cutter. Several, There are teeth on the rear of this share, about three inches long, projecting backward. A wheel and regulating lever are placed on the front of the beam, to which a horse or mule may be attached. The action of this machine may be easily understood. The cutter, as stated above, steadies it; the small plow throws the soil to the centre; and the two rows of teeth distributed it. Thus the horse-hoe can be used to great advantage when the rows are straight, for it runs exactly between, and all other row crops wide enough apart to let it pass between them. In hoeing corn it should be used when the corn is eight inches high, and every plant of the next in order through the length of the field, and afterward once in ten days or a fortnight. It is generally used with the mould-board sides in for other crops as well as corn, unless it be desired to throw the soil from the plants, in which case those being now much practiced. The amount of labor necessary for the cultivation of root crops, except when the common plow and hand hoes only are used, deters many from giving these important crops the care which they require. Where the rows are wide wings are taken off, the V-shaped share operates with great facility, and is recommended especially if drawn by an animal having a steady step and accustomed to such work. But the horse-hoe is not only valuable for the crops in the rows, but since it the best results are desired. Even if hundreds of weeds are destroyed, if a few are left to tuck weeds when they are young, otherwise the stalks are liable to break, leaving the roots in the soil to send forth new shoots. By the use of this tool a farmer can not afford to grow weeds if his own crops are of any value to him.

In hot weather the hoes should be kept constantly going while weeds are to be found; for they are most easily killed when the roots are exposed to the scorching heat of the sun. Should the hoped-for crop of clover be destroyed by insects, and fences are permitted to grow large, let them be cut before the seed ripens, and better still if at an early stage of their growth. Remember the adage:

"One year's good weeding
Will prevent seeding."

The small price of land in many parts of this country, and the high prices of labor, render the careful system of culture so essentially necessary in older countries. But even in such parts of our own America where land, having a large money value, is deteriorating in quality and growing more weeds than crops, it is a self-evident fact, and especially because of the high price of labor, instead of running over a great amount of surface, we ought to concentrate our powers on a smaller area. Soils where fertility is increased by a rational system of manuring, and more labor for the growing of crops than those to which such treatment is unknown.

Rather than naked follow a field completely overrun with quack or other weeds, we would prefer to plow it well in spring, using a cultivator on it every two weeks, and from the middle to the latter part of June sow buckwheat very thickly to choke them out.

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

L. E. C. and T. W. N. (Alvarado, Cal.), J. B. P., and some others. We are accumulated to subscribe to a problem already established and published; namely: that, excepting in very unusual cases, we must be exempt from reference to back numbers. ——— "CHANCE" is welcome, as usual, to publish his problem, but our columns will have all home. ——To Dr. R. (Philadelphia), S. T. (Brooklyn), Newark, and A. B. (Boston), we make the same reference, mutatis mutandis. W. H. accept acknowledgment for his information as stated. Augusta and Augusta (played by telegraph, and ending in a draw). On the next hunt we hope you will both win. ——Solutions to enemy problems to hand from "CONSTANT" (Augusta, Ga.), J. W. C. (Louisville, Ky.), E. P. (Boston), J. S. R. (Cincinnati), and many others. We take occasion, by-the-way, here to remark that mere solutions, etc., are incorrect in it but possible on every occasion to enter into remotion. We make no mistakes, and our friends must excuse us therefore. No mistakes is requisite. ——To H. A. S. (Boston), we have to say that we have not the "Chess Monthly" as No. 1 of publication of which we believe to be accept as acknowledgment of his information as stated. ——Augusta and Augusta (played by telegraph, and ending in a draw). On the next hunt we hope you will both win. ——Solutions to enemy problems to hand from "CONSTANT" (Augusta, Ga.), J. W. C. (Louisville, Ky.), E. P. (Boston), J. S. R. (Cincinnati), and many others. We take occasion, by-the-way, here to remark that mere solutions, etc., are incorrect in it but possible on every occasion to enter into remotion. We make no mistakes, and our friends must excuse us therefore. No mistakes is requisite. ——To H. A. S. (Boston), we have to say that we have not the "Chess Monthly" as No. 1 of publication of which we believe to be accept as acknowledgment of his information as stated.

94. R to K (ch)	B interposes
95. Q takes Kt	Q R to Q
96. Q to K R 8 (ch)	B interposes
97. Q to Kt 6 (ch)	K to Q 3
98. Q to K 6 (ch)	K to Q 4
99. Q to K B 6 (ch)	K to Q 5
100. Q to K B (ch)	Q R to Q 3
101. P to Q B 4	K to Q 6
102. P to Q R 4	Kt to Q B 3
103. P to K 5 (ch)	K takes R
104. Q takes R (ch)	Kt to Q
105. Q to K 3	K to Q B 6
106. K to Kt 2	B takes Q B P
107. P to K 6	B to Q 7
108. P to Kt 4	R to K 3
109. P to Kt 5	R to Q B 3
110. P to K R 5	B to Q 8
111. P to K 7	B to Q 7
112. P to K 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
113. P to Q 5	B to Q 7
114. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
115. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
116. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
117. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
118. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
119. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
120. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
121. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
122. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
123. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
124. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
125. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
126. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
127. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
128. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
129. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
130. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
131. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
132. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
133. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
134. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
135. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
136. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
137. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
138. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
139. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
140. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
141. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
142. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
143. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
144. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
145. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
146. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
147. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
148. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
149. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
150. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
151. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
152. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
153. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
154. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
155. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
156. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
157. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
158. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
159. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
160. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
161. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
162. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
163. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
164. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
165. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
166. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
167. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
168. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
169. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
170. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
171. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
172. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
173. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
174. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
175. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
176. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
177. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
178. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
179. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
180. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
181. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
182. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
183. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
184. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
185. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
186. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
187. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
188. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
189. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
190. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
191. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
192. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
193. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
194. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
195. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
196. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
197. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
198. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
199. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
200. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
201. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
202. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
203. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
204. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
205. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
206. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
207. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
208. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
209. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
210. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
211. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
212. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
213. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
214. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
215. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
216. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
217. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
218. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
219. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
220. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
221. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
222. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
223. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
224. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
225. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
226. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
227. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
228. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
229. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
230. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
231. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
232. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
233. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
234. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
235. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
236. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
237. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
238. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
239. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
240. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
241. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
242. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
243. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
244. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
245. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
246. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
247. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
248. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
249. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
250. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
251. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
252. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
253. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
254. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
255. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
256. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
257. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
258. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
259. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
260. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
261. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
262. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
263. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
264. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
265. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
266. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
267. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
268. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
269. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
270. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
271. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
272. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
273. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
274. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
275. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
276. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
277. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
278. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
279. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
280. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
281. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
282. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
283. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
284. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
285. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
286. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
287. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
288. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
289. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
290. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
291. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
292. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
293. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
294. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
295. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
296. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
297. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
298. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
299. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
300. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
301. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
302. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
303. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
304. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
305. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
306. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
307. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
308. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
309. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
310. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
311. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
312. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
313. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
314. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
315. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
316. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
317. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
318. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
319. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
320. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
321. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
322. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
323. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
324. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
325. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
326. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
327. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
328. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
329. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
330. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
331. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
332. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
333. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
334. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
335. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
336. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
337. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
338. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
339. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
340. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
341. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
342. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
343. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
344. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
345. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
346. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
347. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
348. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
349. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
350. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
351. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
352. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
353. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
354. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
355. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
356. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
357. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
358. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
359. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
360. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
361. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
362. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
363. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
364. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
365. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
366. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
367. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
368. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
369. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
370. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
371. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
372. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
373. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
374. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
375. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
376. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
377. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
378. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
379. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
380. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
381. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
382. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
383. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
384. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
385. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
386. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
387. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
388. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
389. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
390. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
391. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
392. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
393. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
394. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
395. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
396. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
397. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
398. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
399. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
400. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
401. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
402. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
403. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
404. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
405. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
406. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
407. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
408. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
409. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
410. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
411. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
412. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
413. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
414. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
415. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
416. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
417. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
418. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
419. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
420. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
421. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
422. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
423. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
424. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
425. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
426. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
427. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
428. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
429. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
430. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
431. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
432. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
433. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
434. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
435. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
436. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
437. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
438. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
439. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
440. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
441. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
442. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
443. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
444. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
445. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
446. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
447. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
448. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
449. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
450. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
451. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
452. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
453. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
454. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
455. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
456. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
457. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
458. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
459. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
460. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
461. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
462. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
463. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
464. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
465. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
466. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
467. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
468. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
469. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
470. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
471. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
472. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
473. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
474. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
475. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
476. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
477. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
478. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
479. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
480. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
481. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
482. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
483. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
484. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
485. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
486. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
487. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
488. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
489. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
490. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
491. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
492. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
493. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
494. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
495. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
496. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
497. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
498. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
499. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
500. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
501. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
502. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
503. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
504. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
505. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
506. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
507. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
508. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
509. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
510. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
511. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
512. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
513. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
514. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
515. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
516. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
517. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
518. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
519. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
520. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
521. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
522. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
523. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
524. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
525. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
526. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
527. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
528. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
529. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
530. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
531. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
532. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
533. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
534. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
535. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
536. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
537. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
538. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
539. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
540. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
541. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
542. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
543. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
544. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
545. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
546. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
547. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
548. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
549. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
550. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
551. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
552. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
553. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
554. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
555. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
556. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
557. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
558. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
559. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
560. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
561. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
562. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
563. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
564. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
565. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
566. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
567. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
568. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
569. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
570. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
571. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
572. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
573. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
574. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
575. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
576. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
577. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
578. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
579. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
580. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
581. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
582. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
583. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
584. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
585. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
586. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
587. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
588. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
589. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
590. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
591. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
592. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
593. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
594. P to Q 6	B to Q 8
595. P to Q 7	B to Q 7
596. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 8
597. P to Q 6	B to Q 7
598. P to Q 7	B to Q 8
599. P to Q 8 (Q)	B to Q 7
600. P to Q 6	B

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

In Three Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

☞ Printed from early Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers pay the Author

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK I.
RECALLED TO LIFE.

CHAPTER VI.
THE SHOEMAKER.

"GOOD-DAY!" said Monsieur Defarge, looking down at the white head that bent low over the shoemaking.

It was raised for a moment, and a very faint voice responded to the salutation, as if it were at a distance:

"Good-day!"

"You are still hard at work, I see?"

After a long silence, the head was lifted for another moment, and the voice replied, "Yes—I am working." This time a pair of haggard eyes had looked at the questioner before the face had dropped again.

The fainness of the voice was pitiable and dreadful. It was not the faintness of physical weakness, though confinement and hard fare no doubt had their part in it. Its deplorable peculiarity was, that it was the faintness of solitude and disuse. It was like the last feeble echo of a sound made long and long ago. So entirely had it lost the life and resonance of the human voice, that it effected the senses like a once beautiful color faded away into a poor weak stain. So unused and suppressed it was, that it was like a voice underground. So expressive it was of a hopeless and lost creature, that a famished traveler, wearied out by lonely wandering in a wilderness, would have remembered home and friends in such a tone before lying down to die.

Some minutes of silent work had passed, and the haggard eyes had looked up again: not with any interest or curiosity, but with a dull mechanical perception, beforehand, that the spot where the only visitor they were aware of had stood was not yet empty.

"I want," said Defarge, who had not removed his gaze from the shoemaker, "to let in a little more light here. You can bear a little more?"

The shoemaker stopped his work; looked, with a vacant air of listening, at the floor on one side of him; then, similarly, at the floor on the other side of him; then, upward at the speaker.

"What did you say?"

"You can bear a little more light?"

"I must bear it, if you let it in." (Laying the palest shadow of a stress upon the second word.)

The opened half-door was opened a little further, and secured at that angle for the time. A broad ray of light fell into the room, and showed the workman, with an unshaved shoe upon his lap, pausing in his labor. His few common tools and various scraps of leather were at his feet and on his bench. He had a white beard, raggedly cut, but not very long, a hollow face, and exceedingly bright eyes. The hollowness and thinness of his face would have caused them to look large, under his yet dark eyebrows and his confused white hair, though they had been really otherwise; but they were naturally large, and looked unnaturally so. His yellow rags of shirt lay open at the throat, and showed his body to be withered and worn. He, and his old sunken frock, and his loose stockings, and all his poor tatters of clothes, had, in a long seclusion from direct light and air, faded down to such a dull uniformity of parchment-yellow, that it would have been hard to say which was which.

He had put up a hand between his eyes and the light, and the very bones of it seemed transparent. So he sat, with a steadfastly vacant gaze, passing in his work. He never looked at the figure before him, without first looking down on this side of himself, then on that, as if he had lost the habit of associating place with sound; he never spoke, without first wandering in this manner, and forgetting to speak.

"Are you going to finish that pair of shoes to-day?" asked Defarge, stooping to Mr. Lorry to come forward.

"What did you say?"

"Do you mean to finish that pair of shoes to-day?"

"I can't say that I mean to. I suppose so. I don't know."

But the question reminded him of his work, and he bent over it again.

Mr. Lorry came silently forward, leaving the daughter by the door. When he had stood, for a minute or two, by the side of Defarge, the shoemaker looked up. He showed no surprise at seeing another figure, but the unsteady fingers of one of his hands strayed to his lips as he looked at it (his lips and his nails were of the same pale lead-color), and then the hand dropped to his work, and he once more bent over the shoe. The look and the action had occupied but an instant.

"You have a visitor, you see," said Monsieur Defarge.

"What did you say?"

"Here is a visitor."

The shoemaker looked up as before, but without removing a hand from his work.

"Come!" said Defarge. "Here is monsieur, who knows a well-made shoe when he sees one. Show him that shoe you are working at. Take it, monsieur."

Mr. Lorry took it in his hand.

"Tell monsieur what kind of shoe it is, and the maker's name."

There was a longer pause than usual, before the shoemaker replied:

"I forget what it was you asked me. What did you say?"

"I said, couldn't you describe the kind of shoe, for monsieur's information?"

"It is a shoe. It is a young lady's walking-shoe. It is in the present mode. I never saw the mode. I have had a pattern in my hand." He glanced at the shoe with some little passing touch of pride.

"And the maker's name?" said Defarge.

Now that he had no work to hold, he laid the knuckles of the right hand in the hollow of the left, and then the knuckles of the left hand in the hollow of the right, and then passed a hand across his bearded chin, and so on in regular changes, without a moment's intermission. The task of recalling him from the vacancy into which he always sank when he had spoken, was like recalling some very weak person from a swoon, or endeavoring, in the hope of some disclosure, to stay the spirit of a fast-dying man.

"Did you ask me for my name?"

"Assuredly I did."

"One Hundred and Five, North Tower."

"Is that all?"

"One Hundred and Five, North Tower."

With a weary sound that was not a sigh nor a groan, he bent to work again until the silence was again broken.

"You are a shoemaker by trade?" said Mr. Lorry, looking steadfastly at him.

His haggard eyes turned to Defarge as if he would have transferred the question to him: but as no help came from that quarter, they turned back on the questioner when they had sought the ground.

"I am not a shoemaker by trade? No, I was not a shoemaker by trade. I—I learned it here. I taught myself. I asked leave to—"

He lapsed away, even for minutes, ringing those measured changes on his hands the whole time. His eyes came slowly back, at last, to the face from which they had wandered; when they rested on it, he started, and resumed, in the manner of a sleeper that moment awake, reverting to a subject of last night.

"HE TOOK HER HAIR INTO HIS HAND AGAIN, AND LOOKED CLOSELY AT IT."

"HE HAD SUNK IN HER ARMS, WITH HIS FACE DROPPED ON HER BREAST."

"I asked leave to teach myself, and I got it with much difficulty after a long while, and I have made shoes ever since."

As he held out his hand for the shoe that had been taken from him, Mr. Lorry said, still looking steadfastly in his face:

"Monsieur Manette, do you remember nothing of me?"

The shoe dropped to the ground, and he sat looking fixedly at the questioner.

"Monsieur Manette"—Mr. Lorry laid his hand upon Defarge's arm—"do you remember nothing of this man? Look at him. Look at me. Is there no old banker, no old business, no old servant, no old time, rising in your mind, Monsieur Manette?"

As the captive of many years sat looking fixedly, by turns at Mr. Lorry and at Defarge, some long-obliterated marks of an actively-intent intelligence in the middle of the forehead gradually forced themselves through the black mist that had fallen on him. They were overclouded again, they were fainter, they were gone; but they had been there. And so exactly was the expression repeated on the fair young face of her who had crept along the wall to a point where she could see him, and where she now stood looking at him, with hands which at first had been only raised in frightened compassion, if not even to keep him off and shut out the sight of him, but which were now extended toward him, trembling with eagerness to lay the spectral face upon her warm young breast, and love it back to life and hope—so exactly was the expression repeated (though in stronger characters) on her fair young face, that it looked as though it had passed, like a moving light, from him to her.

Darkness had fallen on him in its place. He looked at the two, less and less attentively, and his eyes in gloomy abstraction sought the ground and looked at him in the old way. Finally, with a deep, long sigh, he took the shoe up and resumed his work.

Have you recognized him, monsieur?" asked Defarge, in a whisper.

"Yes; for a moment. At first I thought it quite hopeless, but I have unquestionably seen, for a single moment, the face that I once knew well. Hush! Let us draw further back. Hush!"

She had moved from the wall of the garret very near to the bench on which he sat. There was something awful in his unconsciousness of the figure that could have put out its hand and touched him as he stooped over his labor.

Not a word was spoken, not a sound was made. She stood, like a spirit, beside him, and he bent over his work.

It happened, at length, that he had occasion to change the instrument in his hand for his shoemaker's knife. It lay on that side of him which was not the side on which she stood. He had taken it up, and was stooping to work again, when his eyes caught the skirt of her dress. He raised them, and saw her face. The two spectators started forward, but she waved them with a motion of her hand. She had no fear of his striking at her with the knife, though they had.

He stared at her with a fearful look, and after a while his lips began to form some words, though no sound proceeded from them. By degrees, in the pauses of his quick and labored breathing, he was heard to say,

"What is this?"

With the tears streaming down her face, she put her two hands to her lips and kissed them to him; then clasped them on her breast, as if she had his ruined head there.

"You are not the jailer's daughter?"

She signed "No."

"Who are you?"

Not yet trusting the tones of her voice, she sat down on the bench beside him. He recoiled, but she laid her hand upon his arm. A strange shill struck him when she did so, and visibly passed over his frame; he laid the knife down softly as he sat staring at her.

Her golden hair, which she wore in long curls, had been hurriedly pushed aside, and fell down over her neck. Advancing his hand by little and little, he took it up and looked at it. In the midst of the action he went astray, and, with another deep sigh, fell to work at his shoemaking.

But not for long. Releasing his arm, she laid her hand upon his shoulder. After looking searchingly at her two or three times, as if to be sure that it was really there, he laid down his work, put his hand to his neck, and took off a blackened string with a scrap of folded paper attached to it. He opened this, carefully, on his knee, and it contained a very small quantity of hair; not more than one or two long golden hairs, which he had, on some old day, wound off upon his finger.

He took her hair into his hand again, and looked steadily at it. "It is the same! How can it be! When was it! How was it?"

As the concentrating expression returned to his forehead he seemed to become conscious that it was in here too. He turned her full to the light and looked at her.

"She had laid her head upon my shoulder that night when I was summoned out—she had a fear of my going, though I had none—and when I was brought to the North Tower they found them there, asleep in one another's arms. You will hear me them? They can never help me to escape in the body, though they may in the spirit." Those were the words I said. I remember them very well."

He formed this speech with his lips many times before he could utter it. But when he did find spoken words for it, they came to him coherently, though slowly.

"How was this?—Was it you?"

Once more the two spectators started, as he turned upon her with a frightful suddenness. But she sat perfectly still in his grasp, and only said, in a low voice, "I entreat you, good gentlemen, do not come near us, do not speak, do not move!"

"Hark!" he exclaimed. "Whose voice was that?"

His hands released her as he uttered this cry, and went up to his white hair, which they tore in a frenzy. It died out, as every thing but his shoemaking did die out of him, and he refolded his little packet, and tried to secure it in his breast; but he still looked at her, and gloomily shook his head.

"No, no, no: you are too young, too bloomy. It can't be. See what the prisoner is. There are not the hands she knew, this is not the face she knew, this is not a voice she ever heard. No, no. She was—and He was—before the slow years of the North Tower—ages ago. What is your name, my gentle angel?"

Hailing his softened tone and manner, his daughter fell upon her knees before him, with her appealing hands upon his breast.

"Oh, Sir, at another time you shall know my name, and who my mother was, and who my father, and how I never knew their hard, hard history. But I can not tell you at this time, and I can not tell you here. All that I may tell you, here and now, is, that I pray to you to touch me and to bless me. Kiss me, kiss me! Oh, my dear, my dear!"

His cold white head mingled with her radiant hair, which warmed and lighted it as though it were the light of Freedom shining on him.

"If you hear in my voice—I don't know that it is so, but I hope it is—if you hear in my voice any resemblance to a voice that once was sweet music in your ears, weep for it, weep for it! If you touch, in touching my hair, any thing that recalls a beloved head that lay in your breast when you were young and free, weep for it, weep for it! If, when I hint to you of a Home there in before us, where I will be true to you with all my duty and with all my faithful service, I bring back the remembrance of a Home long desolate, while your poor heart pined away, weep for it, weep for it!"

She held him closer round the neck, and rocked him on her breast like a child.

"If, when I tell you, dearest dear, that your agony is over, and that I have come here to take you from it, and that we go to England to be at peace and at rest, I cause you to think of your useful life laid waste, and of our native France, so wicked to you, weep for it, weep for it! And if, when I shall tell you of my name, and of my father who is living, and of my mother who is dead, you learn that I have to kneel to my honored father, and implore his pardon for having never for his sake striven all day and lain awake and wept all night, because the love of my poor mother hid his torture from me, weep for it, weep for it! Weep for her, then, and for me! Good gentlemen, thank God! I feel his sacred tears upon my face, and his sobs strike against my heart. Oh, see! Thank God for us, thank God!"

He had sunk in her arms, with his face dropped on her breast: a sight so touching, yet so terrible in the tremendous wrong and suffering which had gone before it, that the two beholders covered their faces.

When the quiet of the garret had been long undisturbed, and his heaving breast and shaken form had long yielded to the calm that must follow all storms—emblem to humanity of the vast and silence into which the storm called Life must hush at last—they came forward to raise the father and daughter from the ground. He had gradually drooped to the floor, and lay there in a lethargy, worn out. She had nestled down with him, that his head might lie upon her arm; and her hair drooping over him curtained him from the light.

"If, without disturbing him," she said, raising her head to Mr. Lorry as he stooped over them, after repeated blowings of his nose, "all could be arranged for our leaving Paris at once, so that, from the very door, he could be taken away—"

"But, consider. Is he fit for the journey?" asked Mr. Lorry.

"More fit for that, I think, than to remain in this city, so dreadful to him."

"It is true," said Defarge, who was kneeling to look on and hear. "More than that; Monsieur Manette is, for all reasons, best out of France. Say, shall I hire a carriage and post-horses?"

"That's business," said Mr. Lorry, resuming on the shortest notice his methodical manner; "and if business is to be done, I had better do it."

"Then be so kind," urged Miss Manette, "as to leave us here. You see how composed he has become, and you can not be afraid to leave him with me now. Why should you be? If you will lock the door to secure us from interruption, I do not doubt that you will find him, when you come back, as quiet as you leave him. In any case, I will take care of him until you return, and then we will remove him straight."

Both Mr. Lorry and Defarge were rather disinclined to this course, and in favor of one of them remaining. But as there were not only carriages and horses to be seen to, but traveling papers; and as time pressed, for the day was drawing to an end, it came at last to their hastily dividing the business that was necessary to be done, and hurrying away to do it.

Then, as the darkness closed in, the daughter laid her head down on the hard ground close at the father's side, and watched him. The darkness deepened and deepened, and they both lay quiet, until a light gleamed through the chinks in the walls.

FELDZEUGMEISTER COUNT GIULAI.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE BRITISH YACHT "URSULA."—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Mr. Lorry and Monsieur Defarge had made all ready for the journey, and had brought with them, besides traveling-cloaks and wrappers, bread and meat, wine, and hot coffee. Monsieur Defarge put this provender, and the lamp he carried, on the shoemaker's bench (there was nothing else in the garret but a pallet bed), and he and Mr. Lorry roused the captive, and assisted him to his feet.

No human intelligence could have read the mysteries of his mind in the scared blank wonder of his face. Whether he knew what had happened, whether he recollected what they had said to him, whether he knew that he was free, were questions which no sagacity could have solved. They tried speaking to him; but he was so confused, and so very slow to collect himself, that they spoke at his bewilderment, and agreed for the time to tamper with him no more. He had a wild, hurt manner of occasionally clasping his head in his hands, that had not been seen in him before; yet he had some power of raising the mere sound of his daughter's voice, and invariably turned to it when she spoke.

In the submissive way of one long accustomed to obey under coercion, he ate and drank what they gave him to eat and drink, and put on the cloak and other wrappings that they gave him to wear. He readily responded to his daughter's drawing her arm through his, and took—as to her—her hand in his left hand.

They began to descend; Monsieur Defarge going first with the lamp, Mr. Lorry closing the little procession. They had not traversed many steps of the long, main staircase when he stopped, and stared at the roof and round at the walls.

"You remember the place, my father? You remember coming up here?"

"What did you say?"

But before she could repeat the question, he murmured an answer as if she had originally put it.

"Remember? No, I don't remember. It was so very long ago."

That he had no recollection whatever of his having been brought from his prison to that house was apparent to them. They looked in one another's faces, Mr. Lorry closing the little procession. They had not stopped on any steps of the long, main staircase when he stopped, and stared at the roof and round at the walls.

"You remember the place, my father? You remember coming up here?"

"What did you say?"

But before she could repeat the question, he murmured an answer as if she had originally put it.

"Remember? No, I don't remember. It was so very long ago."

That he had no recollection whatever of his having been brought from his prison to that house was apparent to them. They looked in one another's faces, Mr. Lorry closing the little procession. They had not traversed many

All Right!

"All right!"

"All right, all right!" and is it so?
Am I "all right" from top to toe?
Look once more, look this once more,
And scan me well, friend, or say and o'er,
That you can, my ears delight,
And look proclaim "all right!"

Now first my eyes—how looks that, pray?
Let in the failure's face to-day?
Or answer that in one brief minute:
"Come Albert bright with pride be in it."
Do really think so? "Honor bright?"
Why, there, I'm sure that's right, all right."

Now for my cough? "It makes me sigh
To hear it so!" Time may fly
His onward course for years, but no
Such cure will ever let me go.
'Tis faultless, peerless in my sight!"
Why then, my coat is right, "all right."
What of my pants? Don't like the fit?
"With moderation grace, my friend, they sit.
I'm jealous while I gaze upon
The rondrest thing! My tailor's done."
Wouldst like the name? "Aye, just such others."
Then spend this night to save the brothers.
And when you meet your fair one bright,
She'll proclaim cry, "You're right, all right!"

All Right!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140 Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT S. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

Cure Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Indigestion.
Cure Heart Burn, Heart Burn, Heart Burn.
Cure Water Brash, Water Brash, Jaundice, Jaundice.
Cure Liver Complaint, Liver Complaint, Debility.
Cure Fever and Ague, Ringworm, Ringworm.
Cure Headache, Costiveness, Piles, Nervousness.
Cure Flatulency, Nausea, Nausea, Nausea.

These Bitters are so well known as the most remarkable and efficient yet discovered for the absolute and rapid cure of the above diseases, that it is altogether unnecessary to enlarge upon its merits.

S. W. LOWLE & CO., Proprietors, Boston.

Sold everywhere.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

PRICES REDUCED to $60, $75, $110, and $125.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE,

the gem of which is only $60, is a light and elegantly decorated Machine, capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

SINGER'S TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE MACHINE,

to be sold at $75, is a Machine entirely new in its arrangement; it is very beautiful, moves rapidly and very easily, and, for family use and light manufacturing purposes, is the very best and cheapest Machine ever offered to the public.

SINGER'S No. 1 STANDARD SHUTTLE MACHINE,

formerly sold at $125, but now reduced to $110, is known all over the world. Every sort of work can be done with it.

SINGER'S No. 2 STANDARD SHUTTLE MACHINE.

This is the favorite manufacturing Machine every where. Price, with table complete, $110.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which is a beautiful pictorial paper, entirely devoted to the subject. It will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
458 Broadway, New York.

ARTISTS, TEACHERS, AND SCHOOLS

are respectfully informed that the Subscriber is now selling the best English Cotman, Bill and Water Colors, Pastels, Drawing Papers, &c., at lower prices than any house in the city. The finest assortment of Engravings, Prints, and all the materials for Grecian Painting. Orders in hand and solicited.

W. SCHAUS,
No. 308 Broadway.

Most Patent Medicines are Humbugs;

but DR. HALL'S ASTHMATIC AND BRONCHIAL OINTMENT is for all he recommends it to be. The ointment will be refunded by his agent in every town and village in the State. If you have a pain or ache try it better, it may pain less afterwards. Price 25 and 50 cents per bottle. Depot, 56 Cortlandt Street, New York.

Sold by all the Druggists.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano. This Guano from Jarvis Island, is the Pacific Guano, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale, and retail, at less than one fourth the price of Peruvian, by the particulars address C. S. MARSHALL, Prest. American Guano Co., 66 William Street, New York.

PURCHASE'S
WELL'S
BRANDRETH'S PILLS
POSSESSES THE GREATEST VIRTUES
TO CURE WHEN EXPOSED
IN TIME.
AND LET ME SAY FROM MY KNOWLEDGE IS A
SECOND ONLY TO CHRISTIANITY IN THE BENEFITS
IT IS CAPABLE OF CONFERRING UPON MANKIND.
LET MY MEDICAL MEN PERSUADE YOU BRANDRETH'S PILLS ARE INVALUABLE AS A REMEDY, IF TAKEN IN TIME.
WHAT I TELL YOU FOR 2 SHILLINGS
THESE PILLS
COULD NOT SUPPLY FOR ONE DOLLAR.
MY WORDS AND PRACTICE ARE PRAISED
IN MY OWN ABORATORY, AND I CLAIM ENOUGH
OF FAIRNESS AND BELIEVED EXCLUSIVELY
IN THE PURSUIT OF MY PROFESSION
IN USING THESE PILLS YOU RISK NOTHING.
THEY HAVE BEEN USED BY MILLIONS.
SO THAT WE ARE JUSTIFIED IN ASKING YOU TAKE A SIX DOSES YOU WILL BE CERTAINLY ABLE TO LIVE THROUGH THE OPERATION; AND YOU MAY HAVE THE LAUGH ON YOUR SIDE WHEN THE DOCTOR LETS YOU KNOW THAT YOU ARE NOT CURED AT THE LAST MEDICINE. GO ON IN THE USE OF THE PILLS. THEY WILL DO NOT WITHOUT YOU HOW TENTH OR GUINS AND IN EVERY WAY IMPROVE YOUR HEALTH, IN FACT SELDOM OR EVER DISAPPOINTED BY THE PATRIARCHS OF OLD
DR. BRANDRETH'S PRINCIPAL OFFICE
IS NO. 241 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
AND BY ALL DRUGGETS.

Beautiful Music.

We will send to any address any of the following pieces on receipt of the marked price: "Linda ba departed," new Song by S. C. Foster, 25 cents: "The Old Arm Chair," new Song by Millard, 25 cents; "Glen Schlottisch," by Kleiser, 20 cents.

Music or Musical Works published in Europe or America, and superior Violin and Guitar Strings, sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the prices. Carefull selections made for Teachers, Seminaries, &c.

JUST PUBLISHED:

Hassler's Oratorio of the MESSIAH. Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1.00.

FIRTH, POND & CO.,
547 Broadway,
NEW YORK.

"Love Me Little, Love Me Long."

A Novel.

BY CHARLES READE.

Author of

"Peg Wolfington," "Christie Johnstone," "Never too Late to Mend," &c.

12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

Odd, satirical, brilliant, picturesque, delightful, and thoroughly Reade-ish throughout. — Virginia Dallas (Richmond).

We do not remember any thing in fiction more admirably managed than the denouement.—Boston Christian Advocate Journal.

It matches an unerring continuity of interest, and reveals a thorough mastery of dramatic narrative. — Burnley Express.

Charles Reade has done one great practical good by his novels. He has made the public ashamed of novel-reading and the vanity and folly so distasteful from the conventional to character and society—but he has delineated the character of the former: he is as much the advocate of Reality against Show as Carlyle; he delights in unveiling and in unmasking shams, and his sentimentalism and bringing it to direct contrast to the fresh, fervid, true stamina of manhood and womanhood, and so vividdisting genuine humanity at the expense of artificial society. It is a good, a needful, and a noble mission.—Boston Transcript.

We are delighted to find this the best of his remarkable works.—N. Y. Chronicle.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

Sent by mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States) on receipt of price.

All Freights Forwarded with the Greatest Speed,
BY THE
AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.'S
LIGHTNING RUN.

Trains leave the Depot, Canal Street (Depot 4.45 and 11.15 A. M.; 3.15, 4.30, and 5.10 P.M.

Freights forwarded on Express Passenger trains, and do not lie over or stop at any point.

The regular Rates are as follows:

To Chicago	in 40 hours	To Dayton	in 20 hours
" Cincinnati	" 30 "	" St. Louis	" 48 "
" Cleveland	" 24 "	" Louisville	" 32 "
" Columbus	" 20 "	" Indianapolis	" 36 "

And OTHER WESTERN TOWNS in like good time.

Freights for Albany, Troy, Utica, Syracuse, Rochester, Kansas, &c., will save time by shipping by our line.

Rates positively as low as any responsible Company.

WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & CO.
64 Broadway and 61 Hudson St.

Lord Ward's Worcestershire Sauce.

In the Pint Bottles only. Caution is necessary for all purposes.

ASK FOR, and HAVE ONLY LORD WARD'S. Used at every Hotel, and sold by all Grocers and Dealers throughout the World.

Wholesale and for Exportation, by
JONATHAN JONES & CO.,
46 Broad Street, New York.

Something New.

Agents wanted, to go into a New and Honorable Business, which will pay from $25 to $50 weekly.

Address

No Humbug,

Satisfaction guaranteed. Send stamp for particulars, which see free.

S. M. MYRICK & CO., Lynn, Mass.

Health,

Strength,

BEAUTY

and

Long Life.

HINTS TOWARD PHYSICAL PERFECTION; OR, THE PHILOSOPHY OF HUMAN BEAUTY: showing How to Acquire Beauty of Face, Form, and Expression; Health, and Vigor; hereby Long Life; and Avoid the infirmities and Deformities of Age. By D. H. JACQUES. This is undoubtedly one of the most REMARKABLE BOOKS OF THE SEASON, and one calculated to attract universal attention and awaken the interest of all classes, as it deals with subjects of vital importance to all. It is a complete and thorough exposition of the principles which govern Health, how preserved, and how consequently lost. The means of Health, Beauty, and Long Life are in our own hands. Every man and woman the secrets of Symmetry of Form, Regularity of Features, a Clear Complexion, Rosy Cheeks, and all the Graces and Attractions of Personal Beauty, and teachers man how to acquire that strength of muscle, that physical development, and that enduring vigor which constitute the highest charm of the sex, and the love of the other. Individuality of character, and how to develop it, are next to Health and Beauty the most desirable, every Mother who would develop the Minds and Bodies of his people in Harmony together, every young Woman who wishes to be prepared to fill the duties of Womanhood, and every young Man who would have that Health and Strength are the only sure basis of Permanent Success in Life, should procure a copy forthwith. Price, 50 cents. Sent by mail if desired. Address MATHEW & BAKER, Boston; or FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

To all who use Horses.—DR. TOBIAS'S VENETIAN HORSE LINIMENT, in pint bottles, price 75 cents, is warranted cheaper and superior than any article in the market, for the cure of Cuts, Galls, Lameness and all kinds. Calls, &c. &c. This is no humbug article—try a bottle; it will speak for itself. None are genuine unless signed "S. I. TOBIAS." Depot, 59 Cortlandt Street, New York.

Sold every where.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY. OFFICE 111 BROADWAY.
MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE.
Assets $850,000.

This Company continues to do an exclusive merchandise business, and has confirmed to the owners of all the profits of the year 1858, a dividend of Forty-three per Cent.—Six per Cent. interest on the outstanding scrip—and has redeemed the Certificates of the year 1854.

ALFRED EDWARDS, President.
WILLIAM LECONTEY, Vice President.
BENJAMIN A. OGDENSBURGH, Secretary.

To Teachers.

My Correspondents are requested to address me, hereafter, at 329 "CUBA AT HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin New York City." School Catalogues and Circulars, Names and Post-Office Address of Schools, Educational Papers, &c., are solicited. MARCUS WILLSON.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

To Be Published in New York.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 Pages and
1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

Now Ready for Delivery.

Carefully Revised and Corrected.

The prospectus of this work, issued by the Author more than four years, during which he traveled nearly five thousand miles, in order to visit the prominent scenes of the Revolution, gather up local traditions, and secure records and histories.

The prime object of the Author was to reproduce the history of the American Revolution in such an attractive manner as to entice the youth of his country to read the subject, and thereby become familiar with the founders of our Republic and the value of their labors. The manner in which he has executed his task, and the success that has attended it, are the general verdict of the discriminative of more mature years.

The illustrations, on nearly every page, are from the biographical sketch of every man distinguished in the history of the Revolution.

A copious Analytical Index is given at the close of the second Volume, including a complete Chronological Table. This is, in itself, a complete synopsis of the History of the Revolution, and of the Political Condition of the United States, and will be found exceedingly useful for reference.

The work contains all the essential facts of the early history of the republic, which are to be found only in a great variety of others often inaccessible to the general reader, and in many instances entirely lost. Besides the interest in the work for future generations, it is especially rich in scattered over our broad land.

Upward of THIRTY THOUSAND DOLLARS were expended in the preparation of this work. The exquisite engravings have been executed by artists employed under the Author, from his own drawings, required the most careful study and labor. To this end the Author and Publishers have been directed, and they take great pleasure in presenting to the world the most beautiful typography ever issued from the American press.

The Author and Publishers have received complimentary letters, approving the work, from Edward Everett, Jared Sparks, George Bancroft, George Gibbs, Benson J. Lossing, and many other distinguished men, fully competent to judge of its merits.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a special District will be given. Rare inducements offered. Applicants should state whether they will travel, and if so, with particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

This compound will be found a great promoter of health, when taken in the spring, to expel the foul humors which foster in the blood at that season of the year. By the timely expulsion of them many rankling disorders are nipped in the bud. Multitudes can, by the aid of this remedy, place themselves from the outbreaks of foul eruptions and virulence sores, through which the system will strive to rid itself of corruption, if not assisted to do this through the natural channels of the body in the usual manner. Expel these, and the vitiated blood whenever you find its impurities bursting through the skin in pimples, eruptions, or sores; cleanse it when you find it sluggish and clogged in the veins; cleanse it whenever it is foul, and your feelings will tell you when. Even where no particular disorder is felt, people have an indefinite sense of bad health, when the blood is foul. Keep the blood healthy, and all is well; but with the blood once tainted, this diminishes the power of resisting health. Sooner or later something must go wrong, and the great machinery of life is disordered or overthrown.

IT CURES

Scrofula and Scrofulous Complaints, Eruptions and Eruptive Diseases, Ulcers, Pimples, Blotches, Boils, Tumors, Tetter, Salt Rheum, Scald Head, and Scrofulitic Affectionous, Mercurial Disease, Dropsy, Female Complaints, Gout, Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, and Indigestion, Erysipelas, Rose or St. Anthony Fire, and indeed the whole class of complaints arising from Impurity of the Blood.

In order to secure their complete eradication from the system, the remedy should be judiciously taken according to direction as given on the bottle. Prepared by

DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass.

Price $1 per Bottle: Six Bottles for $5.

Sold by all Druggists every where.

The Base Ball Player's Pocket Companion, containing all the Rules for Base Ball, with full description of each "Nine" and "Club" in the United States. Illustrated. Flexible Cloth, 25 cents. Sent by mail if desired. Address MATHEW & BAKER, Boston; DEXTER & CO., New York; A. WINCH, Philadelphia.

WANTED—50,000 NEW SUBSCRIBERS to LIFE ILLUSTRATED—A first-class Pictorial Family Newspaper, devoted to Literature, Science, the Arts, to Entertainment, Improvement, and Progress. Published weekly at $2 a year. Specimens sent gratis.

FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 70 to 80 pages more reading than any other in the land—more reading than any other in the country.

Commencement of Volume XIX.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR JUNE.

CONTENTS:

ARTIST'S EXCURSION UP THE BATTERMAST AND OHIO RAILROAD. Illustrated by FORTE COLEMAN.

Illustrated by Twenty-five Engravings.

BONNEL. By Frank Lee Benedict.

MORGAN THE BUCCANEER.

Illustrated by Eight Engravings.

THE RED RIVER TRAIL. Concluded.

Illustrated by Twelve Engravings.

JESSIE'S COURTSHIP.

THE LAKE WITH THE BALMORAL.

WAITING. By LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.

BEMIDJI DOLLOCK.

WILLIAM PITT. By LORD MACAULAY.

A WRESTLING MATCH.

THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. THACKERAY.

Illustrated by Engravings. — MODERN WORTHIES.—A Great Lady.—Four Hand-Pieces.

CHAPTER LXXII. In which my Lady is on the Top of the Ladder.

CHAPTER LXXIII. We keep Christmas at Castlewood.

CHAPTER LXXIV. News from Canada.

CHAPTER LXXV. The Course of True Love.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

OUR FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

CONTENTS OF MASTER CHARLEY'S LOVE LIFE.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Master Charley falls in Love.—Publishes his Intentions.—Consults.—Receives Consolation.—Ditto.—The Course of True Love, etc.—Separation from Love.—Ditto.—Ditto.—Ditto.

FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Dinner Toilet.—Traveling Costume.—Dinner Cap.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Five Copies for One Year (each) . . 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together—one year, $5.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

DEVOTED TO LITERATURE AND

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIFTH VOLUME JUST COMMENCED.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 00
One Copy for Two Years 3 00
Five Copies for One Year 8 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

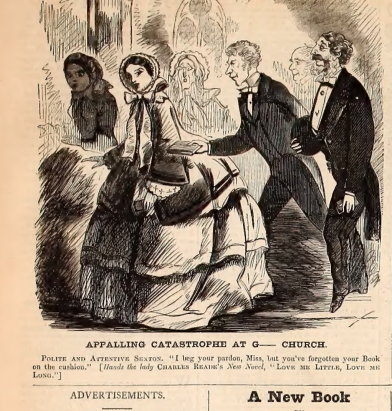
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing to have HARPER'S WEEKLY left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.



APPALLING CATASTROPHE AT G—— CHURCH.

POLITE AND ATTENTIVE SEXTON. "I beg your pardon, Miss, but you've forgotten your Book on the cushion." ("Hands the lady CHARLES READE'S New Novel, "LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG.")

CONVENIENCE OF THE NEW SLEEPING CARS.

(Could Old Grot, who takes a kerb in the Sleeping Cars, listen.)

BRAKEMAN. "Jim, do you think the Millcreek Bridge safe to-night?"

CONDUCTOR. "If Joe cracks on the steam, I guess we'll get the Engine and Tender over all right. I'm going forward!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Now Complete!

Irving's Washington,

5 Vols.

Irving's Works.

21 Vols.

Libris, with prices of various sizes and styles, supplied on application.

For the present, the 5th and any volume may be had separately.

 Send per mail, post free.*

G. P. PUTNAM,

115 Nassau Street.

MICHELET'S L'AMOUR. In Press.

M. MICHELET'S GREAT WORK,

L O V E.

Translated from the latest Paris Edition.

One Volume, 12mo, Muslin. Price $1 00.

RUDD & CARLETON, PUBLISHERS,

130 Grand Street, New York.

Sheldon & Co., New York,

Have just Published:

THE CHRISTIAN GRACES. By Rev. J. P. Thompson, D.D., of the Broadway Tabernacle. 1 vol. 18mo. Price 75 cents.

THE BIBLE IN THE LEVANT; or, the Life and Letters of the Rev. Chester N. Righter. By Rev. S. Irenæus Prime, D.D. 1 vol. 18mo. Price 75 cents.

TRUTH IS EVERYTHING. By Mrs. Thomas Gellatly, author of "Daily Thoughts." 1 vol. 18mo. Price 50 cents.

We have also nearly ready several new volumes for our Sabbath School Library, by good authors, and well illustrated.

Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of retail price.

A Book for the Drawing-Room, the Artist, or the Mechanic.

THE LONDON ART JOURNAL.

A MONTHLY RECORD (PRICE 75 CTS. OF THE Fine Arts, the Arts Industrial, and the Arts of Design and Manufactures. Every part contains at least THREE HIGHLY FINISHED STEEL ENGRAVINGS, besides numerous pictures, one of a work in SCULPTURE. The Illustrations include NOTICES OF ART EXHIBITIONS, Essays on BRITISH ARTISTS, ILLUSTRATIONS OF ANCIENT ART, a mass of valuable information on matters connected with PAINTING, DESIGNING, &c., &c., and forms a complete monthly record of the Fine Arts and the Arts Industrial.

VIRTUE, EMMIN & CO., 24 John Street, N. Y.

The Cricket Player's Pocket Companion,

Containing all the latest Rules, &c., with designs, neatly bound in Cloth, price 50 cents. Sent by mail if desired. Address MAYHEW & BAKER, Boston; DEXTER & CO., New York; A. WINCH, Phila.

Save Your Carpets

From Wear and Moth.

The attention of Housekeepers is respectfully called to Harrington's Patent Carpet Lining, a substitute for paper, straw, or any other article used under Carpets, Oil-Cloth, or Matting. It protects the Carpet against any unevenness in the floor, and is warranted to add fifty per cent. to the durability of Carpets, &c. Its cheapness brings it within the reach of all. To be had of any of the principal Carpet Stores, and at the salerooms of the NEW YORK CARPET LINING CO., 62 Warren Street, corner College Place, & J. R. HARRINGTON, Agt.

The Child's First Music Book.

For the Piano, containing Simple Lessons, with Short and Pleasing Exercises. Price 50 Cents.

Published by CLAYER DITSON & CO., Boston.

A New Book

—BY—

THE AUTHOR OF "TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST."

Ticknor & Fields, Boston,

PUBLISH THIS DAY:

TO CUBA AND BACK.

A VACATION VOYAGE

—BY—

R. H. DANA, JR.,

Author of "Two Years Before the Mast."

One handsome 16mo. vol. Cloth. 75 cents.

This new narrative fully sustains the reputation of that world-renowned volume, "Two Years Before the Mast," of which more than a hundred thousand copies have been sold.

☞ Copies will be sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of 75 cents.

A NEW FEATURE IN MUSIC.

The Musical Guest.

TWELVE PAGES FULL SIZE SHEET MUSIC WEEKLY, ONLY TEN CENTS; OR FIVE DOLLARS YEARLY.

Sacred Musical Guest.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES FULL SIZE SHEET MUSIC MONTHLY, TWENTY-FIVE CENTS, OR THREE DOLLARS PER YEAR.

Operatic Musical Guest

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES FULL SIZE SHEET MUSIC ONLY TWENTY-FIVE CENTS MONTHLY. OR THREE DOLLARS ANNUALLY.

Send money or postage stamps for a copy of each, which will be sent by return mail.

W. DELL & CO., 13 Frankfort Street.

BAILEY & CO.,

219 CHESTNUT STREET,

Philadelphia.

(Adjoining A. J. Levy & Co's.)

The largest manufacturers of

BRITISH STANDARD SILVER WARE

in the United States.

Guaranteed to be of the above quality. All Silver Ware sold by them is manufactured on the premises—Assayed by T. U. Booth, Esq., of the U. S. Mint.

DIAMONDS, PEARLS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, PLATED WARE, BRONZES, &c.

$32 50 SHILAND INST. and MUSICAL ACADEMY, Cobleskill PER QUARTER. } Montgomery Co., N. York. Students received any time. For particulars, address as above, or BY J. FOX, A.M., Assignd, N.Y., or D. G. HUBBARD, Esq., 23 Broadway.

Excelsior Fireworks.

Funston & Scofield,

General Agents,

62 John Street.

AGENTS WANTED—To travel and solicit orders for the Celebrated 425 Sewing Machines. Salary $75 per month and expenses paid. Address, with stamp,

J. M. DAGGETT & CO., Boston, Mass.

GIFTS! GIFTS! GIFTS!—D. W. EVANS & CO., No. 677 Broadway, New York—The Fifth Year—The Original Gift Book Store, established 1854.

THE UNIQUE ENTERPRISES GIFT BOOK HOUSE is the country, enabled by their long experience and increased capital, now offer greater inducements than ever before, and in the

FIFTH YEAR

of their location — New York City, will make it their endeavor to conduct their business with a liberality beyond that of any house in the country.

A new and revised catalogue now ready for gratuitous distribution, containing the largest and best classified list of Standard and Miscellaneous Publications ever issued in the United States, with unequaled inducements to clubs and agents. MAILED FREE TO ADDRESS.

The following is a schedule of Property which will be given to Purchasers of Books at the time of sale:

	WORTH FROM
Gold Watches, English Lever, Patent Lever, and Legnine.....	$30 00 to $100 00
Silver Watches, Patent Lever, Full Jewelled, Hunting Cases, open face, and Cylinder Escapements.....	12 00 to 40 00
Gold Lockets—Large size, four glasses and two glasses with spring—large and small size, with map.....	2 50 to 12 00
Cameo, Mosaic, Florentine, Painted, Lava, Goldstone, Garnet and Coral sets of Pins and Rings.....	5 00 to 12 00
Ladies' Gold Guard Chains, Neck Chains, Charlestonians.....	8 00 to 15 00
Gents' Fob and Vest Chains.....	10 00 to 30 00
Gold Pens, Engraved and Chased, Plain Gold Sleeve Buttons, and Jewsen Studs.....	2 00 to 14 00
Gold Pencils with Pens, large, medium and small size.....	3 50 to 7 50
Silver Pencils with Gold Pens, large, medium and small size, plain and and single extension cases.....	2 00 to 5 00
Gents' Heavy Signet Rings, Ladies' Gold, Chased and Plain Rings.....	1 00 to 7 50
Gents' Gold Breast Pins, Cluster, with Opal, Steel Pins, Onyx, Garnet, &c.	1 50 to 5 00
Ladies' Gold Bracelets, Plain, Cameo, Mosaic, Gold, Garnet, Chased and Plain Oval Bracelets.....	5 00 to 30 00
Silver and Gold Thimbles.....	50 to 6 00
Gents' Pen and Pocket-Knife.....	75 to 1 50
Pearl and Ivory Portemonnaies.....	50 to 2 50
Toothpicks, Watch Keys, Guard Slides	1 50 to 8 50
Gold Crosses, small, medium and large	2 00 to 7 50

Beside other Gifts, comprising a large and valuable assortment of miscellaneous articles, varying from $1 to $10.

One of the above articles will be given to the purchaser of each book at the time the book is sold.

Catalogues, Circulars, letters of inquiry, &c., to D. W. EVANS & CO., Publishers, No. 677 Broadway, N. Y. City.

DO YOU USE IT? TRY IT! TRY IT!

LYON'S KATHAIRON HAIR

USED BY ALL SOLD EVERYWHERE.

ONLY 25 CENTS, PER BOTTLE.

CURE FOR CONSTIPATION.

The Oriental Fruit Paste, or Aromatic Jelly of Figs and Senna,

Is a simple and agreeable laxative medicine, pleasant to the taste, and good at all times.

Sold by Druggists every where.

J. W. NORCROSS & CO., Wholesale Agents,

31 Fulton Street, New York.

FINKLE & LYON'S

FAMILY

SEWING MACHINES.

Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other Sewing Machine in this Market, or money refunded.

P. S.—Send for Circular.

MILTON FINKLE, }
LEWIS LYON, } 503 BROADWAY.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency, opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

PRINCE IMPERIAL

CHAMPAGNE,

FROM

DE VENOGE & CO., EPERNAY, FRANCE,

as used at the

IMPERIAL TABLES OF THE CONTINENT OF EUROPE.

A Perfectly Pure and Delicate Wine

at a moderate price and admirably adapted for family use

Sold by

H. A. KERR, No. 746 Broadway; J. S. PIERCE, No. 60 Broadway; HOWELL & CO., No. 693 Broadway; MAY & CO., No. 319 6th Av.; CORWIN & CO., corner of Broadway and 30th Street; SHAW & CROSBY, No. 19 Spring Street; and by nearly every leading Hotel or Dealer throughout the country.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT, Sole Importer,

Corner of Broadway and Broome Street.

DEBILITY AND NERVOUS INABILITY—physical and mental—in CURE without "Cordials," "Compounds," "Nostrums," or "Rings," etc. Will send a treatise, advice, etc., perfect confidence, to a friend, a former sufferer, merely superscribing Box 292 Charlestown, Mass.

THIS DELICIOUS BEVERAGE IS THE MOST DELICATE OF ITS KIND.

FIREWORKS.

Hadfield's Firework Agency.

Removed from the Old Stand, corner of Spruce and William, to

No. 24 John Street,

Between Broadway and Nassau Streets.

Public and Family Exhibitions furnished.

☞ All work warranted. ☜

GEORGE PARSONS, Agent.

Influenza.

INFLUENZA.—The great and sudden changes of our climate are fruitful causes of Pulmonary and Bronchial affections. Experience having proved that simple remedies often act speedily and certainly when taken at the early stage of disease, recourse should at once be had to "Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Lozenges, to the Influenza, Cough, or Irritation of the Throat be ever so slight, or by this precaution a more serious illness may be effectually warded off.

"Great service in moderating Hoarseness."

REV. DANIEL WISE, NEW YORK.

Sold by all Druggists.

FRED. S. COZZENS,

WINE MERCHANT,

Offers for sale Foreign Wines of the finest qualities at his own importation.

RARE OLD BRANDIES,

SPARKLING AND STILL CATAWBA, AND HIS BELLA WINES,

from N. Longworth, Cincinnati, Ohio.

72 WARREN STREET,

(Opposite Hudson River Railroad, New York.)

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR FLOWERS, FEATHERS, COIFFURES, and BRIDAL SETS, at 361 Broadway, 2 doors from Franklin Street.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 127.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TO OUR READERS.

THE proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY are happy to announce that they are making arrangements in Europe for the prompt illustration of the leading scenes of the

WAR IN EUROPE

by the first artists of the day.

Thus, in addition to the admirable serials by Charles Dickens and George W. Curtis, now in course of publication in the WEEKLY, subscribers will obtain a complete illustrated history of the war.

A perusal of HARPER'S WEEKLY will keep persons living in the country THOROUGHLY POSTED on the news of the day.

To advertisers we need only observe that advertisements in this journal, at fifty cents a line, are cheaper and more effective—because THEY MEET THE EYE OF MORE PEOPLE throughout the country, from North to South, and East to West—than advertisements in any other publication.

THE LATE ASSASSINATIONS AT TACUBAYA, IN MEXICO.

[From our own Correspondent.]

MEXICO, May, 1859.

THE most barbarous scene which has occurred on the American continent since the suspension of the heathenish rites of the idolatrous Church of the Aztecs took place on the 11th of April at Tacubaya, a village near the city of Mexico, under the immediate direction of the priests of the Romish Church of that country of the present day.

The Liberal army had been laying siege to the city of Mexico for three weeks, when the Clergy party, in possession of the city, had obtained large reinforcements, and moved to attack the Liberals. The Clergy party forces numbered 4500 men, and were led on by General Marquez, the most bloodthirsty of the chiefs who fight for the supremacy of the Church in Mexico. The army of attack, after being reviewed in the Grand Plaza of Mexico, received absolution from the Church for all their sins, and medals of the Holy Virgin to shield them from the balls of their enemies. The army left the city at seven o'clock in the morning, and at four o'clock in the afternoon reached a point above and to the east of Tacubaya, where the Liberal forces were. The forces of the Clergy party arranged their forty pieces of artillery which they had with them, and commenced firing upon Tacubaya, a village in which reside the families of most of the rich foreigners and natives of Mexico. As no notice had been given of this attack, the families of these people were much endangered, and the lives of several poor women and children were actually sacrificed. This merciless fire lasted for two hours, and was then hushed until the following morning (the 11th of April).

On the morning of the 11th, at seven o'clock, forty pieces of artillery opened upon the devoted place, and kept up an incessant fire until after ten o'clock, when the Liberals were forced to retire, owing to the treachery or ignorance of their commander-in-chief, and notwithstanding they had killed at least ten of the Clergy forces for every man they had lost.

The Clergy forces entered Tacubaya about eleven o'clock, and at once commenced a scene of pillage and massacre never before witnessed in a civilized country. Priests were seen in their robes urging their soldiers to murder in cold blood the poor wounded of the Liberals who were found in the streets. The drunken soldiers of the Clergy party required little urging. They broke into the lines of citizens, robbed them; and where they found persons at all suspected of evil or liberal in their views, they either murdered them in the most brutish manner or dragged them off to prison with bicts and cuffs. The doctors in the hospitals—a class of persons always respected even in savage warfare—were taken from their humane work and dragged to prison. This scene of riot and massacre lasted until the shades of night set in and might have been accounted for by the fanaticism of the priests and soldiers had not Generals Barrequet and Almonte informed the world of the proceedings of the day by ordering the assassination of sixteen persons among them seven priests. These poor unfortunates were led out amidst the shouts of drunken soldiers, exulted on by several persons in the dress of priests, and taken to a lonely spot on the highest part of Tacubaya, in the rear of the Molino del Rey. There they were forced to dig their clothing, and, one by one, shot in a manner which for brutality defies description. Two foreign residents—an American by the name of Albert Lamon, and an Englishman by the name of John Dowd—were the first victims. They were placed in position, and five soldiers selected out to shoot them in the back. The brutal soldiers then set upon them, threw their bayonets into their flesh, and then discharged their muskets, scattering the brains and flesh of the victims in every direction. Thus scenes brought forth the demoniac cries of the men collected, who shouted, "Long live Zuloaga!" "Death to heretics!" etc. The other victims were served in the same fiendish manner. Among those last were two priests, shot here by the name of Smith—of a family more known in the Philadelphia. Since that night many other victims have fallen, until more than one hundred are believed to have been butchered at the instigation of the priests.

STRIPPING THE DEAD.

MASSACRE AT TACUBAYA, MEXICO, ON APRIL 11, 1859.

The scene of the brutal butchery of the night of the 11th of April is now marked by a high wall. On every such wall I visited the spot, a week after the occurrence, already a pile of stones had been heaped around the place and over the spot where the murdered men. This pile of stones speaks for itself. It is a recognition by those who found a stone on the road that the spot was a murder, and not a legal execution. In time when the clergy are no more at variance in regard to the property of persons thus expressing their sentiments; but nevertheless our friend says, "A thousand stones will nearly cover the spot where the victims of priestly fury in Mexico poured out their life-blood. Peace to their souls and generous earth to them."

Verily the priests of Mexico are surpassing the savage leaders of the Sepoys in their acts of barbarous cruelty.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1859.

THE FINANCIAL CONDITION OF EUROPE.

THREE European Powers—Austria, Russia, and Sardinia—have stopped payment; that is to say, nothing looks more likely than that ours, are inseparably connected with their Governments, have ceased to redeem their notes in specie; and these notes are, by law, declared to be a legal tender. Of the remaining Powers of Europe three which have not suspended payment—to wit, Great Britain, France, and Prussia—are in some embarrassment.

The trouble in England grows out of the transfer of India from the East India Company to the Crown, and the cost of suppressing the late rebellion. A profound peace the revenues of India have always fallen short of the enormous expenditure by ten to twenty millions of dollars a year. The late war has thrown upon the home government an enormous debt, also, to meet which the British Government has been compelled to borrow $60,000,000 every year. About half of this large sum has already been shipped to India in silver, and, as might be expected, a good deal of embarrassment in financial circles has been the result.

Germany and France are suffering from the war. Austria has called for a forced loan of $100,000,000, two-thirds of which, or $66,000,000, have, we are told, been already subscribed. The loan is to be paid in small installments spread over a period of eighteen months. As the war will dismiss the produce, the capital of the French, it will be impossible to draw so large a sum as this from the people without cutting very grave inconvenience. Prussia also is apprehensive. It is true the project has led all the German bankers to contract their loans, and to withhold from the merchants the accommodation usual at this season; but the consequence is much individual trouble, which must lead to a large number of failures.

Altogether the prospect is not cheering. A dissinction must, however, be made between Great Britain and Northern Germany on the one side, and the belligerents and Russia on the other. The embarrassments of Great Britain are simply monetary. A rolling together of the situation—to which John Bull will submit with his usual fortitude—will put the whole cost of the Indian war, and there will be an end of the matter. There is nothing indefinite or problematical in the British case; so much money is to be raised, which, when raised and paid, ends the difficulty. So with Prussia. The trouble there grows out of severe but wise preventive measures. Individuals must suffer; but the country will not be injured, the Government preserves its credit, and next year trade and industry will be none the worse.

With the other Continental nations the prospect is very different. The public debt of France has been lately increasing at the rate of about $50,000,000 per annum. This vast increase of liability has not been incurred for productive works; the money has been spent in maintaining great armies, building vessels of war, fortifying Paris, and supporting an expensive Court. It is but just to say that the prosperity of the country has increased under the Empire; but still the depletion of the coffers of the bank; to prevent a rise in the price of bread, to prevent a collapse in trade concerns as the Crédit Mobilier. According to the principles which obtain in this country such a course of things as this can have but one result—national bankruptcy. Excessive borrowing and excessive extravagance must lead, sooner or later, to forced liquidation and failure. Whether or not interference by Government to prevent this necessary consummation must simply aggravate the crisis when it arrives, is a question of no consequence; there may be a Napoleonic theory of finance which our Anglo-Saxon school has not yet thought out, but, according to principles such as they are, France stands on the verge of a crisis, and this new $100,000,000 may prove the last feather in the camel's back.

The case of Russia, Austria, and Sardinia is much clearer. These nations, among which it must be premised that a knowledge of sound political economy is rare, have caused their banks to suspend specie payments, and rendered their bank notes a legal tender. The consequence of this will be that their people will not refuse obedience to the law; they will not refuse to take the currency forced upon them; but they will have two prices for every thing, according as payment is to be made in paper or in coin. Every one who has commerce will so board it. Those whose living is derived from the Government—to the soldiery, public officials, and contractors, and all those who have the interest of money invested in public securities, or on bond and mortgage, or otherwise, at a fixed rate of interest, will find that it has come largely diminished; for the sum paid them, being in the depreciated paper currency, will be much less than the coin equivalent the coin used to buy. Whatever these nations receive from abroad must be paid for in coin. When, therefore, Austria requires corn or gunpowder from England or Prussia, she must first buy the coin to pay for it. She will get for nothing to give in exchange for it but her own depreciated currency, the price will, of course, be very high. We shall, therefore, receive something of a depreciated paper currency in time of war. Two hundred dollars of paper money were frequently paid for a pair of boots in the Revolutionary War; and in France, in the days of the assignats, though it was death by the law to refuse their currency, a loaf of bread sometimes cost one hundred francs. From present appearances the Austrian currency has a fair prospect of falling until there are as few Revolutionary bills or the French assignats.

In a word, neither Austria, nor Russia, nor Piedmont can gain any benefit by suspending specie payments; for, while the measure will cause great suffering among a large class of their inhabitants, it can do no more than pay arrearments, which may, indeed, compel their own people and peaceable foreigners to take them, but can not, with all their power, force any one of the one of the other to give more for them than the public credit may render them fairly worth.

There is an idea among some of our people that the object of the war, and the suspension of specie payments in Europe, will be to draw gold from England to the Continent, and from this country to England. This presents always a color of plausibility from the present large shipments of specie to Europe. It is, however, a fallacy.

If Austria is to get gold from England and from us, she must give something for it. What has she to give? Is there any thing in the ports, which are mostly objects of luxury made in Vienna and Lombardy, are only about $4,000,000 per annum. Will she send wheat out of a market for four-fifths of these. She has tried, and tried vainly, to negotiate a loan. She is, therefore, nothing but bankrupt to pay by a Government confessedly bankrupt, and by banks which have suspended payment. How much gold over the border think can be obtained on such security as these?

Gold—let it not fret to clear its face of trade—will flow to that country where there is most production and the largest export of produce and merchandize; and from the country whence—from whatever cause—there is less exportation of produce and merchandize. And when the movement takes place, it will be a forced paper currency it will not flow at all, either out or in; people will hoard it. This will be the case in Austria and Sardinia.

L'EMPIRE CEST LA PAIX.

We do not aspire to be the general apologists of Napoleon the Third; his case must be left to the judgment of history. But we do not think our press guilty of a fallow to make their thinking in reference to this much-abused monarch to be done by the prejudiced journals of England.

Not a week passes but some American newspaper taunts Napoleon with his famous saying, "L'Empire cest la paix"—"The Empire means peace"—and triumphantly alludes to the Crimean and the present war as evidences of the hollow pretense of the sentiment.

The least reflection would convince these writers of the injustice of their taunts. What Napoleon uttered the remark in question he referred to the internal strifes of his own country, not to foreign relations. He meant to say that the establishment of the Empire put an end to the constant quarrels between the Republicans, the Monarchists, the Legitimists, the Orleanists, and the red and black and white politicians who, for sixty years, had been tearing France to pieces. Napoleon said, in effect, that, under the Empire, with himself as despot, all these clashing interests and hostile parties would be quelled, and would, perforce, live at peace with each other, leaving the people at large to follow their vocations and cook the pot-au-feu in quiet and quietness.

In this view, the saying was adroit; it appealed to the interests of the commercial and landed classes, and secured their support for his government. To have said, as the European's critics will have it that he said, that the Empire meant no fighting—that, therefore, we have cancillated nobody, and would have grievously offended that military spirit which is a prominent characteristic of the French.

GOING TO THE COUNTRY.

By the time these lines are printed people will be preparing to go to the country. It seems a very simple thing for a city family to select a country residence for the summer months, and the custom is so general that there ought to be, by this time, certain fixed rules for the governance of remaining city folk; yet still it is a fact that mistakes are made year after year by hundreds of families, and it is not, therefore, at all superfluous for the attention to be drawn to a few great principles which are worthy of consideration among those who are now looking out for country homes during the hot months.

The first point which country-goers should settle to their own satisfaction, is what their real object is in going to the country—not, though, as a general rule, the answer to this question will, in nine cases out of ten, be—the removal of health and a change of circumstances; yet there are people who go to the country without once giving a thought to health, who, in fact, seek a very different amusement—to wit, fashionable society and dissipation.

This latter class of persons need no study to determine their movements, for they have no laws and its seasons; they have only to obey. There is a season for Saratoga, and a season for Newport, and there are distinctions between the fashionable courses, during which it is not indecent to be seen at Saltaust, Long Branch, the White Mountains, or Niagara.

Those, therefore, who go to the country in quest of society need only fall into the routine of society's great current and travel blindfold.

The great mass of city folk, happily or unhappily, care for society only in a very subsidiary and remote sense; and for the right enunciation of these neither society nor the faculty have laid down strict rules.

The doctors tell us—and it is one of the few points on which they probably have a reason for their doctrine—that an occasional change of air is salutary, and with many constitutions, essential to health. The rule to not invariable, of course; but we could explain it, if necessary, by changing pure air for impure. For a man who lives in an airy house on Fifth Avenue to remove to a low and aged dwelling in one of the adjoining counties is simply mid-summer madness. What the doctors mean is, that we should exchange for the invariable foul air which we all we breathe habitually. In the city of New York, let us say for example, heaven's air is tainted, not only by the exhalations of thousands of a badly cleaned city, and altered on another, by adjacent large bodies of salt water. The land is low, and was till recently marshy in many places. New Yorkers, therefore, who remove to sea-side watering-places, improve the nourishment of their lungs by getting rid of the city smoke and dust and dirt; but they still breathe air more or less impregnated with saline particles. New Yorkers, again, who remove to inland towns, get rid of the salt air, and probably also of the evil influences of low land; but in nine cases out of ten they go to a place which is even less cleanly than this city, and where the air is as decidedly pestilential as in many of our wards. In neither case is the change thorough. To make it so, the New Yorker must go to some inland place where the land is elevated and scavengers are not needed. Niagara, the White Mountains, Saratoga, the Catskills, Schooley's Mountains, the Blue Hills, etc., etc., are examples in point. New Yorkers who spend a few weeks or months in these places obtain a thorough change of air, and are benefited to expect beneficial results.

The same may be applied to other places. Residents of Albany, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Springfield, Washington, etc., etc., will find the best change of air for health in a residence at some sea-side watering-place. Denizens of mountain sites will derive advantage from a residence on the sea-coast, or, indeed, on the level of the sea. It is waste of time for citizens of Buffalo to go to Saratoga in search of health, or for residents at Richmond, Virginia, to seek new life on the Blue Ridge; the former should go to Newport, the latter Cape May or Long Branch.

It is late in the day to argue against the fashionable watering-places. It needs no argument to prove that dissipation, drinking, and food late hours, and constant gayety will more than undo the benefits of a change of residence. But on the regular annual crusades of the rich people against Saratoga and Newport do not in the least affect the question of health-restoration, as it is not worth while to waste further words on the matter.

For those who honestly seek renewed health and energy by a residence in the country—for mothers who go to the country for their children's benefit—the following hints in the first mind is very simple. Let them find the characteristics of their native atmosphere, and choose a healthy place which presents the opposite physical features.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A READER of Harper's Weekly, in Ohio, propounds to us some questions, the decision of which we prefer to lay before the general public, to which his letter is herewith submitted:

"Editors of Harper's Weekly."

"WARREN, TRUMBULL COUNTY, OHIO, May 14th, 1859.

"Please pardon the liberty that a reader of the Weekly takes in asking your literary opinion in the subjoined matter:

"In the Autocrat of the Atlantic Monthly says, in the May number, that 'The Bible was a good book to our ancestors, and is so still in the basis of some of the region.' The Puritans went to the Old Testament for their laws; the Mormons go to it for their patriarchal institutions.'

"Other than as a literary and moral character will be found in the December number. The Rules Harper's have to say in regard to the Bible as a revelation; but we Western barbarians still believe that the Bible is a pretty good book. Ah! we have much to learn from the East, and to the Bible and a creed.

"Now what do you think of a magazine of high literary pretensions which will, under the cover of classic language and scholarship, endeavor to pollute the minds of youth as well as of the learned into Christian families? Is it safe?

"Another matter: I observed in a recent issue of Boston paper that the Atlantic is the only magazine of purely (?) literary character in America that can subsist without the assistance of the foul taste of the public by illustrating it with pure blood.

"Is this a fact?

"The same paper asserts, also, that the Atlantic is the only magazine that can boast of the 'patronage of Worcester's Dictionary,' which has superseded Webster's Dictionary in the schools of the East. The 'Boston literati' have pronounced Worcester the standard authority of the English language; and that Webster's had all blunders and gross mistakes.

"Is this a fact?

"Worcester is edited and published in Boston, and therefore, I suppose, must be the standard.

"We manufacture goods out West and Northwest. We did not know before that Worcester was the standard, but we have been assured he had spelled.

"Is all philosophy summed up in Emerson, all science in Professor Peirce; all religion in Theodore Parker; all poetry in Longfellow; all learning in Harvard College; all the brains of America in Boston, the Athens of America?

"Is this a fact?

"Yours truly,

"A VULGAR MAN OF THE WEST."

THE AMERICAN CAPTAINS' QUESTION.

We have received a letter from an American sailor, who has been absent for many years on board ship, referring to, and corroborating in every particular, the statements contained in the article in "An American Sailor," published in the Weekly. The writer, after complimenting the author of the article, proposes the question as follows:

"In former times, when sailors shipped themselves they dared not come on board a city sender than pretenses. They would not have been safe among their own shipmates, who would have punished them sufficiently without assistance from the quarter-deck. Or now the sailor, or rather the pretended sailor, does not ship; he is shipped. He is a marketable commodity belonging to and sold by the boarding-house keeper, who, in consequence of the futile attempt of the merchants to abolish the system, adopted, about two years since, to stop this disgraceful traffic, since they fully realized protecting the rain of the American service. You remember, too, how the handcuffs—not the rosiers—formed a league, and swore that their next should not go without advance; and how these commissaries carried the day against the whole shipping interest of the United States! They then accomplished the abolition of sailors, which might but for them have been averted. They called the sixty-four dozen which they might escape from the degradation into which they seem to have fallen without remedy. They have rendered bail and trial all identical clerks in their behalf. It is no sense for the Seamen's Friend Society to be subject to their well-meaning constituents of the "encouraging state of things" which the existing commissaries—who are most of them long as the sailor is the property, the subject of their handlers. Boston, Salem, Portland, Bath, Newport, and other seaports, have been unanimous in their testimony to the sailor's being as he is and free. The advocates of the sailor's rights have had to do with his well-wishers, his sowers, his captain, and his officers, and with no one else. Since this has been the case, the sailor has been living in unendeavoring, in order to get into the hands of the commissaries, to elicit the sympathy of the public. Now that should go to the "brutal shipowners"—go not to the newspapers "brutal shipowners"—go not to the "abused sailor," but are divided between landlords and a Tombs lawyer? Justice, then, is not to be meted out only from unsworn conviction, but from my own personal knowledge and experience, and I am determined to meet of the scene of "cruelty" which are imposed upon a credulous public.

"The state of things now existing has been long perceived by ourselves and others," but we have not been pointed out. It is not yet too late to apply it. Abolish at once and forever, one of the commissaryships, and reinstate, the payment of ADVANCE WAGES.

The landlords's occupation will be gone, and his interest with it.

"The sailor will rise from his degradation; his eyes will be opened to his true interests; his ingrovelent habits will forsake him; he will become what he is a free man working for himself, and will therefore be more careful to keep what he earns. He will then be able to go into a not his enemy; and the public will no longer be obliged to sleep with a revolver under his pillow! A better understanding will then exist between the owners of the ship, and newspapers will no longer term with the stereotyped headings, 'Cruelty on Shipboard.'"

—HUNDLEY.

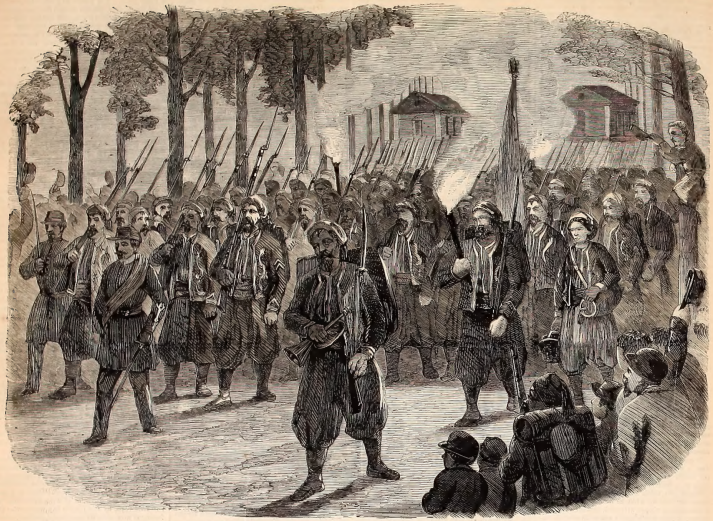
THE LOUNGER.

EDITORIAL VIRTUE

EDITORS of daily and weekly papers are a class freely abused—and with reason. Every body has a word to say, and who are subject to the most unrelenting judgment. Many of these strictures are just enough, but few know their virtues. Fewer still, probably, suspect that one of their chief virtues is silence.

It seems absurd to say so—of course it does. That a man whom business calls to the public pen should either keep silence or be praised for being so, is ludicrous. But it may properly be.

For, if you think about it, the editorial office is blessed for writing with he knows that hundreds of thousands of people will read it. It is not so many



ZOUAVES LEAVING VERSAILLES BY TORCH-LIGHT FOR THE SEAT OF WAR.

THE FRENCH ARMY IN NORTHERN ITALY.

THE accompanying illustrations will enable our readers to form, in their mind's eye, some truthful picture of the troops of whose evolutions in the field they are just now hearing so much.

The French army is said to consist of about 580,000 men, to wit: 360,000 infantry of the line, 20,000 chasseurs, 9200 Zouaves, 14,000 African infantry, 85,000 cavalry, 60,000 artillery, 7500 engineers, and the famous new Imperial Guard, 35,000 men.

Of this army the élite is the Guard which the present Emperor has taken so much pains in forming. It is a little army in itself, having its own infantry, cavalry of all arms, artillery, and engineers; and is composed of the best men from the line. All the soldiers of the guards are conspicuous for size and strength; nearly all have won medals. When the guard was first formed there was much jealousy of the "pet corps" among the troops of the line; but the gallant behavior of the guards before Sebastopol—whither they were sent to efface the stigma of "carpet knights" given them by their less favored comrades—restored them to favor. They are probably the finest body of troops in the world.

ARRIVAL OF FRENCH TROOPS IN PIEDMONT.—[FROM A SKETCH BY FRANK VIZETELLY.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

A SCHOOL-BOY NO LONGER.

CHAPTER XXVI.

SUNSHINE.

The lad seated himself by the window Scratch—scratch—scratch. The sun sparkled in the river. The sails, after yesterday's rain, were loosened to dry, and were white as if it had rained milk upon them instead of water. Every thing looked cheerful and bright from Lawrence Newt's window. The lad saw with delight how much sunshine there was in the office.

"I don't believe it would hurt my health to work here," thought he.

Mr. Lawrence Newt rang a little bell. Venables entered quietly.

"Most ready out there?" asked Mr. Newt.

"Most ready, Sir."

Brisk's the word this morning, you know. Please to copy these letters."

Venables said nothing, took the letters, and went out.

"Now, young man," said the merchant, "tell me what you want."

The lad's heart turned toward him like a fallow-field to the May sun.

"My father's been unfortunate, Sir, and I want to do something for myself. He advised me to come to you."

"Why?"

"Because he said you would give me good advice if you couldn't give me employment."

"Well, Sir, you seem a strong, likely lad. Have you ever been in a store?"

"No, Sir. I left school last week."

Mr. Newt looked out of the window.

"Your father's been unfortunate?"

"Yes, Sir."

"How's that? Has he told a lie, or lost his eyes, or his health, or has his daughter married a drunkard?" asked Mr. Lawrence Newt, looking at the lad with a kindly humor in his eyes.

"Oh no, Sir," replied the boy, surprised. "He's lost his money."

"Oh ho! his money! And it is the loss of money which you especially called 'unfortunate.' Now, my boy, think a moment. Is there any thing belonging to your father which he could so well spare? Has he any superfluous boy or girl? any useless arm or leg? any unnecessary good temper or honesty? any taste for books, or pictures, or the country that he would part with? Is there any thing which he owns that it would not be a greater misfortune to him to lose than his money? Honor bright, my boy. If you think there is, say so!"

The youth smiled.

"Worse things could happen to us than poverty," said he.

Mr. Lawrence Newt interrupted him by remarks which were lighted by his beaming face.

"Worse things than poverty! Why, my dear young man, what kind of sentiments are those for a mercantile aspirant? Do you not know that it is written in the largest efforts upon the lives of all Americans, 'Resist poverty, and it will flee from you?' If you do not begin by considering poverty the root of all evil, when on earth do you expect to end? Cease to be poor, learn to be rich. I'm afraid you don't read the good book. Do your father look behind?—the boy nodded—" and a whole body, a good temper, an affectionate family, genuine and refined tastes, pleasant relations with others, a warm heart, a clear conscience"—the boy nodded with an increasing enthusiasm of assent —"and yet you call him unfortunate—ruined! Why, look here, my son; there's an old apple-woman at the corner of Burling Slip, where I stop every day and buy apples; she's sixty years old, and through thick and thin, under a dripping wreck of an umbrella when it rains, under the sky when it shines—warming herself by a foot-stove in winter, by the sun in summer—there the old creature sits. She has an old, sick, querulous husband at home, who tries to beat her. Her daughters are all out at service —not to keep, in kind families—or some are dull, ignorant ditchers; her home is solitary and forlorn; she can not read much, nor does she want to; she is coughing her life away, and succeeds in selling apples enough to pay her rent and buy food for her and her old husband. She told me yesterday that she was a most fortunate woman. What does the word mean? I give it up."

The lad looked around the spacious office, on every table and desk and chair of which was written Prosperity as plainly as the name of Lawrence Newt upon the little tin sign by the door. Except for the singular magnificence of the merchant's presence, which dissipated each suggestion as rapidly as it arose, the youth would have said aloud what was in his heart:

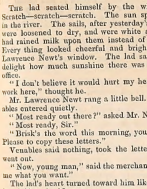
"How easy 'tis for a rich man to smile at poverty!"

The man watched the boy, and knew perfectly well what was thinking. As the eyes of the younger involuntarily glanced about the office and presently returned to the merchant, they found the mercantile sage so keenly alert that they seemed to be more windows through which his soul was looking. But the boy's confidence melted imperceptibly into the usual sweetness as Lawrence Newt said:

"You think I can talk prettily about misfortune because I know nothing about it. You make a great mistake. No man, even in jest, can talk well of what he doesn't understand. So don't misunderstand me. I am rich, but I am not fortunate."

He said it in the same tone as before, without any melodrama.

"If you wanted a rose and got only a butter-



THE GOSPEL OF MAMMON.

cup, should you think yourself fortunate?" asked Mr. Newt.

"Why, yes, Sir. A man can't expect to have every thing precisely as he wants it," replied the boy.

"My young friend, you are of opinion that a half loaf is better than no bread. True—so am I. But never make the mistake of supposing a half to be the whole. Content is a good thing. When the man sent for cake, and said, 'John, if you can't get cake, get candy,' he did wisely. But smelts are not cake for all that. What's your name?" asked Mr. Newt, abruptly.

"Gabriel Bennet," replied the boy.

"Bennet—Bennet what Bennet?"

"I don't know, Sir."

Lawrence Newt was apparently satisfied with this answer. He only said:

"Well, my son, you do wisely to say at once you don't know, instead of going back to somebody a few centuries ago, of whose father you have to make the same answer. The Newts, however, you must be aware, are a very old family." The merchant smiled. "They came into England with Sweet Bess of Normandy, but who they came into Normandy with I don't know. Do you?"

Gabriel laughed, with a pleasant feeling of confidence in her companion.

"Have you been at school in the city?" asked the merchant.

Gabriel told him that he had been at Mr. Gray's.

"Oh ho! then you know my nephew Abel?"

"Yes, Sir," replied Gabriel, coloring.

"Smart boy is Abel," said Mr. Newt.

Gabriel made no reply.

"Do you like Abel?"

Gabriel paused a moment, then said:

"No, Sir."

The merchant looked at the boy for a few moments.

"Who did you like at school?"

"Oh, I liked Jem Greenvich and Little Malacca best," replied Gabriel, as if the whole world that he knew were with those names.

At the mention of the latter Lawrence Newt changed color.

"Gabriel, I take you into my office."

He called Mr. Tray.

"Thomas Tray, this is the youngest clerk, Gabriel Bennet. Gabriel, this is the head of the outer office, Mr. Thomas Tray. Thomas, ask Venables to step this way."

That young man appeared immediately.

"Mr. Venables, you are promoted. You have seven hundred dollars a year, and are no longer youngest clerk. Gabriel Bennet, this is Erwin Venables, the fiends. Now go to work."

There was a general bowing, and Thomas Tray and the two young men retired.

At the same moment a gentleman entered the office in great haste.

"Is Mr. Newt in?"

"In the inner room, Sir."

He knocked and went in.

"Good - morning, Mr. Slocum."

"Good - morning, Mr. Newt. I want to consult you, Sir."

Mr. Mark Slocum had been a clerk of Mr. Newt's a few years. All Mr. Newt's clerks, when they were in business for themselves, regarded Mr. Newt as a kind of father and adviser. Some men keep that relation with all with whom they deal, other men do not.

"Well, Mr. Slocum, what is it to-day?"

"Why, Sir, I suspected last week that there was very little pepper in market. The Argo and the Fly, you remember, were both lost."

"Yes," said Lawrence Newt, leaning back and playing with his quills.

"Rodd & Totham, who were the heaviest holders, have sold all they had long ago."

"Yes."

"I find there have been very few foolish cargoes during the year."

"Yes."

"There's none in Boston."

"So I hear."

"None in Philadelphia."

"Yes."

"None any where."

"Yes."

"There can't be any for a long time."

"Ah?"

"Wouldn't it be a splendid speculation?"

"Capital."

Mr. Slocum rose, in an excited manner.

"I'm glad you think so. You quite agree with my view of the case?"

"Perfectly, Sir."

"Then the Lapwing shall be off as soon as possible. I'll lose no time. Good - morning, Sir."

He was hurrying out, but Lawrence Newt, almost quietly leaning back and playing with his quill, called to him as he reached the door.

"Mr. Slocum!"

The merchant paused and turned, still holding the handle. Mr. Newt continued,

"I am entirely of your opinion."

Mr. Slocum smiled.

"In fact," said Mr. Newt, "I was so persuaded, three months ago, of the justice of the view you mention that I took measures, and have now three ship-loads of pepper on their way. I thought of it a little sooner than you—that's all. So you must take my three ships into your account."

Mr. Slocum was confounded. The disappointment was sudden and sharp. But after a moment's chagrin he felt the kindness of his old master in not allowing him to proceed in the dark.

"By George! Mr. Newt," said he, "you're always ahead of me. And you deserve to be," added he, returning and shaking Lawrence Newt's hand. "Good-morning."

He said it quietly, and went calmly out. Mr. Newt opened a letter which had been brought in by Venables.

CAUGHT IN HIS OWN TRAP.

"DEAR SIR,—I trust you will pardon this intrusion. It is a long time since I have had the honor of writing to you, but I thought you would wish to know that Miss Wayne will be in New York, for the first time, within a day or two after you receive this letter. She is with her aunt, Mrs. Dinks, who will stay at Dunker's.

"Respectfully yours,

"JANE SIMCOE."

Lawrence Newt's hend drooped as he sat. Presently he arose and walked up and down the office.

Meanwhile Gabriel was installed. That ceremony consisted of offering him a high stool with a leathern seat. Mr. Tray remarked that he should have a drawer in the high desk, on both sides of which the clerks were seated. The installation was completed by Mr. Tray's formally introducing the new-comer to the duties of clerks.

The scratching began again. Our friend Gabriel looked curiously upon the work in which he was now to share. The young men had no words for his ear. Mr. Newt was engaged within. The boy had a vague feeling that he must shift for himself—that every body was busy—that play in the life had ended and work begun. The thought tasted to him much more like sweets than like cake. And while he was timidly left by Thomas Tray to familiarize himself with the entire novelty of the situation his mind flashed back to Delahid with an aching longing, and the boy would willingly have put his face in his hands and wept. But he sat quietly looking at his companions—until Mr. Tray said,

"Gabriel, I want you to copy this invoice."

And Gabriel was a school-boy no longer.

CHAPTER XXVII.

FRIENDSHIP.

ABEL NEWT believed in his lucky star. He had managed Uncle Savory—couldn't he manage the world?

"My son," said Mr. Boniface Newt, "you are now about to begin the world." Begin? thought Abel. "You are now coming into my house as a merchant. In this world we must do the best we can. It is a great pity that men are not considerate, and all that. But they are not. They are selfish. You must take them as they are, Abel. You, my son, think they are all honest and good."—Do I? spoke son, in his soul.—"It is this bitter task of experience to undeceive youth from its romantic dreams. As a rule, Abel, men are rascals. That is to say, they pursue their own interests. How old? True; how old? Where was I? Oh! men are rascals. With some exceptions—but you must go by the rule. Life is a scrub-race—melancholy, Abel, but true. I talk plainly to you, but I do it for your good. If we were all angels, things would be different. If this were the Millennium, every thing would doubtless be agreeable to every body. But it is not—how very sad! True, how very sad! Where was I? Oh! it's all devil role de hindmost. And because your neighbors are dishonest, why should you starve? Is you see, Abel?"

It was in Mr. Boniface Newt's counting-room that he preached this gospel. A boy entered and announced that Mr. Hadley was outside looking at some cases of dry goods that day received.

"Now, Abel," said his father, "I'll return in a moment."

He stepped out, smiling and rubbing his hands. Mr. Hadley was stooping over a case. Blackston, Hadley & Merriman's were safer purchasers in the world. The countenance of Boniface Next beamed upon the customer as if he saw good notes or six months in bad from every part of his person.

"Good-morning, Mr. Hadley. Charming morning; fine—beautiful day, Sir. What's the word this morning, Sir?"

"Nothing, nothing," returned the customer. "Pretty print that. Just what I've been looking for" (renewed rubbing of hands on the part of a certain person)—"very pretty. If it's the right width, it's just the thing. You see, sir, that's about seven-eighths." He shook his head negatively. "No, not wide enough. If that print were a yard wide, I should take all you have."

"Oh, that's a yard," replied Mr. Next; "certainly, a full yard." He looked around inquiringly, as if for a yard-stick.

"Where is the yard-stick?" asked Mr. Hadley.

"Timothy" said Mr. Next to the boy, with a peculiar look (and I very much doubt what look) How and, how very sad! Where was I? oh, even a half wink).

The disappeared and reappeared with a yard-stick, while Mr. Next's face underwent a series of expressions of subdued anger and disgust.

"Now, then," said Mr. Hadley, laying the yard-stick upon the calicoes; "yes, as I thought, seven-eighths; too narrow—sorry."

There were many cases of these goods in the loft. Boniface Next groaned in soul. The unconscious small boy, who had brought the yard-stick, replied:

"Mr. Next," said Hadley, stopping at another case, "that's very handsome."

"Very, very, and that is the last case."

"You have no other cases?"

"No."

"Oh! well, send it round at once; for I am sure—"

"Mr. Next," said the unconscious boy, smiling with the satisfaction of one who has found a correct answer, "you are mistaken, Sir. There are a dozen more cases just like that up stairs."

"All that I don't care about it," said Mr. Hadley, passing on. The head of the large commission-house of Boniface Next & Co. looked upon the point of bursting with vexation.

"Good-morning, Mr. Next; sorry that I see nothing further about Mr. Hadley," and he went out.

Mr. Next turned to the unconscious boy.

"What do you mean, Sir, by saying and doing such things?" asked he, sharply.

"What things, Sir?" unconsciously the appellee bore.

"Why, getting the yard-stick when I winked to you not to find it, and telling of other cases when I said that one was the last."

"Why, Sir, because it wasn't the last," said the boy.

"For business purposes it was the last, Sir," replied Mr. Next. "You don't know the first principles of business; and I really do not think you will ever be a business man. Learn to hold your tongue, or you will never leave your situation, Sir."

Mr. Boniface Next, ruffled and red, went into his office, where he found Abel reading the newspaper and smoking a cigar. The calicos outside had been quite in the undercity of Next, Abel. The young man was dressed extremely well. He had returned the few weeks of his vacation to the city by visits to Frost the tailor in Maiden Lane, and had sent to his measure to Tore for Paris bootmaking artists that turned out the prettiest figures that decorated the Broadway of those days. Mr. Abel Next, to his own eyes, had the air of a man of superb leisure; and as he sat reading the paper with one leg thrown over the arm of the office-chair and the smoke languidly curling from his lips, Mr. Next felt profoundly, but unspeakably annoyed. He had some slight prescience of a future of indebtedness for the said Abel to the house of Next.

As his father entered Mr. Abel dropped his paper, and, his hand still holding the newspaper and without changing the cigar, looked through the cloud of smoke he blew.

"Father, you were imparting your philosophy of life."

The older gentleman, somewhat discomposed, answered,

"Yes, I was saying what a pity it is that men are such dunces as they often are, because they rarely look one to be so, too. But what can you do? It all very fine to talk, but we've got to live. I guess I shall not be much out of my way into the street and say, 'I gave ten cents a yard for that, but now you may have some for five.' No, it's other men's business to find that out if they can. It's a great game, business is, and the smartest chap wins. Every day you see men are going to get the largest price we can. People are gnawing and tearing and eating all the round. It's give and take. I am not here to look out for other men. Every man must care for myself—for nobody else will. It's very easy, I know; it's very sad, indeed. It's absolutely melancholy. Abel," said Next, with a sigh, "I was saying that a lie well stuck to is better than the truth wavering. It's perfectly absurd, my son, from some points of view—Christianity, for instance. But what on earth are you going to do? The only hope people are the rich people, for they don't have this eternal bother how to make money. Don't misunderstand me, my son; I do not say that you must always tell stories. Heaven forbid! But a man is not bound always to tell the whole truth. The very law itself says that no man need give evidence against himself. Besides, business is no more than every other calling. Do you suppose a lawyer never defends a man whom he knows to be guilty? He says he does it for the credit of the jury—a trial. Fiddle-de-dee! He does no such thing. He doesn't mean to prosecute in such a strain every nerve to get the man off. Pish! why, a lawyer is hired to take the side of a company or a corporation in every quarrel. He's paid by the year or by the case. He stops to consider whether his company is right, doesn't he? he works for justice, not for victory? Oh, yes! stuff. He works for fees. What's the consequence of a trial? Just this—the examination the lawyer finds the retaining party to be in the right, he will undertake the case? Fiddle! no! but that he will undertake the case anyhow and fight it through. So'tis all round. It's a trade, and I'll not be out of it."

Mr. Boniface Next discoursed warmly.—Mr. Abel Next listened with contempt and ease. He whiffed his cigar, and leaned his head on one side as he hearkened to the wisdom of experience.

"There's one other way," said the young gentleman, calmly.

"What's that?"

"To marry a rich girl," said Abel, "provided always the object be in love with her."

"Yes," replied Mr. Next; "but you know there's not a great many girls of that kind. How many are there rich independent of their parents? The article is scarce, and it is always in the market. Besides, marrying money is a man doesn't fall in love with one of them; suppose, in fact, that no one is not an attorney once, said Mr. Next with a candor that did him credit.

"Ah yes; to be sure, in that case," replied his son thoughtfully, "that is true."

"Yes—in that case—" said Mr. Next.

"Then," said Abel, "you would have me sell myself said to the sheep?' 'I'm not fond of wool, but I'm so fond of mutton!'"

Mr. Boniface Next smiled. He was proud of his son. He thought him a very ready, smart young man. He thought him, indeed, with much less uncertain than when he had caught sight of him lolling in his office-chair, smoking.

"I don't trust myself very much," answered he dishonesty. He only wanted to be rich to get duplicity and practising on the public. He subscribed largely to the American Tract Society, and paid a poor, consumptive clergyman ten dollars for every sermon he had written entitled "Honesty is the best Policy"—a copy of which was laid in every pew of every church in the city of New York, and caused the name of Boniface Next to be mentioned with applause at the next meeting of the American Tract Society while the manual sermon, called "Christianity Circumscribed," which was rejected before the Society for the relief of decayed clergymen's rectors, by Rev. Dr. Maundy, alluded glowingly to Boniface Next and his benefactions, but without specification of the sum, which would have been unseemly for the pulpit.

Boniface Next was fond of a performance which he called philosophizing. But what some men are accustomed to call a little philosophy is simply their practice put into words.

CHAPTER XXVII.

OF LOVE AND LOVERS.

MR. ABEL NEXT was not a philosopher; he was a man of action.

He had his mother that he could not accompany her to the Springs, because he must prepare himself to enter the counting-room of his father. But the evening of Mrs. Next's departure Abel Next had a little party for Mrs. Plumer, of New Orleans, for Miss Grace, of Newport, for Miss Bertha Abel, and who was just about leaving school, left school and entered society, to Miss Gertrude Next, to Miss Fanny Plumer, to Miss Feuille and making her courtesy at Mrs. Boniface Next's.

Madame de Feuille's was a "finishing" school. An extreme polish was given to young ladies by Madame de Feuille. By her assistance system they were fitted to be wives of men of even the largest fortunes. Her house was one of the pupils who would not have been equal to the addresses of a millionaire. It is the profound conviction of all who were familiar with this seminary that the pupils would not have shrunk from matrimonial overtures with a prince of any country who confined himself to Christian wedlock with one wife, or even the son of an English duke—except was that a prince and an liberal the education!

It is well understood that in the previous year Miss Dolly Whetwood Tully, one of Madame de Feuille's successes, was introduced at the Tuileries by her mother to the Empress. Whetwood Whetwood Tully, and was very much admired in the quadrille of the Princess Mathilde, where she was called "La belle Americaine," being the only young American woman of the party who was not a Spanish gentlemen—young noblemen, even, were beneath her notice. Whetwood Whetwood Tully, profoundly did it cry aloud within her when she saw the magnificent bouquet—sent by Marquis of Crockford, Viscount Tattersalls, the Earl of Ascot, and young Lord Tantivy—moving with Mrs. Whetwood Tully in the chaise, or bowing to Miss Tully in the Park, or glancing toward Miss Tully at the opera. Mrs. Whetwood Tully was pained by the universal obsequiousness of the fewer orders which she witnessed in England, and was very thankful that our institutions prevented any such thing at home.

In fact she said as much out loud as she said so to Lady Bump—Lady Benjamin Bump, Baroness Bump of Bump—when they sat down at luncheon with her Ladyship; and Lady Bump said (at least Mrs. Whetwood Tully said she said so). "Law, now! you Americans are you black or red, or a little of each?" Baroness Bump, in Bump, in Bump, had been an actress in her youth, and her forte was the drama, not geography.

"Oh Mitheth Tully!" said young Lord Collow, in the midst of a group at a party which was mentioned in the Post with the names of the guests, including Mrs. Whetwood Whetwood Tully and Miss Whetwood Tully, and of which young Collow was sent home by Mrs. T., that her friends might know of her residence in Paradise—"Oh Mitheth Tully! are you reading?" Are you really going to beweave London of Miss Tully? Cwuel, cwuel woman!"

Mrs. Tully and Miss Tully and that she felt the immense responsibility of that moment. But she was a lady, and when Bruce one of the chief of family, so she rallied instantly and replied, beaming upon the circle of English youths-very young ones—with vivacity:

"Oh yes, my Lord, we are going, but only for a little while. We shall meet friends in Paris, and return, I hope, before the end of the season. But I must really learn more with regard? I thought here been Tudor Tudor, Marquis of Crockford, or Stuart Plantagenet, Viscount Tattersalls, who stood on the Duke's left side, and smiled as the words of Mrs. Whetwood Whetwood Tully died upon her lips.

However much he might be, none Miss Tully —still Miss Tully—and Miss Grace Plumer and Miss Mirabeau Bertha Abel, Miss Fanny Plumer and Mrs. Osborne Moultrie, a lovely woman from Georgia, and her son Virgil, a boy of delightful promise, with fair hair and eyes; Dr. and Mrs. Leah, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Maundy, upon the express understanding that there was to be no dancing, and a pleasant number of other agreeable people. They were all gathered at Mrs. Boniface Next's drawing-room now-necked muslin and strawberries and ice-cream.

The new beauty of the season of the gentle sex soon discovered the dark, rich face of Abel Next, who moved among the groups with the ease and air of an accomplished gentleman of society, smiling brightly upon his friends, bowing gravely to his mother's guests whom he did not personally know.

"Who is that?" asked Mrs. Tully of Miss Fanny Plumer.

"That is my brother Abel," replied Miss Fanny.

"Your brother Abel? how charming! How very like he is to Viscount Tattersalls. You've not been in England, I believe, Miss Next?" Fanny looked negatively.

"Ah! then you have never seen Lord Tattersalls. He is a very superior young man. We were very intimate with him indeed. Dolly, dear?"

"Yes, ma."

"Do remember our particular friend Lord Viscount Tattersalls?"

"Was he a bishop?" asked Miss Fanny Next.

"Law! no, my dear. He was a—he was exactly, he was a Viscount, you know—a Viscount."

"Oh! a Viscount?"

"Yes, a Viscount."

"Ah! a Viscount."

"Well, Dolly dear, do you see how much Mr. Abel Next resembles Lord Tattersalls?"

"Yes, ma."

"It's very striking, isn't it?"

"Yes, ma."

"Now I look, I think he is even more like the Marquis of Crockford. Don't you think so?"

"Yes, ma."

"Very like indeed."

"Yes, ma."

"Dolly, dear, don't you think his nose is like the Duke of Ascot's?" You remember the Wellington nose, my child?"

"Yes, ma."

"Or is it Lord Brougham's that I mean?"

"Yes, ma."

"Which, dear?"

"May I present my brother Abel, Miss Tully?" said Fanny Next resolutely.

"Yes, I'm sure," said Miss Tully.

Fanny Next turned just as a song began in the other room, out of which opened the conservatory.

"Last May a brave wave ran down the long glen,
And all my love to did dance and sing;
I said there was nothing I hated like men—
How they fib, how they flatter, how they lie,
The deuce gan what to believe me."

The voice was that of the merry song rang out. The voice of the singer was arch, and her eye flashed slyly on Abel Next as she finished the first verse of a popular ballad by member.

Abel leaned upon the piano, with his eyes fixed upon the singer.

Abel was fully conscious of the surprise he had betrayed to sister Fanny when she spoke suddenly of Mrs. Alfred Dinks. It was necessary to remove any suspicion that she might entertain, in consequence. People of a certain kind prefer to pursue their own privately. The end may be good enough in itself—may be one which it is perfectly proper every body should know—but the purveyor chooses secrecy. Secrecy is in his nature. Do we quarrel with moles for burrowing, and slip silently under their rocks and stumps? If Mr. Abel Next had intentions in which Miss Hope Wayne was interested, was there any reason why Miss Fanny Next should mingle in the tête-a-tête. It would be a tête-a-tête no longer. It would be a crowd.

As Miss Plumer finished the song Abel and his sister coming toward him through the little crowd, although his eyes seemed to be contemplated fixed upon the singer.

"How beautiful!" said he, ardently, in a low voice, looking her directly in the eyes.

"Yes, it is a pretty song," said she.

"Oh! you mean the song?" said Abel.

The singer blushed, and took up a bunch of roses that lay on the piano, and left the piano and began to play with them.

"How very sweet it is!" said she.

"Yes," said Abel. "Let us take a turn in the conservatory. It is both darker and cooler —and the air is sweeter. Miss Grace, I fight not warmth enough to our conversation."

"Dear me, Abel," said the Arctic sone in the conservatory," said Miss Grace Plumer, as she rose from the piano. (Mrs. Next had written Abel she was fourteen.) How shall we, there are sometimes! She was seventeen in May.

"No, no," said Abel, "we shall find the Equator in that conservatory."

"I never look out for storms," replied Miss Plumer, laughing.

Abel offered his arm, and the young couple moved through the humming room. The ices were even sweet down. The voice of the youth was heard.

He felt a touch, and turned. He knew very well who it was. It was Miss Fanny.

"Abel, I want to present you to Miss Whetwood Tully."

Abel knew Fanny, I can not turn from roses to violets. Miss Tully, I am sure, is charming, but I can not leave you all by yourself, I should," said he, smiling and looking at Miss Plumer, "but, you see, all my heart is going with you."

Grace Plumer blushed again. He was certainly a charming young man.

Fanny Next, with lips parted, looked at him a moment and shook her head gently. Abel was very well aware that she was left to herself in the conservatory presently, whither he and his companion had gone. But Fanny was evidently minuted with a few candles—but was left pro-perly dim.

"I've lovely it here! Oh! how fond I am of flowers!" said Miss Plumer, with the unconsciousness of ingenuity, and a fairy young that Abel was obliged to hold her arm nose closely.

"Are you fond of flowers, Mr. Next?"

"Yes; but I prefer them living."

"Listen to that young man's poetic idea! But what do you mean?" asked Grace Plumer, hanging her head.

Abel and somebody in the cane sofa under the great orange-tree, almost hidden in the shade. Dear Fanny, thought he.

When Abel Next began Abel, in his lowest, sweetest voice; but the conservator was so still that the words could have been easily heard by any one sitting upon the sofa.

Some one sitting there—some one did hear. Abel smiled as that hand bent more closely to his companion. They came nearer. Some one was very near indeed. Abel raised his eyes smilingly to meet Fanny's. Somebody else started then; for under the great orange-tree, on the cane sofa, sat Lorence Next and Hope Wayne.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE VIRGINIA ELECTION.

The returns of the Virginia election are yet very incomplete, and we have nothing of any value to debrie them as to the result. The latest dispatch from Richmond announces that the returns are wonderfully, but indicate the election of Mr. Letcher by a very moderate majority.

THE DEAD LOCK IN UTAH.

We have received news from Utah to the 26th April. At the final adjournment of the United States Court in Utah Territory, Judge Eckels stated that as the seats of the Court records to the effect that the interference of the military with the civil authority of the Territory, the administration of justice had been rendered impossible, and expressed the opinion that his party, since in session, had all performed their duties faithfully. The officers who stated to be about equal to the arrivals. Five hundred of whom remain encamped in Cache valley, the locality of whom confirm the accounts of suffering on the Plains.

THE GOLD REGIONS OF NEVADA TERRITORY.

The news from British Columbia is to April 28. The steamer Commodore had arrived from Victoria, bringing gold dust to the amount of $250,000 had been made up of the Fraser River, and the remainder from the mines in the Canal country, doing well. Some fifteen hundred miners were on the Fraser, and provisions could be had enormously high. Governor Douglas had replied favorably to the petition for the establishment of a mint at Victoria, and would bring the matter before Majesty's Government the expediency of the measure.

TESTIMONIAL TO PAUL MORPHY.

The presentation to Paul Morphy of the New York Chess Club to Paul Morphy took place last week in the large hall of the University. The emblems and ornaments were numerous and brilliant, the room being crowded to its very part. Professor Anthon was President of the Club, Professor Lee presided with a few words of introduction, which were followed, presenting the chessboard and men to Mr. Morphy. Mr. M. made a brief and exceedingly appropriate response.

PERSONAL.

At the New Jersey Episcopal Convention, held at Burlington, on 27th May, Rev. Dr. Odenheimer was elected Bishop, in room of the late Bishop Doane.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR.

THE AFFAIR AT FRASSINETTO.

THERE has been no battle yet.

The operations of the Austrians near Frassinetto are officially described by the Sardinians as follows: "After some insignificant encounters of cavalry during the first days of the war, and in which our troops retarded the enemy's march, we have now to mention facts of greater importance. On the 20th of May, between seven minutes past 4 P. M., the enemy, in considerable force, reconnoitred the bridge of Casale, which, as is known, is supposed to be ready to cross over to the right bank. The enemy's forces were driven back by our artillery posted on the banks of the river, whence they opened a heavy fire on the bridge, and even against our advanced posts. The troops of the 1st division, with the 11th battalion of bersaglieri there for the defense of that point, bore the enemy's fire with perfect firmness, and subsequently the 2d Cuneo battalion, the Savoiarde, hastened out of Casale with the 5th battalion of bersaglieri, and a section of the Mondovi's light cavalry, and the 1st field battery, to the assistance of the former. The enemy was driven back from the river, had to succeed in crossing; before this arrival there, after nightfall, the enemy ceased firing and retired. During the night, at about half past one, the enemy's artillery opened a fire which was to be broken repeatedly during the night, and which, at about 4 A. M., ceased. Then he renewed his project, and began to cross at 5 A. M. The reconnoitring parties and outposts of Casale after the engagement showed that by enemy's regular and abundant fire, and subsequently by grenades and Villarceaux, We have to deplore the loss of a killed and twenty-seven wounded, of whom seven are non-commissioned officers."

DEPARTURE OF THE EMPEROR FOR THE WAR.

Paris correspondent of the London Herald says, May 11: "Such was the scene which will long remain in the memory of all on the occasion of the Emperor's departure for the present campaign. The Tuileries was surrounded by crowds, the cheering, the patriotic songs, broken by the loud cries of 'Vive l'Empereur!' and 'Vive l'Armée!' offered contradiction to the reports of the war being unpopular with the bulk of the people. As for the 'Marseillaise'—c'est une triste chose, but the lower order, who are after all form the great mass of the population, have been taken this opportunity to express their sympathy for the Emperor and their confidence in the success of the field. All progress along the Rue de Rivoli, down which the Emperor moved at a slow pace, was impeded by the crowd along the foot-path was purged so clearly together that the Emperor could see the whole length of it. The windows of the houses were filled with spectators, and every nook were block with human beings. The Emperor was seated in an open carriage with the Empress, the usual escort of Cent Gardes file-clog and preceding. As it moved out of the gates of the Tuileries, it was met by a rear of voices, hats were tossed aloft in the air, handkerchiefs were waved, and scenes even of enthusiasm looked surprised at the unusual warmth of his reception, and with his hand, lifted his hat in return to the people. By the time the cortège had arrived at the Hôtel de Ville its movement had become somewhat retarded by the effect which such an imposing manifestation must have upon the crowd. At the Hôtel de Ville the Emperor and the Empress were received by the Municipal Council, and almost instantly hastened round by the enthusiastic crowd. I am told by an eye-witness that the seeing-in feasting features of Louis Napoleon were quivering with emotion, when the Empress was seated in the carriage to accompany him. He put his hands out of the carriage, and it was a sight pleasant to see the two magnificent brave barrenade-makers of the Rue St. Antoine—bonning over and kissing them in the most affectionate way. When the cortège resumed its march, a band of workmen had formed itself into a guard of honor for the Emperor, and paraded it to the end of the city." Cheering and singing of "Partant pour la Syrie" and even the "Marseillaise," to the sounds of which, in the days of the Reign of Terror, so many had patriotically hanged, and Napoleon III. set forth on his journey to the seat of war."

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

The New York Herald correspondent writes: "It was but half past five o'clock in the morning when I left the windows of a grocery office, wearing on his head a cap of the National Guard, and on his arm a sash of the same approved, accompanied by a number of officers of the Cent Garde preceded and followed him. At first all was silence, as the cortège passed down the street from that noble street. The scenes continued a living scene of gayety. Everywhere the people were seen to crowd the Palais Royal, in the Place of which was drawn up a line of the Garde, and near the gate of the court was to be a work of thunder. Simultaneously all mouths were opened, all hearts beat, and the cry arose of 'Vive Napoleon!' 'Vive l'Impératrice!' 'Vive le Libérateur de l'Italie!' The Emperor seemed much affected by this and on all sides. The windows, balconies, and door-ways of the houses were filled with spectators, and the most thoughts of sympathy and hope were expressed. Many stated her kerchief to her eyes and sometimes buried her face in her hands, as if overcome by irrepressible emotion. The people, rushing from their barriers, threw themselves in the path of the horses, and called out for the prayers of the Emperor that they would do nothing before his departure to hurt the enemy, and, on his saying him, that they were prevented from dragging the carriage themselves. Every now and then, as he turned the eyes as he approached toward the ancient of the Garde Bastille, was greeted with cheers, and, arriving at the station, where the troops and National Guard were drawn up in line, he was received with the cheers. In the midst of the cheering, the Empress, for one, all measure passions seemed to be forgotten."

ARRIVAL AT GENOA.

We read in the Paris Patrie, May 13:

"GENOA, May 12—4.15 P. M.

"The Emperor arrived at Genoa at 2 P. M. I hasten to express the welcome given to His Majesty by all classes of the population. The streets, windows, and the most distance were covered with vivats and boats decked with flags. The sea was covered with a multitude of boats. The noise of the royal barge which conveyed the Emperor to the shore was drowned in the cheers.

"His Majesty, on landing, was received by the Prince immediately received the civil and military authorities. The Queen of the Belgians, Mr. Hutton, were then presented. These veterans were drawn up in the gardens of the palace, where the Emperor passed in review the troops, and received the petitions presented to him. The Emperor is waiting for the arrival of the Empress before he moved.

NAPOLEON'S FIRST ORDER OF THE DAY.

"Soldiers, I come to place myself at your head, to conduct you to the enemy. We are again to see the glorious battles of a people new-violating their independence, and to rescue from foreign domination the land of the brave Genoa, which has the sympathies of the civilized world.

"I need not stimulate your ardor. Every step will remind you of a victory. In the Via Tecta and other ancient streets were engraved upon the marble, reminding the passing soldier of the deeds. He will see the palaces of Doria, Spinola, Marengo, Lodi, you will, in the midst of these glorious souvenirs, march with confidence after Via Sacra.

"Soldiers, I will do our duty, and get your gratitude and that of your country. Your brothers in arms, your children and all France will hear the following words of happy augury re-echo: 'They fought worthily with the worthy of their noble ancestors!'

"NAPOLEON."

"GENOA GENOA, May 13, 1859."

HIS CAMP TENT.

The New York Times correspondent writes: "The camp tent of the Emperor Napoleon, which preceded him to Italy, was pitched in the Piazza Carlo, and is in white and blue striped tent-cloth, double roofed. Its height is about sixteen feet. The interior is divided into three apartments—a saloon, bedroom, and dressing-room. Down in the cloth pruit a passage from one room to the other, and windows are pierced for ventilation. The floor is of folding sacks, and three small tables—one for the toilet—occupying the front part of the bedroom compartment. The tent is remarkable for its perfect finish, the facility with which it can be put up and taken down, and the admirable adaptation to the purpose for which it was designed. It will sleep comfortably a dozen men. The Emperor's tent is named on its entrance as far as Marmilles, but the Emperor has not yet occupied it, preferring to sleep in the palace of the Duke of Genoa. Should he move with the troops, the iron bed now in this tent, the toilet furniture and the table service will be transferred to his new quarters, and accompanied him in nearly all his campaigns; and in these campaigns it has been his custom when Napoleon I going to throw himself upon the destiny of the most victorious of his generals, sometimes on the bed, on the fields of Marengo and Lodi, to sleep upon, and draw his military cloak around him. Here he would sleep, and descend his great words, and on which he planned the battles which have made his name immortal. Napoleon III. has a superstition there are users abused even than this of Louis Napoleon's."

THE REGENCY.

The Moniteur of May 11 contains the following: "The Emperor, having the intention of placing himself at the head of the army, has, by a decree dated at Genoa, the 10th of May, appointed upon the Empress. The Empress says his Majesty's intentions will be executed in the manner which has been determined by the decree of instruction, which will be transcribed into the great book of the State. The Empress will preside the council of the great body of the State, the members of the Privy Council and the Ministers. She will countersign all the orders and instructions, and the Empress will not be able to exercise the prerogatives which are reserved to the Regency. The Empress will not be able to proclaim any amnesty, to dissolve the Chambers, or to conclude any treaty. The Empress will take the advice of the Prince Jerome Napoleon, whom the Emperor calls will be summoned to her."

PRAYERS FOR THE ARMY.

The Cardinal Archbishop of Lyons, to communicating to his clergy the prayers to be offered up in the churches relative to public prayers for the success of the French arms, concludes with the following exhortation: "Let us address in these words: 'Amidst the grave circumstances which surround us, we have recourse to Thee, O God, and we implore Thy mercy. Thou alone canst restore health to the sick, and we relieve or hasten the hour of death, and we relieve or calm their unquiet anxiety. Let us all join, from the Alps to both seas, in the same prayer, and may the sentiment of Christian charity, of courage, of constancy, and the God of victory will stand by us. Our forefather! Fully forever!"

EXCITEMENT AT PISA.

The Daily News correspondent writes: "When the Duke and Duchess of Genoa and the Count of Aosta (sons), and down by the next train from every city came the Duke of Tuscany, with his family, and the Duke of Modena, with his family, and the Duke of Lucca in Post Duchess is hostess to the holder of the hotel, and the Grand Duke and Duchess of Tuscany with their children, and the Princess ordinarily take up their residence in the Palazzo Reale.

The Piazza ordinarily wake up—poor people!—when the train arrived with the Grand Duke of Tuscany, but they waited and waited on the landing bridge—in the fusing with heavy rain, and shivering with patience, till on the next railway they saw the train streaming down with the Grand Duke's colors on the engine. Then the flag began dancing with impatience on the platform; and the band struck up the Tuscan hymn, and remained in the middle of the bridge with it. Then such a shout! The Grand Duke looked out of the window, and was received with a shout which made the very air ring. Then the band struck up the 'Marseillaise,' and the

THE SEAT OF WAR—ALESSANDRIA AND TURIN.

We give in this Number several splendid illustrations of the War in Europe—to wit, two pictures of the French Army in Italy, on page 356; an engraving of Austrian officers in a cafe at Milan, and of the Sardinian troops, on page 364; finally, on these pages, the accompanying views of the port of Alessandria, and the city of Turin, the capital of the kingdom of Sardinia. We take this opportunity of referring those who wish to see pictures of Genoa and Milan to No. 112 of this journal, in which we published elaborate engravings of those cities.

As compared with other Italian cities, Turin looks modern. Its streets are straight, and many are wide. The houses are built according to modern architectural rule. Few medieval edifices recall antiquity to the mind of the spectator; and of Roman remains there are comparatively none at all. Yet Turin has its history. It had the honor of being the first Italian city which opposed an obstinate resistance to Hannibal. It was the scene of many a severe conflict in the old wars between Romans and Gauls. It was taken and destroyed by Constantine. It figured largely in the banquet and strife of the Dark Ages. It was captured and sacked by Francis the First of France.

Of late years its chronicle has been more peaceful. For three hundred years it has been the aim of its masters to render it a beautiful and a prosperous city; and, with the exception of the period of the French domination, those efforts have been crowned with uniform success. Turin now contains more comfortable residences than perhaps any other Italian city. It has fine churches too, a splendid royal palace, a library, museum, and many other noble buildings. Its environs are lovely; no part of Italy contains more picturesque villas than those which adorn the Superga. The Po flows through the city, and receives in the suburbs a fine mountain torrent.

The population of Turin is about 150,000 souls. The most active business of the place is the silk manufacture, which affords employment to many thousands of persons.

The city is unfortified. There was an old citadel once; but the late King, with a wise appreciation of the progress of the age, pulled it down to make room for a railway station.

Alessandria is a town of some 40,000 inhabitants with the suburbs. It stands on the border of the Tanaro, which is represented in the engraving.

Alessandria is the most conspicuous monument extant of the old Guelf and Ghibelline wars. When the cities of Italy banded themselves together in a league against the Emperor, in 1164, Pavia and the Duchy of Montferrat stood out against them. To overawe them, the cities built a fortress adjoining, on one side, the Montferrat territory, on another, the country depending on Pavia: and to this fortress the name of Alessandria was given, in compliment to the Pope Alexander the Third, the Protector of the Guelfs. Milan, Padua, Cremona, Genoa, and other Italian cities sent workmen to build and soldiers to defend the new fortress; so skillfully was the ground chosen, and so bravely did its garrison hold their posts, that, after a long siege, the Emperor who attacked it was compelled to retreat.

Alessandria has since become a most important place. Two fairs are held there every year, and the amount of business done is very considerable. Since the present war became imminent large sums have been spent in fortifying Alessandria. The most eminent foreign engineers—among others the famous General Todtleben, of Russia—have given the Sardinians the benefit of their counsels in the construction of the works; there is no doubt that they are as strong as modern art can make them. Nature has done much for the defiance of Alessandria. A little labor causes the Tanaro to overflow its borders and submerge the neighboring country; then, in case of need, opposing an impassable barrier to an invading army.

Marengo, the famous battle-field in the old Napoleonic war in Italy, is within sight of Alessandria.

A few remarks about the hostile armies, which, in all probability, have by this time met on the battle-field, will not be out of place.

At the present time the Austrian army is said to consist of about 600,000 men, of whom about 460,000 are infantry, 60,000 cavalry, 70,000 artillery, and 15,000 engineers and sappers. Of these it is estimated that two-thirds could be brought into the field during the present summer, constituting an army equal in numbers, and superior in discipline, equipment, and general efficiency to that with which Napoleon set out for the conquest of Russia forty-seven years ago.

The army of Austria has always been an object of incessant watchfulness on the part of the Government. Wielding a despotic sway over a widely extended empire, peopled by races various and usually hostile to each other, the Austrian emperors have owed the preservation of their throne to the army, and have never lost sight of the obligation. Though the pay is small, especially for the grades between second-lieutenant and general, the honor of being an officer in the army is deemed considerable; and it is quite possible for an Austrian officer to live comfortably even on his meagre pay. He has no mess bills to discharge; he dines where and how he pleases; his associates almost exclusively with his comrades at the military café; if he evince military genius, preferment is certain. He is taught to look upon war and plunder as the natural complement of his small stipend. As the French opera song says:

THE CITY

THE CITY AND FORT

PIEDMONT.

"Dans le service de l'Autriche
Le militaire n'est pas riche,
Chacun sait ça;
Mais si ne pas est trop logée,
Il n'en console, car c'est la gourre
Qui l'en paire."

Though a poor man, he enjoys in the army the society of men richer and probably better born than himself. He meets the highest nobility on a footing of equality, using the familiar "thou" to all comrades.

It is well known that the army of Austria is composed of various races. The principal peoples which are represented in its ranks are the Germans from Austria proper and the neighborhood; the Hungarians; the Poles; the Sclavons, including the Croats; the Wallachs; the Italians, and the Tyrolese. All of these races live under Austrian dominion, and are liable to conscription. Every year a certain number of the youth of the empire draw by lot for the painful honor of serving the emperor; the unlucky ones who draw the fatal prize must serve eight years, if they are not able to pay $400 for a substitute—Astute policy dictates the immediate transfer of each body of recruits from its home to the farthest part of the empire. The Hungarians and Sclavons are sent to serve in Italy; the Italians mount guard in Poland; the Germans do duty in Croatia, and so on. By this means the soldier may be relied upon to do his duty in suppressing insurrection; he has no kindred feelings with the people among whom he is quartered; they are foreigners to him; he does not speak their tongue, and often has a hereditary prejudice against them. This policy is so thoroughly carried out that each body of troops is removed every few months from garrison to garrison, lest, by chance, ties of marriage or friendship should be contracted between them and the residents of the town.

The heterogeneous composition of the Austrian army has its disadvantages. At least a dozen languages are spoken by the soldiers; and as the word of command is always given in German, both officers and soldiers sometimes take some time to learn even this much of the military tongue. In the field the soldiers' ignorance of the language of their superior officer often causes great inconvenience. Again, the very prejudices of race which the Austrian Government fosters for the purpose of keeping down revolutionary movements interferes with the harmonious action of the army. The Italians hate the Germans; between the Germans and Hungarians a deadly feud exists; the Poles hate all the southern races. In 1848, this want of unity of feeling produced great dangers; that it will do so again in this war is confidently anticipated.

Though as a general rule cavalry, artillery, and infantry are raised indiscriminately from all these races, some branches of the army have their special recruiting dépôts. The lancers are mostly Poles. The hussars are Hungarians. It is in the Tyrol that the best riflemen, in which arm the Austrian army is very strong, are found. The best infantry and the best heavy dragoons are Germans.

As an army, competent critics pronounce that of Austria very efficient. The men are well armed, and tremendously drilled. The firing is generally good, and the physical strength of the soldier formed by constant exercise. The rifle corps is especially commended. Generally speaking, the officers know their duties and perform them well. By recent regulations, a cadet must, before obtaining a commission, pass an examination of some severity. Promotion afterward goes by seniority and merit. Thus most of the Austrian captains and field-officers are competent men. By a singular rule, however, each regiment is "owned" by some noble or government official, who is frequently able to obtain commissions for his dependents, and to secure their advancement before the proper time: thus a certain number of incapables are added to the army. It is not believed that they are numerous enough to leaven the whole lump.

The French artillery and cavalry are deservedly famous. The latter arm has acquired prodigious efficiency under the present Emperor, who is himself no mean gunner. The French are said to be bad riders and bad grooms. They kill more horses than men of the German armies. But in the field nothing can be more irresistible than the charge of their heavy cavalry—cuirassiers and carabineers—or more flashing than the pursuit of a flying enemy by their hussars and chasseurs à cheval. Competent authority pronounces these arms in the French service to be unsurpassed, if equaled, in any other service.

French infantry compare unfavorably in point of size and strength with Germans, Russians, or English; and in the field—even in the present day—strength is worth something. But what the French lack in muscle they make up in fortitude and endurance. It is said that the little thin Frenchmen who compose the regiments of the line will march further and fight longer—at the offensive—than the Germans or English. On the defensive they are probably equal to both of these, for they are probably more cool, and prone, under adverse circumstances, to give way to despondency. But in sudden matches, in rapid evolutions in the field, as voltigeurs, skirmishers, and chasseurs, they are beyond praise. Their courage, of course, it was supposed was to assert: they are not only brave, but quick, intelligent, thoughtful, and well-disciplined. The German and Swiss regiments are reported to be of the opinion that the richer the skull the better the soldier, for he will stand the more nobly: the French pursue the opposite theory, and expect every soldier to be intelligent, capable at need of assuming the commander's place. It is quite common, we are told, at reviews for the commissioned officers of a French regiment to be fired from the field, leaving the command to the sergeants, who, after putting the regiment through various manœuvres, end in their turn, leaving the command to the corporals.

ANDRIA, PIEDMONT.

The French soldier showed at Sebastopol how able he was to shift for himself, and to make himself comfortable in the midst of privations. He cooked, he made his tent snug, he protected himself against the cold in a manner that was incomprehensible to the Russians and British; and in the midst of the hardest trials his native gayety kept up his spirits. These are among the most prominent traits characteristics of the French soldier. If he descends under the first shock of defeat, his natural vivacity soon restores his courage; and, in success, his ambition, which assures him that he only needs opportunity to become a general, leads him to dare any thing.

The French officers are masters of their trade. They are educated from the first youth, and practice it assiduously during life. Very many of them rise from the ranks, and are the sons of men who have risen in the same way. Between the officers and the soldiers there is little sympathy; the former are, if not always, generally well educated, and retain the feeling. Among themselves there is much good fellowship, and the esprit de corps is very strong. Within the past few or five years the African element has been grafted on disappearing stock of Zouaves, and new Zouaves have entered their ranks. At the present time, two-thirds of the Zouaves are Germans, mostly from Paris, and many Germans, Poles, Italians, Greeks, and even Englishmen have enlisted with them. Their courage is splendid, and not only attractive to the eye but admirably suited for practical work in the field. Their discipline, too, is generally act as skirmishers and on patrol, which enables them to do a good deal of work which is considered by others as more agreeable than those of heavy marching regiments. Discipline among the Zouaves is not so rigid as among other troops, and in the simple reason that they are such nearly daredevils that they laugh at the Provost Marshal and the Salle de Police. There are now about nine thousand of them altogether, and are said to be the hardest to manage of all the troops under the crop. For daring exploits and outpost duty they are certainly unrivalled. We shall hear more of them, doubtless, as this war goes on.

ANECDOTES OF THE COURT OF LOUIS XIV.

At the close of the seventeenth century a young, sharp-witted, pragmatical nobleman entered on his career at the court of Louis the Grand. He was the Duc de Saint Simon, son of a favorite of Louis the Thirteenth, and the Sainct Pages of his time. He made himself the chevalier and general portrait-painter of the court; then bequeathing a gallery of likenesses, and a breadroll of events, which graver history would not have prepared; but we can not say that they increase our respect for the Grand Monarque and his era of France.

One of Louis the Fourteenth's great desires was to provide brilliantly for his natural children. The only daughter of Mademoiselle de la Vallière he had married to Prince de Conti, the first object daughter, by Madame de Montespan, he had given in like manner to the Duc de Vendôme. Conti, grandson of the great Condé, and, like the Prince de Conti, one of the Royal Princes of France. His second daughter, by the same mother, he was determined to marry to his nephew the young Duc de Chartres, son of Monsieur, brother to the king, and future famous Regent Duc d'Orléans. The mother of the young Duc Chartres—a princess of the violent woman, bubbling in horror all unsuitedness relations—received the proposition with fury. The young Duc Chartres—a prince, by the way, detested Cardinal Dubois, and awed by the terrifying majesty of the King, grew pale and trembled. Indeed this projected marriage with Mademoiselle Dubois, as she was called, quite as much as his mother herself. But the King knew what was best for slaves he had to deal with, and cared nothing for private prejudices. One evening, therefore, all these personages were sent for to the King's private cabinet; the court on the tip-toe of expectation to know what was afoot. When they returned, the marriage was announced as a settled thing. Madame was furious, Monsieur was oppressed with shame, the young Duc was miserable, and Mademoiselle Dubois embarrassed and trembling. Madame strode in the gallery with her handkerchief in her hand, gesticulating vehemently and weeping passionately as she spoke, for all to hear, of the insult and wrong done to them. At supper she and her son ate nothing. The next day were read the father's document, while indignant tears fell hot and heavy from Madame. The King was impressively polite to Madame. He offered her every dish before him, all of which she refused with rudeness. When they rose from table her Majesty made the indignant mother a low bow, during which she performed so complete a pirouette, that the King, on raising his head, found nothing but her back before him. The next day, when the court was assembled in the gallery, waiting for the breaking up of the council, the Duc de Chartres went as usual to kiss his mother's hand; but she gave him a box on the ear, which so far startled he was sent reeling backward. This was one of the courtly amenities of that age of knightly manners.

The household of the new Duchess is next declared, and by the same edict the eight-months'-Saint Simon of the number—certain offices are created in it, whose reversal devolves on the heirs-male of France. That innovation was worse than a thousand regal crimes. The marriage day arrived. After a ball, a supper, and the midnight marriage ceremony, the young couple are conducted to their nuptial apartments. Here, as was the case in the full court, receive their respective night-gowns from the hands of the highest ladies of the court, and are finally left, in their wedded state, to the undisturbed enjoyment of each other. The Queen (James the Second's Queen), be from Louis himself. And then the married pair, left to their own devices, put on the gilded Cupids, its velvet hangings, laced sheets, and gold embroidered counterpane—a bed which Monsieur had won in the Low Countries, who keeps them shivering in their smarty clothing a full quarter of an hour outside the door to make full announce. Then the courtly crowd bows and trips and minces back to the bull-room, there to dance minuets and receive the felicitations of the day.

The Princess de Conti is in love with Clermont, a relation of Madame de Montespan's (the Marquis's son) is in love with La Chaise, one of the Princesse's maids of honor, "a great, ugly, fat, pock-marked girl." Lauzun, the Lauzenburg's creature, and De Lauzenburg desires to govern Mademoiselle, and therefore Madame Clermont that he should abandon the princess and marry La Chaise, by this time the acknowledged mistress of Monsieur, and governed by her unlimited power over the future king, might make Clermont's fortune and his own. The Princesse de Conti, Lauzun's son, and in love with Clermont, and therefore bombshell bursts. Clermont, during the bombshell bursts. Clermont, during the bombshell bursts. Clermont, during the twenty-four hours poor Santeuil was dead, after suffering frightful torments; but no one troubled the Duc about it.

Madame Pulet, in fact, called Monsieur la Vauban a gentleman for refusing a certain stake at play, after the rest of the company had gone, La Vauguyon "bolted the door, clapped his hat on his head, drew her up against the chimney, and swore he would have her because his two tats, said he, were no reason why he should not have one of his wife to feed, her to call him poltroon again. The poor woman was horribly frightened, and made use of the most pathetic entreaties to him, and all sort of excuses." La Vauguyon was half-mad then. Eventually he became wholly so, and died of a long, lingering and dangerous things, died by his own hand.

The Duke's brother falls ill. He has been twice or thrice before on the verge of death from his excessive gluttony. This time he is really very ill. The King, who has been estranged from him for some months, hears the news with great composure; but as midnight orders are to change to be really to take him to Saint Cloud should worse news arrive. In the mean time he goes to bed, and is roused by two messengers, the one of whom reports that Monsieur has just asked for some cheese-cakes-and-water, the other that he is worse, and all the medicines given are powerless. At this the King sets out, Count Rochefort leading the way with link-boys; any coach that comes first to hand, and carriers, for the moment, of precedence or etiquette. The King arrives at Saint Cloud at night at Saint Cloud, his brother slowly sinking; when, finding that he is not dead, he sends for the physicians, and returns to Marly, the Court surrounding after him. And then the dying man was deserted by all. Gentlemen of the bed-chamber—all was left only to the scullions and footmen, who filled the room with their cries. The house running here and there, crying, with distracted hair, like bacchantes." The Duchess de la Ferté, who had always been the great friend of Monsieur's minions, came back to look at him as he lay yet palpitating. "Faith! here is a man who no one cares for," said she, bitterly, turning on her heel. The next day all trees of sorrow were laundried. Gentlemen of the bed-chamber forgotten—all was just the same as Marly as before.

Monseigneur, the King's son, was now the only house, father of the Duc de Bourgogne, and slave to La Chaise, takes the small-pox. The King and Madame de Maintenon are in his bed-room. Boulon, and Monsieur and Madame de Bourgogne hold their court at Versailles. Monseigneur, taken from court as business, hears of Monseigneur's illness, and hurries back—torn between the hope that he will die and the fear that he will recover. It was of filty, he may recover. Things seem to go well for Monseigneur: he is much improved in itself, and progresses favorably. The Dames de la Halle, who are very fond of him, come in procession to congratulate him on his recovery. At the foot of his bed, and say they will order a Te Deum to be sung. Unfortunately, however, says the Te Deum would be premature, gives them money and dismiss, and sends them away. The Duchess of Orleans and the Princess Royal say the Te Deum would be premature, gives them money and dismiss, and sends them away. The Duchess of Orleans and the Princess Royal together their evil fate, and wonder how so gross a man can survive so delicate a child. The Monseigneur's recovery was factitious. In a few days he becomes unconscious, sinks rapidly, and dies. As Madame de Saint Simon is watching, she is just ready to get into bed, rumors of the event reach Versailles. Saint Simon awakes and the Duc de Berri's, but finds that every one has gathered round the heirs—the Bourgogne. It was a curious sight. The whole Court, Monseigneur was bubbled into Madame de Bourgogne's chamber.

The two sons (De Bourgogne and De Berri) and their wives sat side by side, on a sofa in the midst of the saloon, the Court ranged around them. The Duc and Duchesse de Bourgogne were calm and greatly powerful, not somewhat dull and were advanced a step nearer to the throne by a father's death; but the Duc de Berri, the youngest and his favorite son, wept, and was deeply affected at the event. They were not sobs, but appalling yells, that burst from him. The Duchesse de Berri had her protector, was as bad. The decorous sympathy of the poor Duchesse de Bourgogne was lost in such a tumult of grief. "Let us not disturb ourselves" in keeping up appearances. When the prince her brother-in-law left the room, the Duchesse de Berri had brought some tears along with her and kept them up with care; and these, combined with the art of the toilet-table, made her to sufficiently ugly and make them swell and smudge her face." In the midst of all this, Madame, the Duchesse de Berri's widow—" in full-dress she knew not why, howling the knew not why, and furnishing the old spectacle of a princess—a widow—in her bed-room by day in the end of night to come and cry among a crowd of women, with little or no mourning, and nights-dress; almost as masqueraders." In the gallery, a few hours—notably the Duchesse d'Orleans and Saint Simon—near death, and suffering cruelly, and confessing their joy at the death. Then first—the Duchesse de Berri gathering very night for the Swiss Guards. In the midst of the servitude, one of the ladies touched the bed when a sturdy arm rested itself upon the bed-curtains, and showed them a brawny Swiss under his short half-armor, and a wooden-leg which he made not his position, and understood his business amongst the white princesses or goddesses, he dived back beneath the sheets and the curtains; and the ladies had much trouble not to laugh too loudly for a Court supposed to be in deep affliction.

At last the Duc de Berri was obliged to be entirely dressed, and he was obliged to be in a state of hysterical delirium. Monsieur and Madame de Bourgogne invited a number of ladies to pass the night in their bedroom. They slept, with unclosed curtains, a calm and unbroken sleep, and the next morning rose early, "their tears quietly dried up."

Monseigneur had been very popular with the Parisians, and his death was much lamented; but, if Saint Simon's portrait is a faithful one, he was no great loss to the country. Idle, credulous, and prejudiced, "absorbed in pain for and his ignorance," avaricious even to penury, obstinate and stupid, "without any desire to do ill, he would have made a pernicious king." So that, though his death wrought some grief and a little state perplexity, France, under the regency of the Duke Orleans, was in better keeping than she would have been if she had ever passed into the hands of La Chaise's fat friend.

OUR SPECIAL PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Departure of the Emperors—Wise Feeling of the Parisians—Their warm welcome of the Emperor—Napoleon flying from Paris—Napoleon doing the Conjugal—The Prince Imperial has his Photograph taken—No more Bals at the Tuileries—The Bois—End of the London Season—Adventure of our Own Correspondent—Prospects of Convergence, etc., etc.

PARIS, May 21, 1859.

It is difficult at this moment to write of Paris much less to write, of any thing but the incidents connected with the departure of Napoleon "en famille," as it is termed here—and the events of which are fast becoming matters of history. The departure left a void, a vacuity, which the Parisians fill as fast as they can, by the most extravagant demonstrations on the line of road to see his departure, and for his return. The Emperor is greeted most heartily and sincerely cheered, and the unwonted sounds must have been music to his ears, and pervaded him with a joy that will last for a long time, true popularity.

Louis Nap. had no knew the nation he governs when he said, "it would be so," though they were at first so averse to it. The French are so unusually sensitive to flattery, that the man who can flatter, pet stirs all their passions, and awakens the sensual within them with its last for luxury and for conquest. They do not care when they are led to fight against; many think it is the Sardinians who are to be their enemies, but they will fight for it, when it is explained to them that it is the Austrians, which they will do, for they have been enabled to maintain her neutrality; but I confess my fears are stronger than my hopes upon this question.

A July whom I saw last evening, just arrived from Rome, gives an interesting account of events which seized the English there when it became known that the Queen had ordered her telegram to be sent to their governor, "Tant pis, Monsieur," and "that he should not care by France," which, coupled with the remarks made in the last of the newspaper suggestive of the immediate prospect of a war between France and England, occasioned a general alarm among the English there. A Frenchified passengers on the steamer this July came by from Civita Vecchia, were questioned closely for fifty, which was in itself a risk and an alarm.

It is impossible that the Empress should not be sad and anxious at the present moment, and it is to be hoped that the Parisians, to whose care she was confided by her consort, will feel for her distrust, and that we shall not have a republican revolution to alarm us. I heard on Tuesday in the crowd a woman say that she was sorry the Empress was Englishman, who had been asking some questions of her about her Emperor's departure, to which they were both looking at—

"Do not be alarmed, Monsieur. We have the Garde Nationale at the service of us, and my husband and brother are both among them."

But I must say I feel uneasy myself, and not seem to be very much au fait either of the language in which she spoke or of the events of the day, was not in the least reassured by her assurances, and said "he should take his family home at once, though they had come to spend the summer."

"Tant pis, Monsieur," said the good woman, with the usual shrug of the shoulders.

The Emperor knows so well how to work upon the feelings of the French. The last three weeks he has always driven out with "his wife," "with the conjugal" like the most affectionate couple. All this ruse and they say he is so sorry to leave his wife and child, and that he is so anxious for France he makes the sacrifice.

So a few days ago he let him it was known that the little Prince Imperial had gone to have his photograph taken for "his papa to carry with him to the wars." Then on an occasion of review, mounted on the Boulevard, and they cheered so loudly when he came in sight, that the horses were frightened. He is a very grave child, it seems, and it is recommended that he should see more of a later childhood, as he is said to play with them. For this purpose the Princess Matilda gave a notice that Saturday and Sunday last would be days of fêtes in her den of his age, and they had all been "très gentil, and so happy." She is certainly a very pretty child, a white jean frock and a Leghorn straw hat bound with black velvet. But this absence of theory to amuse his age is a "vilaine fête" for the unfortunate toy boy—not very bad fair, with lovely blue eyes. The Court has gone away with the Emperor, and of ballet and fêtes which we were promised for "after Easter." The theatres are the only resource for the lovers of amusement. I have been once to the bear in Histori, and think her, if possible, improved since last year. She is certainly a most wonderful dog, without, perhaps, all the genius of Rachel, but with more of sentiment and real feeling. The Italian opera is still going on unusually late this year. I went one night last week to hear Donizetti's opera of "Polionete," which is being given for the first time in Paris. There are beautiful things in it, and Tamberlick and Madame Penco do them full justice, and sing the principal parts in an admirable manner. It was preceded by the famous duo in Otello, which Tamberlick and Corsi were greatly applauded, and which was magnificently given by those artists. Indeed, I never witnessed in Paris, where the audience is generally cold and critical, so much enthusiasm as on this occasion. Every duo was encored, and bouquets thrown, and even the ladies stood up in the excitement of the scene and applauded. The Empress was in her box, looking, as ever, very lovely, simply dressed in white, with blue flowers and blue ribbons. I believe that on cause of the unusual warmth of emotion displayed by the audience was that there were many Italians present, and they are always more demonstrative than the French. I was curiously a very enjoyable evening, as there is nothing to distract one's attention from an admiration for art—it carries one so along with it.

This, with the fêtes at the Bois de Boulogne, are all the amusements we have been allowed as there troubled times. I have only been to them on the Thursday evening. Sunday is the favorite for this, as for every public amusement in this country; but I cannot endure even the scene to say and amusing, or the stands so crowded with well-dressed and fashionable company. But these fêtes were very well I feel that the season at Paris has quite come to an end, and this is my last letter from here.

I am going to London, from whence my next letter will be written. The town there has been deserted of a crowd of its gayety by the intolerable dissolution of Parliament disturbing all the fashionable arrangements. "Mamma and daughters" who had ordered "gipsy" looking bonnets for the season, that they might have a chance of displaying their charms, were disappointed. It consisted at this enforced departure of "all the best men." But the vacated benefits may now be taken up again; and it is said the season will be unusually full and brilliant, as persons will not wish to go out of town, and Continent in the most certain state of political relations.

I must not forget an amusing anecdote of your late correspondent, which he relates to me himself in a letter received this morning. It appears that the Sardinians are in the habit of sending out to tempt by strangers to acquaint themselves with their military position and tactics, and have given orders to arrest any one who might be supposed to have the intention of giving information in regard to their movements. It seems that the day after his arrival at Turin he was riding out, in company with another amateur, toward the Sardinian camp. They had proceeded some miles, when they were stopped by a reddet, and made to leave their horses, and carried off to the camp, as a spy. Fortunately but day, to the nearest head-quarters. Here they were speedily released, but they were obliged to walk the ten miles back again before they could recover their horses, which was a great trial for a "fashionable" stroller at Paris after much for curiosity.

And so from while I bid you adieu, courteous reader, until, perhaps, another autumn shall have collected again with the scattered fcem ments of the summer population which will be the delight the readers of the Weekly.

But I would add that I kept my present privileges until that time, not only to amuse, but I should be assiduous to warn, instruct, and guide with the experience of authory your pleasant and young women whom it seems the tendency of this age to fence forward in the headlong pursuit of pleasure, and to the neglect of all these quiet graces and simple virtues which, unless they are possessed and cultivated by our sex, lose their influence and their power over our husband and readers. "What shall we do?" you exclaim; "must we shall not be without permission, dear readers, and perhaps in the end we will find more pleasure in such themes. And so, from Paris, adieu!

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

THE COST OF MEAT.

THERE is no subject of much greater importance to the farmer now than the price of meat; and the consumer, also, is deeply interested. It seems that there is a disproportion between the increase of animals and population; and in obedience to the invariable law of supply and demand, when the former is small and the latter large, the price is sure to increase, as there is not the usual abundance with which to market values. This seems to be true in relation to the present prices of animal food, for there is no reason to suppose that they are caused by any sudden fluctuations of trade, an unusual short supply for any one or more seasons, short crops, increase of foreign demand (although this has had some influence), but to the difference between the increase of animals and that of population. The population has been increasing thirty-five per cent. in a given time, while that of the rate of twenty per cent. only. We can, therefore, see no other important cause of the present high prices of meat than the disproportion between the number of animals and the population. This is a thing of to-day or yesterday, but one which has been gradual and regular for a long time. If the demand is greater than the supply, the price is taken out of the hands of speculators, and becomes subject to a higher law. The number and increase of cattle in the United States between the years 1840 and 1850 were as follows:

	1840.	1850.	Increase.
Horses and mules	4,335,339	4,502,000	166,661
Neat cattle	14,971,586	19,375,307	4,403,721
Sheep	19,311,376	21,884,719	2,573,343
Swine	16,141,714	31,481,240	15,339,526

The increase of cattle, as shown by the above figures, has been about twenty per cent., but that of the population has been thirty-five per cent. This is true of the whole country. In the old States the population has been increasing, but the number of animals has been decreasing. The table given below applies to New England, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia:

DOMESTIC ANIMALS IN THE OLD STATES.

	1840.	1850.	Decrease.
Horses and mules	1,193,197	1,193,197	53,394
Neat cattle	6,112,559	6,112,559	1,236,062
Sheep	6,876,453	6,876,453	2,795,062
Swine	11,437,022	9,437,022	1,704,218

We naturally look to the new States for a supply. Let us see what the facts are. The table given below refers to Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee:

DOMESTIC ANIMALS IN THE NEW STATES.

	1840.	1850.	Increase.
Horses and mules	1,656,922	2,156,190	512,468
Neat cattle	4,396,000	5,771,481	975,481
Swine	13,748,509	13,648,581	2,116,528
Sheep	4,435,076	6,008,266	1,573,190

The above table shows the increase between the years 1840 and 1850. But we are desirous of subjecting ourselves more especially to the last, which relates to the whole United States, and is the latest statement we have in relation to supply and demand. It may at first seem a reproach that, in our new country and on its fertile soil, the most-producing animals should not keep pace with the population. Our exports of breadstuffs and animal products during the period between 1842 and 1846 inclusive, amounted to more than a million of dollars, and from 1852 to 1856 to more than two million dollars; nor is there any reason to suppose that the demand will be less than it has been. When, therefore, we take into consideration the exports of the increase of population beyond that of the most-producing animals, we can see no reason why animal food shall not be a high price hereafter. This is a subject well worthy the serious consideration of Western wool-growers.

A well-known writer says: "The most urgent problem which the present day has to solve is the discovery of the means of producing the human food and wool on a given surface." These words not only apply to the United States, but have a world-wide significance.

Should our readers have any just fault to find with the views given above, we shall be glad to have facts and figures from them in elucidation of this subject.

CROP NEWS.

Mr. John Payne, Haddimand County, Canada West, writes:

"Fall wheat sown in good season, be well prepared and is looking remarkably well. Spring wheat is not looking bad. Where was very little snow to protect it looks dreary enough. Barley sown early is looking well and fourish when covered with snow, but it appeared to have little to take hold upon last winter, and many rather early with heavy rains and occasional frosts, which appear to have done much injury to last wheat and clover and the latter is not looking as well as usual. A match, together with the roots not having had time to be thoroughly dried on the fall. I am afraid there will be more than that there is, I think, a greater breadth of land sown to fall wheat than ever before. This is begun to sow sooner than the middle of April. I had some sown then, but was not pleased with the crop. Very many have sown it this year of wheat was good, and in most places had any crops of spring wheat cut out of fall wheat."

The Chicago Tribune of May 20 says:

"We present this morning a large number of letters from different portions of the West, giving a most cheering account of the prospects of the growing crops. In places at the stop will show those who are not familiar with the agricultural resources of the country refer to a wide extent of country, at lying south of the latitude of St. Louis, favor advantages for cultivation are not equally encouraging. In a week or two the harvest will have fully commenced in the South, and we hope soon to announce that the crop is safely gathered. One of the editors of the Press and Tribune visited Madison, Wisconsin, last week, and all along the line of the St. Paul and Fond du Lac and the Milwaukee and Mississippi roads the wheat looked finely. Most of it was spring, of which a very wide breadth has been sown in this section. The prairie corn also appeared to be very extensive. Advices generally from Wisconsin agree that the prospects were never better for an abundant crop."

ADIEU!—A DEW-DROP FROM MEMORY.

BY C. H. WEBB.

The maiden moon was peeping
From out the latticed west;
A weary world was sleeping,
And even I should rest;
For souls are Twilight's minions,
And, yielding to her sway,
We fold our pastime-pinions
Like doves at close of day.

But yet one light was gleaming,
The lilac-tops above,
From Lilly's casement beaming
The guiding star of Love.
One birdie there was keeping
A tryst to meet its mate;
So when the flowers were sleeping
I flew to Lilly's gate.

And soon a maiden's blushed
Were burning on my breast;
Then hand in hand we strolled
Within my own wee premd.
But what our lips were planning
Not even Lilly knows:
He thought he heard the humming
Of wild bees in a rose.

All dial hands were creeping
White blissful moments flew,
And Morning's eyes came peeping
The lattice-leaflets through:
Sweet mists tears were weeping
The lids of morn anew,
Asters yet was weeping,
And Lilly said, A—dew!

SARDINIAN TROOPS IN FULL UNIFORM.

THE SARDINIAN ARMY.

On pages 361, 362 will be found an account of the Austrian army, which should be read in connection with the engraving given below. Of the Sardinian army, of which we give a picture above, a very few words of description need suffice.

It consists, in time of peace, of 70,000 men, and in war time can be raised to 120,000. The most famous corps are the Bersaglieri, or skirmishers, whose broad-brimmed hat, crowned with dark-green plumes, is depicted in our engraving. They are an admirable corps, and won much fame in the Crimea.

The best idea of the spirit animating the Sardinian troops during the Crimean War will be formed from the following passage, extracted from a powerful article that appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes a short time back.

"Each day the army renewed its combats, frequently under the most unfavorable conditions, beneath a burning sky, having to endure hunger in the most fertile provinces of Europe, in fertile Lombardy. The Sardinian soldiers frequently had to go under fire, not having eaten for thirty hours. At the outset of the war Piedmont undertook to pay its army, while the Milanese Government engaged to provide food. Unfortunately, provisions were not always to hand. 'For three months,' an officer said of his men, 'they have never taken off their clothing, and have always slept on the ground, with the sky for their roof.' Most singular was the character of that Piedmontese army, fighting for a cause which every passion was striving to ruin. It possessed all the masculine qualities of military spirit, but not an atom of boasting. This army was not imbued by any revolutionary sentiments, but had brought with it into the camp the simple and even religious manners of the Piedmontese valleys. A poor private was killed, and what was found upon him? A book of prayers, on the first page of which these words were written: 'O God, watch over my parents and protect the army!' An officer narrates how, being one night on guard at La Madonna del Monte, he entered a church which was filled with soldiers grouped round an image of the Virgin. 'These brave fellows,' writes M. Farrere, 'who fronted the enemy with such courage on the battle-field, were singing a litany to the Virgin. Two enormous bougeots, rolled in the fields, and some lighted tapers, adorned the altar. When the prayers were ended, a soldier, whose bravery I had often noticed, said to me, "Mon lieutenant, I have been praying for my family. I have four children and a blind mother."

AUSTRIAN OFFICERS AT A CAFÉ IN MILAN.—[FROM A SKETCH BY M. MORGAN.]

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

In Three Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

If Printed from early Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers pay the Author

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK II.

THE GOLDEN THREAD.

CHAPTER I.

FIVE YEARS LATER.

TELLSON'S Bank by Temple Bar was an old-fashioned place, even in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty. It was very small, very dark, very ugly, very inconvenient. It was an old-fashioned place, moreover, in the moral attributes that the partners in the House were proud of its smallness, proud of its darkness, proud of its ugliness, proud of its inconvenience. They were even boastful of its remoteness in those particulars, and were fond of an express conviction that, if it were less objectionable, it would be less respectable. This was an assumption wholly, but an active weapon which they flashed at more convenient places of business. Tellson's (they would say, in their shop-parlour, Tellson's wanted no light, Tellson's wanted no embellishment. Nookes and Co.'s might, or Snooke Brothers', might, or Crooke and Co.'s, thank Heaven!—

Any one of these partners would have disinherited his son on the question of rebuilding Tellson's. In this respect, the House was much on a par with the Country; which did very often disinherit its sons for suggesting improvements in laws and customs that had long been highly objectionable, but were only the more respectable.

Thus it had come to pass that Tellson's was the triumphant perfection of inconvenience. After fighting open a door of idiotic obstinacy with a weak wrist in its throat, you fell into Tellson's down two steps, and came to your senses in a miserable little shop, with two little counters, where the oldest of men made your check shake as if he were mumbling it, while they examined the signature by the dingiest of windows, which were always under a shower-bath of mud from Fleet Street, and which were made the dingier by their own bars proper, and the bony shadow of Temple Bar. If your business necessitated your seeing "the House," you were put into a species of Condemned Hold at the back, where you meditated on a misspent life, until the House came with its hands in its pockets, and you could hardly blink at it in the dusty twilight. Your money came out of or went into, wormy old wooden drawers, particles of which flew up your nose and down your throat when they were opened and shut. Your banknotes had a musty odor, as if they were fast decomposing into rags again. Your plate was stored away among the neighboring cesspools, and your communications corrupted its good polish in a day or two. Your deeds got into extemporized strong rooms made of kitchens and cellaries, and frotted all the fat out of their parchments into the banking-house air. Your leather bored of family papers with the damps into a Barmecide room, that always had a great dining-table in it and never had a dinner, and where, even in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty, the first letters written to you by your old love, or by your little children, were but newly released from the horror of being soiled through the windows, by the heads exposed on Temple Bar with an insensate brutality and ferocity worthy of Abyssinia or Ashantee.

But, indeed, at that time, putting to Death was a recipe much in vogue with all trades and professions, and not least of all with Tellson's. Death is Nature's remedy for all things, and why not Legislation? Accordingly, the business was put to death; the utterer of a bad note was put to Death; the unlawful opener of a letter was put to Death; the purloiner of forty shillings and sixpence was put to Death; the holder of a horse at Tellson's door who made off with it, was put to Death; the coiner of a bad shilling was put to Death; the sounder of three-fourths of the noses in the whole gamut of Crime, were put to Death. Not that it did the least good in the way of prevention—it might almost have been worth remarking that the fact was exactly the reverse—but, it cleared off (as to this world) the trouble of each particular case, and left nothing else connected with it to be looked after. Thus, Tellson's, in its day, like greater places of business, its contemporaries, had taken to making mere clerks, of the heads laid low before it had been ranged on Temple Bar; but now, when the guillotine was busiest of all, they would probably have unclinked what little light the ground-floor had, in a rather significant manner.

Cramped in all kinds of dim cupboards and hutches at Tellson's, the oldest of men carried on the business gravely. When they took a young man into Tellson's London house, they had him sometimes till he was old. They kept him in a dark place, like a cheese, until he had the full Tellson flavor and blue-mould upon him. Then only was he permitted to be seen, spectacularly poring over large books, and recording his brethren and gutters into the general weight of the establishment.

Outside Tellson's—never by any means in it, unless called in—was an odd-job-man, an occasional porter and messenger, who served as the live sign of the house. He was never absent during business hours, unless upon an errand, and then he was represented by his wife, a grisly urchin of twelve, who was his express image. People understood that Tellson's, in a stately way, tolerated the odd-job-man. The house had always tolerated some person in that capacity, and time and tide had drifted this person to the post. His surname was Cruncher, and on the youthful occasion of his renouncing by proxy the works of darkness, in the easterly parish church of Houndsditch, he had received the added appellation of Jerry.

The scene was Mr. Cruncher's private lodging in Hanging-sword-alley, Whitefriars; the time, half past seven of the clock on a windy March morning, Anno Domini seventeen hundred and eighty. Mr. Cruncher himself always rose with the lark, and so did his wife; and it was the latter's kettle that hissed first, while the Clarence ears dozed from the invention of a popular game, by a lady who had bestowed her name upon the Bank.

Mr. Cruncher's apartments were not in a savory neighborhood, and were but two in number, even if a closet with a single pane of glass in it might be counted as one. But they were very decently kept. Early as it was, on the windy March morning, the room in which he lay abed was already scrubbed throughout; and between the eyes and nostrils, the singular process of dressing and eating a herring did not linger.

Mr. Cruncher reposed under a patchwork counterpane, like a Harlequin at home. At first, he lay still enough, but, by degrees, he got himself into a sitting posture, and then he raised his head and listened. No doubt in consequence of that unwholesome training, he took a very decided view of things.

Mr. Cruncher's first remark was strongly laconic, but it was not his only one. He discharged it at his wife, who lay asleep with her face towards him, and his back towards the door. He had recourse to it, three times before it awoke her, and then she said, starting up:

"What's o'clock?"

"Six."

"Only six?"

"And a wet six."

"I should have thought it was later."

"Well, it wasn't."

"What's the weather?"

"I don't look at it."

"Are you going to get up?"

"In course."

"Then, why don't you?"

"Because I don't mean to."

"Oh, indeed!"

"Yes, indeed."

"Don't aggravate!"

"I'm not."

"Then, why do you?"

"I tell you, I'm not."

"You're a brute, Jerry."

"Well, I'm paid for it."

"Not that you care, I know."

"I don't."

"You've no feelings."

"Not a bit."

"Nor nothing human?"

"Not a morsel."

"How long," said Mrs. Cruncher, with a hitch in her voice, "do you mean to lie there?"

"Long enough."

"Well, then, I warn you that I'm going to get up."

"Go it!"

"Do you intend to get up?"

"Not at present."

"Nor nothing shall induce you?"

"Nothing."

"Not even," said Mrs. Cruncher, beginning to whimper, "not even the prospect of your breakfast?"

"Breakfast," said Mr. Cruncher, yielding to the temptation, "is a thing I enjoy."

"Then, why don't you get up?"

"Because I don't mean to."

"Oh, dear me, dear me, what a fate mine is, to be sure! Other women's husbands get up, and make their own breakfasts, and clean their own boots, and fetch their own hot water, and enjoy their breakfasts, and their wives lie lazy in bed. Other women's husbands don't stick in bed, when they're told to get up, and perish their wives' lives with their slothful ways. Other women's husbands—"

"Now, look here, old woman," said Mr. Cruncher, breaking in with a growl, and a strong shake of himself, "you've had your say, and you've had mine. Now, I'll tell you what it is, I'm a-going to get up, and I'm a-going to have my breakfast, and I'm a-going to clean my boots, and I'm a-going to work, and I'm a-going to keep myself to myself, and you'll keep yourself to yourself, and you'll be the better for it."

"Better for you, I suppose?"

"Yes, better for me, and better for you."

"Better for you, I suppose?"

"Yes, better for you."

"Then, I tell you what, Jerry, I'll have a good cup of tea."

Mr. Cruncher, with a grunt, which seemed to express that he had known she would, and that he had no doubt she would be the ruin of him, got out of bed, and began to dress himself. He was a tall man, with a large head, and a fell development of muscle about the back and shoulders; his face was stronger than prepossessing, and his hair was coarse and straight. He brushed it in a backward direction, and stuck it behind his ears; but, as it instantly reversed itself, and shot forward all round his head, he had no shorter way of smoothing it than by standing on his head before the looking-glass. That feat brought his face into such favorable contrast with the reflection of his own face that he looked all round at his wife, as if she had been the mirror, and he were about to kiss her; but she was yet lying in bed, and he held back.

Mrs. Cruncher was one of those wives who are regarded by their husbands in general, at once as bores and oracles. She was an amazing woman for her size, and was regarded as such by all who knew her. She had very little to say for herself, but she said it with great force. She was a woman of a firm face, of a pale complexion, and of an inflammatory temperament, which showed itself occasionally in her eyes, but rarely extended any further. She had already got her cup of tea, and was pouring out another cup for herself, when Mr. Cruncher began to clean his boots.

"Now, Jerry," she said, "you've got to go to Tellson's to-day. You've been there before, and they'll want you there again. You'll be sure to be wanted. What with your fishing, and what with your hawking, and what with your business, you're always wanted. Mind, I tell you beforehand, I won't have it. Here's your breakfast. Eat it."

Mr. Cruncher took his place at the table, and took a bite and a gulp, and then a look at his wife, who was intently watching him.

"Now, Jerry," she said, "I'm not a-going to tell you that you're a fool, because you're my husband, and you'd be the first to resent it. But I'll tell you what, I'll tell you what, I'll tell you what, and voice," said Jerry. "I leave you to judge whether a damp way of carrying a living mine is."

"Well, well," said the old clerk; "we all have our various ways of gaining a livelihood. Some of us have damp ways, and some of us have dry ways. Here is the letter. Go along."

Jerry took the letter, and, remarking to himself with less internal deference than he made an outward show of, "You are a fine old one, too," made his bow, informed his son, in passing, of his destinations, and went his way.

They hanged at Tyburn, in those days, so the street outside Newgate had not obtained one infamous notoriety that has since attached to it. But the jail was a vile place, in which most kinds of debauchery and villainy were practised, and where dire diseases were bred, that came into court with the prisoners, and sometimes reached even the bench of the wig Lord Chief Justice himself, and pulled him off the bench. It had more than once happened that the judge in the black cap pronounced his own doom as certainly as the prisoner's, and even died before him. For the rest, the Old Bailey was famous as a kind of deadly inn-yard, from which pale travellers set out continually, to be seen at reaches, on a violent passage into the other world: traversing some two miles and a half of public streets and road, and shaming few good citizens, if any. So powerful is use, and so destructive to good use in the human mind, it was famous, too, for the pillory, a wise old institution, that subjected a criminal to a punishment of little else but shame; also, for the whipping-post, another dear old institution, very humanizing and softening to behold in action; also, for extensive transactions in blood-money, another fragment of ancient wisdom, quite essentially leading to the most frightful mercenary crimes that could be committed under Heaven. Altogether, the Old Bailey, at that day, was a choice illustration of the precept, that "Whatever is is right," that aphorism had not then got final as it is large, did it not include the troublesome consequence, that nothing that ever was was wrong.

Making his way through the tainted crowd, dispersed as usual down this latitude and direction, with the skill of a man accustomed to make his way quietly, the messenger found out the door he sought, and handed in his letter through a trap in it. For people then paid to see the play of the Old Bailey, just as they paid to see the play in Bedlam—only the former entertainment was much the dearer. Therefore, all the Old Bailey doors were well guarded—except, indeed, the social doors by which the criminals got in, and they were always left wide open.

After some delay and demur, the door grudgingly turned on its hinges a very little way, and allowed Mr. Jerry Cruncher to squeeze himself into court.

"What's on?" he asked, in a whisper, of the man he found himself next to.

"Nothing yet."

"What's coming on?"

"The Treason case."

"The quartering one, eh?"

"Ah!" returned the man, with a relish; "he'll be drawn on a hurdle to be half hanged, and then he'll be taken down and sliced before his own face, and his inside will be taken out and burned while he looks on, and then his head will be chopped off, and he'll be cut into quarters. That's the sentence."

"If he's found Guilty, you mean to say," Jerry added, by way of proviso.

"Oh! they'll find him Guilty," said the other. "Don't you be afraid of that."

Mr. Cruncher's attention was here diverted to the door-keeper, whom he saw making his way to Mr. Lorry with the note in his hand. Mr. Lorry sat at a table, among the gentlemen in wigs: not far from a wigged gentleman, the prisoner's counsel, who had a great bundle of papers before him: and acutely opposite another wigged gentleman with his hands in his pockets, whose whole attention, when Mr. Cruncher looked at him afterwards, seemed to be concentrated on the ceiling of the court. After some grroll coughing and rubbing of red hair and snuffling in his hat, Jerry managed to attract the notice of Mr. Lorry, who had stood up to look for him, read the note, quickly nodded, and sat down.

"What's he got to do with the case?" asked the man he had spoken with.

"Blest if I know," said Jerry.

"Whether he's got to do with it or not, if he's a person may inspire—"

"Blest if I know that, either," said Jerry.

The entrance of the Judge, and a consequent great stir and settling- down in the court, stopped the dialogue. Presently the case on which came the central point of interest. Two jailers, who had been standing there, went out, and the prisoner was brought in and put to the bar.

Every body present, except the one wigged gentleman who looked at the ceiling, looked at him. All the human breath in the place rolled at him like a sea, or a wind, or a forest, or surface strained round pillars and corners to get a sight of him; spectators in back rows stood up, not to see better or hear better, but merely to be sure that the man was there. Conspicuous on the floor of the court lay their hands on the shoulders of the people before them, with which, themselves, at any body's cost, to a view of him—stood on-tiptoe, got upon ledges, stood upon nothing, to see every inch of him. Conspicuous among these latter, like an animated bit of the spiked wall of Newgate, Jerry stood, pinning at the prisoner the beery breath of a whet he had taken to be equal to the labour of discharging it to mingle with the waves of other beer, and gin, and tea, and coffee, and what not, that flowed at him, and drowned whole upon the great windows behind him in an impure mist and rain.

The object of all this staring and blaring was a young man of about five-and-twenty, well-grown and well-looking, with a sun-burned cheek and a dark eye. His condition was that of a young gentleman. He was plainly dressed in black, or very dark grey, and his hair, which was long and dark, was gathered in a ribbon at the back of his neck: more to be out of his way than for ornament. As an emotion of the mind will express itself through any covering of the body, so his manner bespoke his situation superadded cause through the brown spun linen cloth, showing the soil to be unfavourable for the sun. He was otherwise quite self-possessed, bowed to the Judge, and stood upright.

The sort of interest with which this man was stared and breathed at was not a sort that elicited sympathy. Had he stood there for a less horrible sentence—had there been a chance of any one of its savage penalties falling short—he would have lost in his fascination. The form that was to be doomed to be so shamefully mangled was the sight; the immortal creature that was to be so butchered and torn asunder yielded the sensation. Whether the savage old laws spectators put upon the interest, according to their several arts and powers of realizing what they see, it was all the same. Ogrelish.

Silence in the court! Charles Darnay had yesterday pleaded Not Guilty to an indictment denouncing him (with infinite jingle and jangle) for that he was a false traitor to our Sovereign Lord the King, whose Majesty he had, as well as divers other subjects of our Lord the King, unlawfully, traitorously, and devilishly, by words and writing, within five years last past, broadly instigated, conspired, and stirred up to withdraw from the allegiance of our said Lord the King, whose Majesty he had, as well as divers other subjects of our said Lord the King, unlawfully, traitorously, and devilishly, by words and writing, within the said five years, also

THE MAN OF SUCCESS.

By Nicholas P. Gilman.

THE man who thinks he balances
The world upon his nose;
Who, in a dream of weak conceit,
Thought life eternally great;
Oh! he will one day waken,
And find himself surprised
By some neglected trial,
Working silently and fast!

The man who means to win his way,
And rise in spite of fate,
Must husband all his energies,
And work, and watch, and wait.
He must not be eagerly expectant
For its rather will he known,
But will perform it and turn footmarks,
All his Spring and Summer clothes.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, 140 and 142

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, } NEW-YORK.
ROBERT L. SMITH, }
J. SMITH BECK. }

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

LA TOURETTE HOUSE,

Corner Forty-Second Street and Fourth Avenue, N. Y.

Will be Ready for the Reception of Visitors on the 1st of May.

This fashionable Summer Hotel is beautifully situated, on the banks of the Harlem River, which is spanned by the Excellent Harlem, Suspension, Railroad and Spring on the Fourth Avenue, and Second and Third Avenue Cars running New York, and the Old Boston can be conveyed on a hotel to town, as it takes no longer time (only 25 minutes) by steamboat to reach it, than to go from South Ferry to Union Square.

☞ 5000 AGENTS WANTED—To sell 4 new inventions. Agents have made from $5 to $10 per day on one,—other than all other similar agencies. Send four stamps and get particulars. Address
EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

☞ AGENTS WANTED in this State to canvass with the Genuine Saxon. Sells rapidly. Can make good pay. For terms, &c., send stamp.
J. C. WHITNEY, Leverett, Mass.

PHOTOGRAPHY, COMPLETE APPARATUS, $25 (all of the best make), with a full supply of Materials and Instructions for Practising. Also, Stereoscopic Pictures, &c. Packed and sent to any address.
C. J. FOX, 631 Broadway, New York.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of

1500 Pages and

1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

A New Edition Rapidly

Carrying the History to the Present Time.

The preparation of this work occupied the Author more than three years, during which he traversed nearly TEN THOUSAND MILES, in order to visit the prominent scenes of the Revolution, gather up local traditions, and explore records and histories.

The first object of the Author was to reproduce the history of the American Revolution in such an attractive manner as to induce the people of all classes to read the wonderful story, and become familiar with the founders of the Republic and the acts of their fathers. The success which it has been arranged and set forth renders it the most popular work of the kind ever issued from the publisher of American history.

Explanatory maps and plans are on every page, and also a biographical sketch of every man distinguished in the events of the Revolution.

A copious table of Index is given at the close of each Second Volume, embracing eighty-five closely-printed pages, in itself a complete synopsis of the History, Men and Biography of the period of our Revolutionary History, and will be found invaluable to the reader and student.

The work contains all the essential facts of the early history of our Republic, which are scattered through scores of volumes, in public and private libraries in all parts of the country. It forms a complete Guide-Book to the tourist seeking for those localities which are memorable in the early annals of the country.

Upward of THIRTY THOUSAND DOLLARS were expended in the preparation of these works. The exquisite engravings, prepared under the immediate supervision of the Author, from his own drawings, constitute a prominent feature in printing. To this end the efforts of the Publishers have been directed, and they have succeeded in presenting to the public a work of more than ordinary typographical beauty.

The Author and Publishers have received compliments of letters, approving the work, from EDWARD EVERETT, JARED SPARKS, WASHINGTON IRVING, GEORGE BANCROFT, and many other distinguished men, fully competent to judge of its merits.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a special District will be given, to be, independently effected. Applications for agencies from the Country would prefer. For full particulars address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

PURIFIED BY THE CHEMICAL ACTION OF
BRANDRETH'S PILLS
PURIFIES THE BLOOD, AND CANNOT FAIL
TO CURE WHEN ENFORCED
IN TIME,
AND LET ME SAY THAT THIS KNOWLEDGE IS A SECOND GIFT OF GOD TO CHRISTIANITY IN THE PRESENT AGE, IT IS CAPABLE OF CONFERRING UPON MANKIND, LET NOT MISTAKEN ECONOMY PUT ON THE GRANUS. BETTS PILLS ARE A QUICK REMEDY, IT IS INDUCED THING, SELDOM YOU FIND A PHYSICIAN WHO WILL GIVE THESE MEN FOR FIVE SHILLINGS
COULD NOT SUPPLY FOR ONE DOLLAR.
THE PROPRIETORS ARE ANXIOUS TO HAVE IT PERFORMED IN MY OWN LABORATORY WHERE A STEAM ENGINE IS EMPLOYED, AND EVERY IMPROVEMENT FOR HEALING IN FACT GIVE YOU SUCH AS WAS ENJOYED BY THE MILLIONS OF OUR FELLOW CITIZENS
DR BRANDRETH'S PRINCIPAL OFFICE
294 CANAL STREET NEW YORK
AND BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

New Styles.

From $50 to $125.

SINGER'S FAMILY MACHINE, the price of which is only $50, is a light and elegant Lock-Stitch Machine, capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

SINGER'S STANDARD MACHINES for manufacturing purposes are well known to be without a successful rival in the market. Much has recently been published in regard to various machines made by Singer Machines. Singer's Machines make the best stitch ever invented, and do it in the best manner. A pamphlet discussing this question, sent free.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be sent gratis.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

WATER COOLERS! WATER COOLERS!—THE FAMILY JAR.—Although the use of fliers in the house would have a chilling effect, the Family Jar is perfect for cellar, country cottage-house, and manufactories. For sale wholesale and retail at 4 and 6 Barling Slip, New York.
LUCIUS HART.

FIREWORKS.

Hadfield's Firework Agency.

Removed from the Old Stand, corner of Spruce and Nassau Streets, to

No. 24 John Street,

Between Broadway and Nassau Streets.

PORTE and Family Fireworks Manufactured.

☞ All works warranted. ☜

GEORGE PARSONS, Agent.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR FLOWER, FRUIT, ORNAMENTAL CONIFERÆ, and BRIDAL SETS, at 361 Broadway, 2 doors from Franklin Street.

Energetic Agents wanted for all parts of America.

MACK R. BARNITZ,
United States

PUBLISHING HOUSE,

68 and 60 West Seventh Street, Cincinnati,

Publish a choice selection of Splendid Books, Maps and Charts, Beautifully Illustrated with Colored Engravings Great Inducements offered. Published by Subscription only, and sold by Agents.

THE SUPERIOR
Steam-ballot
Coffee
Mill.
Cafe de Costa Rica
C & C
For sale by
No 5 Bowery
Agent.

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

What is it? Do not dread!

Thousands of persons have Piles—suffer for years with the disease—yet few know what it is, or how it is cured. Dr. Brandreth's Pills are a perfect cure for Piles, in the most aggravated form. They have been tested by thousands in all parts of the world, and invariably, upon commencing the use of the celebrated vegetable Pills, the distressing symptoms of the abdominal viscera disappear. The pile-doctor, the engorgement, dilation of the veins, formation of tumors, hemorrhoids, pain and soreness of the parts, are relieved only by judiciously cured by medicines which, taken internally, relieve the liver of obstruction and congestion, hence ointments, washes, and even injections, are as injudicious.

HUMPHREYS' HOMŒPATHIC PILE SPECIFIC, a simple remedy in pill, which cures Piles in all forms. Prepared from the drug by curing them of every form of disease dependent upon Piles have been cured by it, to one of the most distressing cases. All will be promptly forwarded by Dr. Price, 50 cents a box.

N. B.—A full set of HUMPHREYS' HOMŒPATHIC SPECIFICS, with book of directions, in Morocco-lined Pocket Case, 2 dozen vials, and 2 of sixteen each, $25; in plain case, 2 dozen vials, and 15 boxes and book, $15.

The Remedies may be sent by mail, or will call, and, on any address by mail or express, free of charge, on receipt of the price.

DR. F. HUMPHREYS & CO.,
No. 562 Broadway, New York.

Sold by all Druggists.

PATENT FOROUS PLASTERS STRENGTHENING

THESE PLASTERS ARE FULL WITH THE VIRTUES OF INGREDIENTS, WHICH, BY MEANS OF MOISTURE UNDER THE SKIN, AND GIVE RELIEF WHEN THEY ARE SOON AFFECTED BY THE HEAT OF THE BODY.

ARE APPLIED, WE HAVE SEEN A MAN WALK WITH EASE FROM THE SEVENTH TO LUDGATE HILL, STRAIGHTEN UP AND WALK ERECT, CLOTHES WERE PUT ON WHEN HE WAS ONCE UNABLE TO STAND.

ONE OUNCE USED, AS ANTIDOTE, AND ALL PAINS IN THE CHEST AND SIDE, IN ADDITION OF THE BREAST THEY ACT AND IN ALL CASES WHERE OTHER PLASTERS ARE INVALUABLE. PREVENTING TENSION AND SWELLING, CHANGES OF WEATHER. THESE PLASTERS ARE HIGHLY RECOMMENDED FOR ALL DISEASES. THEY HAVE PURVIEWED A FEW SIX PRINTED BILLS OF DIRECTIONS.

Sold by ALLCOCK & Co.

19 Cash Drug,

NEW-YORK,

AND BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

N. B. LAST THREE MONTHS 1000 BOXES A DAY SOLD.

Sold also at Barnum's, 326 Bowery, and Junkon's, 417 Broadway.

Charles Grobe's New Method FOR THE PIANO FORTE.

Mr. Grobe is so well known, that any remarks as to its merits would be superfluous. Suffice it to say, that it has been published to The New Method a work fully commensurate with the reputation of its author, and justly due to the public, and as the result of a long and careful experience of the author, it is irresistible to Teacher and Pupil. Simple, intelligible, and thorough, the Pupil is led by easy, pleasant, and gradual means to the desired end. The work is also remarkable completeness of its works of instruction is straighter avoided, and the Pupil-Teacher finds it to be the most simple, progressive, and judicious system of instruction extant. The work is confined to several pieces illustrating the different positions of the hands and fingers. The type is large and beautiful, and the paper of the finest quality. The work is published in two books, and bound in boards. Price $2.00; in Cloth, $2.50. Copies will be sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the market price. The trade supplied. A handsome discount to Teachers and Seminaries.

FETTER, POND & CO., 547 Broadway, New York.

LEE & WALKER, Philadelphia.

Lord Ward's Worcestershire Sauce.

IS THE TRUE ORIGINAL AND GENUINE. Is excellent for all purposes.

ASK FOR, and HAVE ONLY LORD WARD'S.

Used at every Hotel, and sold by all Grocers and Civil Dealers.

Wholesale and for Exportation, by

CROSSE & BLACKWELL, Purveyors to the Queen,
46 Broad Street, New York.

Sold Retail by the Grocers and Druggists throughout the Union. Pints, 50 cents per bottle; Pints, 50 cents per bottle.

Something New.

Agents wanted, to go into a New and Honorable Business, which will pay from $25 to $50 weekly.

No Humbug.

Satisfaction guaranteed. Send stamp for particulars, which are free.

S. M. PETRICK & CO., Lynn, Mass.

A Book for the Drawing-Room, the Artist, or the Mechanic.

THE LONDON ART JOURNAL.

A MONTHLY RECORD (PRICE 75 CTS., OF THE Fine Arts, the Arts Industrially Applied to Manufactures, and the Progress of Art in all Countries, published on the first of each month, and forwarded free by mail.

EIGHT ENGRAVINGS. Two of these pictures, one of a work in progress. Thirty literary contributions. ARTICLES OF ART EXHIBITIONS, Essays on BRITISH ARTISTS, ILLUSTRATED, together with a large amount of valuable information on matters connected with PAINTING, ENGRAVING, &c., &c., and forms a complete monthly record of the Fine Arts and the Arts Industrial.

VIRTUE, EMMINS & CO., 26 John Street, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,

The Best Spring Alterative and Tonic.

We take pleasure in reminding our numerous friends that the Season is now arrived when most Medicinal Results may be obtained from the use of the most excellent Spring Medicine for purifying the Blood, Invigorating the System, and for effecting a complete change of Blood, and Restoring Health and Vigor.

Prepared and sold by

A. B. & D. SANDS, 160 Fulton Street.

Sold by Druggists everywhere.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Franklin Square, N. Y.,

Have just Published:

ALFORD'S GREEK TESTAMENT. The Greek Testament; with the Various Readings at the Bottom of the Page, Prolegomena: Marginal References to Verbal and Idiomatic Usage, Prolegomena to each Book, and Critical and Exegetical Commentary. For the Use of Theological Students and Ministers. By HENRY ALFORD, B.D., Minister of Quebec Chapel, London, and late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. In 4 vols. Containing the Four Gospels. 734 pages, 8vo. Muslin, $5 00; Sheep extra, $6 00; Half Calf extra, $7 00.

HUMBOLDT'S COSMOS. Cosmos. A Sketch of a Physical Description of the Universe. By ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. Translated from the German by E. C. OTTE and W. S. DALLAS, F.L.S. Vol. V. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

ANCIENT MINERALOGY; or, An Inquiry respecting Human Knowledge concerning Minerals possessed by the Occasional Remarks on the Uses to which they were Applied, By the Rev. JOHN MILLER, Professor of Columbia College. A New and Revised Edition. 12mo. Muslin, $1 00.

THE BERTRAMS. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Doctor Thorne." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

LEVER'S GERALD FITZGERALD. Gerald Fitzgerald, "The Chevalier." A Novel. By Charles Lever, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Glennore," "The Daltons," "Jack Hinton," "Harry Lorrequer," "Maurice Tierney," &c. Part I. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY. OFFICE 121 BROADWAY.

MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE.

Assets $800,000.

This Company continues to do an exclusive marchandize business, and has returned to its dealers, out of the profits of the year 1858, a dividend of Forty-five per Cent.—Six per Cent. interest on the outstanding original capital, and has reduced the Contingent of the same to 1858.

ALFRED EDWARDS, President.
WILLIAM H. LUDOWEY, Vice President.
BENJAMIN A. OGDENDON, Secretary.

To Teachers

My Correspondents are requested to address me, hereafter, to the "CARE of HARPER & BROTHERS, New York City." Also, all Communications for Music, Sunday and Post-Office Address of Schools, Educational Boards, &c., are solicited. MARCUS RAFFLEE.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 20 to 80 pages—and from one-third to one-half more reading than any other in the country.

Commencement of Volume XIX.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR JUNE.

With the present Number HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE enters upon the TENTH YEAR of its publication. In the course of that period, the objects and manner in which they are carried out, are now so well known, that it is unnecessary for the Publishers to announce to any of the Magazine in the usual manner. It will be their endeavor not to lessen, but to increase the excellence of the style and gaze, the conservative and patriotic, who form a large majority of the intelligent readers of this country.

The Editorial Departments of the Magazine will present the same characteristics as heretofore. The "Table" will be divested genres themes of historical or ethical interest; the "Easy Chair" will continue to discuss the social and aesthetic topics of the day as it sees fit; "Editor's Drawer" will continue to present the best of the new humor, and the "Literary Record" will chronicle events of political and literary interest. The Publishers have also secured the services of several of the leading books, as they issue from the press, the "Drawer" will by favor of numerous friends, be enriched with the best humorous story of odd, humorous, or pathetic anecdotes, sayings, and reminiscences, that may be communicated. Under the special charge of one member of the Editorial Corps; while the Record of Current Events will embrace each new art, and every contributor, in order to ensure that nothing fresh and important shall escape the notice of those of the Magazine.

The Illustrations will still be mainly filled with original designs, upon accessible subjects, published by American authors, the Publishers will also present from time to time such engravings as may be issued in any part of special interest or value. The Magazine, containing at least one-third more reading than any other published in the country, will be able to give an Essay by Macaulay or Carlyle, a Story by Dickens or Thackeray, Travels, Story, or Reade, or a Tale by Miss Mulock, Mrs. Gaskell, or Wilkie Collins, and still contain a greater amount matter than any of its contemporaries.

The Publishers have made arrangements upon American terms for the early publication of the Sheets of the Serial Issues of the Magazine. These will be continued on the present liberal scale, and the publication of the Magazine has been faithfully illustrated by pen and pencil.

In making the selection from the mass of matter continually placed in their hands, the Editors will be influenced solely by the best judgment of the literary and artistic world, wholly irrespective of their nationality. Subscribers may rely upon the same care and the same consideration as those from the most intimate friends of the Editors. No one upon the premises will be under bias by refusing to examine contributions from those whose communications are not desired. The Publishers will spare no pains to make the Magazine worthy of its increasing and freshness; for many of the most valuable articles which it has contained have been furnished by persons who were unknown to the Editors and to the public.

The remarkable success of the Magazine induces corresponding duties upon the Publishers. At no former period have their facilities been so great, or they and they pledge themselves that no effort or expense shall be spared to make the Magazine still more a welcome guest and increase of the favor with which it has uniformly met.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, to one address, for one year, $5.

The Postage upon HARPER'S MAGAZINE must be paid quarterly in advance at the receiving. The Postage is Thirty-six cents per year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER,

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2.50 A YEAR.

The Publishers have the pleasure of announcing that they have just completed the Stereotype of Five Thousand Dollars, the early proofsheets of MR. CHARLES DICKENS' NEW STORY, entitled A TALE OF TWO CITIES," Splendidly illustrated by MCLENAN, the publication of which will commence in HARPER'S WEEKLY of May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

The Publishers are happy to announce that they have also made arrangements for the publication of an Illustrated Story, entitled "THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH," by GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS, Author of "The Potiphar Papers." This story will begin with the first of the first Number reported in HARPER'S WEEKLY for April 9.

As HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE Numbers are being constantly reprinted and may be obtained at any time,

A Perusal of HARPER'S WEEKLY will keep persons living in the country constantly posted on the events of the day. No other publication gives so much and so interesting matter, or has the same freshness of the times in which we live.

Subscription of HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for Twenty Weeks	2 00
One Copy for One Year	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	15 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	29 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to advertise for three Months or more.

☞ The Postage in the State of New York wishing to HARPER'S WEEKLY left at their houses, will please send to the Office of Publication, or to HARPER & BROTHERS, and the amount necessary, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

JOHN BULL. "Whist! fighting again! I suppose I must thrash some of the Fellows."
BROTHER JONATHAN. "Keep cool, John; let them fight away—it's about all they're good for, I reckon; and let you and me keep on our little business, and sell 'em Beef, and Bread, and Dry Goods."

SARDINIA'S CHALLENGE TO AUSTRIA.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A New Book
By Dr. J. W. FISHER.
The NEW and the OLD;
Or, California and India in Romantic Aspects. By the Author of "Up and Down the Irraweddi; or, The Golden Dagon." Abundantly Illustrated. Muslin, 12mo, $1 25.
 Sent by mail on receipt of price.
RUDD & CARLETON, 130 Grand Street, N. Y.

COZZENS'
West Point Hotel
is
NOW OPEN.

Masser's 5 Minute
ICE CREAM FREEZERS,
As Improved for 1859.
With Stamped Iron Covers and Bottoms—Tinned.
The only Freezer known which is constructed on true Scientific principles.
The Cheapest, Best, and most Economical, requiring less ice and less labor than any other, being at the same time the most durable in structure, and most certain in its operations.
Sole Agents for the United States,
E. KETCHAM & CO.,
Manufacturers of Japanned and Finished Tin Ware, 189 Pearl Street, New York.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure Assistance and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

Love Me Little, Love Me Long.
A NOVEL.
By CHARLES READE,
Author of "Peg Woffington," "Christie Johnstone," "Never too Late to Mend," &c., &c.
12mo. Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

Odd, satirical, brilliant, subtle, picturesque, delightful, and thoroughly Reade-ish throughout. Virginia Index (Richmond)

We do not remember any thing in fiction more admirably managed than the character of the heroine.—Scottish American Journal.

It maintains an absorbing continuity of interest, and reveals a thorough mastery of dramatic narrative.—Evening Post.

We are delighted to find this the best of his remarkable works.—N. Y. Christian.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles) on receipt of price.

409 BROADWAY.

BALLOU'S FRENCH YORK SHIRT EMPORIUM,
409 Broadway,
(Premium Shirt Manufacturers.
Shirts made to order from Scientific Measures, of the best materials, sewed by hand, and warranted to fit, at less than the usual prices.
BALLOU BROTHERS, 409 Broadway, N. Y.
"Sole Manufacturers of THE FRENCH YORK SHIRT."

CURE FOR CONSTIPATION.
The Oriental Fruit Paste, or Aromatic Jelly of Figs and Senna,
Is a simple and efficacious laxative medicine, pleasant to the taste, and good at all times.
Sold by Druggists every where.
J. W. NORCROSS & CO., Wholesale Agents,
91 Fulton Street, New York.

GIFTS! GIFTS! GIFTS!—D. W. EVANS & CO., No. 617 Broadway, New York—The Fifth Year—The Original Gift Book Store, established 1854.
THE ORDER ESTABLISHED GIFT BOOK HOUSE in the country, enabled by their long experience and increased capital, now offer greater inducements than ever before, and in this,
THE FIFTH YEAR
of their location in New York City, will make it their endeavor to conduct their business with a liberality beyond that of any house in the country.
A new and revised catalogue now ready for gratuitous distribution, containing the largest and best classified list of Standard and Miscellaneous Publications ever issued in this or any other country, which will be forwarded to order and agents. MAILED FREE TO ADDRESS.
The following is a schedule of Property which will be given to Purchasers of Books at the time of sale:

	WORTH FROM
Gold Watches, English Lever, Patent Lever, and Lepinet	$30 00 to $100 00
Silver Watches, Patent Lever, Full Jewelled, Hunting Cases, open face, and Cylinder Escapement	12 00 to 40 00
Gold Lockets—Large size, four glasses and two glasses with spring—large and small size, with snap	2 50 to 12 00
Cameo, Mosaic, Florentine, Painted, Lava, Goldstone, Garnet and Coral Sets, Pins and Ear Rings	5 00 to 25 00
Ladies' Gold Guard Chains, Neck Chains, Chatelaines	8 00 to 15 00
Gents' Fob and Vest Chains	10 00 to 30 00
Sets Cameo, Goldstone, Painted, Mosaic, Garnet, Onyx, Engraved and Plain Gold Sleeve Buttons, and Bosom Studs	2 00 to 10 00
Gold Pencils with Pens, large, medium and small size	3 50 to 7 50
Silver Pencils with Gold Pens, large, medium and small size, double and single extension case	2 00 to 5 00
Gold Thimbles, Plain, Engraved, Leather Gold, Chased and Plain Rings	1 00 to 7 00
Gents' Gold Bosom Pins, Cluster, with Opal, Scarf Pins, Onyx, Garnet, &c.	2 50 to 6 00
Rich Silk Dress Patterns	12 00 to 30 00
Cameo, Mosaic, Coral, Garnet, Chased and Plain Oval Bracelets	6 00 to 30 00
Silver and Gold Thimbles	50 to 6 00
Gents' Pen and Pocket-Knife	50 to 1 50
Pearl and Morocco Portemonnaies	50 to 2 50
Toothpicks, Watch Keys, Guard Slides	1 50 to 9 00
Gold Cross, Medium and large size	2 00 to 7 00

Beside other Gifts, comprising a large and valuable assortment of miscellaneous articles, varying from $1 to $40.
One of the above articles will be given to the purchaser of each book at the time the book is sold.
Address all orders, letters of inquiry, &c., to D. W. EVANS & CO., Publishers, No. 617 Broadway, N. Y. City.

'OLD DOMINION.'

If you want DELICIOUS COFFEE always, and at a saving of from forty to fifty per cent., get an "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT. Over sixty different styles and varieties are manufactured. The "OLD DOMINION" TEA POT takes only half the usual quantity of Tea. You will save the price of either in two months, and secure daily a table luxury prized above all others.
☞ Sold by Dealers in Housekeeping articles, and Stove Manufacturers.
ARTHUR, BURNHAM, & GILROY,
Manufacturers and Importers, 65 Cliff Street, Philadelphia.
Also, Manufacturers under the Patents of ARTHUR'S SELF-SEALING FRUIT CANS AND JARS.

FINKLE & LYON'S
FAMILY
SEWING MACHINES.
Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other Sewing Machine in this Market, or money refunded.
☞ Send for Circular.
MILTON FINKLE, LEWIS LYON, } 503 BROADWAY.

PRINCE IMPERIAL
CHAMPAGNE,
FROM
DE VENOGE & CO., EPERNAY, FRANCE,
as used at the
IMPERIAL TABLES ON THE CONTINENT OF EUROPE.
A Perfectly Pure and Delicate Wine
at a moderate price and admirably adapted for family use.
Sold by
H. A. KERR, No. 746 Broadway; J. S. PIERCE, No. 616 Broadway; HOWELL & CO., No. 693 Broadway; MACY & CO., No. 319 6th Av.; CORWIN & CO., corner of Broadway and 59th Street; SHAW & CROSBY, No. 19 Spring Street; and by nearly every leading Hotel and Dealer throughout the country.
E. V. HAUGHWOUT, Sole Importer,
Corner of Broadway and Broome Street.

GOODYEAR'S PATENT.
India Rubber Pens,
Made entirely of Rubber, are for sale by Booksellers, Stationers, Dealers in Rubber Goods, and
The India Rubber Pen Co.,
57 Liberty Street, N. Y.
Price, post-paid, Three Dollars per gross.

Grand Introduction of
SUMMER HATS,
At Genin's, 507 Broadway,
On Wednesday, May 25th, 1859.
Embracing every Department of Hatting, and comprehending
HATS OF ALL STYLES,
ALL MATERIALS,
ALL PRICES,
AND FOR ALL PURPOSES.

JAMES E. CALDWELL & CO.,
822 Chestnut Street,
Opposite Girard House,
Philadelphia.
Fine Watches, Rich Jewelry, Silver Ware, Sterling.
Bronzes and Bronze.
Chiefly of our own importation and manufacture.
Strangers visiting the city are invited to visit our establishment.

E. A. BROOKS.
575 Broadway—150 Fulton Street.
Constantly on hand, French Calf-Skin and Patent Leather Boots, Shoes and Gaiters, made with Dick's Patent Elastic Shanks, and Congress Gaiter Boots; also, a large assortment of Ladies' and Children's Gaiters and Shoes, Waterproof and Cork Sole Boots, Prospect Gloss and Leather Over-Shoes.
Boys' and Youths' Boots, Shoes and Over-Shoes.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.
DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.
DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.
The Remedy of the Times,
The Remedy of the Age,
The Remedy of the Season.
Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Bronchitis, Whooping Cough, Croup, Inflammation of the Throat, Lungs, and Chest, Influenza and Consumption, are all cured by this incomparable remedy.
Beware of counterfeits, and purchase only that bearing the written signature of "I. Butts," as well as the printed one of the Proprietors, BUTTS & DAVIS & CO., 16 Tremont Street, Boston, on the outer wrapper.
BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.
BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.
BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.
Sold everywhere.

Save Your Carpets
From Wear and Moth.
The attention of Housekeepers is respectfully called to the Preparations advertised for preserving carpets from paper, straw, or any other article used under carpets, Oil-cloth, or Matting. It prevents the Carpet against any unevenness in the floor, and is warranted to keep out any moth or insect that may be in the floor. Its cheapness puts it within the reach of all. To be had of any of the principal Carpet Stores, and at the salerooms of the Manufacturers, NORTH AMERICAN TRADING CO. 69 Wurtz Street, corner College Place, J. R. HARRINGTON, Agt.

$32 50 PER QUARTER
ASHLAND INST. and MUSICAL ACADEMY, Ashland, Mass. Students received any time. For particulars, address Rev. HIRAM J. FOX, A.M., Ashland, N. Y., or D. G. HUBBARD, Esq., 53 Broadway.

Excelsior Fireworks.
Funston & Scofield,
General Agents,
62 John Street.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 128.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TALKING FISH.

We engrave herewith a learned seal, or talking fish, which is now being exhibited in England. It has long been well known to naturalists that the phoca, or common seal, when taken young, is susceptible of education, and can be taught to obey the word of command. The animal whose portrait we present herewith—like some similar creatures which have been exhibited in this country—fires and lies down when ordered by its keeper; performs a marine dance with its tail; kisses the benevolent individual who looks after its comfort; and has made such progress in elocution as to pronounce pretty distinctly the words "Papa" and "Mamma." The keeper tells the usual wonderful stories about its intelligence; assures a wondering public that its last despairing, heart-rending cry—when it was captured—was "Mamma!" This our readers are at liberty to believe if they choose. Certain it seems that animals of this race are susceptible of very considerable education. It is well known that many varieties of fresh-water fish—such as carp, perch, gold fish, and even pickerel—can be taught to come at the word of command, and, when properly trained, will eat out of the hand of their master. The seal surpasses these fish in intelligence; under skillful management there is no saying how far its education may not be carried.

Birds and beasts we have domesticated, and rendered useful servants. There is no reason why fish should not be tamed by similar processes, and should not hereafter fulfill some useful purpose in domestic economy.

THE TALKING FISH.

THE FIGHTING TIGER OF THE KING OF OUDE.

THE tiger whose portrait we give herewith—from a sketch made by permission of the naturalist IDDESON—is the famous BURRHEA, the fighting tiger of the late King of Oude. He was kept by the King expressly for his fighting qualities, and bears on his body many a scarred reminiscence of past combats. In his last fight, it is said, he killed his antagonist in ten minutes. Only a few days ago, since he arrived, with other spoils of the conquered Kingdom of Oude, in London, England, he saw a horse pass his den. His eyes flashed fury; he sprang to his feet, and, with a furious roar, rushed against the bars of his cage. He fancied himself once more in the arena at Lucknow. His keeper states, however, that he is a very gentle creature naturally, and quite affectionate when caressed.

He stands five feet two inches in height, and is therefore an unusually large animal. His ordinary food is twenty-five pounds of raw meat per day.

We take the following account of one of BURRHEA's encounters from the "Private Life of an Eastern King." His antagonist on this occasion was a famous stallion whose ferocity and blood-thirstiness led you him the name of the man-eater, and immense fame throughout the Kingdom of Oude, which at one time he had almost devastated!

BURRHEA, THE FIGHTING TIGER OF THE LATE KING OF OUDE.

"Burdea was the name of a favorite tiger of the Rajah, so called from a village at the foot of the Himalaya, near which he had been taken.

"We were all assembled at Chuun-gunge in the gallery of a court-yard, about sixty yards square in extent — communicated with buildings all round, and a veranda below. Trifle bamboo railing had been put up in front of the veranda, so as completely to surround the court-yard, but in front only, and of enlarged cage. The man-eater had been cut into the interior of the enclosure by a little man-eating, as the sentry horses are called, for trifling value.

"The large and lofty aerial suite of female attendants had taken their places in the gallery, by on a sofa placed there for the purpose by their bridal lord. The rest of the Majesty's regimental left, leaning on the parapet or on the sofa. Every one commanded a full view of the court-yard, and the ladies seemed to relish the prospect as much as any.

"The noise was great, and Burdea's cage was brought into the veranda. A door in the bottom was opened for the purpose, was drawn up, the cage-door was opened, and Burdea leaped to attack the monster, bristling his sides with his long tail, and glaring furiously upon the man-eater and his little protector, a friend. A very few moments sufficed. It would not be easy to determine again from Burdea's cage, rush, and leap, and bound over to all fours. His gloomy rush, regularity and above in the interior, his pleasant contrast with the fussy covering of the little mass. Even the well-kept bulks of the man-eater looked quite unwieldy and lethargic when compared with the glittering skin of Burdea.

"The tiger had not been kept without food for some of the previous day to prepare him for the assault. He glared savagely at his foe, and seemed to know that he must slowly starting along toward them. The man-eater kept close to the side of the cage next to the gallery. Not for an instant did he take them off; his head bowed low, and standing on a small stride, with one paw slightly advanced, he awaited the attack, moving as Burdea moved, but retaining all the eyes intently on him. After the tiger came near, she was transfixed with fear—paralyzed—apparently unable to take a single step in advance, but she stood cowering in a corner, awaiting her fate. With a slight bound Burdea was upon her over as the ground fortnight. At blow of his paw threw her over as the ground. His teeth were fastened in her neck, and he drank her blood greedily. The struggle lasted about a minute, with no resistance.

"It will make Burdea only the more savage," said the King, rubbing his hands gleefully. The European ensigns assembled, and the female attendants, ignorant of the language, but certain that the King was pleased, were mightily pleased too. They exchanged glances of approbation and of satisfaction ere they turned again to watch the proceedings in the court-yard.

"Burdea might have been from three to five minutes enjoying his delicious meal—and—that was his head turned toward the man-eater at the time, and his eyes for the most part upon him. The man-eater, who had not stirr, gave no indications of man-desire. An impatient snarl or two escaped him, but that was all. Burdea, with teeth and cracked ears, and glaring eyeballs, and twitching tail, his sensations in his enemy instead of his victim. In no easy attitude of attention, as if prepared for immediate action.

"As length Burdea was satisfied, or else no more blood was forthcoming; and having bit clean out of the dead animal, and shaking himself as he left it, he began to go stealthily round the court-yard, like a sad cheetah or a mock on a cat. He made no rush at anything. The large grass were placed one after the other upon the ground, but still and for the first proceeded as usual. Slowly were they raised and depressed while the look here as slowly and as very forward—head and all the shoulders, now at the hind-quarters, as the legs were moved—but his glaring eyes were fixed steadily on the body belonging to the bones and muscles beneath it. It was not a sight to be forgotten! But although the attendant females gazing intently above, the European spectators standing by, and each one of the slow, stealthy movement and every animal; the man-eater in the centre of the court-yard slowly turning as the tiger moved his head and ears and neck over the sauce; the tiger stealing along, as if unable to expect, and yet so gigantic in strength. Not a sound was audible but the snarling of the man-eater's feet, as they were raised and lowered again—it was scarcely heard—and all was awaiting the next motion gaining.

"At length the tiger bounded with the rapidity of lightning upon his enemy; the horse was fully prepared. He had evidently put Burdea's character to the test by hand and fore-quarter; but the man-eater on to admit for that; and, by a quick diving motion of his head and shoulders, had received his antagonist upon his massive haunches behind the tail. The tiger was on his back, while the hind-feet of the tiger made a grasp or two at the flesh-eater of the horse; but these were unable to screw his position. The man-eater hailed up with his two hands on the tiger's throat, apparently as well as a moment Burdea was a-rending on the ground, not at all the better for the assault. No credit to Burdea, however, that he had been thrown upon his back—gently against the boundary-railing of the gallery—because he was on his legs again, growling as before, moving stealthily round as if nothing had happened. With an indignant snort the man-eater removed his immense position, and stood to another spring. His muscular haunches, as before, were in best betrayed his intent, as the growls of blood which disfigured them, of the sharpness and strength of his claws and teeth.

"'Burdea will kill him yet!' exclaimed the King, turning to the nearest European.

"'Undoubtedly, your Majesty,' said the courtier.

"Gobble did Burdea, and the man-eater sprang again, his broad round head ever turned toward his very antagonist. Burdea, with his bravery gone, and his tail lowered again in necessitate, noiselessly as before, while the beautifully-striped skin played over the ribs and the muscles freely. With distended nostrils and flashing eyes the man-eater watched again as Burdea moved exactly in the same position as formerly, the head and neck lowered and prefixed as the paw was raised, and the eyes fixed in a glaring stare at the stealthily-gliding figure not one hair-breadth ever slightly deviating. At last, suddenly, of that rapid diving and thrusting movement of his shoulder and head, by which he had formerly succeeded in getting his antagonist upon his haunches, sparring.

"For fully at last ten minutes did this monotonous circling of Burdea continue, the man-eater ever facing him and panic, intently, as angry must now and then bending from the horse as he turned. Burdea opened his large jaws wider at times, and licked up the drops of blood which still clung to them; and once that once only he paused for a moment over the dead mare, as if meditating a second draught. But the irresolution was only momentary, and the monotonous walk was continued.

"At length the decisive moment arrived again. Burdea was standing almost over the carcass of the dead mare, when he bounded upon man-eater's back, and that was in the gallery started at the sight, expecting it though we were; and more than one of the attendants on the King gave forth a stifled exclamation of alarm. There was no premonitory growl or display of any kind. It was as if by galvanic agency the tiger had been suddenly lifted into the air in the course of his monotonous gyrations.

"Man-eater was not taken by surprise, however. His head was ducked still lower than before; his forelegs were screwed to glide under the springing assailant; and again were Burdea's claws deep dyed into his haunches, but further over on this occasion than on the former. Burdea's head and the upper part of his body, in fact, as him beyond the tail of the horse, while his hind-claws were used for the purpose of maintaining his grip. For an instant we saw him quivering motionally in that position, and then—down he fell, with his antagonist clinging to his prey for an instant, but only for an instant. Burdea was dead before he had touched the ground, his face fell, almost as if he would throw himself over on his back. His two heels came with crushing force against the head of man-eater. The latter's forehead was spreading instantly upon the ground, once more erected, and ready for action.

"It was but for an instant, however, that Burdea lay by his side. Man-eater, with a single savage roar, ringing round the bamboo inclosure, it was quite apparent that he had had enough of the contest. No savage. His jaw was broken; and, with his tail between his legs, and his head low, he ran round and round and smelled a whipped spaniel. The man-eater watched him, as he was, intently, evidently fearful of a trick, and finding it difficult to keep up with his rapid motion. But it was not to be permitted. Burdea's blood was the nutriment of savage, crying almost piteously as he did so. 'Allah! Allah!' exclaimed the Rajah, and the man-eater, as quite below, who watched him from the veranda. The man-eater stood still, and Burdea ran to his feet.

"'Burdea's pet is broken!' he exclaimed to us as he ran by.

"'As your Majesty pleases,' was our answer.

"The signal was given—the door of the cage was opened, Burdea was driven in, and the man-eater rushed in to bury himself in its furthest corner.

"Proudly did the King of Oude look over when he found himself this victor. He first stamped up to the cage, and stuffed them a sensation; and then, spurning her with his foot, with head aloft and tail arched, he strutted to one of the gallery-doors, and disappeared, as if anxious to get at the attendant-servants. His blood was up; and happy was the man who had mixed with his assailants now, or wished he assailed."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1859.

THE FARCE OF AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP.

THE following letter has been published in the papers:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 17, 1859

"SIR,—Your letter of the 12th inst. has been received. In reply I have to state that it is understood that the French Government has called out service from all its men of France who may be found within its jurisdiction. Your naturalization in this country will not exempt you from liability if you should voluntarily expatriate yourself.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"LEWIS CASS."

In other words, the title of an American citizen, which is held out as an inducement to foreigners to settle in this country, is a mere empty distinction, involving, it is true, absolute protection in the United States, but no such thing as protection on the other. Outside of the limits of the United States it can not shield us from the heavy hand of military conscription by foreign despots. At the very time at which we invite an American citizen, a useful and highly respected member of Society, he is actually visited Prussia—his birth-place—to see some relatives, he is serving as a conscript of the army and navy in the Prussian army without a word of remonstrance from our Government.

It will be with serious feelings that the future biographer of Lewis Cass will say that, after a life of conspicuous honor, and active devotion to the interests of his country, he crowned his career by ingrafting on the policy of the United States the principle that the naturalization laws of the country and the naturalization can not afford to protect its citizens abroad.

He will observe—this biographer—that Mr. Cass's want of spirit in this matter was the more remarkable, as his duty was clear and its execution easy. The Constitution and the laws know no distinction between native and naturalized citizens. They are all citizens—and the word implies every right. It is impossible that a foreigner must have fulfilled his obligations to his native country before presenting himself for naturalization here, and he becomes at both with law and with common sense. No word of obligations to foreign States is to be found in the naturalization laws.

If the doctrine be accepted that no foreign born citizen can be protected who has not fulfilled the services which his native country may choose to exact from its people, then this country has no law in the wrong, and Great Britain in the right, in the controversy of 1812. For the term which Great Britain exacts from her people is perpetual allegiance. If Mr. Cass be right in declining to protect citizens of French or German birth against the conscription, neither can he justify the Government of Madison in denying the right of the British to stop and impress men taken under General Scott. The principle is the same in both cases. Great Britain exacts a life of allegiance from her natives, as Germany and France exact so many years' military service from their citizens. We reject the one, we must also respect the other. Under the policy of Mr. Cass, every British-born citizen in the country might be shot as a traitor if, in the event of war with England, they served under the American flag. Naturalization, in fact, under this reading of the law, becomes a farce.

The true idea of the naturalization law of the United States is, that every man has, on reaching his majority, a right to select his country, irrespective of the accident of his birth, and that by doing so the transfer which a foreigner makes of his allegiance to the land of his adoption is thorough, complete, and final. This idea is a necessary and legitimate consequence of the great democratic principle on which all our institutions and all our literature are based. The recognition by our Government of the pains and penalties imposed by foreign potentates on their subjects who become citizens of the here is their dominions gives the lie to our whole political system, and involves a denial of the first propositions in the Declaration of Independence.

But Mr. Cass's future biographer will go on to say that the error of the Secretary of State lay in the blindness of the Secretary to the inevitable consequences of a manly and spirited policy. Had he followed in the footsteps of Madison, Scott, and Jackson, and insisted on making the European sovereigns respect American citizens of whatever birth, we should have had no occasion to say little or nothing, and the political reward would have been liberal. It would not have been necessary for us to make war on the offending nations. A simple embargo on their wares and produce would have achieved the end without any unnecessary injury to this country. No-body Prussian nor any other European state would risk the loss of their American trade for the sake of half a dozen additional soldiers. Six months' stoppage of the export of dry goods from Europe to the United States would have forced them break half the foreign spinners, and would very quickly bring the sovereigns to their senses. And what a triumph for the American policy! It may safely be said that no single act would create such enthusiasm throughout this country as the humiliation of the European power for engaging an American citizen. Every American heart would thrill with pride at intelligence of such an event, and the flight would be the signal, imprisoned, and outraged by foreign despotism with perfect impunity.

GOOD NEWS FOR SHIP-OWNERS.

We have all been lamenting, ever since the Peace of Europe, the decline of the trade of our shipping; the renewal of war in Europe is calculated to revive the spirits of American shipowners. For, no sooner than we dream of the decline of ship property—the construction of foreign steamers—has not been removed, accident is serving out of Great Britain and France, which there is once more a prospect that American ships will earn interest on their cost.

No man in the United States or England may take part in the European war. There is a strong feeling, and, indeed, a law, against the engaging by any subject of a belligerent power, or by the citizen of a neutral, and lend aid to Austria; they are strengthened in their views by the London Times, which declares that we should be only against the Emperor of the French. Between the two it is quite possible that, despite her proclamation of neutrality, the British Ministry may find herself a combatant before the war has been long. Any interference on the part of Russia would threaten the possibility of British participation in the war.

The effect of England's becoming an actor in the war would be to drive her carrying trade into American hands. Whether Britannia still rules the waves or not, it is undeniable that England goes to war, even British merchants will send their goods to sea in vessels which are neutral, and countries where their flag is not, and therefore give our ships the preference we have supposed, will devote upon the United States. Already Peace is a subject of discussion in the leaders with the assurance that England's participation in the war would not destroy her trade—"Germany, the Australian colonies, Cotton and grain to England, and cotton goods and hardware from England to all parts of the world. Anything may happen in the hour of war and danger, upon the maxim which they were so slow to acknowledge when they had no interests at stake—"Free Ships make Free Goods"—the English boast that, even if Napoleon has equipped a navy superior to that of England, they can, with the aid of this country and American ships, defy his worst efforts.

We trust that it may never come to this. We have very little to gain, and much to lose, by Great Britain mixing in a general European war. Interest apart, to every friend of humanity such an event would be revolting. Nor does our shipping interest need so powerful a stimulus. The new possibility that England may be driven into the war will naturally increase the demand for American vessels in every part of the world. No British vessel can sail on a voyage of a month with a perfect certainty of being without risk of capture. In these days of telegraphs and railroads a week, or a fortnight, rate Great Britain into the war, and cover the British channel and the Atlantic with French cruisers. What, in such a case, would be the value of the vast fleets of large British vessels freighted with valuable cargoes, and sailing for China?

Every prudent English merchant has already directed his Asiatic and Australian correspondence to ship in American vessels, when he can. A few mails will show this to be the case.

The event should at once stimulate our shipowners to repeal the only law which is the decline of American ship-property. Screw and tide, wheel steamers should at once be built. Ingenious ship-owners had good reasons before for increasing their marine investments. Now they are going to make money again: let them build steamers without delay—steam, fast, expensive vessels like the Collins ships, but sensible, economical craft, like Vanderbilt's fleet and the Glasgow ocean-ship.

Commodore Vanderbilt launched, a few days ago, an ocean steamer wholly built of iron—filling hitherto deemed impossible in this country. Where shall we find men wise enough and enterprising enough to follow the example? If there are none such, the Australia which the war is imparting to the American shipping interest will be the prelude to a reaction when will utterly decline peace.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HOMICIDE OF THE DEAF AND DUMB BY UTAH.

We have received a long letter from Mr. W. G. Mills, of Salt Lake City, in Utah Territory, giving the statements contained in a letter published two-three times in this Journal, describing the murder of a deaf and dumb child in Utah. Mr. Mills, who is evidently a Mormon, eulogizes the Mormons very highly, and states at considerable length what he calls untrue statements. We are bound to say that our correspondent is a man of honesty and candor. But as he only makes assertion, we see no reason to alter the opinion to that effect which we expressed in regard to Brigham Young. At the same time, in justice to the people of Utah Territory, we give Mr. Mills's version of the story:

"Another Mormon child has been killed by accidicity. He resided here for years, and grew up a man among us. He will live a long time in my memory as a rare effect. He was twenty years old, stood five feet to inches high, good-proportioned, with a light and active frame, and weighed 160 pounds. He was a man of no common strength; and unrestrained by intellect to regulate his passions, he was frequently known to be excited by passion and revenge. Neglected at home in his tenderest years, deprived by his deafness of the means whereby he might in their privileges to torment him; naturally passionate, and, as regards his intellect, feeble, he possessed an ungovernable, impetuous, and irritable temper, which could be restrained only by the controlling influence of the presence of a relative—a respectable woman there, by the name of Mrs. Elizabeth Kinsman. He had for years been a pest to the citizens by his thievish propensities, and had made himself a terror to the people. In several instances he so frightened females that they were thrown into spasms, and one of them was injured and unsuccour to them. Previous to his death he entered the house of Mr. Kinsman, and was in no sense urged by some of our transient friends and teamsters, who have a custom of using for them in witnessing his habits and cruel tricks while in a state of uncontrollable excitation.

"Last autumn, on the arrival of several trains, 'Dummy,' as he was designated, stole about the sum of seventy dollars from a teamster, Mr. Bennett. Almost was made to a justice of the peace—a writ issued for his arrest. He was arrested, and the money found for several weeks. On his return he was charged with the theft, and accused of it. He was threatened that he would get the money in a place of death and executed it a the time of the arrest. He was taken to the house where this title city. He volunteered to go to the place with a policeman and get the money. He did so, and selected a charge of policeman N. L. Christiansen, to the spot where he had buried the money, and went for it. And here I would say that Christiansen is a sober man, of good character, and has for any thing he knows of a dead human blood. He says he approachable character with those who know him; yet, I believe, would not be trusted with a responsible position, which I consider is a proper trait in man; though, in the spirit in favor of every man who is not a fool, and trusting to the conduct of 'Dummy.' But to resume.

"The money was found where it was taken the extent, to the spot where the latter said the money was deposited. Christiansen was then left alone, and took his place a place for relics at the wives of Dummy, who still signed that they would be glad to get the rest of the money.

"While they returned to the shanty Dummy digged out the money, and, unperceived by Christiansen, attacked the policeman in a violent manner, striking him on the side and breast with a pick-axe, and cutting him with the fat and blood oozed; and had not the knife struck a rib, which broke in receiving the stroke, it would have proved fatal. He also cut him in the hands in receiving the blow. Dummy then made a large piece of sharp iron, and again attacked Christiansen in a frenzied manner, who only saved his life by dodging the running into the house. Dummy pursued, and would have broken the door but for the timely interference of some passers-by. Again he attacked him; but not effecting complishing his purpose, he ran off, and the policeman first there after. Dummy, in the meantime, had become taking sufficient effect to even cripple him.

"Dummy, however, was the violence of his passion apparently, subsided, they traveled toward the city. He was overtaken by Mr. E. Banks, who was driving a team and wagon, from whom they obtained a ride, and knew also nothing of their treasons until told by them. When near the mouth of Emigration Cañon, he requested the policeman to go to a certain place to which he guided, for the halt time, and he would certainly get the money.

The latter, anxious to obtain it, and having traveled so far, did not like to return without it, if possible, and he went with him. They jumped from the wagon, requiring Mr. Hanks to stay until their return, and proceeded forthwith toward the place. When Danegar got him in a convenient position, he drew a pistol, and, presenting it on Christianson in a treacherous manner, with a threatening expression, told him that he must submit to be tied himself, and, after a struggle, succeeded in grasping his left hand, when he pulled the prisoner's hand to his neck and tolling him, but knowing what to do with the body in such a place, he by company with Mr. Hanks, and when he had ascertained the Captain of the Police, who at once interrupted the Mayor of the proceedings, and had the prisoner put forthwith in their hands. Justice Clinton, being informed of the facts, required Danegar to be bound over in a heavy sum, and held an inquest on the body, had it conveyed to the city cemetery and decently interred.

"These are the substantial and unqualified facts of the case, without the least attempt to exaggerate; and any one will see that Christianson was perfectly justified in the act. His forbearance was greater than any one else in my case would have been disposed to extend toward a desperate, ungovernable man, who had murdered his wife so often, and who not only resisted him wilfully while in the execution of his duty, but who had an evident design on his life."

THE LOUNGER.

THE NEW NAPOLEON AND THE OLD.

SOME of us did not think that we should ever read a proclamation of the Emperor Napoleon to the army of Italy. We thought that chapter of History was closed. Marengo belonged to the Past. Arcole, "the immortality of which," we have to be mentioned with Agincourt and Cressy.

But we have read the proclamation, and we may let read of the battle of Montebello—and of Alonzo, last in the newspapers. These very pages may to called upon to illustrate the history of the day, and upon upon the field where the old secured Italy.

When Napoleon Bonaparte first descended into Italy he was a twenty-seven year old General, unused to command, and his army was covering upon the Alps, whither the timid Directory had sent Bonaparte had driven them. His first proclamation said to them, "Famine, cold, and misery, are the school of good soldiers." and the result proved it. He marched straight to Turin, supressed the resistance at Peyra, reached Mondovi, and finally sat down before Mantua. On the shores of the Lake of Garda—on the dykes of Arcole—on the plain of Rivoli, the Austrian Wurmser surrendered Mantua and retired. The Austrian Archduke Charles, with thirty thousand men, in vain attempted marched to meet the Frenchman upon the plains of the Po. Venice revolted to the invader. Italy and the States were handed to the Alps at the head of thirty-five thousand men Napoleon stood upon the shore of the Adriatic and looked around across the peninsula—made peace, and went home.

This was only his first campaign. Marengo was four years later.

The new Napoleon leads an army of two hundred thousand men into Italy. Montebello is a little battle, but friendly. Fresh, disciplined, active, it is undoubtedly the flower of living armies. Is not famine, cold, and misery, of which the Emperor spoke. But in his first proclamation he says: "Beware of your generous enthusiasm. It is the only thing I fear." The enemy are not less in number, and they are not merely defending themselves; but they are pushing for the very capital heart of their empire. But the fact of this enemy burns the ground upon which it stands. The old traditional hate felt by the Italians toward the Germans is now added horror at the barbarity with which the Austrians conduct the war, and the ten thousand thousand perfectly-appointed Frenchmen are reinforced by an enthusiasm which multiplies them. Meanwhile Europe looks gravely on, with its hand upon the sword indeed, but the sword in the scabbard, while those fiery, flashing blades cross with the shock of battle.

The London Times would fain be incredulous of the event. It finds too much study of melodramatic effect in the constant resurrence by the French to particular days and to particular men. It declines to believe that a raw military band can depose the calm and well-disciplined army.

Failure indeed is possible to the greatest genius—it overtakes the greatest luck. Mens Ouchi had leisure to reflect upon the fact at Saint Helena. Therefore even Louis Napoleon's singular good fortune may conquer his genius, and coquetry in his case is destruction. Austria fights for her imperial existence; but, on the other hand, so long as the treaty of Vienna, which excluded Austria entirely from the French throne, is the law of Europe, the Austrian Archduke is an usurper, and must return to Paris victorious, or not return at all. Had the uncle failed, he might have found his road to the throne by any German or other country. If the nephew fails, his throne falls.

THE RACES.

HORSE-RACING has always led a rather precarious existence with us. It has been frequently forced the peculiar interest of black-legs and professional jockeys. Gentlemen occasionally went to the races, but only as a Board of Trade merchant adjourned in their honor, as the British Parliament rises for the Derby day; nor has any meeting of either in the State ever been known to postpone a visitation that he might attend, as was stated, without contradiction, of an English bishop. In Charleston, South Carolina, the races are more recognized as a disdinctly fashionable resort. Families in the country time their visits to town to hit the races. But elsewhere the institution has existed by stationary, unlisted help, and who want to attend.

The especial essence of this was, unquestionably, the conviction that the contest was not to be decided according to actual superiority, but by arrangement. The races were generally in possession of persons not known outside of "the sporting world," and very well known within it; so that a little cloud of suspicion rested upon the race, and the better was always in doubt whether the fastest horse was to be allowed to win.

There is, however, such an inextinguishable love of horse-flesh in the human heart that a large crowd always waits upon any race that promises the least excitement; and the meeting over the course by Allen and Flora Temple excited an usual attention. Twelve or fifteen thousand persons are reported to have been upon the ground, and Flora Temple bore away the bays. The contest was the mere interesting because they were each the favorite mares of their sex in the country. The horses trotted "to wagon," as it is called—that is, each was harnessed in a carriage of four wheels—the other kind of trotting being "to harness," or in a sulky on two wheels. The time made by the successful Flora was 2 minutes and 25 seconds, for the first mile, or heat, and 2.27 for each of the second heats. Four were three heats, in all of which Flora Temple was the winner, and is, therefore, the fastest trotter in the country.

That, of course, is with reference to all the other trotters to all who did not beat ninety-five minutes. It has, also, of course, greatly enhanced the value of Flora Temple and all her progeny. For after that, those gentlemen who are wealthy in dollars and Quaker clothes who haunted the race-course, and who are reported to be fond of a good horse, must see clearly, even without the spectacles, that a race is like a flower. The unsophisticated think the best of any thing is that which they like. They know that it is merely the germ of the fruit. And in the mind's eye they see the colt in the future in the running. They forget that the victor's worth is enormously increased, and that all the foals of the winning horse will be correspondingly valuable.

Will some one of those philosophers inform us why "fast" is a synonyme for virtue in the horse-trade? and why the term jockeying is synonymous with knavery?

A CUP OF COLD WATER.

THE happy people who will run into the water attract less attention than the one lovelier sight than the sparkling cascades that vein green hillsides with flowing silver. The fresh, bright springs in the shady depths of woods, over which they will lean upon their hands and knees and drink of the cooling water. Happy is that face, whether by sea-side or on river banks or on lofty hills whence they can see the wide world, that delinging in greasy meadows, or whether they watch the sudden shower of pattering crystal, or the rainbow that makes whatever it touches so fair, or whether that garnish the sunset, it will still be the beauty that looking will be the most delightful to the eye and mind.

Will they think of those who can not climb the hills, nor walk in the woods or the meadows? Will they remember the dry streets in which the every flower cannot be the city rose, and the chickets are crinoline, and the only singing birds are feathered ones in cages, or poor ones in nurseries, who can not sing for the want of water?

Yet the last kind do not sing much. They are usually silent and sickly. And the first thing necessary of nature there is a constant growth and development toward greater beauty from the egg to the caterpillar, and from the caterpillar to butterfly. From the little gasping months of mere feather's down to the perfect liquid frill of the bird—from shrub or the jutilliant glen of the bob-o'-link. But this last kind of singers in city nurseries grow more silent as they grow older. The bird-fancier finds singing by contrast rather than in any other way. It has every thing which helps and charms them, every thing which tends to refresh the city with the blessings of the country, is surely worth inducing. And while the sun is shining and the rain, the globe would be a hill of new life if it were only to be interested in it. But it is not. Instead of the pavements, indeed, and in the walls of the houses, but it is put into daylight. Let us have more fountains—more beautiful crystal columns and statues along the sidewalks, that the throats of the thirsty may be refreshed, and the eyes and minds of the whole population quickened. These little public drinking fountains always flowing, will be also the best of all sanitary measures. In other, white violets will not spring up around them as in a solar concert, but those who drink there will be as flowers, will start in the pleased minds of the wary.

Let the fountains be wrought, too, in pretty forms. In Rome how many there are!—A Triton blowing his conch, and the Naiads sporting around, and the nymphs striding the rocks of little cataracts, and in the Medici villa, near Florence, Venus standing forth, and the Lounger, his wife thinks, in her hair. Let the artists invent and the poets suggest. Put your fountains, too, in the public squares, where it shall seem to preach cleanliness as a preventive of disease, and where the water that sprang among trees in the country will bear the rattle of the noble elm in the Hospital yard. Put one at the corner of Chambers Street that it may rival Delmonico's barroom; and one before every hotel, that strangers may know the hospitality of the city.

Yes, by all means put forth the poetic side of the image for the cure of wounds and waters. Those Caryatides, philosophers, and poets, who make the municipal laws.

ABOUT WIVES.

"XYLOCUS" writes to the Lounger from a lake in Arkansas that wives are "property, very personal property, the most sacred property on earth." His letter is pleasant, and full of kind feeling, but Sir. Xylocus and all his relatives and friends of the other sex, who we should suppose to be called a sub-sold flavor, as indicated in the extract above.

That people who entertain Xylonia's opinions do treat wives as property, every man with his eyes open has probably often enough perceived. But the utter absurdity of gravely urging that wives really are to will also hardly have escaped the observation of the sane witnesses. You may go into many a house and see the woman whom the man of that house has sworn to love, honor, and cherish the victim of his ill-temper, his whims, his follies. You may see him treat her precisely as he treats any other article of property with which he has nothing to get angry, only he gets angry with "the most sacred property on earth" much oftener than with any other. He cuts his arm-chair, in a pet. He tears his newspaper, in a little rage. He curses a hackney-coach, in a fit of temper. But he never looks across the floor that he does not like. He strikes his horse only when the horse refuses to please him. Why not? They are his property. Shall a man not do what he will with his own? And you may see the same man calm, smug, powerful, strike at his wife. Why not? For his practically believes, whatever his theory may be, that wives "are property, very personal property, the most sacred property on earth."

If Xylonia is property, then his wife is; not otherwise. If he may treat her as property, she may do the same with him. Same for the goose, same for the gander. Xylonia and all the Xylonians need not suppose that they are going to secure immunity for their vices or their whims or follies, as men and husbands, by rhetorically asserting that wives are property. For their wives, if still a woman property, and to treat her as such, is a lovely method of illustrating her husband's conception of her superior society. If anything in any thing but a mere legal contract—if it in any sense whatever be Roman Catholic marriage, and every honorable man feels, a sacrament, then it is quite as sacred upon one side as upon the other.

The husband who is false to his companion is precisely as culpable as the wife. Society does not prove that to be true which it does not believe in not.?

Simply because the active and controlling power of society is that of men, and men have hitherto practiced the principle that wives are property, and that husbands are property (which is absurd), husband who tampers with the property of another expose himself to the perils of the trespasser against old property—he is liable to be shot by burglar or the incendiary. That is, he runs great risk of being shot.

And if the offender succeeds—whatever happens to him—how about the property? Why, the Xylonian has, by his own logic, that property is lost, subject to the owner, he is the judge of it, and that is his property may throw it away altogether. No wonder that our friend Xylonia says, in his letter, that "the highest laws of natural religion," assuming property, do not always "in accordance with revealed religion." If revenge be an inspiration of natural religion, then the statement is quite correct. But there are two very awkward dilemmas yawning before him; for if God be not divided against himself, he loves, whether natural or revealed, must be harmonious. And if there be no such thing as "sin," and the relations you are perfectly equal, except in those details which, rarely, considered by the parties most to be in honor of women, have arranged in their own favor.

A well-ordered household has a mistress as well as master, and a well-ordered State has a ruler.

A wife is not a higher kind of hoss or armchair; and supposing civilization is actually working the Inferiors idea that she is so out of public opinion and the laws.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

A MARRIED MAN, St. Paul, Minnesota. The subject of your note was well considered by the Lounger. You may be very sure that Harper's Weekly will take no party-political position. If you differ from its decision, you, of course, will abide by your own judgment. It is, however, always for the interest of a large paper in a great city to be not edited without very careful consideration. It may be a matter of interest—but the bitter should not suppose that he is the first to bring the question to editorial notice. The widest range of party spite will not bring the Lounger to consideration as a candid critic.

C. F. L., Cincinnati. Lawyer's opinion of "An Incident in a Trapper's Life," which he sends him. It is simply a tale, and has no more to do with the settlement of the utter barbarity of border life, and the superiority of semi-civilized to wholly savage inhumanity. But it is not too purely horrible?

—CARRY wishes the Lounger to tell about his travels completely in the style in which he says John Phoenix of Dr. Abbott betrays that he has seen a pyramid. But Carry should remember that Phoenix and Abbott "stories" are recorded and illustrated upon other pages of the Weekly, and that the Lounger, his wardrobe, and even his eye drooping, only strolls quietly about and chats pretty of matters of interest, and does not write or recorded. One of these days, perhaps, when he can lounge no longer, he will write a book of travels.

C. Suffolk. The Lounger will "destroy the poem and keep mum."

—INDEPENDENCE, Buffalo, asks who the Lounger is. He is being the best in these columns, who has no criticism out of them. Impudence can go no further than to ask "Who is the author of Hamlet?" Smith is his own perpetual answer.

—Over to your HARPER, Boston, Massachusetts, will find in any good eyeglass that Prosper John was the owner of land whose passenger was the property of travelers in the Middle Ages to be a Christian Prince in the interior of Africa. Marco Polo, who traveled at the close of the thirteenth century, has given the most extensive account of Prester John (Gentle Library, No. 132). Gwong, a Mongol monarch, who had been subject to Nestorian influences. He is mentioned by writers of the twelfth century, and all the earlier Eastern travelers speak of him. Matthew Paris has a great deal to say of him. Sir John Mandeville gives a detailed account of things that are in the "land of Prester John." The most interesting account of him is in the introduction by M. d'Avezac to his edition of Plan-de-Carpin's

History of the Tartars, published in 1838, in the Transactions of the Geographical Society of Paris. If "one of our readers" is really interested in the question, he should refer to that.

A. J., Ill., Cincinnati. "The old Cuban Bucket" was written by Samuel Woodworth, who was born in Scituate, Massachusetts, a farmer's son, and died in New York in 1842. He was a journalist, and after the year of 1812 wrote some popular songs upon the victories. In 1826 he began the New York Mirror, with George P. Morris, but his literary energetics were not often successful. The strange versatility of his life was also shown by his producing a short time before his death. He had been touched by the Millerite excitement, and was writing with very quick short steps. His eye was batteried, and his hand trembled. He published a semi-religious work, called Natural Theories in Leonard Street, at which Barton Hall, now his in New York, generated him "a substantial freshly," Duykinck tells us.

—A BACHELOR in Nebraska wishes to know if it be a temptation of the devil to wish to marry a very pretty gentleman or redness "as fondness empire may lead them." Not a Bachelor speaks of before, there is, of course, no answer to his question, and that the shortest possible No. It is time enough than the expiry of the case who she as a Bachelor has evidently been done by. But ladies are not let loose upon society to be kept by men who are seen to be spoke. A Bachelor rather asks if "it ain't a little selfish, when the foundations are scarce?" Also, dear Sir, some women have discovered not only that they have had sons, but that they will be fond of them.

—O. ANDOR complains that there is too much flighting in novels, and has been "often shocked by seeing the yellow-covered literature which attracts our read walks, announcing a sparkling exhibition," etc. The problem of difficulty seems to be that even a novel-writer's characters get into situations where they would naturally fight, like Achilles and Ajax. How to keep the peace between them. They "go to" immediately. Does G. Andor, then, in citing the yellow-covered literature, suggest a judgment, mean to hold the novelist responsible for his characters? Does he mean to say that the characters develop themselves. The subject is only a clerk.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, June 4, 1859.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been quite dull and heavy during the week, and prices have declined in almost every article except beef, which is scarce for the season, and only for late immediate delivery. Flour has been in better demand from first sellers, prices have been irregular, and at the close generally tended downward. Fresh fruits have been plenty. Wool has been in active demand, but slowly offered and purchased at reduced rates. Beef has been less active, and closed low. Butter and cheese have been quiet.... Coffee, Teas, and Molasses have been more sought after, with a moderate supply, and have been in good demand. Coffee and Sugars are cheaper. Rice is dull and lower.... Tobacco has been in fair demand for under prices.... Hay has been more active but less plentiful, and prices have ruled higher.... Hops have been in fair demand, and have been quiet.... Cotton has been in good request at buoyant prices.... Lumber has been in fair demand, with prices ruling steady.... Naval Stores are quiet and unchanged.... Oils, prime have been more sought after.... Tobacco has been pretty sparingly offered.... Wool has been in active demand at reduced quotations.... The movements in our commercial circles have been quiet, owing to the unfavorable change.... We append a subjoined list of the Wholesale Prices current for leading articles:

Standard Super State Flour, per barrel	$4 50	@ $5 70
Fancy Brands, do.	5 75	@ 6 50
Superfine Western	4 45	@ 4 70
Fancy do. do.	4 75	@ 5 00
Extra Missouri	4 50	@ 10 00
Superfine Southern	4 50	@ 5 00
Extra Southern	5 00	@ 9 00
Superfine Canada	4 50	@ 5 00
Extra Canada	5 00	@ 9 00
White Michigan Wheat, per bushel	1 75	@ 1 15
Southern White	1 40	@ 1 50
Red Western Wheat	1 40	@ 1 84
Canadian White	1 70	@ 1 75
Chicago Spring	1 05	@ 1 10
New Yellow Corn	69	@ 1 00
Rye	1 07	@ 1 10
Western Oats	55	@ 57
Western Oats	55	@ 57
Barley	60	@ 62
Timothy and Pennsylvania Oats	1 00	@ 1 05
Clover Seed	6 00	@ 6 50
Western Mess Pork, per barrel	16	@ 16 50
New Mess Pork, per barrel	16	@ 16 25
Prime Pork	13	@ 13 50
Country Mess Beef	8 5	@ 9 50
Extra, per pound	11	@ 14
Shoulders	11	@ 11
Hams	12	@ 14
Fair to Prime State Butter, new	19	@ 20
Fresh Butter, best	21	@ 23
Cheese, new	8	@ 9
Prime, per 100 pounds	8 50	@ 9 00

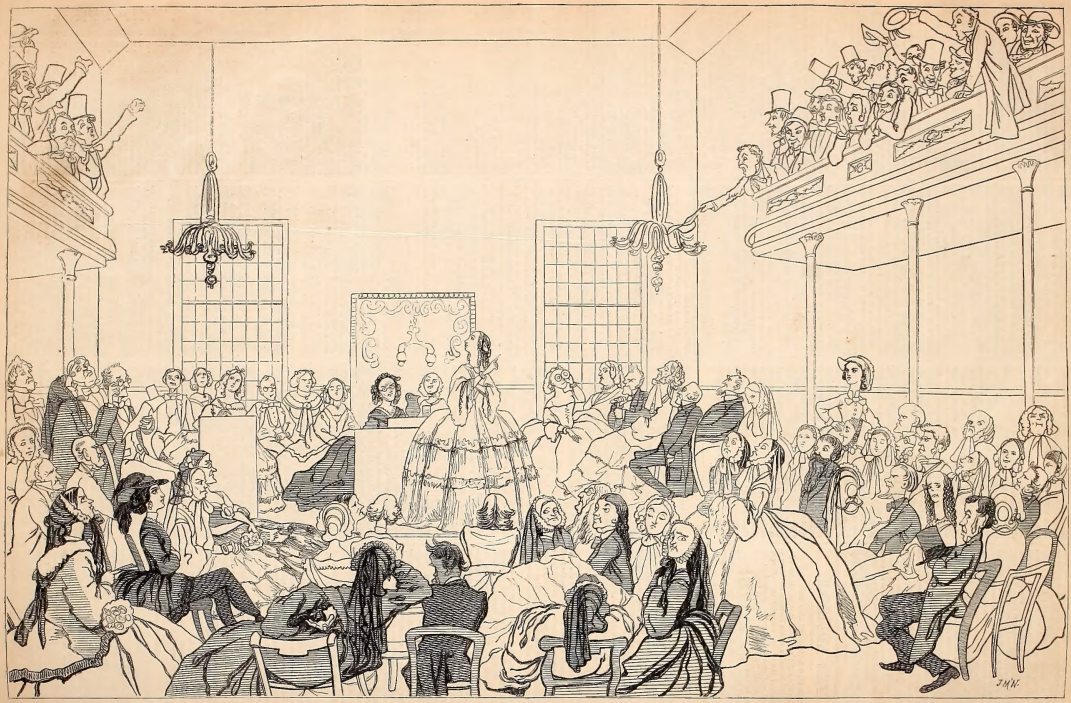
The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were well supplied with Cattle, and prices ruled low. Sheep and Lambs were fair.... The receipts of fresh Milch Cows were a little more than for the week previous, and the sales fell off. Common Cows sold, and were dull at $35 to $45 each. Good Cows and Veal Calves were nearly as abundant as for some days past. Veal Calves were in good demand, and sold at lower rates, no larger stock could be sold.... Sheep and Lambs have been offered very freely, but the demand was good and prices were firmer.... Swine were arriving freely and sold to fair advantage.

The range of prices according to the returns of sales of the Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Extra Primo Premium Beeves, per pound	$ 9	@ $ 12
Fair to good Milch Cows, per head	35 00	@ 45 00
Veal Calves, per pound	7	@ 8
Sheep and Lambs, per head	2 75	@ 6 50
per pound	6	@ 7
Live Swine	4	@ 5
Dressed Hogs	6	@ 7
Rending Pigs, each	3 00	@ 4 00

The Wholesale Dry Goods outdoors by PEDDLERS AT WASHINGTON.

Strawberries, per quart box	$ 12	@ $ 31
Strawberries, per basket	3	@ 5
Cherries, per quart	12	@ 25
Gooseberries, per quart	6	@ 8
Apricots, per dozen	2 50	@ 5 00
Dried Apples, per bushel	1	@ 1 50
Dried Apples, per pound	11	@ 15
Peaches, per dozen	12	@ 25
Potatoes, old, per bushel	1 00	@ 2 50
Potatoes, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 2 50
Potatoes, sweet	4 00	@ 4 50
Onions, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Onions, per pound	2	@ 3
Beets, per bunch	1	@ 2
Beans, white, per bushel	1 50	@ 2 00
black, per pair	1	@ 2
Peppers, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00
Eggs, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00
Snipe, per dozen	1	@ 1 50



YE MAY SESSION OF YE WOMAN'S RIGHTS CONVENTION—YE ORATOR OF YE DAY DENOUNCING YE LORDS OF CREATION.

HAS HE EVER SAID SO?

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THERE'S NOTHING HALF SO SWEET IN LIFE.

SINCE Hope Wayrn had received Abel Nest's note she lived in human beings do live when for the first time they are conscious that they love, and believe that they are loved.

She read her books, and the page burned with a glow it had never known before. She was no longer haughty with Mrs. Simcoe, whatever happened; but she was so meek, so docile, so gentle, so patient, that the girl who was always then and lovely was deaner and lovelier than ever.

Grandpa Burt was conscious of some change which he could not explain; but he was grandpar and happier in his grandchild, and remembering constantly that she was now eighteen, began to consider his vast plans for the future. It was his fixed resolution that she should be protected from the wicked world of youth that is always going up and down in the earth seeking whom it may marry. If incessant care and invention and management could secure it, she should arrive safely where Grandpa Burt was determined she should arrive ultimately, at the hand of her husband's dinner-table. Mrs. Simcoe, ma'am.

What on earth is a girl sent into this world for but to make a proper match, and not disgrace her husband—to keep his house, either directly or by a deputy—to take care of his children, to see that his slippers are warm and his Madeira cold, and his beef not burned to a cinder. Mrs. Simcoe, ma'am. Christopher Burt believed that a man's wife was a more sacred piece of private property than his sheep-pasture, and when he delivered the deed of any such property he meant that it should be in perfect order.

Hope may marry a foreign minister, Mrs. Simcoe, ma'am. Who knows? She may marry a large marchand in town or a large planter in the South, who will be obliged to entertain a great deal and from all parts of the world. I should say that she shall be fit for the situation. I shall she shall preside at her husband's table in a superior manner.

So Hope, as a child, had played with little girls, who were invited to Fineswood—select little girls, who came in the prettiest frocks and behaved in the prettiest way, superintended by nurses and belles' maids. They rended their dolls generally in the nursery. They played clean little games upon the lawn. Not too noisy, Ellen! Mary, gently, gently, dear! Julia, carefully! you are tumbling your frock. They were not chattery French nurses who presided over these solemnities. They were grave, housekeeping, Mrs. Simcoe-kind of people. Julia and Mary were exhorted to behave themselves like little ladies, and the frolic ended by their all taking books from the library shelves and reading them properly in a large chair, or on the sofa, or even upon the piazza, if it had been nicely dusted and inspected, until the setting sun sent them away with the calmest kisses at parting.

Suddenly, in a day, out of this proper, pretty demure, wearisome, intolerable life, Hope had emerged into the very thickest of the toughest battle that human beings have to fight. And the warrior, instead of being haughtier, and colder, and more unyielding, was the softest and sweetest of creatures.

Grandpa Burt did not understand, but he was delighted. In spirit he perpetually rubbed his hands, and chirped and crowed. He was like a man whose wax having refused to melt, has petulantly laid aside his seal, but now with joy and thanksgiving beholds the melting mass, and begins to wet his seal to secure the perfect stamp—and grand —that he intends.

Mrs. Simcoe's inestimable feet did not vary. She watched Hope without losing her from mind a moment, but it was as the watched her own from her window. The young girl came to her old friend tenderly, and put her arms around her neck, and in a thousand endearing ways caressed her. Yes, and so she would have caressed any body, as Mrs. Simcoe knew. It was her love, her new life, her new down, that she was celebrating and worshiping with all that fondness. Dear child, said Mrs. Simcoe in her heart, you do not deceive me, you only deude yourself. Hope thought she loved Mrs. Simcoe more than ever before. But the older woman knew that she was dream were disturbed Hope would find that the sense of isolation she had felt when her love was first announced to her would be as deep as ever.

Yet with all the sweetness of the consciousness of love Hope chafed at the uncertainty of seeing her lover again. But she consoled herself by thinking that it would be so easy to write him. So she drew her table to the window which she had unwittingly honored to him was hers, she took the prettiest sheet of paper on the sunniest morning, when the landscape was so beautiful and the whole world so wonderful—her eyes filled with tears with the eagerness with which she ran and got the pen out of the room and locked it. As she seated herself to begin, her cheeks burned—her very soul seemed blushing. She took the pen, but dropped it in the ink; she must she could as easily have pulled up by the roots the pine-tree that waved at the window as have begun that letter. Yet did she not know she loved him with all her heart? Was she not sure he loved her?

She paused—hanging over the table, the feather of the quill at her lips—when the reflections half consciously asked themselves in her mind. Oh! the little asp of suspicion that stung those questions in the heart. But he never said so?

She lifted the lid of her writing-desk and touched a spring at the back. Out flew a little drawer in which lay a note. It was worn with much holding, and a slight odor arose from the desk pervaded it. Once more, and word by word, she read the note which she knew by heart, to find if she could see what she knew was not there. Only a lover could have written it—yet it did not say, "I love you." Nor more she pressed it like a precious portrait, and kissed it as devotees kiss relics of saints, and put it in the little drawer—the spring snapped—and the perfumed note was as securely hidden in the desk as the rich secret it held in her heart.

In the great uncertainty she grew restless. To wait until next winter was impossible. She should die, if she must wait.

Die, she thought, and be laid by mother in the quiet little country church-yard—and the trees would rustle over us, and the flowers bloom and fade, the red leaves fall, and the snow cover us. And some day when he comes to see his old haunts again—famous and a little tired with success—his heart more mature, his face a little older—he will stand there in the long grass—how plainly Hope saw it all!—and turning aside to read the names to see if he recognizes any. He will come to me—he will pause. But he is not alone: he says he is with me—with who?—oh, so beautiful, so noble, so worthy of him—and in that low voice, that gives it music, "Why, what did I know about that name in the days long, long ago? How strange I can remember them!" Hope choked and gasped as she tortured herself in the still summer days.

In the midst of all this mental commotion Mrs. Dinks and Mrs. Bearon came rolling out from town to perform a call sincee. Mrs. Bearon was Mrs. Simcoe's mother-in-law—surprised and charmed by her friend's niece. Really an immense acquisition to society. We shall be lighted up. It will be positively refreshing not to see the same eternal old fices buzzing and booming about people's houses. What! going to New York with you? Ah, now that is really cruel. I don't know what Boston will say, Miss Wayne.

Hope had not the air of profoundly caring, but she did her part of the ceremony with composure—until her aunt said:

"Well, Hope, I suppose to take New York on my way to the Springs next week."

Then Miss Hope started and colored.

"I am sorry, dear, how I should like—"

It was too late, again. And who knows? possibly Hope was not sorry for her really involuntary betrayal of her desire.

"Would you like to go, too?"

"Dearest aunt, how good you are!"

Mrs. Beacon smiled.

"My dear Miss Wayne, I think you would easily find plenty of ladies who would be glad to chaperon you at the Springs. I am sure if Mrs. Dinks can not do so, I shall be very happy."

And she bowed with that persuasive suavity for which the Statehouses are distinguished to this day.

But Mrs. Dinks had no thought of declining the pleasure. It was impossible to say what passes between mothers and marriageable sons upon certain subjects, and how should we know that the Alfred Dinks had ever thought of marrying his cousin, or that his mother had reflected upon the extreme convenience of such a connection? In the minds of the best regulated mothers such thoughts do undoubtedly sometimes occur, both in regard to daughters and sons. Marriage, we are told, is at once natural and proper for mankind, and surely no maternal parent is not to be blamed if she looks a little to the lining of the nest in which her daughter may presently lo lay her eggs.

When Mrs. Dinks left Fineswood it had been agreed that Hope was to accompany her; and when she had bowed her visitors from the door, the young girl ran to Mrs. Simcoe, radiant as the day itself.

"Aunty, I'm going to New York next week with Aunt Dinks."

She put her arm around her aunty as she spoke, and kissed her. The eyes of the older woman looked down upon her face in amazement. The expression of her face did not change, but those eyes gradually filled with tears.

"God's grace go with you, my child."

"Why, aunty, is it so dreadfully wicked there?"

"It is our hearts that are desperately wicked, Hope."

"Come, come, aunty, this is too dismal! See how the sun shines! Won't you shine a little? Can I get anything for you?"

Foolish Hope! Of course every thing is possible when parcels are received to make a journey, whether they are ready for it or not. When the heart is all ready—when the mind has been packing and packing and packs may as well fall into order directly.

Mrs. Simcoe knew this very well. She knew that Hope was going, and that she was going to see Abel Nest.

So the girl ran out to begin to get ready. Mrs. Simcoe looked only more silently and fixedly, as if she were rummaging the very years dust and refuse of her memory or invention to find some musket which might be useful in this unexpected campaign. Never could she trust her dear child in that Babel! And yet how could she stay at home?

At length she seemed to bring something into sight. She rose quietly, and opening the drawer in her table, took out a sheet of foolscap—it was many years since Mrs. Simcoe had written a letter—and with great effort she composed the note which Lawrence Nest received on the day that Gabriel Bennet became his clerk.

CHAPTER XXX.

OLD FRIENDS AND NEW.

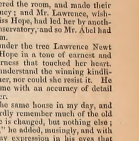
LAWRENCE NEWT had called at Banker's, and found Mrs. Dinks and Miss Hope Wayne. They were sitting at the window upon Broadway watching the promenaders along that famous thoroughfare—for thirty years ago the fashionable walk was between the Park and the Battery, and Bunker's was close to Morris Street, a little above the Bowling Green.

When Mr. Newt was announced Hope Wayne felt as if she were suffocating. Her heart seemed to be the husband of her friend, Mrs. Nancy Dinks, during the summer, of which we have had some intimation in her letter to Abel. They both looked up and saw a gentleman they had never seen before. The face is not known Newt had that calm, smiling sweetness to see which is like feeling the south wind. It was kindly and observed. It was the face of one of those ten men for which every city ought to be grateful. He bowed pleasantly, and said,

"Ladies, my name is Lawrence Newt."

There was a touch of quaintness in his manner, as in his dress.

"You will find the city quite deserted," said he. "But I have called with an invitation from my sister, Mrs. Boniface Howe, for this evening to a small party.



FRIENDS.

She inclues her card, and begs you to waive the formality of a call."

Hope was aware that Lawrence Newt and Hope Wayne came to be sitting on the cane sofa under the great orange-tree in Boniface Newt's conservatory.

They had entered the room, and made their bows to Mrs. Nancy; and Mr. Lawrence, wishing to talk to Miss Hope, had led her by another way to the conservatory, and so Mr. Abel had failed to see them.

As they sat under the tree Lawrence Newt conversed with Hope in a tone of respect and respectful tenderness that touched her heart. She could not understand the winning kindness of his manner, nor could she resist it. He spoke of her home with an accuracy of detail that surprised her.

"It was not the same house in my day, and you, perhaps, hardly remember much of the old one. The house is changed—but nothing else; no, nothing else," he added, musingly, and with the same dreamy expression in his eyes that was in them when he leaned against his office window and watched the ships—while his mind smiled swifter and farther than they.

"They can not touch the waving outline of the hills that you see from the lawn, nor the pines-trees that shade the windows. Does the little brook still flow in the meadow below? And do you understand the pine-trees? Do they tell any tales?"

He sighed with a half-mournful gayety. He asked as if he both longed and feared that she should say, "Yes, they have told me: I know all."

The murmurs of the singing came floating out to them as they sat. Hope was her self, and trustful. She was in the house of Abel—she should see him—she should hear him! And this dear gentleman—not exactly like a father nor an uncle—well, yes, perhaps a young uncle —he is brother of Abel's mother, and he mysteriously knows so much about Fineswood, and his smiling voice has a tone in it as he speaks of old days. I love him already—I trust him entirely—I have found a friend.

"Shall we go in again?" said Lawrence Newt. But they saw forms approaching, and sat still.

While they were yet silent, and Hope's heart was like the dawning summer heaven, she heard Irene wonn that Abel Nest's uncle, Mr. Grace Plumer, and watched him, speechlessly, as he and his companion glided by her into the darkness

"Yes, let us go in!" said Hope Wayne to Lawrence Newt as she rose calmly.

Abel had passed. He could no more have stopped and shaken hands with Hope Wayne than he could have sung like a nightingale. He could not even raise his head erect as he went by, something very stern and cold seemed to hold it down. The whole system of his life appeared to rush to the flesh of that moment to be tottering and shaking.

Miss Plumer's head was also bent; she was waiting to hear the end of that sentence. She thought society opened beautifully. Such a handsome fellow in such a romantic spot, and O dear Lavinia (she was rehearsing the letter she should write to her boom's confidant, her dearest sweetest friend), in such a fine style, he began, with his hair almost brushing mine. But he did not finish. Abel Nest were perfectly silent. He glided away with Grace Plumer into grateful gloom, and her cary, exquisitely apprehensive, caught from his lips only a smothered muttered word that began with d.

Abel Newt thought himself really in love with Hope Wayne. He wanted ease and comfort, and knew that they came by wealth, and he knew that wealth came by Hope Wayne. It was not an extraordinary case, but it sometimes leads to extraordinary results.

Lawrence Nest rose as she requested, and her mould away. She would her arm, and they walked on by her side. The young men were brought up and presented, and submitted their observations upon the weather, asked her how she liked New York — were delighted to hear that she would pass the next winter in the city—avoided show her that them that New York had some claim to attention even from a Bostonian—were charmed, really, with Mr. Bordon Beaton and—and—Mr. Alfred Dinks: at mention of which name they looked in her face in the most expressive manner to see the red result, as if the remark had been a blister, but saw only an unconscious abstraction in her own thoughts, mingled with an air of attention to what they were saying. In truth she was not upon and conversation can often be heard without the full force of mental attention.

"Miss Hope," said Lawrence Nest, who approached her with a young woman by his side, "I want you to know my friend Amy Waring."

The two girls looked at each other and bowed. Then they shook hands with a curious cordiality.

Amy Waring was like a spring day. In personal appearance every thing was full of hope; every little leaf of thought or sympathy was tangled out—was allured to blow into its fullest proportion. She had soft dark eyes, a rose-red and hard and black—not classy eyes, but mild, sympathetic eyes, in which you expect to see images as lovely as the Eastern traveler sees when he remembers home and looks in the deep hold in the spring of the hand of the camel's boy. They had the fresh, unworn, moist light that flowers have early in June morning, when they are full of sun and dew. And there was the same transparent, deep, pure darkness in her complexion. It was not sweet like the black, nor glossy. It did not look half Indian, nor even olive, but was an illuminated shadow. Have you seen the shade of Sorrento orange gardens?

The two girls—they were women, rather—went together to a sofa and sat down. Hope Warren had heard also should never speak again except from her lips outward. She felt as if the stone of the tomb had been rolled off of her, over the mouth of her spoken treasure of her life. But as she seated herself by Amy Waring's side, still holding her hand, she felt herself drawn very near to the heart of a human being, much nearer than she had been to Alfred Dinks.

Her impulse was to lay her head upon her new friend's shoulder and cry. For Hope was prostrated by the unexpected return of Abel, as a strong man is unnerved by sudden physical pain. She felt the overwhelming relief of a child, and longed to give way to it utterly.

"I am glad to know you, Miss Wayne!" said Amy Waring, in a cordial, cheerful voice, with a pleasant smile.

Hope bowed, and thanked her.

"I find that Mr. Nevet's friends always prove to be mine," continued Amy.

"I am glad of it, but I don't know why I am his friend," said Hope. "I never saw him until to-day. He must have lived in Dehaldi. Do you know how that is?"

She found conversation a great relief, and longed to give way to a kind of unrestrained social volubility.

"No; but he seems to have lived every where to have seen every thing, and to have known every body. A very useful acquaintance, I assure you!" said Amy, smiling.

"Is he married?" asked Hope.

There was the least little blush upon Amy's cheek as she heard this question; but so slight that if any body had thought he observed it, he would have looked again and said, No, I was mistaken. Perhaps, too, there was the least lit-tle fluttering at her heart observer's consciousness. But words are like breezes that blow hither and thither, and the leaves upon the most secluded trees in the most remote forests do rise and rest sometimes feel a breath, and stir, with rustling music, before they are aware.

Amy Waring replied, pleasantly, that he was not married. Hope Wayne said, "What a pity!" Amy smiled, and asked,

"Why a pity?"

"Because such a man would be so happy if he were married, and would make others so happy! He has been in love, you may be sure."

"Yes," replied Amy, "and is very much afraid of that. We don't see men of forty, or so, who have not been married—"

"By what?" asked Lawrence Nest, who had come up silently, and now stood beside her.

"Yes, by what?" interposed Miss Hope, who had been very busy during the whole evening trying to get under her hands the various threads of various interests that she saw flying and streaming out around her—by what not seen Mr. Alfred Dinks devoted to Miss Wayne, and was therefore confirmed in her belief that they were engaged—by what had been the history of Grace Plumer, and therefore concluded he cared nothing about her—by what had been the last words with Alfred Dinks, but was extremely dissatisfied with her best; and who, seeing Hope and Amy together, had come to the conclusion for them for a long time, anxious to overhear or to join in.

"Really," said Amy, looking up with a smile, "I was making a very innocent remark."

"Perfectly innocent, I'm sure!" replied Fanny, in her sweetest manner. It was such a different sweetness from Amy Waring's that Hope turned and looked very curiously at Miss Fanny.

"There are few men of forty who have not been in love," said Amy, calmly. "That is what I was saying."

As there was only one man of forty, or near that age, in the little group, the appeal was evidently to him. Lawrence Nest looked at the three girls, with the swimming light in his eyes, half crushing them and smiling, so that every one of them felt, each in her own way, that they were as completely blinded by that smile as by a glare of sunlight—which, like that smile, is very warm and not unchildren.

They could not see beyond the words, nor here to.

"Miss Amy is right, as usual," said he.

"Why, Uncle Lawrence, will us all about it!" said Fanny, with a hard, black smile in her eyes.

Uncle Lawrence was not in the slightest degree alarmed.

"Fanny," said he, "I will speak to you in a parable. Remember, to you. There was a farmer whose neighbor built a curious tower upon his land. It was upon a hill, in a grove. The structure was lovely, and gave the entire region with fearful rapidity. The gossips gossiped about it in the public houses. Artists came to stole up to the city, and down came reporters and special correspondents to describe it with re-markable accuracy and picturesque metaphor of style known only to them. The builder held his tongue, but Fanny. The world remained hand upon the subject, but their speculations were no more valuable than those of other people. The farmer received pleasure to tell; and all the great newspapers announced that, at an enormous expense, they had secured the exclusive intelligence, and the exclusive intelligence was always wrong. The country was in commotion, and a shrill cry arose about town that a man was building upon his land. But the farmer was wooden, and, in the exaggeration of exasperations, was, that the farmer whose estate adjoined never so much as spoke of the tower, and never received pleasure to tell; and all the great newspapers announced that, at an enormous expense, they had secured the exclusive intelligence, and the exclusive intelligence was always wrong. The country was in commotion, and a shrill cry arose about town that a man was building upon his land. But the unconscious neighbor should never be stricken to silence, and such a perfectly tranquil mind. There are but two theories possible in regard to art men, and those respecting Public Sentiment. Ask the builder, if you want to know, said the farmer, at a party, to ask me, and we want you to tell us, because we know that you have asked him, and know all about it. Now what, in the name of all that is holy, is that tower?' I have never asked, replies the farmer. Never asked?' cried Public Sentiment. Never asked! Impertinence. And why, in the name of Heaven, have you never asked?' cried the crowd. Because, said the farmer, I am not curious."

Lawrence Nest looked at his auditors "As you listening, Amy?"

"Yes, Uncle Lawrence."

"—because it is none of my business."

Lawrence Nest smiled; and all the rest, including Fanny, who remarked that he might have told her in fewer words that she was impertinent.

"Yes, Fanny; but sometimes words help us to remember. Remember, my dear, second guessed when we have learned to bee our own potatoes in our own fields, and not vex our souls about our neighbor's towers."

Hope Wayne was not in the least abstracted. She was completely alive to the application that was said and done; and listened with a smile to Lawrence Nest's story, which she knew more and more as the various aspects of his character unrolled themselves before her.

The general restless distraction that precedes the breaking up of a party had now begun. People were moving about, and ruffling and looking off the ends of conversation. They began to go. A few said good-evening, and had had such a charming time. The rest were disappointed, until there was a universal departure. Grace Plumer was leaving upon Sligo Moultrie's arm. But where was Abel?

Hope Wayne's eyes were fixed upon the door. She could see it all. But her only glimpse of him during the evening had been that glimmering double mirror opposite the entrance.

There he had remained ever since. There he still stood going through the door into the whispering-gallery, and back again, and thinking a wild whirl of thoughts. Somehow or other, in her thoughts he was the originator of all actions. We may try to alter the course of events that we foresee, but we shall probably let them alone.

"What a fool I am!" thought Abel, bitterly and fiercely, "to suppose that I had found something that will cost me the whole future I had planned. Hope Wayne believes that I was making love to Grace Plumer. I know that I looked so, for I did it purposely. Caught in my own trap—trapped—foiled—fooled—damned—Hope Warne—before—I—had—won—her."

But his reflections seemed to percolate drop by drop, as it were, through his brain.

Now it is not a very terrible thing for a young man to make love to a young woman, except that as they saunter in the luminous distances of a conservatory on a summer night. No, and it is not very dreadful even if that young man should have given occasion to another young woman, set others, provided always and every where and every how that it is all honor bright at bottom-that he is not playing falsely, and not lying, and not making love (as we call it, as if love were not made for us!). And even if the other young woman aforesaid be present, and overhear and overseo words and acts that are not meant to be written in themselves, but only blinds and misguidings to other people, it may be very foolish, but it is not treacherous, it may require some very elaborate explanation, it may even cost some hours of exceeding doubt and despondency, yes, and be as willingly concede several sleepless nights and haggard days, before a due reconciliation and mutual understanding; but it is still a very venial offense—an enormity susceptible of satisfactory explanation, and something which may be made to intelligently ripple the course of true love, not dam it sadly and send it weltering and wathing upon the fair fields of life.

Abel may, therefore, have been innocent, or very nearly so, and he could need only a fit opportunity to present every thing clearly to Hope's mind. She was full of generous impulses at once. This renunciation was surely entirely uncalled for.

Abel was always and every where and every how that it is all honor bright at bottom. And who knows Abel, who can know that, but the offender himself?

Suppose that Hope Wayne had not been the heiress-at-law of Grandfather Bell—had not a minus instead of a plus quantity—could Abel probably have remained in the city, constantly, doubting and d'ing? Could he not, under those circumstances, have easily raised his head from the desk in Miss Wayne's office Plumer hung upon his arm?

Alas! Lawrence Nest's despair! Suppose the gates of Paradise clang behind! Are there no fresh fields, no pastures new? Ans. nonez

(To be continued.)

LITERARY.

THE BERTRAMS, by the author of "Dr. Thorne," is the latest novel, published by Harper & Brothers. Like "Dr. Thorne," it is strong in character. The people are not of the highest metropolis people, the character of every man and woman standing out clearly outlined. The construction of the novel is the plan of making no concealment beforehand of the plot. It is open and manifest, and we become interested in it as it progresses with that strange anxiety to follow out a history which is known to be true in every detail. The author takes the opportunity to introduce a little Oriental travel, which is by no means the least interesting part of the book. We have never found better sketches of modern Jerusalem than in these volumes, and many of the travelers in the Holy City will fail to find elsewhere any more faithful description. The love makes love at a proper time, the valley of humiliation walks by the side of a lady down the valley of the Son of Hinnom, sends by her feet over the bed of Siloam, sends up the hive to Jerusalem for dry stockings, and changes them in the cave of the Apostles' Creed. There is no sensation, but it is excellently well done, and the Eastern traveler will not fail to enjoy the book, whether or not another with all the scenes in and around the Holy City.

The love of the story is a plain, sad story of love is this miserable world, ending quietly, pleasantly enough at last, by the usual marriage, which makes the present enjoyment all the greater. The book is curious, eccentric, and very readable and enjoyable.

The readers of Mr. Prime's TENT LIFE in the Holy Land will welcome Newright, as one of the author's traveling companions. We suppose it is no longer a secret that this was a nameless charge of Mr. Bayard Taylor's last Persian Envoy, whose death at Diarbekir on the Tigris is now announced on the last page of volume. Newright, in fact, is drawn as a sketch of the brief but useful and interesting life of this gentleman, Rev. Chester F. Newright, graduate of Yale, Tutor, Principal, and, published by Sheldon & Co. It is a short but deeply attractive biography. It does not so much reveal the man, as him himself, as what he showed himself to be by his life. In the few years that he lived he so devoted himself to searching through the East for openings into which he might direct the Christian zeal of the Mohammedans, and his work was well done. The volume is not large, but it contains very much and very interesting of the world-roving of all who would know how to live for two worlds at the same time.

THE HISTORY OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH AT TRENTON, by Rev. Dr. Hall, published by Randolph, is a history of Presbyterianism in America. It is a fine monogram, valuable and eminently useful. It involves the history of Princeton, New Jersey, the Manses of Caswell, Burr, Davies, Finley, in early times, and of Alexander and Symmes in later days. Dr. Hall is a historian. Dr. Hall is deeply interested in his subject, and makes it eloquent. Rev. Ernest W. Shurtleff contributes a letter sketching the history of his own pastorate in his own classical and polished style.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE GOVERNMENT SUSTAINS GOVERNOR CUMMING.

The law officer of the General Government, by direction of the President, has just rendered an important decision in the case of ambiguous conflict between the action between the Federal Executive, judicial, and military authorities and Governor Cumming, of Arizona, in a document it appears that the courts of Governor Cumming is sustained. This opinion is also important in another respect, as it defines the principles that should govern Governors of Territories and military commanders in the exercise of the powers delegated to them.

DISORDER IN ARIZONA.

Arizona letters state that much excitement has been occasioned in the Territory by the late acts of organized bands of ruffians, who commit outrages upon the Mexican residents. Recently a party of Americans in cold blood by a gang of desperadoes, under the lead of two men named Page and Ake. A meeting of citizens had been called to adopt preliminary measures for the formation of a Vigilance Committee. The Governor requested justices to summon a force, criminals escaping punishment through the inability of the people to bring them to trial.

FIGHT WITH COMANCHES.

The California column, consisting of the 6th ult., while arrived at St. Louis on Saturday, had a considerable and desperate battle between a party of United States troops, under Major Van Horn, and a body of Comanche Indians, on the 8th inst., on the fork of the Arkansas river. Forty Indians were killed and thirty-six wounded. Among the latter were Chief Santanta and Big Tree. Among the latter were Captain Smith and Lieutenant Lee.

DEATH OF A DISTINGUISHED LAWYER.

Hon. William S. Reed, late United States Commissioner of Claims, died suddenly on Monday last of congestion of Philadelphia, in the chamber of the Board of Trade, where he had been. He had addressed and argued an interesting history of his negotiations with the authorities of China, and, after a brief exhaustion, gradually, and thoroughly refuted the slanders of the Los Angeles.

MURPHY AND A LADY-PLAYER.

The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Mercury, in a notice of Murphy, the great chess-player, says a clever contest between him and a lady player took place in New York. A carriage drove to the St. Nicholas, in which was seated a splendidly-dressed lady. She sent up a card and requested an interview with the chess champion. Murphy was in the parlor, when the fair visitor demanded the privilege of playing a game with him. Murphy bowed, and the lady was conducted to the chess-room. A table was brought to the window, and Mr. Murphy sat down to play. The lady was a very pretty young woman. Half a dozen moves were made on either side, when the lady arose, and, with a graceful bow, declined to prove the most formidable antagonist he had ever met. Murphy was astonished, and the lady, Murphy directed the servant to admit no one else until it was known if the lady would play again. She was alone. The lady was then satisfied, and blockingly took her leave. Murphy was completely puzzled by her conduct. The moment she had gone, Murphy and his friends examined the board, and found that her move was simply an excuse to obtain a position. Her object could be found in the lines of play. This, however, she failed to accomplish, and though Murphy was completely at a loss to know precisely who was the visitor, the gentlemen are as much in the dark as ever. Murphy says that she has proved a most game in which Murphy was over a contestant, and that he has never engaged in a more interesting battle with Murphy in order to assure herself of her own skill.

THE NEW YORK POETS.

We read in the Evening Post: "A few days since, a man on a sidewalk in Broadway, near Fulton street, and occupied the only seat, of 'six on a side,' that is provided for foot-passengers, saw her worse when, from his countenance denoted his fashionable dress, his appearance was that of a gentleman, he kept on with another his own or his neighbor's did not then occur to him, and appeared to be quite unconscious of impropriety in scraps for a stage 'all full inside.' A splendid dinner, with wine, was given to the poor creature.

Arrived at her destination—a jewelry store—she was asked by the clerk what she wished to purchase. She began to go the trade. She emphatically declared that he was mistaken. She was the wife of a gentleman of wealth, and was on her way to the country for the benefit of her morning's journey. She was informed that her husband had been arrested for the most disgraceful character d'astardie, that his brilliants were probably in the hands of the police, and that if their friends he paid his was rent and successful. She reluctantly adopted the alternative, and anxiously awaited the return search, which it was supposed would extinguish all hope of a release in the future.

"The resulted in bringing to light, from an unexpected quarter, the sum of $1,000, which was paid to the lady a few minutes before glittered upon the hand of her light-fingered friend. The lady returned to the store, and, with a smile, gave the diamond ring to the astonished clerk.

Her admission of the trickiest was not in the least degree, upon examination, found to be worth more than $1 worth $90."

HEAVY DAMAGES IN A BREACH OF PROMISE CASE.

A telegram from St. Louis, published last week, announced the verdict in the case of Miss Sallie Hall against Dr. Hall, of Mexico, Mo., for $25,000 damages for breach of promise of marriage. The following is a report of the evidence. It appears that the defendant, Henry Shaw is sixty years old, and the plaintiff twenty-five. The plaintiff a spinster of thirty years, who, aided by her two sisters, Mrs. Dr. Hall and Mrs. Judge Hall, kept a boarding-house. She seems to have paid particular attention to plaintiff, who was then a boy. Mrs. Hall, the plaintiff's mother, was foreign to her door, had her cut to ride with him, and in fact made a pet of him. He was left by the lady for sick. Plaintiff charges that he solemnly promised to marry her, yet would not do so. Mrs. Hall appeared in behalf of this slight she used Mr. Shaw for breach of promise in the sum of $50,000. Mr. Shaw's counsel claimed that Mrs. Hall had been attempting to blackmail him, and that her sister-in-law, who was at last accounts still alive, died of a broken heart.

REGATTA OF THE YACHT CLUB.

The annual regatta of the New York Yacht Club came off last week, and was as interesting as could be expected. The Mischief, the Madeline, and the Fleetwing, the three smallest vessels, were the first to start. The Dauntless, the second-class schooner prize, the Dove the first-class prize, and the Fleetwing the first-class sloop prize, and the Flying Cloud the third-class sloop prize.

The Mischief was a disastrous failure.

The Napoleon Arkansaw Planter published the following account of a recent duel:

"Whereas, untoldth pinkham, my wife, has left my bed and board, and has gone to live with Mr. Jones, and has he nobel rewarded, let it be more or less. Jim Hall caused untoldth pinkham to run, his wife, down the small size, find her do or her mother will be dead on the 28, Hall and pinkham met on the bloody field. Jim Hall not anything about, with a double-barrel shotgun, and pinkham with a revolver, went away the 9 of nevember Hall, before he was reached by pinkham, was struck till the darter of cera hill and banner hill of adam."

A SLAPPER, AND A SLAPPER'S DEFENDER.

A singular affair is said to have occurred in Portland, Me., on the 31st ult., between two members of one of the most distinguished jurists and politicians of Florida. Ex-Governor Marvin, of Tallahassee, and Mr. Call, Mayor of Pensacola, who had paid her some attentions previous to her marriage with Governor Marvin. The latter gentleman is reported to have struck Mr. G. the latter of her feelings, and he returned the compliment by a slap in return. Governor Marvin, in a state of intoxication, is said to be extravagant and startling manner, but he probably expected nothing serious would come of it. One fact is certain, however, she went to his house and called for Mr. G., and, when that lady came to the door, Mrs. Marvin pulled a pistol, from the folds of her dress, and fired at her rival. The ball missed its mark, and Mrs. G. bravely rushed upon the desperate girl, and wrenched the pistol from her hand, and prevented and determined to shot them. Mrs. Marvin was then taken to the police station, and bailed by others who interfered, succeeded in inflicting a slight wound upon the face of Mrs. G. The ladies will be tried in order to shield her from a criminal prosecution, which would be used her or an insane asylum.

PERSONAL.

The Tuscaloosa Gazette and Times has had the pleasure of meeting Gov. Rector Borland, formerly United States Senator from Arkansas, and afterward United States Minister to Central America. It will be remembered that a bullet lodged at the Hon. Rector's nose led to the hemorrhage which caused his death. Gov. Borland is a Southerner and a Democrat. Quid Nunc says that he has been nursing a rabbit like, and lives quietly on his farm in Arkansas, where he combines the luxuries of leisure with the pursuits of agriculture. He is in fine health and spirits.

President Buchanan recently, in alluding to the charge that Texas would be lost to North Carolina was with a view to its attraction for a second term, said that nothing was further from his intention, and he had never even hinted to himself of the first opportunity publicly to disabuse the minds of those who suspected him of the idea that he desired to become again a candidate for the Presidency.

A Paris correspondent of the Boston Post says: "I was at the bankers' the other day, when Mr. Young, the newly appointed successor to the Marchese Gerolamo, who told me confidentially, in the course of conversation, that he had left the banker that that morning a private soldier of the 1st, in his great coat and knapsack, and had gone to the house of the bank and presented a letter containing a draft in favor of Count ——, for 30,000 francs, 20,000 The banker asked where the Count was. 'I am he,' was the answer."

By the will of the late Charles F. Hoyer, the leading merchant of Sacramento, Cal., his estate, valued at $1,000,000, is to be divided as follows: To his wife, $50,000; to each of his four children, $17,000; to William Hoyer, a brother, and C. Wright, Peck & Pillsbury, and Augustus T. Foster, $10,000 each; to several relatives, $5,000 each; to the Society of Pioneers of the city, $1,000; to the Protestant Orphan Asylum, $10,000; to Wendell Phillips Francis Jackson, William Lloyd Garrison, and others, to be distributed by the Anti-Slavery, Women's Rights, and Non-Resistant Societies.

Governor Medary, of Kansas, who has been spending a few days at his old home in Columbus, Ohio, returned to his official post on Saturday.

Enclish Locomotive is practising law at Leavenworth.

A wife in Portage in the north corner of eleven gets the second best twelve years old. Taxes of them elevated to dollar a few days ago.

FOREIGN NEWS

THE WAR.

THE FIRST BATTLE.

The first battle has been fought at Montebello.

The battle of Montebello took place on the first ult. The French advance was under the command of Gen. Forey, under General Stadion, attacked the advanced guard of Marshal Baraguay d'Hilliers, and was driven back by General Forey's division after a fierce combat of four hours' duration. The Austrians retreated on Pietteuten cavalry, carried Montebello, but did not attempt to hold the position.

The loss of the latter is stated by the French at 600 to 700, and that of the French at 600 to 700, of whom many were killed. The Austrian loss, though not stated, is known, was heavier.

The Austrian account of the battle states that General Stadion pushed forward a reconnoissance by a forced march toward Lignt and Montebello, and after a sharp fight with a French force of superior strength retreated behind the Po to protect our order.

The actual strength of the French is not stated. Its parts say they numbered 30,000 men. This is the first engagement of Sardinian cavalry.

THE AUSTRIAN PROCLAMATION TO TAKE THE FIELD.

It was asserted that the Emperor of Austria arrived at the 29th ultimo at Milan, and issued a proclamation to the Army, accompanied by General Hess. It was reported that General Urpital had been sent to the Po to reconnoitre, but his previsions were beginning to fail in Piedmont, and that he would not be able to cross at the present position for more than fifteen days longer.

THE PROCLAMATION TO THE ALLIES.

The following official French bulletins appeared in the Moniteur:

"ALESSANDRIA, May 17, 1859.

"The Emperor went yesterday to Valenza, to reconnoitre the position of our vanguard and the course of the Po. He met a white flag. The Austrians had evacuated the bridgeheads, and the military are supporting completion.

"ALESSANDRIA, May 18, 1859.

"The organization of the army is going on actively. The repairs of the fortress of Alessandria, the works of the bridges, roads, and railways are supporting completion.

"The Emperor, after having visited the positions and troops of Voghera, went yesterday to Valenza, and passed all quite out of condition to satisfy their demands.

"During the night of the 15th a body of cavalry, 100 strong, escaladed the bridge of Valenza through a breach, and took a 24 pounder although he take it."

THE IMPERIAL ENTRY INTO ALESSANDRIA.

The Times correspondent says: "The first intelligence that the Emperor of the French, riding side by side with Marshal Canrobert, had reached by a ford the left bank of the Po, and had entered the town, establishing here the headquarters of his powerful army, was the first news that reached the arrival of his Majesty has been greeted by the most vociferous and unbridled manifestations of joy on both of citizens and soldiers. Triumphal arches were erected in different streets, and the bridge of boats by which, the Emperor crossed the river, was decorated with flowers and flags, on the fronts of which Garibaldi, 'All' ordi' and other inscriptions, the introduction of the conqueror of Marengo) had been constructed. Immediately on the arrival of the Emperor, the Municipal council, with a flag at their head, went to meet him, and took him to the Royal Palace, splendidly decorated for the occasion. The enthusiasm of the people was really magnificent; his martial bearing and his bold, free manner gave evidence of the noble race of warriors from whom he springs. It would have been a subject worthy of Meissonier, if that great painter could enough to describe the busy and singular appearance of the streets. Groups of soldiers in front of houses and cafés, together with the beautiful women and girls of the city, mingled and encouraged each other in the most animated manner. In this one of the prominent features of the present movement, and one which will be found to be of great importance. Many of the ladies of the highest rank are seen in their talking together, calling together, drinking and singing together. The most perfect unanimity prevails, and it was the real manifestation of a powerful and true-felt unity. The manifestations had no limit during the whole of the day addressed by the Emperor to the army was posted at the corners of the streets, and over the walls of public buildings."

BLOCKADE OF AUSTRIAN PORTS.

The official Weiner Zeitung announces that a Norwegian brig, while going into Venice, was fired upon by French frigate and informed that all Austrian ports, from the mouth of the Po to the Roman frontier, were in a state of blockade. The commander of the fortress at Venice had received the same notice. The brig in which Hollow Venice had already taken twenty vessels.

The Austrian squadron in the Adriatic consists of 30, or, in much more detail, of 34 ships.

The London Times correspondent in the Austrian camp says that a naval attack on Venice would have no chance of success. Every channel has either been quite blockaded by sunken ships, or closely tailed with steam accompanied all these obstacles. The Paris correspondent of the Times, however, says that the French squadron is about to attack Venice, but merely to blockade that port for the present.

AUSTRIAN EXACTIONS.

A dispatch dated Turin, 17th, says: "The bridge of Stella has been threatened by the Austrians. The water of the Po have risen. Women and children of the country are compelled by the enemy to labor at the bridge.

"The Barone of Belleville, a village in the district of Alessandria, and other persons, have been made hostages, who are ordered to supply with the greatest for contributions, have been arrested.

"Austrian workmen have been assembled on the right bank of the Po and at the bridge of Stella, and other workmen have been collected between Arona and Sesto.

OCCUPATION OF VERCELLI BY THE ALLIES.

A Piedmontese dispatch dated Turin, May 19, says: "A foreign regiment, consisting of Austrians and Swiss under its Carpiano, near San Germano, driving off cattle and plunder, at the approach of the troops, leaving its light, evaded the enemy at San Germano, but they withdrew to Vercelli, where they are. The Austrians were expected after blowing up two arches of the bridge of Stella. Our troops are in possession of Vercelli, and the inhabitants with their artillery are still on the left bank of the river."

THE RUMORED MISSION OF THE GENERAL GOWAN.

A letter from Turin in the Independance, of Brussels, says: "The damage already caused by the Austrians is very great. They have destroyed bridges, cut the dikes, and set fire to the houses. Corn, cattle, wagons, &c., have been taken, principally vexatious, burned and blown up bridges, destroyed railways, and sacked country houses and farm buildings. Count Cavour, who has a great deal of his property in the threatened provinces, says he have been committed, will be a severe sufferer. The Piedmontese people are animated with extraordinary zeal, much dignity and firmness, not excepting the clergy, to whom the Austrians have given the most cruel provocation to trust. The Austrians could neither find a spy, assistance, nor information in the country."

SUCCESS OF THE FRENCH LOAN.

The Moniteur publishes an official report of the Minister of Finance respecting the subscriptions made to the loan of 500 millions. The total subscriptions amount to 2,307,000,000 francs. 8,000,000 francs have been subscribed in the name of 1,052,000 persons. The number of subscribers is 623,000. The ministerial report points out that such results are due to the wise and liberal financial system, and the wealth, power, and patriotism of France. The report says that the confidence of the people and the Emperor, and the entire confidence of the nation in the strength of the army and the sovereign, are evidenced by this splendid success.

The Courrier Messenger, of the 15th inst., says: "The effect of payments to be made on account of the first 500 millions continues to be greater than ever. Yesterday, before the doors of the Bank of France, and throughout all the Ministry of Finance, many of whom had been there since the morning, numerous groups of bankers, and of ordinary citizens have been spread in the old barracks of the Carrousel, and in the Champs Elysées, and in the Place Vendôme."

THE POPE DOESN'T TRUST THE EMPEROR.

A letter from Rome, in the Paris Univers, says: "The Pope in Consistory yesterday, after the usual allocution of the Pope, having received a dispatch ordering him to express the sentiments of the Emperor of the French and the French toward his Holiness, and to declare that his Majesty would not permit any attack upon the territory of the Sovereign Pontiff and to protect his person and his rights. The Pope expressed himself in the most touching terms, in reply, said to the ambassador, 'Monsieur le Duc, that is what I would expect.'"

SWITZERLAND POSITIVELY NEUTRAL.

Instructions were manifested by the Italian refugees for the Swiss frontier, and the Federal Government in Lausanne, but they were put down by the Swiss troops, who have been called out for the purpose.

The Federal Council has issued a proclamation forbidding the exportation of arms to and the collecting of arms by the inhabitants of Switzerland, for the purpose of the aid of the Italian frontiers. Fugitives and deserters aide to their arms are to be sent back to their regiments. Every able citizen is liable to the territories of the state.

RENEWED TREACHERY OF RUSSIA.

The Liverpool Mercury says that a private information explanatory of Austria's mysterious proceedings. It says that a treaty existed between Russia and Austria, the Austrian troops will march direct on Paris. Russia will then join the Austrians, and the object of the combine treachery is to be Moldavia and Wallachia. The Russian Government has given to the Porte a formal declaration of its intentions in the event of the Austrians and Germany will act. The Porte then proceeds to show the declaration to the Western Ambassadors, requesting to say that it is disposed to place implicit faith in its declarations.

The French Government, it was said, had received information of the plot, and the Prince Napoleon had moved toward the Austrian frontier.

GERMANY ON THE SIDE.

The London Times says: "The vision Prussian army has been put on a war footing, the federal fortresses are being repaired, and the contingents of the minor states, to the 38 of Maigni, that of Prussia having been voted by the Diet, are being mobilized. The Bavarian army of 70,000 men and 150 guns is already on the Rhine, marching their troops southward at once, and Hanover and Wurtemburg are following suit. Baden has a corps of observation on the Rhine. It is at the momentous crisis that the English cabinet has chosen to propose a new reform bill, which, though couched in general terms, and possibly not intended to be carried, is yet of a character to produce its sufficiently remarkable. We may quote it once more. Prussia, says the bill, is to have a number of votes in the boards of European public right and the balance of power in Europe. Prussia, therefore, is to have a vote in the case for the security, the protection, and the national interests of Germany. Prussia, therefore, is to have a vote in the case of those European questions in which the German Confederate Powers will stand firmly by her side. Prussia, therefore, is to have a vote in the case of her readiness to defend the common Fatherland with her whole power."

RESIGNATION OF BOUL—PROSPECT OF ANOTHER HOLY ALLIANCE.

We read in the Vienna correspondence—"At eleven o'clock yesterday morning Count Buol ceased to be Minister for Foreign Affairs. He had sent in his resignation, or he tendered his resignation, or whether he was requested to do so, I cannot say, but certain it is that he resigned that day. Count Buol is a man of talent, and has always stood high in the confidence of the Emperor. He is somewhat dangerous to jump at conclusions, but I risk nothing by doing so. Count Buol was the man who had to undergo a complete change. Count Rechberg, who has been for some time at the head of the Finance Department, is said to be entrusted with the provisional management of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It is also said that Count Rechberg will be the permanent successor of Count Buol. Count Rechberg is the enemies of Count Buol made a violent attack on him, and succeeded in getting him removed. But, as a matter of fact, he was to be rejected or even hated from England, it would be wise to make peace with Prince Napoleon.

"At the moment Count Buol has left office the first step toward a reconciliation was taken, and it is probable that a good understanding will soon be established between the Austrian and Russian empires. Austria will, as a matter of course, be obliged to make many concessions, but in the changes which are to take place in Europe it will be by no means the worst off. Russia will be a support, rather than an enemy, to Austria in the St. Petersburg and Vienna Governments are both agreed that the present party in power again in Prussia, and when that is the case the re-establishment of the Holy Alliance may reasonably be expected."

AN AMERICAN CAPTAIN REFUSES TO HELP THE FRENCH.

A London Times letter from Toulon says: "The masters of several English merchant ships that have been lying here many months, from time to time, to the authorities for Government freights to Genoa, and have been forcibly refused, on the ground that, during the Italian rebellion, the British Government and East India Company decided to engage French tonnage. The authorities also said that they did not want any foreign ships, as they could get all the transports they required within sufficient time. Yesterday, however, the master was at last allowed, and application has been made to several others. Captain Hall, who is waiting for the same purpose, refuses to Genoa. An American skipper was applied to the other day, and he declined. He said he was then preparing for doing so was highly creditable. He was not satisfied in his own mind that the war was being undertaken for freedom, and likely to benefit humanity; he therefore did not feel disposed to lend his ship to the opponents."

PRINCE NAPOLEON'S ADDRESS TO HIS TROOPS.

The Moniteur publishes the following address of Prince Napoleon:

"ARMY OF ITALY, FIFTH CORPS D'ARMEE.—Soldiers of the Fifth Corps of the Army of Italy!—The Emperor calls on to the honor of commanding you. Many days are my old comrades of Alma and Inkermann. As in the Crimea, and as in Africa, you will realize your glorious reputation. Discipline, courage, tenacity—such are the virtues which will lead you to victory, and open a page to Europe, which is attentively watching for the Italian events. You will be the worthy heirs of the heroic cradle of ancient civilization and of modern emancipation. Soldiers, I am proud to be your chief. Let us march, then, with confidence, and let us show to the universal enemies of France whose name is associated in our history with all our victories, and with all our glories. The reception which the Italian people give to their liberators, the sympathies which we meet with, prove that the Emperor defends Vive l'Empereur! Vive la France! Vive l'Independance Italienne!

"The Prince commanding in chief the fifth corps of the Army of Italy, NAPOLEON JOSEPH CHARLES PAUL."

IMPOPULARITY OF FLOG FLOG.

A writer says: "Flog flog is not popular in this fair britain, but preceded the Emperor to the station of the Lyons Railway by about two quarters of an hour. Flog flog and Burn a little vivarity was exhibited toward the Prince, but was no one wounded to be seen except the cooling for Prince. In fact, this man appears to be a perpetual source of disaster. The Times thinks it necessary to tell all idea of his receiving a command was entirely given by the Emperor. Flog flog is called the only one in the surviving brother of Napoleon the Great was to have been the first to be sacrificed to the rage of the people. Flog flog is said to have declared that the Emperor never was willing to be his Imperial Highness's subordinate. It is impossible to imagine the feelings of the brother of his wait of courage, and which have caused the Emperor to be in this disagreeable position with the French vallies."—Let us make our mock general—our general of straw—Flog flog, the Emperor's brother, in the place of Marshal Vaillant as Minister of Law, and Marshal Canrobert, Flog flog's brother-in-law, Minister of Justice. It does seem that no uncomfortable lit tle temper that enjoys other people's misfortunes, in France, is now over by it. If distressed, he will tower even the proprietors of the Times, and the Times itself, in the eyes of the people on whose backs he sits and abuses that even the rumors of Achilles in the Greek camp will find say upon Flog flog.

THE HUNGARIANS TO DIE.

It is said that arms have been sent to Hungary, and that the Hungarians intended are intended to rise in insurrection to create a diversion in favor of the French by the Austrians. Kossuth is at Turin, and has communicated with Napoleon. He will be in charge of the Hungarian exiles, being confronted with the vagueness he became confused. Kossuth, Major Turr, and Klapka are said at once by a agent-martial, as already stated, and shot.

THE PRUSSIAN ARMY AGAINST THE WAR.

A Paris correspondent of the Boston Post says that the Prussian Regency is at the head of the party opposed to the cause of unanimous by her behavior at the Council, She has declared that the question of her war should be taken off. She declared the way to be unjust and wicked, and expressed her sympathy with the Italians. There is a prosperous end—and in the midst of sobs and exclamations, letting, her daughter appeals to the sympathies of the fraternities, immediately to cause the strife to cease, that all hens there may be united in love. The Princess Royal he has a personage that the Archbishop of Paris; was to be the bride of Prince Frederick William, heir apparent to her chair, covered her face with her handkerchief and left the room.

MARTIAL SONGS.

The Paris correspondent of the Boston Traveller, in speaking of the exciting events of the departure of the French troops for Italy, says: "The Marseillaise, the Marseillaise, the band playing it with incomparable spirit and fire. The sun was shining brightly overhead, and the scene was one which no pen can fitly describe. Imagine the unfeigned enthusiasm! Think they heard Berlioz!

"But you must hear the Marseillaise sung by back his police, bidding them, in the imperative voice of the day, to 'Circulate.' They have no time to stop and sing they please! The din of arms hath even drowned the voice of the Muses.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON III. AND THE GENERALS OF THE ARMY OF ITALY.

A TURCO.

A ZOUAVE IN MARCHING ORDER.—[FROM A SKETCH BY LIEUTENANT BOCHER.]

A TURCO.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

THE HOSTILE ARMIES.

We give herewith an engraving of the Emperor Napoleon and his Generals, portraits of members of the famous corps known as Zouaves and Turcos, and a sketch of the skirmish between the Austrians and Sardinians on the borders of the Po.

Of the French staff, four members are pretty well known to our readers. Every one will recognize the Emperor, with his hard face and waxed mustache; the Prince Napoleon, whose resemblance to his uncle is his chief capital in trade; fat old Marshal Pelissier, the hero of the Ouled-Rich Cave, and of the Malakoff; Canrobert, an excellent soldier, but the man who didn't take Sebastopol. The other officers are less generally known.

Marshal Randon, who occupies the next position to Canrobert, is an old soldier of the First Empire, who served in the campaign against Russia, was wounded at Lutzen, and was in a fair way of rapid promotion when the unlucky overthrow of Napoleon destroyed his prospects. It was not till Louis Philippe ascended the throne that he again obtained military employment. The Orleans dynasty sent him to Algiers, where, as first captain, then colonel, of Chasseurs, he won his fame honorably. He took a prominent part in the civil administration of the country, and for many years filled the important post of Governor-General. During a brief period under the republic he was Minister of War. His titles and dignities at present are Senator, Marshal of France, and Grand Officer of the Legion of Honor.

Baraguay d'Hilliers, who is on the left of the Emperor, is also an old soldier of the First Empire. He is, however, a man of accommodating temper; and though, during Napoleon's heyday, he was staunch to his cause, at the cort of some ugly wounds received in battle, when his star set Baraguay d'Hilliers found that his conscience did not prevent his swearing allegiance to the Bourbons. The step involved him in some perils, but he came out of them without material injury. He rallied without scruple to the Orleans interest when Louis Philippe became king, and in Algeria had the honor of commanding the Duke d'Aumale, whose bravery he took care to eulogize with emphasis in his dispatches. From this period till the revolution of February he filled various offices of honor and emolument under the Orleans Government. In February, 1848, he sent in his adhesion to the Provisional Government, ran for the department of Doubs as deputé, was elected, and figured prominently in the Constituent Assembly as a member of "the right," an uncompromising opponent, however, of General Cavaignac. He was a very active politician at this time, founded and became president of the famous Club of the Rue de Poitiers. When Louis Napoleon resolved to overthrow the republic, Baraguay d'Hilliers was one of his first allies. He took part in the coup d'état, and took the post previously occupied by Changarnier as commander of the army of Paris. During the Russian war he commanded the army which took Bomarsund. He is now Vice-President of the Senate, Marshal of France, and Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor.

Marshal Magnan was intended by his relatives to be a lawyer. He, however, ran away from the law school in 1809, and enlisted in the army at the age of eighteen. Two years' service won for him the rank of second lieutenant, and in the following year admission to the Imperial Guard. He fought at Waterloo; but was so highly esteemed by the friends of Louis XVIII. that he was offered promotion to enter that monarch's army. He did so, and rose steadily to the rank of Colonel. In 1831, the Government of Louis Philippe suspected him of a want of energy in suppressing a riot at Lyons, and he fell into disgrace. Leaving France, he took service in Belgium, where he served with the rank of General for seven years. On his return to France he obtained a high military post in the northeast; and was, it is said, gravely compromised in the affair of Boulogne. In 1848 he behaved very well. He hastened to the Tuileries, and urged Louis Philippe to let him defend the throne; the monarch refusing, he repaired to the Duchess of Orleans, and was the only General officer who accompanied her to the Chamber to plead for her son. All failing, he rallied heartily to the support of the Government, did good service during the terrible days of June, and quelled a revolutionary movement at Lyons. Let us not forget Charles Albert the commander of the Piedmontese army, but dead now. As soon as the contest began between the Emperor and the Assembly he took the side of the former, and was one of the few confidential friends who were in the secret of the conduct at the Elysée said to have been marked by great energy. He has since filled various high offices. He is the Father of Prince Napoleon's Grand Cross, and Grand Veneur.

THE SKIRMISH AT FRASSINETTO.—[FROM A SKETCH BY CAPTAIN FIELI, OF THE PIEDMONTESE ARMY.]

Marshal Castellane, who is on the right of Marshal Magnan, is another old soldier of the First Empire. He also, though of old and wealthy family, entered the army as a private and fought his way to the rank of Colonel. He was a terrible scrape-goat, being, like Ney under a somewhat similar name. Napoleon the elder was very fond of him, and made him senior Colonel of the Guards of Honor. In the Russian campaign he had his right hand frozen, and has never wholly recovered. Under the Restoration and Orleans regime Castellane was filled any prominent office. In 1848 he did good service at Rouen by preventing a riot; and in 1851, at Lyons, he showed remarkable energy in this like service. He is an old man of uncommonly active temperament and powerful mind, still constantly in broils, and constantly getting his name into the papers.

General Marchais is one of the youngest of Napoleon's staff. He comes of an Irish family which followed the Stuarts into exile. His military education was gone through in Algiers. He rose into public notice during the Crimean war, when his successful skirmishes as General of Division; at the attack on Sebastopol he assailed and carried the Malakoff. He is about forty-four years of age, Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor, and Senator.

General Niel is the most distinguished of the French engineers. He was dispatched during the Crimean war to reconnoitre, and diverse other expeditions there; afterward, he was sent to the Crimea, to report for the special instruction of the Emperor. He was so struck with his sagacity that he placed him the entire control of the engineers' department. General Niel's services, in a great degree, will be devoutly esteemed a prudent and capable officer.

We gave in our last number a picture of the Zouaves during their Versailles fête in the war. We now give a portrait of one of those famous soldiers in full marching order. The Zouave's costume is something wonderful. Besides his arms and clothing he carries knife, pot, and cup, all of metal; a sack containing provisions, and various utensils for camp service, and any stray food that he can get on the way. Like all the Zouaves often carried, besides, a bundle of hay for the cattle, a fagot of sticks for fires, and either a pig or a sheep, or other article which agreeable lead they marched gayly twenty miles a day across African sands, and remain stalwart and able for the fray.

The Zouaves are unwisely nick-named "Jackals" by their comrades of the French line. It is certain that their ideas of means and ends are somewhat confused. Many of them are wayward boys from the great cities of Europe, who have enlisted to save their necks. Discipline converts the Zouaves to a easily maintained, especially in the field; and they are so useful as skirmishers that fault-finding would be inexcusable when the troops are overlaid in them.

The soldier of the French troops, however, are not the Zouaves, but the Turcos, of whom we give a couple of illustrations. These are Algerian riflemen raised among the Arabs, and drilled and fitted in regular regiments. They are, for the most part, recruited from the lowest and most abandoned of the native Africans with whom the French have contended for dominion in Algeria. On the battlefield the Turcos have been compared to "Scotch tigers." They were the favorite troops of General Bosquet.

Very desperate fellows are they, and apt to confound friend with foe. When they arrived from sea at Genoa, and the Piedmontese soldiers attempted on the quays to receive them, they uttered their war-cry, and fraternized instead with each other into the inuts, bent on doing battle with "the enemy." It was all the French officers could do to prevent them from their feud of fraternization. In their camp at Rivarolo they have, it is said, exacted a livelly tribute on the part of natives to get rid of them. Their bravery is beyond dispute. Twenty of them who had been caught plundering were mustered by their officers to be sent to the house digid by way of punishment; they one and all declared that they would have their noses cut if not allowed to accompany their comrades.

The only action that has thus far taken place in the affair of Piedmont, mentioned in our last paper. We give an engraving of it, from a sketch made by an officer then present. The French account states that on 3d May one of the corps d'armée constituting the left wing of the Austrian army approached the Po. The Austrian sharp-shooters were thrown out along the left bank of the river, and a battery of artillery opened fire to cover the passage. On their first appearance, the war opened from the Piedmontese batteries on the right bank, and after a few hours' firing the Austrians gave up the attempt.

Another version of the affair is given by the London Times correspondent who accompanies the Austrian army. He says:

"At Valenza, there were two fine bridges across the Po. The one the Piedmontese had themselves destroyed, and the other the Austrians determined to destroy before them; so, on the 3d and 4th they made great demonstrations as if to cross the river, both there and opposite Frassinello, and succeeded in misleading the bridge.

"At Frassinello the intended deception was completely successful. Quantities of boats, etc., were ordered with great ostentation at Casella, and conveyed to the river. On the 5d of May some lancers led the way across a ford of the Sesia to an island between that river and the Po. Four companies of grenadiers followed, and half a mile further, the whole order crossed Pecherer. The island is thickly covered with brushwood, so the multitudes of the enemy was concealed from the enemy, who opened a heavy fire from the southern bank of the Po. This was answered by the whole battery and the grenadiers, who extended themselves along the bank.

"As the Piedmontese fire was kept up until the next day, a few unimportant figures may be useful. The Austrians lost on the 3d, before midnight, one man killed and eight wounded; of the latter one has since died.

"At night Captain Dreyer, an Irishman, led over another company of grenadiers, and a second battalion was kept up till morning, as if bridges for the passage of a large army were being constructed. By sunrise, on the night the loss to the Austrians was only three men wounded."

ELEVEN O'CLOCK, AMONG THE FIR-TREES.

NURSE PARKER had lived with us ever since our mother, Lucy, and my younger brother Bella, myself, and little Lucy—loved her dearly.

Nurse Parker, in a plain, homely, but deep, earnest way, strove to fill our mother's place towards us, her little orphans; for our father, a quiet, studious man, given up to abstruse scientific pursuits, though kind and amiable of heart, hardly noticed us in an ordinary fatherly way. He was, however, always ready to fall in with Nurse Parker's suggestions, and we had grown up, under governance whose rule was founded less on authority, until Lucy was sixteen, when the lesson-book part of our education being finished, we were left about with our father and Nurse Parker.

No; not quite alone. A gentleman, neither young nor old, very grave and quiet, but of some position, of my father, as fond of antiquarian lore as he, but not half so amiable, was in the habit of making one of our party. He was Colonel Hall (the name of our old place), that he might be said to live there for the year. Mr. Arthur was this gentleman's name—a gentleman of a gloomy turn of character, and his aspect was quite in tunion with it. He had a grave, melancholy countenance about his long, dark face, and a searching, suspicious look in his unfathomable eyes, that those of which could never have been determined by the most scrutinising observer; but wherein could exist more, at times, of the spirit of unsatisfying fire never permitted to flash out, that made me shrink involuntarily from his gaze. Mr. Arthur was the gentlemen's name—a gentleman of a gloomy turn of character, and his aspect was quite in tunion with it. He had a grave, melancholy countenance about his long, dark face, and a searching, suspicious look in his unfathomable eyes, that those of which could never have been determined by the most scrutinising observer; but wherein could exist more, at times, of the spirit of unsatisfying fire never permitted to flash out, that made me shrink involuntarily from his gaze. Mr. Arthur was the for little Lucy—we called her "little" because she was the youngest, and our pet—she could hardly see his eyes.

It was for otherwise with Bella. She was always a favorite with every child, especially those toward any thing peculiar (a part of her character which she might have derived from her father, though he is not peculiar in any way, remember him, he being quiet and grave, and the high-spirited and full of fun). It was, perhaps, on this account that she alone among us liked our dark, strange visitor, Mr. Bourbon.

It became evident to us, in the course of time, that, in his own odd, undemonstrative way, he liked her. He proposed himself to her as a husband, and, to our unspeakable regret, she accepted him. I shall never forget the day she did so, for Lucy, and I, and Nurse Parker had all been come up into the nursery to be congratulated, kissed and cried over as the future Mrs. Bourbon, while there then on her face were quiet and repressed, as if her heart had been somewhere else.

When we were going to tell that night, I said to Nurse Parker, lingering behind with her in the nursery:

"Nurse, dear, what do you think of Bella's engagement?"

"My dear Miss Alice," she answered, "don't ask me."

"But then, nurse, I know you don't like it."

"Well, dear, we will hope for the best. Perhaps, after all, Mr. Bourbon may be very kind."

"But Bella loves him, nurse—what then?"

"Bella does, then she loves him, there isn't a doubt, but I have seen many gentlemen before now."

We said no more at that time; but I recollect going to bed very unhappy, and dreaming restlessly with nightmare oppressiveness, of Mr. Jocelin, our nearest neighbor of gentle, gentlemanly manners and indescribable, but always overshadowing Bella with a cloud. The house seemed empty, whenever she was going to smile or speak to me.

About this time a surprising thing occurred. Mr. Arthur, who had all but become quite inseparable in our childhood, had my father come up stairs into our nursery, for us, and this was considered to be at the door, and entered, for the purpose of giving us a piece of intelligence. The intelligence, unexpected as it was, and this was considered to be used as my father's appearance in the nursery. It was, however, a fact that Mr. Arthur was quitting (the only asset we had, of whom we had heard from time to time from Nurse Parker, and very occasionally from my father, as living in Italy with her invalid husband, was to be expected at Cousin Upland's in the course of a week. She had returned to England, having lost her husband, and my father had asked her to come and take up her residence with us, at what used to be, when they were boy and girl together, her old home.

Mr. Arthur's departure, as we were all sitting together in our own room. I was thinking about Mr. Jocelin, and Bella in connection with him, when Nurse Parker entered, and I made her come and sit down with me upon the couch. The quiet, Nurse Parker, and our easterly companionship in the dear old nursery, led me into thoughts of the past days of our childhood, when, in the same place, at such an hour, we had sat by the uncertain flickering firelight listening to nurse's stories, and I felt an irrepressible desire to revive them once more as far as, in the nature of things, they could be revived.

"Nurse, dear," I said, "you used to tell us stories when we were children. Tell me one to-day quiet—tell us one now."

"My dear Miss Alice," she said, laughing, "you wouldn't care for Cinderella, nor Goody Two Shoes, now, and what else should I have to tell you?"

"Oh, I don't know. I remember so many things, I'm sure. You have lived in different places before you came here, and you must have some pleasant stories to tell of them. Tell us one, that's a good, kind nurse, do!"

"Well, suddenly, "nurse, dear, had you ever a sweetheart long ago?"

Nurse Parker smiled, and then looked grave, and raised her hand across her face as she answered:

"Yes, miss, once—but he died long before you were born, my dear. I don't think I could tell you any story about that. He died before your dear mamma was married."

She paused again, thinking for a few minutes, and, looking over at Bella, who still sat quiet with Lucy's head upon her lap.

"I think I'll try to tell you a story, my dears, about something that happened once, but which I never told to any one but myself, for it was almost a young woman. But you must excuse my way of telling it, and how to it will seem, because it is old."

We were all fond of stories, especially Lucy and Bella, reasing herself from her meditative attitude, and I was all attention to listen attentively. Nurse Parker commenced:

The story, my dears, is about a beautiful lady that I once lived with—first, when she was a young lady, and then after she married, when she was married and a mother, as her baby's nurse. She was very fond of me, and I was fond of her. She lived in a large town before she married, and her father and mother being conspicuously people, but as she became a lady, there was a great many gentlemen admired her, and she might have married well, as they said, at least a dozen times. I'm an old woman, and an old maid, but I think there is only one way of marrin' well, and that is marrin' for love. If a lady marries a man, or a gentleman, really united to her, and when there's true love on both sides. I told my dear, you, Miss Alice, the other night, that I had seen mistakes in marriage, made in my time, and the marriage this young lady made was no doubt one of them.

Bella looked up, and seemed to fancy that nurse and I might have been talking of her on the night alluded to. She said:

Well; I never could tell how my young lady came to marry the gentleman she did choose after all. He was older a good deal than she. She was a gay and lively girl like—he was quite grave. She liked life, and stir, and change—he liked nothing but retirement and entire still. Music was one of music as a tired—he couldn't tell one tune from another. Often and often I have seen her sittin', singin' and playin' away after many hours of sittin' quiet, at the piano in the drawin'-room, and him in the study over a book by some old monastic or a single note. She had been used to praise and company, and every one to love and listen to her, and he used to be left to his own society.

She did feel it a great change—as you shall presently hear—though she tried not to show it, or even to think about it, for a long time.

When they first married her husband used mostly to sit in the study with her, though he never hardly noticed what she was doin', but after a while he took to goin' out by himself, by degrees, and only cousin' in to meals with her; and at night he sat up hours poring over his learning and his books. She used to sit in the room of my lady's drawin' of herself cast down and melancholy. One day, as I passed on my way upstairs to dear, which was half open, I saw her, all in tears, kneelin' down by his chair, and sayin' somethin' to him which I did not hear. He, in his quiet, kind answer, in his grave, even voice, "Well, my dear, if you feel dull and lonely, why don't you go out more and any one else you like, to make the place gayer to you."

I was nearer guessin' what they had been talkin' about, I thought, than he was what was grievin' her whose heart He was so good sort of a man, but he couldn't understand it.

In a week or two's times after that, however, the house was full of gayety, for Mr. Bourbon's brother, her sister, her brother, sons of their cousins, and a number of friends. The house was thrown almost upside down after the still life we'd led; but lookin' at my lady's pale face—which was like a June rose when she left home and Italy—I couldn't exactly say how.

Bella was a beautiful rider on horseback, and rode in a horse for my lady which nobody else could manage. My lady was very fond of 'plin', and had gone out a ride with her a few times, because my master didn't use himself to horses, very often for the more pleasure she had in the exercise. This handsome gentleman and her brother, however, were both fine men, and my handsome gentleman always helped her to his saddle. Of an evenin' he sung duets with her, or read aloud for the benefit of the whole company, except my master, who would slip away to his study and his books. Then, after he left, the house seemed very dull, and my mistress too, sat especially her sister, thought that was for another reason, but while I didn't think of then, but I found out something long before any one else would have done. It was because Bella's heart had been very much, and had hoped he loved her. She died, poor thing! in a deep decline, two or three years afterward.

Well, the handsome gentleman knew none of the families in the neighborhood. Then one house he went to stay with one of them, and, as occasionally, we saw him still at dinner at long way although, and as he did all our company, and we were very quiet again for some months.

One day, some time after my young lady came to my mistress, which I hoped would make her happy after all, dear little baby, and it was in June—but it did not. Something else had come to her, I suppose. We are all weak creatures, my dears, and the best of us very often out of our own strength, and if we let wrong wishes and thoughts come into our minds without strivin' against them with more than our own might, they steadily will come, and make sorry prey of us. Something of this sort had come over my poor lady's mind, I fear. She was very young—had been praised, petted, and almost spoiled from her childhood by her husband, though not unkind, neglected of her.

Nurse stopped a moment, and I, getting strangely excited, moved closer to her on the couch, and took hold of her hand. She resumed, glancing down at me:

Not but what she loved her baby. She loved it dearly—but with a poisoned mind. I saw how it all was, when the handsome gentleman I had once seen in the garden with her, and then with the family in the neighborhood, rode ever so often to call upon my master, and stayed along with my lady in the drawing-room.

I might have been over fancy; but I thought him and her more handsome as he was.

Well. He came and went in the neighborhood for some time, and my lady was always glad and sad after, and her husband saw nothing, or said nothing, all the while, but appeared to grow more busy and more learned than ever. Then, one night, then a year old, and able to talk a little, lispingly, her dear life was very lonely. Some one to play with would scarcely leave the nursery. At others, she seemed to enter it with a faltering step, and a tremble ranied through her frame. One day, with a frightened face kissing the little innocent, she would launch away to hide the tears in her eyes, and the aching at her heart.

Though I never saw them together—I mean my lady and the handsome gentleman—after this time, I knew by instinct (for I loved her, and had time from a child) that they corresponded. At last I knew it for certain, and I never was so unhappy in my whole life's. No, not even when I thought my dear lady gone.

It was a beautiful autumn evening. My master was gone out, and my mistress was in a state of society connected with what he was always reading about, and there was no soul about the house, or the farm, but myself and the servants and the nursery, who was, I thought, in the drawin'-room. Having a very bad headache, she had left my dear baby to bed and left the housemaid in the nursery to watch it, I went out to get a breath of air in the kitchen garden and orchard, which is always healthy for headaches. Every thing was very still, except that a rich breeze was rustling the ripe apples through the great fir-plantations, and I, quite alone, and feeling my head grow lighter and better as I walked, yet, I know not why, very sad and thankful, I remember, at the time, what a nice sound it would be to sing a baby to sleep by. Then I listened, presently I heard voices. At first they were hardly louder than the fir whispers, but, gradually I learnt my own dear lady's voice answer some few words, too low for me to catch, aloud, in a tone of agony:

"Oh no!" she cried; "Gerald, do not tempt me—for Heaven's sake do not tempt me to leave my little child! I am not so wicked, though not a high one, rung through the stillness with such an echo that I trembled, but my mistress was I could see myself. She seemed to bush her, and to try to soothe her, as I gathered from the few words I could overhear.

I knew it was the handsome gentleman, for Gerald was his name, and oh, what a horror I felt of him!

I had never played the listener on purpose before in my life, but I could not help myself now that all could, and I stood as still as death almost, in my place inside the shrubbery where I was. I see me much when she was little more than a child"—didn't she love me, and might I not try to save her? Didn't I was not to be thought of?

Now, or never, I thought, and I came out of the shrubbery, and stepped forward.

I waited, perhaps half an hour, perhaps not quite so long. I hardly knew, I was in such a tremor. Then I went in by the kitchen passage-door, and up the back staircase round to my darling's nursery, in the front of the house, next to my lady's dressin'-room. There was a door through it into the nursery, and in about an hour or so I heard my mistress come up there, and, as I was bed-time, I knocked and went in to help her to undress, as I was always used to do.

She was sitting before her glass, washing her face with some rose-water, and she started as I opened the door. She didn't need to try and de-ceive me, poor thing, into thinking that she hadn't been crying!

"Are you startled me, nurse!" she said.

I answered, "But I knocked, ma'am—didn't you hear me knock?"

"I suppose I was not thinking about you, Mary," she said, hurriedly.

I said, "I don't think you are in spirits this evening, ma'am. You'll feel it heavier for a day without mother. She'll leave the doors open through to the nursery, so as you can hear me and the baby?"

I wanted her to think about the baby. But she said, sorrowfully,

"No, thank you, Mary. I'm used to being lonely."

I still wanted her to think about the baby; and pretending that I heard it stirring, I went back through the open door into the nursery for a moment, and after pretending to soothe it, called her to look at it.

"Oh, ma'am," I said, "do come and look at the dear child. I don't know that ever I saw it less so pretty in its innocent sleep!"

She came in in her white morning-gown, which she had loosely put on, but her face, that had flushed to a deep red as she first looked at the child, grew almost whiter than her gown, while she stood silent by the little bed.

"Dear me, ma'am," I said, "what is so innocent and beautiful to look at as a little sleeping babe? I can't think how any one can ever look on a child! I do think, if I was to hurt a baby through cruelty or poison, I couldn't never say my prayers again hardly."

My lady stooped over the child until her long hair, which was all loose and down, fell over her face and her own, and quite hid them both from my sight, as she answered something that I couldn't hear.

Looking at the nursery clock, I said:

"Dear, dear me, ma'am, it must be time to rise! It is now upon the stroke of eleven."

At the mention of the hour she started from over her pet-picture, no doubt remembering when she had last heard a mention of eleven o'clock, and in the start she gave she knocked the baby from its sleep. Throwing out its little arms the child caught at some of her bright long hair as it floated away from her and cried to cry.

I wouldn't quiet it. I left it all to her. And she, as I hoped she would, never raised her head back to what she used to be before that dark, handsome face had been seen in our house! She might not have been happy, but she was innocent then.

"The baby will always leave off crying best for you, ma'am," I said, "so I'll just go and get you some water for you into the basin, and unfold your night-dress ready."

She could not but take the crying baby, and I left her bashing it to rest. When I came back the child was asleep in her arms, but she was softly raising down from my lady's eyes upon its little night-dress. I thought I heard her crying.

Taking the child from her, I laid it into bed, and then said, as my lady tried in vain to stop her tears,

"Oh, my dear mistress, I am sure you can't be well. What can I do for you?"

"Nothing, Mary," she answered. "Nothing?"

"Shall I send for my master?" I asked. "I am sure he would grieve dreadfully if you was ill."

"Mary!" she exclaimed, reproachfully.

But I went on:

"Yes, ma'am, you may not think so, because master is so quiet like, but I know he would feel it very much, in his way, if any thing happened to you."

How strong I tried to speak those words!

"It is fond of the baby too," I said, "though he seems careless of it, for when I took it to the window the other day, when I was out with it in the garden, he took it in his arms and played with it a long time."

She took upon her to seem quite haughty all at once, as she rose, and said that I had spent out say more; but I didn't mind, I only said,

"Dear mistress, you surely won't be offended with me, who have served you so long?"

"I am tired, Mary," she answered, "and shall go to bed now." And then she had her breakfast-tray, saying that I need not come in again to help her in undressing, for that the baby was not quite sound.

I never went to sleep that night, and I got out of bed several times to look at her door, which, when I heard her go through into her bedroom, I had set ajar. She was always stirring, never still. And in the middle of night I heard her get up, and as she had done among the fir-trees in the shrubbery. She went to and fro once for a quarter of an hour, and I can watch, and, as I said, I can't speak.

My lady spent almost all day in her dressing-room, and I fancied she was writing. I was glad she kept there, because it was next the nursery, and I made the baby cry more merrily, and talk in her pretty way cunningly, so as to keep her from the little creature in her mind. The child had learned to say "Mamma" quite plain, and, going up to the dressing-room with her little knocking-sentence, many times through the day she called to her to come in, with her sweet tender little voice. My lady did not come, however, but kept her own room closely; and I began to think that she was afraid to look at the dear baby any more—that she really meant to leave it.

The day were on. My mistress, who had breakfasted up stairs, only went down to dinner at five o'clock, and then remained in the dining-room. I went instead of coming, as she must times did, to bid the baby good-night and see my mistress and put it into bed. We were a very regular house. Nine, and five o'clock all the servants were settled for the night. My lady had dined with the surgery with her dressing-gown on (for she had been in her own room little time), told me that I might go to bed, for that she had something she wished to read, and might, perhaps, sit up late. I made answer, "Very well, ma'am," and that was all. My lady never looked toward the little bed where the baby was lying.

I didn't undress, but I got into bed with my clothes on, and lay waiting and listening. We always burned a candle in the nursery all across of the baby, and I often recall that troubled wakeful hour when, by my side, I lay dreaming of every sound in my lady's dressing-room, while the great shadow of the night-shade danced and flickered on the ceiling.

My mistress, to seem quite careless like, had left the door of her dressing-room open, and as she sat there I could hear the leaves of a book turned over from time to time. Nothing else. The hour seemed forever long. Nothing else, except but the ticking of the nursery clock, and the turning of the pages. I tried every now and then to look at but the shadow of the night-shade danced on the ceiling. I guessed that my mistress had let her own bedroom door open to the nursery, and she who would leave a light still burning in the dressing-room, and go to bed and set by with the garden passage, as we called it, at the end of which was a door, which, very easy to open, and almost out of hearing of any one in the house.

The nursery clock struck eleven, and still I heard my mistress in the dressing-room. I only know she must be going soon now. Presently there was a sound as if she had risen from her chair, and I fancied she was coming to bed—but all was still. Then I heard the door from the dressing-room into the bedroom open and shut.

That was the moment for us to get up. I did get up; and, taking the sleeping child in my arms, I went softly, without my shoes on, into the landing (for I had left my door ajar as my mistress had done here), and then into the garden passage below the hall, and into the garden passage before she had left her room. The baby still slept, and I stood quiet still, close by the garden door, for less than ten minutes my mistress, with a candle in her hand, came down into the hall. She was dressed completely, with a bonnet on. She came on hurriedly, so fearfully, and so often looking back, and I stood as much in shadow, in a corner of the doorway, that she didn't see me until she was within a yard of me. I spoke to her then when she did see me, and saw in my face that I knew or guessed all, and when, above every thing, I held the sleeping baby out to her, as if to say that I stretched arms, as though it were the real her, the darkish, slight-made figure all like the first conveyed and, with a strong shiver, sank down powerless on the stone floor of the passage at my feet. I had ordered the child to be put in its bed, and, with my hand, and set it on a bracket fastened to the wall. Then I kissed and left my mistress to her grief, and was sure she would not go. She would let me take a letter out to him—we never spoke his name then, nor afterwards—and tell him that she could not leave the dear, dear baby! Down in that stone passage, in the dead of night (for it was long past the appointed hour), when all the house were dreaming and at rest, my dear lady and I wept and sobbed together, and all that time the Tempest or waited in the moonlight, among the fir-trees, for her white-robed mistress to come.

My dears, I can never tell you all that passed between my lady and me that night. The whole thing has always been a secret, even from all the world; and even now, when the chief actors in it are dead, I feel bound to keep it so.

I only tell you that, by God's mercy working on her heart, and by the unexpected sight of her little child at the moment before the awful step would have been taken, she was saved. She was saved by a power that her self-deceiving soul, out, too late, that she had never loved her husband. But I think God she was saved from a lifetime grief and guilt. I know she was a wretched mother who forsakes her innocent baby, and knows for the mystery of her name would be cast and disgraced!

She lived, after the terrible night and the illness it cost her to get over, to be cheerful in trying to do her duty, and in time, after a sort, even to be happy. She never loved her husband, but was as only a dreary wife with a neglectful, unsuitable husband can. But she fled young, after all—no doubt it was for the best—and was not a wife who knew what a great struggle her life had been.

That is my story, my dears, before the world, and may never have to experience what that poor lady had.

We all sat very still, and cried quietly. I think my old Jill, of whom the world was not worthy, had said it was a secret, and we never afterward, even to each other, hinted a guess.

I had left my lady, Bella did not marry Mr. Jonchin. That unsuitable engagement went off, as a dark, awkwardness night will go off before the rising sun. When my Aunt Dorothea came in letter and brother-in-law began her all of us; for she was a delightful woman, who, in the course of her useful life, clockered with many a trial, had gathered around her much sympathy, and kindness, which she exercised abundantly for her nieces' advantage. We are all comfortably and happily married, and, originally and happily. Our father, and our Aunt Dorothea, lie in their quiet graves in the village church-yard; but Nurse Parker survives them all. Very old, but very active, she is the delight of our little children. She lives with me, as the eldest of her nurslings, but often stays with the others, and particularly with Bella, whom she loves as tenderly as she loves me. She often tells my children, and Bella's children, stories that we both well remember, but the one I have recorded she has never told again; nor have I, nor has Bella, ever, in all our long talks with Nurse Parker, referred to it by a single word.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

LAND DRAINAGE.

STONE DRAINS.

C. P., Marquette County, Wisconsin, writes:

"I have read a great deal on the comparative merits of tile and stone drainage. There are many warm advocates on both sides of the subject and plenty of this Attestic. In England there are the deep drainers and the shallow drainers, and in this country we have them too. So far as I can see, the tile have many advantages beyond stone drains, and they will be used more and with my mark at my reasonable cost. However, there is a great deal of stone on my land, and I am determined to use it for drains, for I consider that the improvement to the land would pay me to get rid of it in my way. Are there any rules by which I may determine? Is in the Weekly Farmer will be of great advantage to me for the future management of my farm. Nothing, although a farmer all my life), and land drainage is of so much importance, I should wish you have a series of it will be of general interest to your readers."

Space will not permit us to even glance at the subject of tile drainage. Let it be remembered that stone drains often cost more than tile drains. Then is true if stones must be carried a long distance, and that tiles can be had cheaply. But in this former are within a stone's-throw of the ditch, and that tiles can not be had cheaply, and that the removal of the stones will improve the land, there can be no doubt that in this case tiles are the most desirable.

The latter may be laid out for stone as for tile drains. The fall for the former should be greater than for the latter, because the water meets with more hindrance in passing through the rocky tiles. The ditches may be cut in the same way as for tiles. The grade should be uniform. No double water will pass at one end of the stone drain if the other be higher, but if the bottom of the ditch between these two points be on a level line, the action of the water passing over the high places is always tending to wash them to the low ones, and especially if the soil be not of a very stiff kind. When the lines are found for the ditches it would be well, in order to prevent unnecessary excavation, to measure the exact width for the top of the drain, and mark out both sides. Begin to excavate at the lower end or outlet of the main drain, and cut it nearly to the desired grade, so that the water may run away and so go backward to the next number part of the system, cutting the lateral drains as set out to the main conduit. The work may now be brought to a finished grade, and the stones put in the ditches. We shall probably at a future time go into the detail of laying out land for underdrains, made of digging drains, the use of leveling rods, &c., &c., assuming our correspondent to be familiar with these things, we have thus far, and will continue to confine our remarks to other parts of the subject matter which he must learn by more specially interested. There are several ways of constructing stone drains to meet various wants, of which are as follow: If the bottom is a stiff clay, flat stones six or seven inches thick are laid a few inches apart, and the flat stone drain is the result. as to break joints. Then ordinary-sized stones are laid in, more or less, according to the quantity of water to be carried away, and the wishes of the drainer, if he is very desirous to rid his land of much stones. If a large body of water is to pass in the ditches most of course be correspondingly deep, so that when the work is finished the top of the drain will be a proper distance below the surface of the soil.

If the bottom of the ditch be a running soil, it is usual to place a row of flat stones before lying the other.

Another way is to put a row of flat stones on the bottom, and then flat stones are stood on their edges, meeting in a point like the roof of the letter A.

Another way is to put flat stones in the bottom as already described, and place flat stones on their edges, but like the two sides of the letter V. This stones are then placed on the top as in the first joints. Some drainers prefer to lessen the angle of the V-shaped duct, and instead of placing flat stones over the top, to put stones of other shape, so as to keep the sides apart, but not to drop between them to stop the passage of the water. It is self-evident that a ditch should not be cut so wide as the bottom V as the A shaped drain. It is said in favor of the former that a small quantity of water is more active in carrying away sediment than in the latter.

Another way, and one that is much practiced in Ireland, is to place a row of flat stones on the bottom, then stand flat stones on their edges in an upright position close to one side of the ditch, and lay other flat stones on a slanting direction from the other side of the drain resting against the upright ones. By this plan the bottom, instead of stones, is never wet. There should be great care in all the modes described to make the joints as close as possible. Sometimes small stones are cut through over the water-ducts; but, in such case, lavender, sand, straw, tan, shavings, etc., are used. When these decay are not the drains likely to be stopped up? Such is the experience of many, especially if the joints are not close. When a body of stones is put over the water-ducts it is well to think with small ones, and better still with small stones that may be pounded into a compact mass, so as to prevent the possibility of soil or sediment passing between the stones, which would be likely to stop the drain.

Another way it is to use stones in a solid mass without any water-duct. If this plan is adopted, be careful not to put in any large stones that would be likely to dam the water. Whenever a solid mass of stones is used, either with or without water-ducts, it is absolutely necessary, in the making of a good drain, to finish with small stones, and if possible, as stated before, with stone that may be pounded fine to make a compact mass.

Stone drains are sure to run freely at first, but when rain of cold sunk, how many farmers have been disappointed, after a few years, in finding them choked!

CROP NEWS.

TEXAS.—We learn that the injury done by the frost in Washington, Fayette, Bastrop, Gatlin, and Fannin Counties, was very much exaggerated.

LOUISIANA.—We learn from Bourbon County that the road is less injurious than was anticipated. Thus far it has not rotted out much, how many farmers have been disappointed, after a few years, in finding them choked!

CHESS CHRONICLE.

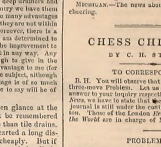
BY C. H. STANLEY.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

B. H. You will observe that we avail ourselves of your three-move problem. We have not been from you. In answer to your inquiry regarding the Illustrated London News, we have to say that it is a weekly journal of that journal is still under the control of Mr. Herbert Ingram. The of the London Era and Illustrated Times of the World are in charge of Mr. Leader.

PROBLEM XXV.

BY B. H. SLACK.



WHITE.

White to play and checkmate in three moves.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM XXIV.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Kt takes Q	K moves
2. K to B 6	B moves
3. B to K B 8 checkmate.

CHESS IN NEW YORK.—Since the return of Mr. Paul Morphy from Europe, and during his temporary stay in New York, although he does not appear to have given regular evidence of his wonderful powers at chess, he has yet shown the most convincing proofs of his unquestionable superiority over all the players with whom he has encountered. Mr. Morphy visited the rooms of the Brooklyn Chess Club, has encountered defeat the odds of Queen's Knight in a very signal manner, to a match wherein the first winner of five games was to be declared the conqueror. Mr. Morphy gave the odds and won his antagonist did not gain one; a single game also being drawn. Mr. James Thompson then commenced a match with Mr. Morphy on the same terms. One game only has been played up to the present time on this match, which resulted in Mr. T.'s favor. It is a fine specimen of Chess skill, and will be found subjoined:

SICILIAN OPENING.

(White's Queen's Knight should be removed from the Board.)

WHITE (Mr. M.)	BLACK (Mr. T.)
1. P to K 4	1. P to K 4
2. P to K B 4	2. P takes P
3. Kt to K B 3	Kt to Q B 3
4. P to Q 4	4. P to Q 4
5. P to K 5	Q to B 3
6. P to Q 6	6. P takes P
7. B to Q B 4	P to K 3
8. P to Q 5	P to Q B 3
9. Castles	B to Q 2
10. P to Q R 4	10. P to K 4 (b)
11. K to R sq	P to K Kt 4 (c)
12. P to K Kt 3	P to K Kt 4 (d)
13. P to Q 3	P to K Kt 5
14. Q to K 2 (e)	P to K R 4 (f)
15. Kt to K 1 (ex pass)	Kt takes P
16. Kt takes P	P to K Kt 5
17. Q to K 3	Kt to Q 4
18. Q to K R 3	Q to K 3
19. P to K Kt 4	P to K R 3
20. P takes P	Q to K 7
21. R to B 1	Q to K 3
22. Q to Kt 7	Q takes R
23. K to B 2	Castles
24. Q to Q B 7	Q to K R 7
25. Q to K 8	Q to K 3
26. R to K B 1	Q takes P (g)
27. Q to K 7	P to K Kt 6
28. Q to K 8	P to K Kt 7
29. R to K B 2	P to K Kt 8 (ch)
30. Q takes Kt (ch)	P to Kt 6 (ch)
31. K to R sq	P to K B 7
32. R to K B 1	Q to B 6 checkmate

Notes.

(a) Mr. Thompson certainly exercises sound judgment in declining to accept the odds. Mr. Morphy is, in our opinion, entitled to the odds of Queen's Knight, and we are glad to see that he has offered to give them.

(b) Black's position at this point is very strong, and he is enabled to win, as he could accumulate most favorably with the third and fourth ranks, and Mr. Morphy's attempt to attack the adverse King's position with the Queen's Knight Pawn is very hazardous.

(c) Mr. Morphy's fork of Queen and Bishop by advance Queen's Knight Pawn, which, in connection with the subsequent advance of Bishop's Pawn, discovering check, would win for Morphy a piece.

(d) Black's game is now in a very critical position in right-hand, and allows him the attack in a very masterly manner.

(e) An excellent move. The capture of this Pawn, en passant, would have been fatal to White.

(f) The Pawn should have been taken, and the Knight retired to Q B 3, to be ready for the continuance of this match. Mr. T. has evidently overlooked the fact that the adverse Queen will be given a move; but we do not think he will have his own way through it, as the Knight appears to us to be the strongest piece in the present occasion.

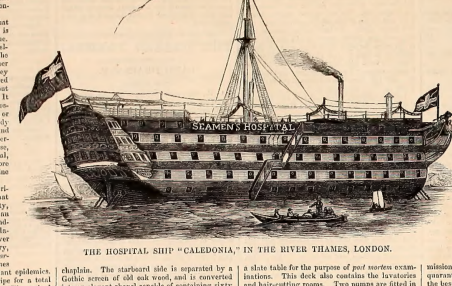
THE FLOATING HOSPITAL IN THE LOWER BAY.

We publish herewith engravings of the proposed hospital ship in the Lower Bay of New York; also a picture of the Caledonia, which has lately replaced the old Dreadnaught as the floating hospital for the port of London, England.

It is now abundantly evident that the only quarantine hospital that is suited to this port is a floating one. The existing hospitals on Staten Island are fruitful of pestilence to the city and all its suburbs; the temper of the Islanders, too, shows that they could never hereafter be considered safe receptacles for the sick, without a standing army to protect them. It is out of the question to propose a hospital on Coney Island, Long Island, or any of the inlets in the bound. Sandy Hook, unfortunately, the terror and prejudices of New Jersey will not permit us to acquire. We have to choose, therefore, between a floating hospital, anchored at a safe distance from shore in the Lower Bay, and no quarantine hospitals at all.

There are many persons of experience and judgment who believe that quarantines are an obsolete absurdity, which should not be tolerated in an enlightened age; and it must be admitted that, while quarantine regulations and cordons sanitaires have never excluded disease from any country, the evidence goes to show that lazarettos and quarantines have sometimes bred, and often intensified malignant epidemics. Still the public mind is not yet ripe for a total abolition of the quarantine system. The arrival of a vessel like the Susquehanna at the Brooklyn Navy Yard might or might not spread yellow fever in New York and Brooklyn; it certainly would create a panic of the most formidable character.

We are then driven to the hospital ship as the only resource left. Ten years have elapsed since a floating hospital was first suggested by Dr. W. C. Anderson, of Staten Island, as the true remedy for the evils of quarantine. The idea was scouted at the time, and for many subsequent years. Letters written by Dr. Anderson to the city papers, urging a trial of the experiment, only provoked derision. It was not till after the Legislature had appointed Commissioners to purchase Sandy Hook, and found that Jersey would not treat with them on any terms; till after the people of Staten Island had turned down the quarantine hospitals, first at Seguine's Point, and next at Tompkinsville; till every other plan, in short, had been tried and had proved a failure, that the Legislature and authorities of the State fell back upon the hospital ship as a necessity.



THE HOSPITAL SHIP "CALEDONIA," IN THE RIVER THAMES, LONDON.

It is now in progress. The Commissioners for the removal of Quarantine have purchased the old steamer Falcon, which is being fitted out to serve as the future floating hospital. She ought to be ready to take her place in the lower Bay by this time. If, however, inexperienced persons are allowed to trifle with the matter—a prospect not wholly unlikely from present appearances—she may be delayed a month or more.

The accompanying engraving of the Caledonia will serve to guide the Commissioners in their preparations. We take the following particulars from a letter which Dr. Anderson published in the Herald in 1856:

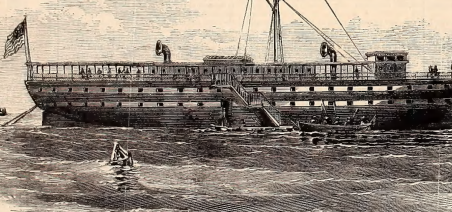
"The Caledonia is a ship of 2216 tons burden, 205 feet long by 53 feet 8 inches wide. She is divided as follows: The forecastle is arranged as cabins for the petty officers of the ship and their families. The poop is occupied by the superintendent selected by the main deck is laid out in the following manner: The whole of the afterpart is adapted as a dining-room and general quarters for the principal medical officer, surgeon, assistant-surgeon, and chaplain. The starboard side is separated by a Gothic screen of old oak wood, and is converted into an elegant chapel capable of containing sixty persons. The larboard of this deck is hung with fifty or sixty hammocks for the accommodation of convalescents removed from the sick wards, while the fore-part of the same deck serves as quartermasters' cabins, female nurses' dining-room, carpenters' work-shop, dispensary, etc., etc.



PROPOSED HOSPITAL SHIP IN THE LOWER BAY, NEW YORK.

"On the aft starboard side of the middle deck, in close proximity with an open gallery, is a commodious room for surgical operations, the other portions of this deck afford a space for the reception of cases of accidents, and cabins for the nurses.

"The lower quarter-deck contains a museum, quarters for the fever patients, and cabins for the hospital attendants. A portion of the orlop-deck is appropriated as a dead-house, and is fitted with a slate table for the purpose of post mortem examinations. This deck also contains the lavatories and hair-cutting rooms. Two pumps are fitted in this deck, with an engine hose in case of fire, and nerves for washing decks and various other uses. One of the ports has been enlarged four feet square, so as to admit patients in cases of emergency.

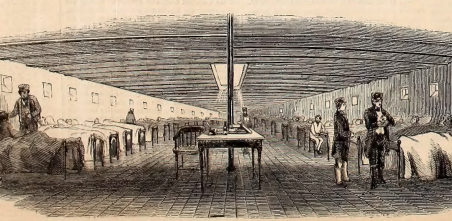
"The various compartments of the ship are heated from this deck with supply pipes, laid on each deck, with hot air. Here are also six tanks for containing a good supply of fresh water, and stores for housing upward of six hundred tons of coal and coke. With this minute attention to the comfort and convenience of the officers and attendants, nothing has been neglected which could secure the well-being of the patients; and the success which the medical and surgical departments of the floating hospital realize is, in a great measure, due to the admirable arrangements which could not be so well accomplished on shore."

The peculiar advantage of a floating hospital consists in the ease with which it can be ventilated. Fresh air, as every one knows, is the bane of all remedial agents; in a hospital ship, properly ventilated, a fair mess copious and steady supply of fresh air can be obtained than on any hospital on shore. Whether from this or from some other cause, it appears that the terrible accidents known as hospital gangrene and erysipelas, which are so frequently fatal in the hospitals of London and Paris, are unknown on board the Caledonia.

The disadvantages of a floating hospital are not insurmountable. If the ship be allowed to leak and bilge-water to accumulate, the air will become unwholesome; this can be remedied by proper pumping. The rocking motion of the vessel, which in high weather would be inconvenient to the patients, may be prevented by the construction of a proper guard on either side of the vessel at the water's edge. If a proper person be placed in charge, the system may be as complete and as perfect in every way as any hospital on shore.

We trust that the authorities who have this matter in charge will give the ship a fair trial. The public look to the Board of Health and the Commissioners of Emigration, in whom the control of quarantine matters resides, to carry out this in the best of their abilities. We are sorry to notice evidence that both these bodies are tainted with the vices which render almost all our municipal departments a by-word and a reproach. Though yellow fever ships are arriving here daily, the Board of Health—with Mayor Tiemann at its head—has employed no tug for the boarding of vessels in the Lower Bay; the Mayor should try to make us rather forget than remember him either by threats against the "Sequoya." The Commissioners of Emigration, so far as is known, have afforded no aid to the Commissioners who are intrusted with the execution of the Act of 1859. Some of these gentlemen seem to fancy that they have a corporate dignity to preserve which rises far superior to such petty concerns as the health and lives of the people of New York. Among none of the various boards which are concerned in this matter have we heard of any vigorous endeavor, or even any honest desire, to carry out the law, or to remedy existing evils.

If the hospital ship experiment should fail through the inexperience of the person who has the charge, or through the mismanagement or the indifference or the jobbing propensities of any Commissioners or their subordinates, there will be no one to blame but the Commissioners themselves on the settlement of a very intricate and troublesome question. It may safely be asserted, after experience of the past two or three years, that whether it be safe or not to abolish quarantine altogether, no hospital for this port could be established on any site in the Bay or the vicinity without grave inconvenience, and probably some danger of pestilence as well to the neighborhood of the hospital as to the city and its suburbs. The question is now narrowed down to a choice between the floating hospital or no Quarantine at all.



A FEVER WARD IN THE PROPOSED HOSPITAL SHIP IN THE LOWER BAY, NEW YORK.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

In Clear Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

IF Printed from early Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers pay the Author

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK II.

THE GOLDEN THREAD.

CHAPTER III.

A DISAPPOINTMENT.

MR. ATTORNEY-GENERAL had by no means the best of the jury that the prisoner before them, though perhaps not seven years, was old in the treasonable practices which claimed the forfeit of his life.

That this was so, was a circumstance with the public enemy was not a correspondence of to-day, or of yesterday, or even of last year, or of the year before. That it was certain the prisoner had, for longer than that, been in the habit of passing and repassing between France and England on secret business of which he could give no honest account. That, if it were in the nature of treasonous ways to thrive (which, happily, it never was), the real wickedness and guilt of his business might have remained undiscovered. That Providence, however, had put it into the heart of a person who was beyond fear and beyond reproach to ferret out the nature of the prisoner's schemes, and, struck with horror, to disclose them to his Majesty's Chief Secretary of State and most honorable Privy Council. That, this patriot would be produced before them. That, his position and attitude were, on the whole, sublime. That, he had been the prisoner's friend, but at once in an auspicious and an evil hour detecting his infamy, had resolved to immolate the traitor he could no longer cherish in his bosom on the sacred altar of his country. That, if statues were decreed in Britain, as in ancient Greece and Rome, to public benefactors, this shining citizen would assuredly have had one. That, as they were not so decreed, he probably would not have one. That Virtue, as had been observed by the poets (in many passages which he well knew the jury would have, word for word, at the tips of their tongues; wherever the jury's countenances displayed a guilty consciousness that they knew nothing about the passages), was, in a manner, contagious; more especially the bright virtue known as patriotism, or love of country. That, the lofty example of this immaculate and unimpeachable witness for the Crown, to refer to whom, however unworthily, was an honor, had communicated itself to the prisoner's servant, and had engendered in him a holy determination to examine his master's table-drawers and pockets, and secrete his papers. That, he (Mr. Attorney-General) was prepared to hear some disparagement attempted of this admirable servant; but that, in a general way, he preferred him to his (Mr. Attorney-General's) brothers and sisters, and honored him more than his (Mr. Attorney-General's) father and mother. That, he called with confidence on the jury to come and do likewise. That, the evidence of these two witnesses, coupled with the documents of their discovering that would be produced, would show the prisoner to have been furnished with lists of his Majesty's forces, and of their disposition and preparation, both by sea and land; and would leave no doubt that he had habitually conveyed such information to a hostile Power. That, these lists could not be proved to be in the prisoner's handwriting; but that it was all the same; that, indeed, it was rather the better for the prosecution, as showing the prisoner to be artful in his precautions. That, the proof would go back five years, and would show the prisoner already engaged in these pernicious missions within a few weeks before the date of the very first action fought between the British troops and the Americans. That, for these reasons, the jury, being a loyal jury (as he knew they were), would bring a responsible jury (as they knew they were), must positively find the prisoner Guilty, and make an end of him, whether they liked it or not. That, they never could lay their heads upon their pillows—that, they never could restore the idea of their wives laying their heads upon their pillows; that, they never could endure the notion of their children laying their heads upon their pillows; in short, that there never more could be, for them or theirs, any laying of heads upon pillows at all, unless the prisoner's head was taken off. That had Mr. Attorney-General concluded by demanding of them, in the name of every thing he could think of, with a round, round turn, and on the faith of his solemn asseveration that he already considered the prisoner as good as dead and gone.

When the Attorney-General ceased, a buzz arose in the court as if a cloud of great blueflies were swarming about the prisoner in anticipation of what he was soon to become. When it toned down again, the unimpeachable patriot appeared in the witness-box.

Mr. Solicitor-General then, following his leader's lead, examined the patriot: John Barsad, gentleman, by name. The story of his pure soul was exactly what Mr. Attorney-General had described it to be—perhaps, if it had a fault, a little too exactly. Having released his noble bosom of its burden, he would have modestly withdrawn himself, but that the wigged gentleman with the papers before him, sitting not far from Mr. Lorry, begged to ask him a few questions. The wigged gentleman sitting opposite still looked at the ceiling of the court.

Had he ever been a spy himself? No, he scorned the base insinuation. What did he live upon? His property. Where was his property? He didn't precisely remember where it was. What was it? No business of any body's. How had he inherited it? Why, he had. From whom? Distant relation. Very distant? Rather. Ever been in prison? Certainly not. Never in a debtors' prison? Didn't see what that had to do with it. Never in a debtors' prison?—Come, once again. Never? Yes. How many times? Two or three times. Not five or six? Perhaps. Of what profession? Gentleman. Ever been kicked? Might have been. Frequently? No. Ever kicked down stairs? Decidedly not; once received a kick at the bottom of a staircase, and fell down stairs of his own accord. Kicked on that occasion for cheating at dice? Something to that effect was said by the intoxicated liar who committed the assault, but it was not true. Kicked in consequence of a dispute? No. Ever by cheating at play? Never. Ever live by play? Not much of a gentleman. Ever been kicked? Might have been. Frequently? No. Ever kicked down stairs? Decidedly not; once received a kick at the bottom of a staircase, and fell down stairs of his own accord. Kicked on that occasion for cheating at dice? Something to that effect was said by the intoxicated liar who committed the assault, but it was not true. Kicked in consequence of a dispute? No. Ever by cheating at play? Never. Ever live by play? Not much of a gentleman. Been pretty well Ever borrow money of the prisoner? Yes. Ever pay him? No. Was not this intimacy with the prisoner a friendly visit, conducive to good relations between the prisoner in coaches, inns, and packets? No. Sure he was not in the habit of seeing Mr. Carter, inn. Knew any more about the lists? No. Had not procured them himself, for instance? No. Expected to get them? No. Considered it No. Not in regular government pay and employment to spy? Oh dear no, nothing of any thing? Oh dear no. Swear that? Over and over again. No motives but motives of pure patriotism? No motives whatever.

The virtuous servant, Roger Cly, swore his way through the case with exactly the same result. He had taken service with the prisoner, in good faith and simplicity, four years ago. He had asked the prisoner, directly after he was packed, if he wanted a handy fellow, and the prisoner had engaged him. He had known the prisoner formerly as a bandy fellow as an act of charity—never thought of such a thing. He began to have suspicions of the prisoner by seeing, and to act upon his, soon afterward. In arranging his clothes, while traveling, he had seen similar lists to these in the prisoner's pockets, over and over again. He had taken these lists from the drawer of the prisoner's desk. He had not put them there first. He had seen the prisoner show these identical lists to French gentlemen both at Calais, and similar lists to French gentlemen, both at Calais and Boulogne. He loved his country, and couldn't bear it, and had given information. He had never been suspected of stealing a silver tea-pot. He had once been maliciously suspected of mustard-pot, but it turned out to be only a plated one. He had known the last witness seven or eight years; that was merely a coincidence. He didn't call it a particularly curious coincidence; most coincidences were curious. Neither did he call it a curious coincidence that true patriotism was his only motive too. He was a true Briton, and hoped there were many more like him.

The blue-flies buzzed again, and Mr. Attorney-General called Mr. Jarvis Lorry.

"Mr. Jarvis Lorry, are you a clerk in Tellson's bank?"

"I am."

"On a certain Friday night in November one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, did business occasion you to travel between London and Dover by the mail?"

"It did."

"Were there any other passengers in the mail?"

"Two."

"Did they alight on the road in the course of the night?"

"They did."

"Mr. Lorry, look upon the prisoner. Was he one of those two passengers?"

"I can not undertake to say that he was."

"Does he resemble either of those two passengers?"

"Both were so wrapped up, and the night was so dark, and we were all so reserved, that I can not undertake to say even that."

"Mr. Lorry, look again upon the prisoner. Supposing him stripped up to those two passengers were, is there any thing in his bulk and stature to render it unlikely that he was one of them?"

"No."

"You will not swear, Mr. Lorry, that he was not one of them?"

"No."

"So at least you say he may have been one of them?"

"Yes. Except that I remember them both to have been—like myself—timorous of highwaymen, and the prisoner has not a timorous air."

"Did you ever see a counterfeit of timidity, Mr. Lorry?"

"I certainly have seen that."

"Mr. Lorry, look once more upon the prisoner. Have you seen him, to your certain knowledge, before?"

"I have."

"When?"

"I was returning from France a few days afterward, and, at Calais, the prisoner came on board the packet-ship in which I returned, and made the voyage with me."

"At what hour did he come on board?"

"At a little after midnight."

"In the dead of the night. Was he the only passenger who came on board at that untimely hour?"

"He happened to be the only one."

"Never mind about happening, Mr. Lorry. He was the only passenger who came on board in the dead of the night?"

"He was."

"Were you travelling alone, Mr. Lorry, or with any companion?"

"With two companions. A gentleman and lady. They are here."

"They are here. Had you any conversation with the prisoner?"

"Hardly any. The weather was stormy, and the passage long and rough, and I lay on a sofa, almost from shore to shore."

Miss Manette!

The young lady, to whom all eyes had been turned before, and were now turned again, stood up where she sat. Her father rose with her, and kept her hand drawn through his arm.

"Miss Manette, look upon the prisoner."

To be confronted with such pity, and such earnest youth and beauty, was far more trying to the accused than to be confronted with all the crowd. Standing, as it were, apart with her on the edge of his grave, not all the starting curiosity that looked on, could, for the moment, save him. It remained quite still. His hurried right hand paceled out the herbs before him into imaginary beds of flowers in a garden; and his efforts to control and steady his breathing shook the lips from which the color fled in his heart. The buzz of the great flies was loud again.

"Miss Manette, have you seen the prisoner before?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Where?"

"On board the packet-ship just now referred to, Sir, and on the same occasion."

"You are the young lady just now referred to?"

"Oh! most unhappily, I am!"

The plaintive tone of her compassion merged into the unimpassioned voice of the judge, as he said, something fiercely: "Answer the questions put to you, and make no remark upon them."

"Miss Manette, had you any conversation with the prisoner on that passage across the Channel?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Recall it."

In the midst of a profound stillness she faintly began:

"When the gentleman came on board—"

"Do you mean the prisoner?" inquired the Judge, knitting his brows.

"Yes, my lord."

"Then say the prisoner."

"When the prisoner came on board he noticed that my father," turning her eyes lovingly to him as he stood beside her, "was much fatigued and in a very weak state of health. My father was so reduced that I was afraid to take him out of the air, and I had made a bed for him on the floor of the best cabin steps, and I sat on the deck at his side to take care of him. There were no other passengers that night but we four. The prisoner was so good as to beg permission to advise me how I could shelter my father from the wind and weather better than I had done. I had not known how to do it well, not understanding from the wind would set when we were out of the harbor. He did it for me. He expressed great gentleness and kindness for my father's state, and I am sure he felt it. That was the manner of our beginning to speak together."

"Let me interrupt you for a moment. Had he come on board alone?"

"No."

"How many were with him?"

"Two French gentlemen."

"Had they conferred together?"

"They had conferred together until the last moment, when it was necessary for the French gentlemen to be landed in their boat."

"Had any papers been handed about among them, similar to these lists?"

"Some papers had been handed about among them, but I don't know what papers."

"Like these in shape and size?"

"Possibly, but indeed I don't know, although they stood whispering very near to me: because they stood at the top of the cabin steps to have the light of the lamp that hung there, as I was a dull lamp, and they spoke very low, and I did not hear what they said, and saw only that they looked at papers."

"Now to the prisoner's conversation, Miss Manette—"

"The prisoner was as open in his confidence with me—which arose out of my helpless situation—as he was kind, and good, and useful to my father. I hope," bursting into tears, "I may repay him by doing him harm to-day."

Buzzing from the blue-flies.

"Miss Manette, if the prisoner does not perfectly understand that you give the evidence which it is your duty to give—which you must give—and which you can not escape from giving—with great unwillingness, he is the only person present in that condition. Please to go on."

She told us that he said he feared the bitterness of a delicate and difficult nature, which might get people into trouble, and that he was therefore travelling under an assumed name. He said that this business had, within a few days, taken him across, and might, at intervals, take him often across between France and England for a long time to come."

"Did he say any thing about America, Miss Manette? Be particular."

"He tried to explain to me how that quarrel had arisen, and he said that, so far as he could judge, it was a wrong and foolish one on England's part. He added, in a jesting way, that perhaps George Washington might gain almost as great a name in history as George the Third. But there was no harm in his way of saying this: it was said laughingly, and to beguile the time."

Any strongly marked expression of face on the part of a chief actor in a scene of great interest to whom many eyes are directed, will be unconsciously imitated by the spectators. Her forehead was painfully anxious and intent as she gave this evidence, and, in the pauses when she stopped for the Judge to write it down, watched its effect upon the Counsel for and against. Among the lookers-on there was the same expression in all quarters of the court; inasmuch as that a great majority of the foreheads there might have been mirrors reflecting the witness, when the Judge looked up from his notes to glare at that tremendous heresy about George Washington.

THE PRISONER AND HIS DOUBLE.

Mr. Attorney-General now signified to my Lord that he deemed it necessary, as a matter of form and public duty, to call the young lady's father, Doctor Manette; who was called accordingly.

"Doctor Manette, look upon the prisoner. Have you ever seen him before?"

"Once. When he called at my lodgings in London. Some three years, or three years and a half, ago."

"Can you identify him as your fellow-passenger on board the packet, or speak to his connection with your daughter?"

"Sir, I can do neither."

"Is there any particular and special reason for your being unable to do either?"

He answered, in a low voice, "There is."

"Has it been your misfortune to undergo a long imprisonment, without trial, or even accusation, in your native country, Doctor Manette?"

He answered, in a tone that went to every heart, "A very long imprisonment."

"Were you newly released on the occasion in question?"

"They tell me so."

"Have you no remembrance of the occasion?"

"None. My mind is a blank from some time before I can not even say what time—when I employed myself, in my captivity, in making shoes for the time when I should travel living in London with my dear daughter here. She had become familiar to me, when a child, and my mind stored my faculties: but I am quite unable even to say how she had become familiar. I have no remembrance of the process."

Mr. Attorney-General sat down, and the father and daughter sat down together.

A singular circumstance then arose in the case. The object in hand being to prove that the prisoner came over, with some fellow-plotter untracked, in the Dover mail on that Friday night in November five years ago, and that one of the mail in the night, as a blind, at a place where he did not remain, left from with the rest a traveled look of having come miles or more, to a partisan and dock-yard, and there collected information; a witness was called to identify him as having been at the precise time required, in the coffee-room of a hotel in that place-empty at dock-yard was waiting for another person. The prisoner's counsel was cross-examining this witness with the object, clearly, that he was not present with the prisoner on any other occasion, when the wigged gentleman, who had been long and closely looking at the ceiling of the court, wrote a word or two on a little piece of paper, screwed it up, and tossed it to him. Unfolding the piece of paper in the next pause, the counsel looked with great attention and curiosity at the prisoner.

"You say again you are quite sure that it was the prisoner?"

The witness was quite sure.

"Did you ever see any body very like the prisoner?"

Not so like (the witness said) as that he could be mistaken.

"Look well upon that gentleman, my learned friend there," pointing to him who had tossed the paper over, "and then look well upon the prisoner. How say you? Are they very like each other?"

Allowing for my learned friend's appearance being careless and slovenly, if not debauched, they were sufficiently like each other to surprise not only the witness, but every body present, when they were thus brought into comparison. My Lord leaned forward to look at the paper held by aside his wig, and giving no very gracious consent, the likeness became more remarkable. My Lord inquired of Mr. Stryver (the prisoner's counsel) whether they were next to try Mr. Carton (some of my learned friend's fee cross? But Mr. Stryver replied to my Lord, no, he would ask the witness point blank whether what happened once might happen twice: whether he would have been so confident in his evidence if he had seen this counsel learned gentleman whisper, and whether he would be so confident, having seen it, now. The significance of which was to smash this witness like a crockery vessel, and shiver his part of the case to shivers limber.

Mr. Cruncher had by this time taken quite a fancy to the paper-folder and to his following of the evidence. He had now to attend while Mr. Stryver fitted the prisoner's case on to the shoulders of another client, showing them how the patriot, Barsad, was a hired spy and traitor, an unblushing traitor before his face, and how the virtuous servant, Cly, was his friend and partner, and was worthy to be; how the watchful eyes of those forgers and false swearers had rested on the prisoner as a victim, because of their unlikeness to him. Standing certain of French extraction—did require his making those passages across the Channel; though what those passages were, he knew nothing of others who were near and dear to him forbade him, even for his life, to disclose. How the evidence that had been warped and wrested from the young lady, whose anguish in giving it they had witnessed, came to nothing, involving the mere little innocent gallantries and politenesses likely to pass between any young gentleman and young lady so thrown together—with the exception of that reference to George Washington, which was altogether too extraordinary and impossible to be regarded in any other light than as a monstrous joke. How it would be a weakness in the government to break down in this attempt to practice for popularity on the lowest national antipathies and fears, and therefore Mr. Attorney-General had made the most of it; how, nevertheless, it rested upon nothing, save that vile and infamous character of evidence too often discharging such curse, and of which the State Trials of this country were full. But there My Lord interposed (with as grave a face as he could put on, truly), saying that he could not sit upon that Bench and suffer those allusions.

Mr. Stryver then called his few witnesses, and Mr. Cruncher had next to attend while Mr. Attorney-General turned the whole set of clothes Mr. Stryver had fitted on the jury inside out; arguing how Barsad and Cly were even a hundred times better than he had thought them, and the prisoner a hundred times worse. Lastly, came My Lord himself, turning the suit of clothes, now inside out, now outside in, but on the whole decidedly trimming and shaping them into grave-clothes for the prisoner.

And now the jury turned to consider, and the great Bell was carried out.

Mr. Carton, who had so long sat looking at the ceiling of the court, changing neither his place nor his attitude, even in this excitement. While his learned friend, Mr. Stryver, massing the papers before him, had disturbed the whole set near, and from time to time glanced anxiously at the jury; while all the spectators had changed more or less, and grouped themselves anew; while even My Lord himself rose from his state and went out, leaving a quiet air behind him which was not disagreeable; Mr. Carton had taken no notice of the change, and had preserved the same attitude. He had not even changed it, when the prisoner was brought back, after being expressly remanded, to hear the verdict.

Mr. Carton, who had so long sat looking at the ceiling of the court, changing neither his place nor his attitude, even in this excitement. While his learned friend, Mr. Stryver, massing the papers before him, had disturbed the whole set near, and from time to time glanced anxiously at the jury; while all the spectators had changed more or less, and grouped themselves anew; while even My Lord himself rose from his state and went out, leaving a quiet air behind him which was not disagreeable; Mr. Carton had taken no notice of the change, and had preserved the same attitude. He had not even changed it, when the prisoner was brought back, after being expressly remanded, to hear the verdict.

And now the jury turned to consider, and the great Bell was carried out

MONTH OF JUNE

Month of the flower-crowned bread and brow,
We find thy genial influence now.
And all our garden plots grow bright
With thy chaste gifts of balm and light.

In every form, of every hue,
Thy "trade of May" became the flowers
Which now adorn our brides and bowers.

Oh! stir the harmony, sweet the scion
Of Flora to the breeze lock,
While, softly as a whisper, grows
Sweeps round our path the fragrant air.

For, bright as are the garden hues,
And sweet the influence flowers diffuse,
Some works of art are yet more delightful
That them in beauty and delight!
The utmost powers man's mind and solid
Where the great Smithy their flag unfold;
Go look at them—every one!
And say, hath summer nobler fruitry
Greeny and lush combine
To make them foremost in their line.
Buy but one suit of Smith, and Brother,
You'll need no hint to "eat again."

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138 and 140

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the

Goods in Plain Figures.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

New Style.

From $50 to $125.

SINGER'S FAMILY MACHINE, the prices of which is only $50, is a light and elegantly decorated machine, capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

SINGER'S STANDARD MACHINES for manufacturing purposes are well known to be without a single rival in the market. Much has recently been published in regard to various stitches made by Sewing Machines. Singer's Machines make the best stitch ever invented, and do it in the best style. A pamphlet discount is made to clergymen.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be sent gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 456 Broadway, New York.

TUCKER'S NURSERY FOR FLOWERS, SMALL PLANTS, COFFURES, and BRIDAL SETS, at 361 Broadway, 2 doors from Franklin Street.

THIS SUPERIOR Strong-bodied delicate-flavored Mountain COFFEE, For sale by CORNEAL & CO No. 8 Beaver Street.

Café de Costa Rica

C&C

PILES! PILES!! PILES!!!

What is it? How cured?

Thousands of persons have Piles—suffer for years with the disease—yet few know what it is, or how it is cured. Every case of Piles, whether manifesting itself in the form of external tumors, frequent bleedings, or in violent itching and irritation, originates in a disordered state or condition of the abdominal venous circulation. This produces the engorgement, dilation of the veins, thickening of the coats, hemorrhages, pain and suffering; and the disease can only be fundamentally cured by medicines which, taken internally, relieve this abdominal venous congestion. Hence ointments, washes, and every other remedy for the skin are useless.

HUMPHREYS' HOMEOPATHIC PILE SPECIFIC, a simple sugar pill, taken two or three times per day, cures the disease by curing the condition upon which the disease depends. Hundreds have testified to the cure in all of the most obstinate cases. All will be promptly benefited by it. Price 50 cents per box.

N. B.—A full set of HUMPHREYS' HOMEOPATHIC Specifics, with book of directions, case of vials, morocco, large 2 fourth vials, and receipt case, $5; do. in plain case, $3. Sent by mail or express on receipt of price.

The Remedies by the single box or full case, sent to any address by mail or express, free of charge, on receipt of the price. Address

DR. F. HUMPHREYS & CO.,
No. 562 Broadway, New York.

Sold by all Druggists.

$32 50 PER QUARTER. ASHLAND INST. and MUSICAL ACADEMY, Catskill Mountains, Greene County, N. Y. Boarding and Day Pupils. For particulars, address Rev. HENRY ANABLE, A.M., Ashland, N. Y., or G. G. HUBBARD, Esq., 52 Broadway.

AGENTS WANTED in this State to connect with the GOLDEN SALVE. Bills supply! Can make good pay. For terms &c., send stamp.
C. H. WHITTON, Lowell, Mass.

To Teachers.

My Correspondents are requested to address me, hereafter, to the "CITY OF HARTFORD, Hartford, Conn., City." School Catalogues and Circulars, Names and Post-Office Address of Schools, Academies, Colleges, &c., are solicited.
MARCUS WILLSON

PATENT POROUS PLASTERS

STRENGTHENING

THESE PLASTERS ARE ALSO APPLIED, WE ARE ASKED, WHY ARE THEY SO POPULAR? THE ANSWER IS SIMPLE AND SUFFICIENT—THEY ARE A NEW, SURE & SAFE REMEDY FOR EVERY PAIN, WEAKNESS, AILMENT AND SUFFERING FROM WHICH MANKIND IS KNOWN TO SUFFER. THEY ARE ALWAYS READY, ALWAYS STRONG, ALWAYS SAFE, NOT SUBJECT TO DRYING, MOISTURE, UNDER-WATER, WORKING, AND ONE ROLL IS WORTH FROM FIVE TO TWENTY DOLLARS BESIDES THE COST. SO OF ASTHMA AND ALL PAINS IN LUNG, CHEST AND SIDE, IN AGUE OF THE BREAST THEY ARE USED WITH THE MOST SURE AND INVALUABLE PREVENTING TENSION AND DISPERSING CAPACITY. IN ALL CASES THESE PLASTERS ARE WARMLY RECOMMENDED AND FOR PAIN IN THE SIDE, FULL PARTICULARS ARE PRINTED SLIPS & DIRECTIONS.

50 & 25 cts. ALLCOCK & Co.

POROUS PLASTER CO.,
NEW-YORK.
AND BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

N. B. LAST TRICE AS LONG AS OTHERWISE SOLD AT 50 CTS.

Sold also at Barnes's, 256 Bowery, and Hamblen's, 417 Broadway.

PRINCE IMPERIAL.

CHAMPAGNE,

FROM

DE VENOGE & CO., EPERNAY, FRANCE,

as used at the

Imperial Tables on the Continent of Europe.

A Perfectly Pure and Delicate Wine

at a moderate price and admirably adapted for family use.

Sold by

Nearly every leading Hotel and Dealer throughout the country.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT, Sole Importer,

Corner of Broadway and Broome Street.

Grand Introduction of

SUMMER HATS,

At Genin's, 507 Broadway,

On Wednesday, May 25th, 1859,

Embracing every Department of Hatting, and comprehending

HATS OF ALL STYLES,

ALL MATERIALS,

ALL PRICES,

AND FOR ALL PURPOSES.

TIFFANY & CO.,

Importers & Manufacturers,

No. 550 Broadway, New York, and

Rue Richelieu, No. 79, Paris,

DIAMONDS AND OTHER PRECIOUS STONES.

FINE JEWELRY. WATCHES.

Silver Ware in Great Variety. Table Cutlery.

Clocks. Bronzes, Artistic Gas Fixtures,

Desks, Dressing-Cases, Work-Boxes, Jewel-Boxes,

Fans, Rich Fancy Goods,

and many other articles of Art and Luxury.

The only Agents in New York for the sale of Chas. Frodsham's Watches, whose superiority over any other pocket time-pieces ever made is unquestionably established.

Every article is marked in plain figures the Lowest Price at which it will be sold.

We carefully attend to strangers' solicitation to examine our stock, which has a well known and the most obliging reception.

CURE FOR CONSTIPATION.

The Oriental Fruit Paste, or Aromatic Jelly of Figs and Senna,

Is a simple and efficacious laxative medicine, pleasant to the taste, and free from griping.

Sold by Druggists every where.

J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO., Wholesale Agents,
No. 21 Park Row, and 81 Fulton Street, New York.

FINKLE & LYON'S

SEWING MACHINES,

For Family Use, Tailoring Purposes, Saddlery, &c. Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other machine in market, or money refunded. Agents wanted.

503 BROADWAY,

Next to the St. Nicholas Hotel.

Burgmuller's Piano-Forte School.

A New Edition, handsomely bound in cloth. Price $2 00. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

Lord Lod'n's Worcestershire Sauce.

Is in FIRST WINNING Sauce. Is a favorite for all purposes.

ASK FOR, and HAVE ONLY LORD WARD'S.

Used at every Hotel, and sold by all Grocers and Fruit Dealers.

Wholesale and for Exportation, by

CROSSE & BLACKWELL & CO.,
40 Broad Street, New York.

Sold Retail by the Grocers and Fruit Houses. Half Pints, 20 cents per bottle; Pints, 35 cents per bottle.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S, PERFUMERY,

Sold by all Druggists in every city.

Wholesale Agent,

J. FISHER,

87 Pearl St.

New York.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S LAUREL WATER FACTORY.

SWEET SCENTS THE FLOWS FROM THE EAR KISS-ME-QUICK FRANGIPANNI

Are a Thousand others

No. 46, each or Name

2 New Bond St. London

PURGATION WITH BRANDRETH'S PILLS

PURIFIES THE BLOOD

AND

CANNOT FAIL

TO CURE WHEN ENFORCED

IN TIME;

AND LET ME SAY THAT THIS KNOWLEDGE IS SECURED BY CONVICTIONS YOU CANNOT DOUBT. IT IS CAPABLE OF CONFERRING UPON MANKIND, IF NOT WITHDRAWN, PERHAPS FOR YOU BRANDRETH'S PILLS ARE A QUICK REMEDY. IT CONSUMES NO TIME FOR ITS ACTION.

WHAT I SELL, THESE MEN SHILLINGS

YOU COULD NOT PURCHASE FOR OUR LIVES.

MY HERBS AND EXTRACTS ARE ALL PREPARED AT MY LABORATORY, WHERE A STAFF OF 140 HORSE POWER IS EMPLOYED EXCLUSIVELY ON THEM, AND WHERE BRANDRETH'S PILLS ARE, IN FACT, GIVE YOU QUICK AS WAS DISCOVERED BY THE

FOUNDER OF THE FIRM OF

DR. BRANDRETH'S PRINCIPAL OFFICE

294 CANAL STREET NEW YORK.

AND SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

Cure Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Indigestion, Cure Heart Burn, Heart Burn, Acidity, Acidity, Cure Water Brash, Water Brash, Jaundice, Jaundice, Cure Liver Complaint, Liver Complaint, Debility, Debility, Cure Want of Appetite, Want of Appetite, Cure Headache, Costiveness, Piles, Nervousness, Cure Flatulency, Nausea, Female Complaints.

These Bitters are so well known as the most remarkable and efficient yet discovered for the absolute and rapid cure of the above diseases, that it is altogether unnecessary to enlarge upon its merits.

S. W. LOWELL & CO., Proprietors, Boston.

Sold everywhere.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

Kingsley's Great Novel.

Now Ready,

The Recollections of

GEOFFRY HAMLYN.

By

HENRY KINGSLEY

1 vol. 12mo. Price $1 25.

[From the London Athenæum.]

"A book that keeps up its interest from the first page to the last; full of vigorous, stirring life."

[From the London Critic.]

"High and hearty praise to Henry Kingsley for his splendid novel, 'Geoffry Hamlyn,' a magnificent fiction. We advise our readers most certainly to lose no time in obtaining it."

[From the Boston Transcript.]

"We can only add, that, in view of the general breadth, boldness and vigor of mind that the novel displays, that it will undoubtedly be popularly equal to the best romances of Charles Kingsley."

Published also by

Ticknor & Fields, Boston.

Charles Grobe's New Method

FOR THE

PIANO FORTE.

Mr. Grobe is as well known, that any remarks as to his qualifications would be superfluous. Suffice it to say, that he has produced in his New Method a work for the instruction of the beginner in any land. It is evidently the Book for the People, and as the result of the labors of a life, it is the best work ever offered to Teacher or Pupil. Nothing is anticipated, nothing hurried. The Book is divided into progressive lessons, and each one is preceded by elementary exercises, and followed by a series of instruction in altogether avoided, and the Pupil is led gradually and delightfully on. The paper the utmost attention, and the leading handsome. Price $2 00; in full, $2 50. Copies sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of the marked price. The trade supplied. Address, or apply to Trumbull & Co., Hartford, Conn.

FIFTH, POND & CO., 547 Broadway, New York.

LEE & WALKER, Philadelphia.

PACIFIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY. OFFICE 111 BROADWAY.

MARINE AND INLAND INSURANCE.

Assets $380,000.

This Company continues to do an exclusive merchandise business, and has returned to its dealers, out of the profits of the year 1858, a dividend of Forty-three per Cent.—See Cal. Cont. interest on its outstanding certificates—and has reduced the certificates of the issue of 1854.

ALFRED EDWARDS, President.
WILLIAM LEGGETT, Vice President.
BENJAMIN A. OGDEN, Secretary.

Something New.

Agents wanted, to go into a New and Honorable Business, which will pay from $10 to $20 weekly.

No Humbug.

Satisfaction guaranteed. Send stamp for particulars, which will be sent free.

S. M. PETTICK & CO., Lynn Mass.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

This compound will be found a great promoter of health, when taken in the spring, to expel the foul humors which fester in the blood at that season of the year. By the timely expulsion of them many troubling disorders are nipped in the bud. Multitudes can, by the aid of this remedy, spare themselves from the endurance of feul eruptions and ulcerous sores, through which the system will strive to rid itself of corruption, if not assisted to do it effectually by the cleansing blood of the body by an alterative medicine. Cleanse out the vitiated blood whenever you find its impurities bursting through the skin in pimples, eruptions, or sores; cleanse it when you find it is obstructed and sluggish in the bowels; cleanse it whenever it is foul, and your health will follow. Even where no particular disorder is felt, people enjoy better health, and live longer, for cleansing the blood. Keep the blood healthy and all is well; but with this pabulum of life disordered, there can be no lasting health. Some one or more unerring seeds go wrong; and the great machinery of life is disordered or overthrown.

IT CURES

Scrofula and Scrofulous Complaints, Eruptions and Eruptive Diseases, Ulcer, Pimples, Blotches, Tumors, Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Syphilis and Syphilitic Affections, Mercurial Diseases, Dropsy, Neuralgia or Tic Doloureux, Debility, Dyspepsia and Indigestion, Erysipelas, Rose or St. Anthony's Fire, and indeed the whole class of complaints arising from Impurity of the Blood.

In order to purify their complex ordination from the system, the remedy should be judiciously taken according to directions on the bottle. Prepared by

DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass.

Price $1 per Bottle; Six Bottles for $5.

Sold by all Druggists every where.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,

Nature's True Restorative.

A SAFE, SURE, AND CERTAIN REMEDY

TONIC AND ALTERATIVE EVER PREPARED.

Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, corner of William, New York.

Save Your Carpets

From Wear and Moth.

The attention of Housekeepers is respectfully called to Harrington's Patent Carpet Lining, a substitute for Straw Paper, and for any other article used under Carpets, Oil-Cloth, or Matting. It protects the Carpet against any unevenness in the floor, and is warranted to save fifty per cent. to the durability of Carpets, &c. Its cheapness puts it within the reach of all. To be had at any of the principal Carpet Stores, and at the sciences of the Patentee, No. 1 Dey Street, New York, and No. 27 Merrimack Street, corner College Place, J. R. HARRINGTON, Agt.

SIMMONS'S DYSPEPSIA CORDIAL,

Though eight years in use, has never failed in one case of Dyspepsia or Fever and Ague, however confirmed, in a great number of cases. It is perfectly safe, and contains no quassia, or bunfish to the Dyspeptic.

Prepared by H. H. SIMMONS, Wholesale Druggist, New York Office, No. 13 John Street. Send for a circular.

A. S. HATCH, Agent.

FELIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Pamphlets containing main outlines of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano. The Subscriber is now located, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, and will be offered wholesale and retail at less than two thirds the price of Peruvian. For particulars address C. S. MARSHALL, Prop., American Guano Co., 66 William Street, New York.

Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 70 to 80 pages of reading, or one third as much more reading than any other in the country.

Commencement of Volume XIX.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

AND

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR JUNE.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year . . . . . $ 2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year each 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00, in advance.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where received. It is Twenty-four Cents a Year.

Twenty-five Cents a Quarter.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST FAMILY PAPER.

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

EVERY CITIZEN SHOULD TAKE IT.

EVERY CITIZEN SHOULD READ IT.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S New Story, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," splendidly Illustrated by Phiz, is now being commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY of May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS, Illustrated Serial, Political and Miscellaneous Articles, will be contributed to "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for April 9.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for Six Months 2 00
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 8 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twenty or Twenty-five Subscribers.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

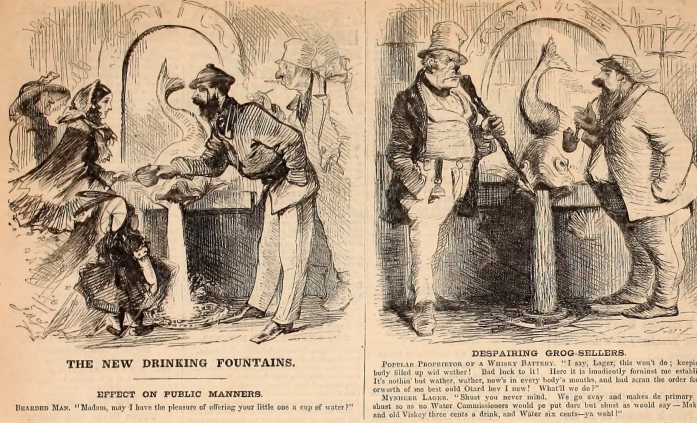
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

The Postage in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names at the Office of Publication, or by letter addressed to the City of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.



THE NEW DRINKING FOUNTAINS.

EFFECT ON PUBLIC MANNERS.

BEARDED MAN. "Madam, may I have the pleasure of offering your little one a cup of water?"

DESPAIRING GROG-SELLERS.

POPULAR PROPRIETOR OF A WHISKY BOTTERY. "I say, Lager, this won't do; keepin' every body filled up wid wather! Bad luck to it! Here it is imadiately forninst me establishment. It's nothin but wather, wather, now's in every body's mouths, and bad scran the order for a bagerworth of me best ould Oxard her I now! What'll we do?"

MYSTERIOUS LAGER. "Shout you never mind. We go way and makes de primary mestic's about so as to Water Commissioners would pe put dare but shuts us would say — Make Lager and old Vinkey three cents a drink, and Water six cents—ya vehl!"

DREADFUL FOR YOUNG COLLEGIANS.

YOUNG LADY. "Are you at School?"

YOUNG COLLEGIAN. "Aw, no—I'm at College!"

YOUNG LADY. "College! Rather a nice place, is it not?"

YOUNG COLLEGIAN. "Bum—Haw! Pretty well, but then I can't get on without female society!"

YOUNG LADY. "Dear! Dear! Pity you don't go to a Girl's School, then!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

This is Arcadia—Hic the lord
Their weary souls have sighed for.
This is Arcadia—this the land.
Heroic hearts have died for.
Yet, strange to tell, this promised land
Has never been applied for.—Forever.

A NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF THE SPARROWGRASS PAPERS.

NOW READY.

ACADIA;

OR,

A MONTH WITH THE BLUE NOSES.

BY FREDERIC S. COZZENS.

Two Elegant Illustrations by Napoleon Sarony.

One Volume. Price $1.

Also, a New Edition of

THE SPARROWGRASS PAPERS.

Price $1.

DERBY & JACKSON,

PUBLISHERS,

No. 119 NASSAU ST., New York.

FOR SALE BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.

The New Novels.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Peg Wofflington," "Christie Johnstone," "It is Never Too Late to Mend," &c. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

THE BERTRAMS. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Doctor Thorne." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

GERALD FITZGERALD, "The Chevalier." A Novel. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," "The Bold Family Aboard," "Sir Jasper Carew," "Maurice Tierney," &c. Part I. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

ADAM BEDE. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT, Author of "Scenes of Clerical Life." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT? By PIERCE EGAN, Author of "Real Life in London," "Tom and Jerry," "Wight and Mayhew," &c., &c. Illustrated. 2 Parts. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Muslin, $1 00.

THE ROMANCE AND ITS HERO. By the Author of "Magdalen Stafford." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

BY EVAN HOLT'S DAUGHTER. A novel. By HESBER LEE, Author of "Kathie Brande." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles) on receipt of price.

Blasser's 5 Minute

ICE CREAM FREEZERS,

As Improved for 1859.

With Standard Iron Covers and Bottom—Tinned.

The only Freezer known which is constructed on true scientific principles.

The Cheapest, Best, and most Economical, requiring less ice and less labor than any other. Purchasers will find the time the most durable in structure, and most certain in its operations.

Sole Agents for the United States,

E. KETCHAM & CO.,

Manufacturers of Japanned and Planished Tin Ware, 189 Pearl Street, New York.

Curtis' Cure for Baldness.

This remedy is reliable; contains no oil, lead, or sulphur. It has been tested to Boston, Providence, and the Eastern States. J. W. CURTIS & CO., Proprietors, Providence, R. I. Sold by E. M. Orton, No. 197 Broadway; J. & J. Cuddington, No. 78 Broadway; W. H. Lewis, No. 377 Greenwich street, store down, No. 72 Hudson Street, New York; Mrs. Hayes; G. P. Hiles; and Reynolds & Co., Brooklyn; E. Bellamy, Jersey City; C. T. Mercer, Newark.

BARNES & PARK, Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row, And all Druggists. General Agents.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

With such universal distress and suffering as saddens the female life, a really good Medicine must be their best friend. The numerous cases of Irregularities, Interruptions, Discharges, Ulcerations, Falling Wombs, Leucorrhœa, &c., constantly effected by Dr. Marchisi's Catholicon, gives it a reputation and popularity never obtained by any other article. It never fails to relieve, and in a few days cures the most obstinate cases. It is the best, safest, and most speedy, certain, cure spirit in magazine, and forms a want this Catholicon has restored health to the patient and gladness to the fireside. It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the female sex, and should never be dispensed with previous to and after confinement. Numerous letters testify that it is

NEVER TAKEN WITHOUT BENEFIT.

Daughters, Wives and Mothers! this medicine will cure you. It has been long and favorably known. As an evidence of its efficacy the money will be refunded where results are not as indicated. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered at the counter of agents. The sole proprietor, Dr. Marchisi with many years' practice in the City of New York, has had in his care and treatment 22,000 cases. Price $5 per bottle, or 2 bottles for $9. Notice Removal. Address,

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,

13 and 15 PARK ROW, N. Y.

GIFTS! GIFTS! GIFTS!—D. W. EVANS & CO., No. 671, Broadway, New York—The Celebrated Gift Book Store, established 1854.

THE GREEST FRUITERERS GIFT BOOK HOUSE in the country, conducted by those long experienced and increased capital, now offer greater inducements than ever before, and to this,

THE FIFTH YEAR

of their location in New York City, will make it their endeavor to conduct their business with a liberality befitting the prosperity shown in the above.

A new and revised catalogue now ready for gratuitous distribution, containing the largest and most diversified list of Standard and Miscellaneous Publications ever issued in this country, which we offer at unprecedented low rates to the trade. MAILED FREE TO ALL APPLICANTS.

The following is a schedule of Property which will be given to Purchasers of Books at the time of sale:

	WORTH FROM
Gold Watches, English Lever, Patent Lever, and Lepines	$50 00 to $100 00
Silver Watches, Patent Lever, Full Jewelled, Hunting Cases, open face, and Quarter Hunting	12 00 to 40 00
Gold Lockets—Large size, fine glasses and two glasses with spring—large and small size, with snap	2 50 to 12 00
Cameo Sets, Ear-drops, Pinnets, Lava, Goldstone, Garnet and Carol Sets, Ear-drops, Pinnets	5 00 to 25 00
Ladies' Gold Chains, Medallion Chains, Chatelaines	8 00 to 15 00
Gents' Guard and Vest Chains	10 00 to 30 00
Sets Cameo, Gold-lane, Painted, Mosaic, Garnet, Onyx, Engraved and Plain Gold Sleeve Buttons, and Studs	2 50 to 12 00
Gold Pencils with Pens, large, medium and small size	3 50 to 7 50
Silver Pencils with Gold Pens, large, medium and small size, double and single extension cases	2 00 to 5 00
Gold Thimbles, Gold Pens, Gold Pen and Pencil Holders	1 00 to 7 50
Gents' Gold Breast Pins, Cluster, with Pearl, Ruby, Emerald, Garnet, &c.	1 50 to 5 00
Rich Silk Dress Patterns	12 00 to 20 00
Cameo, Jet, Coral, Garnet, Onyx, and Plain Oval Bracelets	5 00 to 20 00
Silver and Gold Thimbles	50 to 6 00
Gents' Pen and Pocket-knife	25 to 1 00
Pearl and Rosewood Portemonnaies	50 to 3 00
Toothpicks, Watch Keys, Guard Slides	25 to 1 00
Gold Cameo, small, medium and large	50 to 7 50

Besides other Gifts, comprising a large and valuable assortment of miscellaneous articles, varying from 25 cents to $10.

One of the above articles will be given to the purchaser of each book at the time of the sale.

Address all orders, letters of inquiry, &c., to D. W. EVANS & CO., Publishers, No. 671 Broadway, N. Y. City.

☞ Something New!!! ☜

A Gift Enterprise conducted upon a Liberal and Important Plan!!!!!!

The most Liberal, Punctual, and Reliable

GIFT BOOK ENTERPRISE

IN EXISTENCE.

The best evidence of this is the fact of its being the only one that ever embraced in Their Press of the City in which it is located.

We are not only INDORSED BY THE ENTIRE PRESS of our own city, but by many of the most respectable and influential papers throughout the country.

H. E. HOYT & CO.'S

GREAT

GIFT BOOK STORE,

No. 41 Baltimore Street,

Baltimore, Md.

Headquarters for Southern and Western Orders.

WRITE FOR A CATALOGUE FOR 1859,

BY CONTAINS THE

LARGEST LIST of Useful, Ornamental and Valuable Gifts ever Published!

☞ GREATER INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS than ever before offered by any other establishment in the United States.

A Gift worth from Fifty Cents to

One Hundred Dollars

ACCOMPANIES EVERY BOOK.

Postmasters, Country Merchants, Booksellers, Librarians of Universities, Academies, Private and Circulating Libraries, Schools,

And all others whose business will make them, are respectfully solicited to BECOME OUR AGENTS.

Catalogues giving full particulars mailed free to any address.

WHAT THE PRESS SAY.

They have a magnificent assortment of Books, and have prepared themselves with tremendous stock of Gift Jewelry, Watches, &c.—Daily Transcript of Boston and Gentleman's Journal.—New Yorker.

Not only may a selection be made of any choice work, but with it the purchaser is sure to receive next article of jewelry, which in many cases proves quite valuable.—Saint Daily Exchange.

They make no promises that are not performed strictly to the letter, and by their punctuality omething their obligations, have gained the entire confidence of not only our citizens, but the country abroad.—Ledger, Pa.

A young lady acquaintance of ours purchased, for us, a book of this establishment, a few days since, and received a double eared Gold Watch, enlosed at one hundred dollars.—Ledger, Pa.

Among those which attends the Gift Book House of Messrs. H. E. Hoyt & Co. has no precedents in the annals of Gift Enterprises.—Republican and Argus.

Call and see them, and our word for it, you will not regret your visit.—Dispatch, Md.

The inducements to the Southern and Western people to make their purchases from Messrs. Hoyt & Co. are much greater than can be offered by any house of the kind in the country. Receipts from Baltimore to any Southern point is less, and the immense order handed done by this firm is a guarantee of their fulfillment of its promises.—Family Journal.

It is, in a word, getting Boston for nothing and being paid to take them away.—Boston.

All orders will be promptly and impartially filled, and parties will be pleased with their being received. Forwarded within one day after receiving the Books, with a Gift, in all cases. A circular accompany the Books, with a written certificate of the Gift which accompanies them.

Remember, no Gifts distributed of less value than 50 cents, or more than $100.

Address M. E. HOYT & CO.,

No. 41 Baltimore Street, Baltimore, Md.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 129.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

GARIBALDI AND HIS LEGION.

We are glad to be able to present our readers with a portrait of the famous Italian patriot Garibaldi, where exploits on the slopes of the Alps are at present in every one's mouth. We also give an engraving of the uniform of his troops.

Joseph Garibaldi is the type of the gallant soldier of fortune, to whom the excitement of war is a necessity; but who, when his country's opportunity arrives, is never found wanting among her defenders. Of all the Italian patriots of 1848 he is, without doubt, the ablest, most sensible, and most respectable.

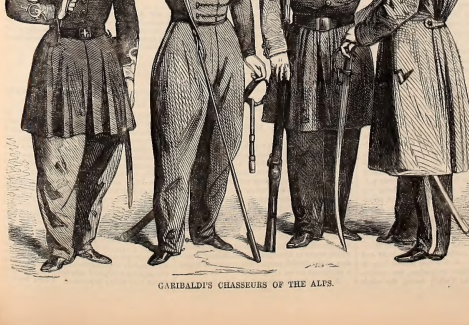
He was born at Nice, fifty-two years ago, of a good family. While yet a lad, he entered the naval service of Sardinia, and distinguished himself by several acts of bravery; but having taken part in a revolutionary movement at Genoa in 1834, he was obliged to fly the country. He took refuge in France, and shortly afterward accepted a command in the fleet of the Bey of Tunis. A very few months' service disgusted him with the Moors, and he sailed from the Mediterranean to South America, where war was raging on the La Plata. He offered his services to the President of Uruguay, and obtained the command of the fleet which was dispatched against Buenos Ayres. His occupation was destroyed shortly afterward by the Anglo-French intervention; but, nothing discomforted, Garibaldi raised a partisan corps of 3000 men, and fought gallantly for a long period of time against Rosas.

Altogether he spent many years in South America, winning golden opinions, and acquiring a thorough knowledge of partisan warfare. He married a South American lady, whose beauty was as remarkable as her courage and devotion to her husband. She accompanied him in all his military movements, was by his side at the time of his greatest dangers, and died at last, of fatigue and distress of mind, during the disastrous retreat from Rome.

In 1848 the cry of Italian liberty reached Garibaldi in South America, and in a few weeks he was on Italian soil. The champion of Italy, then as now, was the king of Sardinia; to him Garibaldi offered his sword, and readily obtained the command of a corps d'armée to operate on those very same Alpine slopes where we hear of his victories now. He knows the ground, and the people know him. During the brief but disastrous war of 1848–49 Garibaldi achieved wonders; but Piedmont was overmatched, and the day came when the gallant partisan was compelled to lay down his arms. He settled in Piedmont, became a member of the Sardinian Chamber of Deputies, and took a leading part as a member of the opposition.

The proclamation of the Roman Republic again roused him to action. He called his faithful legion together, and arrived at Rome in time to take the lead in the restoration of order. He had at this time with him Mazzini and all the other Italian patriots, very few of whom could compare with him in respect of experience or common sense, though not unfrequently their nominees gave them an advantage over him with the Roman populace. The moment was critical. Rome was about to be attacked by the French. The French general, Oudinot, who perhaps had never heard of Garibaldi, despised his preparations for defense. He sent against him a corps of 3000 French troops, which Garibaldi very quickly defeated, and sent flying back in confusion. Another enemy—3000 Neapolitans—marching upon Palestrina, Garibaldi hastened to meet them too, and with his legion, 3000 strong, he utterly routed them. Within a day or two afterward, at Velletri, he was equally successful, and was badly wounded. So unequal a contest, however, could not last long. The French were steadily advancing on Rome, and all that could be done was to prepare the old city to stand a siege. This Garibaldi did so well, that, though the fortifications, as every one knows, are in a ruinous condition, he held the French at bay for a whole month, to the amazement of their generals, and the great indignation of the Emperor. When it became certain at last that the city must fall, he prepared to his colleagues to blow up the bridges, abandon the city, and take to the hills. This desperate counsel was not followed. He then resolved to fly with his legion. His speech on that occasion would have done no dishonor to Brutus or the Gracchi: "Soldiers," he said, "in recompense of the love you may show your country, I offer you hunger, thirst, cold, war, and death; who accepts the terms, let him follow me." The enthusiastic legion followed him to a man. The day before the surrender, Garibaldi, at the head of his faithful partisans, cut his way through the enemy's lines, and made good his escape to the little republic of San Marino. There he dismissed his comrades, and, with two hundred men, embarked for Genoa.

GENERAL GARIBALDI.—[FROM A LATE PORTRAIT.]



GARIBALDI'S CHASSEURS OF THE ALPS.

It was now evident to the practical mind of Garibaldi that the revolutionary movement was crushed, and that further resistance would be hopeless. He made up his mind resolutely to dismiss politics from his thoughts till a better time came, and to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. After a brief stay at Genoa he sailed for New York.

He spent some time here. A candle factory, which he established on Staten Island in conjunction with the celebrated tenor singer, Lorenzo Salvi, defrayed his expenses for a while. But the wily singer was more than a match, in business matters, for the patriot, and the candle factory failed. Garibaldi then started off to California, which was then the "promised land" for all adventurers. Shortly after his arrival there, an American vessel in the port of San Francisco lost her captain; the post was offered to Garibaldi, who accepted it, sailed to China, and thence to Peru. In the latter country he could not resist an offer which was made to him of the chief command of the Peruvian army; but the Peruvian tactics, it would seem, did not exactly please him. He took the first opportunity of returning to his early vocation—the sea. For several years he commanded trading vessels, which not unfrequently sailed to New York, where Garibaldi was always received as a hero by his fellow-countrymen. His last employment was as commander of a Genoese steamer.

The legion with which he is driving the Austrians from Northern Lombardy is chiefly composed of his old comrades in arms, recruited by young men of high character. He knows the value of good men, and will not accept any recruit who can not bring excellent references. A very large number of Italian noblemen are serving under his orders. A letter in the Paris Siècle says of his men:

"There is not a regiment in Europe where discipline is more severely carried out than in the companies of volunteers. Garibaldi chooses the men, and when he does not personally know them who cross and offer their services to him for such accept them without good references. The wounded are straightened, leaden in great part, of young men belonging to the best families of Naples, Bologna, Modena, Parma, and especially of Milan.

"There is at this moment, at the Great British Hotel, in Turin, a very rich Milanese countess, whose two sons are volunteers. The elder is twenty-two and the younger nineteen. The mother of these two young soldiers has taken up her residence in Turin that she may be near her children. She can not see them, for they are fighting at the front posts, but she receives news from them every day, and will not return to Lombardy until the Franco-Sardinian army shall have entered Milan at the point of the bayonet.

"Do not suppose this lady to be a matron of ancient Rome. All her days are passed in dread and tears. At every moment she is afraid of some disastrous news, and every unexpected letter makes her tremble. Being very pious, she has two masses said every morning that God may turn aside from the breasts of her children the bullets. We are not made of such sorry stuff, you see, as the journals friendly to Austria would have the world believed.

"To speak to you frankly, our scrape-graces would not have frightened me, from the moment especially when fighting with Garibaldi's soldiers was in question, and on my first journey to Turin, on meeting under the arcades all those young Italians who were going to the straightest who were getting ready to go and fight under Garibaldi's orders, I asked myself if it would not have been better for the papers I spoke of but now to have stated the truth. Now, however, there is no longer a doubt about the courage, the moral strength, and determination of those who, as young, indeed, as Henri Berkel in from all parts of Italy. Full of confidence in their chief, they follow him wherever he wishes to lead them, and have transformed the enemy night and day—not an hour at rest, always on the watch, and with the moment forever on the qui-vive. In less than a month these children have become old soldiers. They have abandoned not every thing—they, the inheritors of great names and large fortunes—for servitude, the platter, and the hard camp-couch. The dishes, hamplopes, cocoa, these latest scions of the oldest patrician stocks, have become Republicans working for independence. Spare, then, these grand children, who are followed by the anxious eyes of their mothers, all disdain and hatred. Let the enemy at least respect such noble hearts, who will be an element terrible in their valiant energy."

Their title is Chasseurs des Alpes. They consist of two fine regiments, of two thousand men each, and a squadron of Guides, who serve at the staff and make reconnoissances. The latter are almost universally recruited at their own expense. The Chasseurs wear a green tunic with white trimming over the shoulders. The corps of Guides wear a gray jacket with black trimming, in the Hungarian fashion, large trowsers of the same color, a saber, and a rifle-carbine. They are always mounted on their good chargers, and are much feared by Austrian sharp-shooters and Croat marauders.

Garibaldi, when he was at Rome, was clad in a most picturesque though eccentric costume—half Spanish half Italian of the Middle Ages. The manta has been got rid of, and the Garibaldi of the present day has assumed the elegant uniform of a Piedmontese general. Every body wishes well to him and his corps.

Count Alfieri Sostegno, a rich nobleman from Cremona, has sent from Paris a battery of eight guns, three horses, and 8000 francs, to be given as a patriotic present to the corps of Garibaldi.

The relatives of Garibaldi reside in Rome, the brave defender of that city being now an exile from the very place he once defended, and forbidden by its government to enter its gates. His two sisters belong to a wealthy and aristocratic family, but on account of the republican sentiments of their brother they are closely watched, and are not allowed to send any of their property out of the city. They are themselves desirous of leaving Rome, but, to all intents and purposes, effectually prohibited from doing so.

DROWNED!

Where the mad lies black and slimy,
Where the waters seep along,
Where the wharfrats, stout and grimy,
Heave and haul with many a song—
Heaving still
Will,
Every coming day to fill;
Hauling, with a laugh and shout,
Bales of wondrous size about,
Straining to the ponderous weight
Of the good ship's wealthy freight.

Where the wide and swelling river
Rolls to seaward, proudly,
Where the gracious winds deliver
Glorious things from every clime—
Stuffs to wear,
Spices rare,
Lie in heaps, or scent the air—
Where the merchant, full of gold,
Welcomes home the seaman bold;
Where each heart, its love confess'd,
Claps the lived one to the breast,

Where the soft-voiced land-breeze ever
Hums its tune by mast and shroud,
Where the rough-tongued master never Ceases crying to the crowd—
"With a haul,
Lubbers all,
Stretch your muscles to the full!"
Where the never-ceasing flow,
Man above, and waves below,
Night and day, pours on and off,
Mingling at the city wharf.

There the vagrant boy is standing
With a ghastly, frightened air;
While each lounger is demanding
What he sees to make him stare.
Still his eyes
Grow in size
As his stammering speech he tries;

And his finger points below,
Where the waters ebb and flow.
Still his lips give forth no sound
But a hoarsely whispered "Drowned!"

Where the planks are green and rotten,
Sending forth a sickening steam,
Where the daylight is forgotten,
And the wharf-rat reigns supreme—
In his eyes
Fierce surprise
At his footborne human prize:
Squeaking, squeaking, such a cry,
As the crash above goes by;
Heeding neither man nor horse
In his blither o'er the course.

With a crow-bar to the planking,
With the tackle and the fall,
With a heave, and with a clanking,
Shivering hands and willing haul.
There he lies!
Open eyes
Turned toward the sunlit skies—
There he lies in oozing slime,
Heedless of the place and time;
Heedless of the gaping throng,
Heedless of the clash and song.

Sunlight falls like shadows fading,
Still the song goes on aloud—
Still with gaze that seems upbraiding
Stares the dead man on the crowd.
Hours fly
Swiftly by;
Sunset darkens on the sky
Ere the lingering men and boys
Take the dripping burden whose
O'er the distant stone-clad ground,
Coming for the man that's "Drowned."

Had his limbs been clothed in scarlet,
Were his linen rich and rare,
Had he been of gentle carriage,
Tainting God's own perfumed air,
Would he lie
While hours fly,
Staring sightless to the sky?
Would the crowd so careless stand
If a gem gleamed on his hand?
Would they sing, and laugh around,
Were he better dress'd when "Drowned?"

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1859.

AMERICAN OPINION ON THE WAR IN EUROPE.

WITHIN the past six weeks there have been three great wars in which European nations have engaged—the Crimean war, the war in India, and the present war in Italy. In none of these had the United States any interest, direct or remote; but the people of the United States have manifested decided sympathies for one side or the other in each of them. A study of the facts goes to show that Americans, as a rule, are much less influenced by their prejudices than is commonly supposed, but are governed by principles which, perhaps, they might always be supposed to have had, but which, nevertheless, exercise general sway over the mind of the nation.

During the Crimean war the sympathies of this country were unequivocally with Russia. There were a few persons and persons here and there—generally in one way or another with England or France—whose feelings were on the side of the Allies. But that the American people at large felt more friendly to the Russians than to their enemies, every observer must have perceived. Many writers have pointed themselves to discover the source of this Russian sympathy. There was no principle involved in the war. Liberty was not at stake on either side. As between the belligerents, in view of humanity, there was nothing to choose: the Zouaves are as savage as the Cossacks, and the English sacked the palaces of Kertch. The English papers tried hard to show that the war was one of civilization against barbarism; but this ridiculous assumption imposed on no one. Americans saw plainly enough that the Turk was as barbarous as the Russian, and that civilization had little to expect from success on either side. Driven, therefore, to their wits' end to account for the decided sympathies felt by Americans for the Russians, the writers who examined the subject came to the conclusion that we were biased by latent jealousy of England and anti-British prejudice. We are of opinion that the judgment was unwarranted, and that the real, though small, undue influence to certain Irish orators and petty politicians, who, they supposed, had been the means of exciting that jealousy and anti-British prejudice. We are inclined to think that the American sympathy for Russia grew altogether out of the belief—which was general in this country—that the war was unnecessary, that Russia was overmatched, and that two powerful maritime Powers had clubbed together to bully and humiliate a third. It is a fact that so long as the war was confined to Turkey, our sympathies were with the Turk; during the whole of one Pasha's campaign on the Danube Russia had no friends in this country. It was only when the Allies landed and concentrated their "immoral fire" on Sebastopol, while Todtleben, by prodigies of genius, withstood the assaults of enemies infinitely superior to him in numbers, in guns, and in resources of every kind; when the Russians died by the thousand a day, but held firm to their fortresses—it was only then that American sympathy pronounced itself decidedly in favor of Russia. We infer from these facts that that sympathy was merely the natural feeling excited by heroic resistance against overwhelming odds, that it implied no particular liking for Russia, and no extreme prejudice against England.

This view is confirmed by the decided sympathy felt throughout this country for Great Britain in the Indian war. On the face of it, it would not have seemed unnatural had our people sympathized with the Hindoos who appeared to be struggling for independence and liberty. But the contempt and loathing elicited by one or two Irish demonstrations in favor of the Sepoys proved clearly that that was not the feeling flowed; and the honors paid to the memory of Havelock afforded a still more emphatic confirmation of our regard for England. The fact was the more remarkable as the vices and oppression of the East India Company were well known in the United States. We, republicans, who had not received undue prejudices from England during years before, not only felt no kindred feeling for another people engaged in the same struggle against the same foe, but entertained sentiments more aggravated than those which had roused the American Colonies to arms, but actually expressed almost unmixed joy at her successes, sorrowed over his disasters, and rejoiced at his victories. The secret of this very singular fact will be found in the general conviction among Americans that the Hindoo is incapable of maintaining unaided even the imperfect civilization sustained by the English in India; that his success would have been the prelude to an era of barbarism and bloodshed; and that the English rule, with all its faults, was susceptible of amelioration. Americans saw that no good —to humanity and civilization—could result from the expulsion of the British from India, and the coronation of Nena Sahib as despot, and they believed that the mutiny would lead to a conversion of the Company in India; and an elevation of the country in the scale of nations. The sympathy based upon these principles was confined to the better properties; but its real basis was what we have stated.

Now we have a third war, and again American sympathy is decided. But the fact in source is clear and plain. We sympathize with the Italians because they are fighting for liberty and independence against a Power whose very name is synonymous with oppression, cruelty, absolutism, superstition, and all the worst vices of the feudal system. We have nothing with Napoleon because we believe that he is honest in his desire to free Italy and his declaration that he does not seek conquest.

The writers who, in reviewing the course of public opinion in the United States during the Crimean War, have devoted such attention to anti-British prejudice of Americans, and do their slightly love for Russia, must reconsider their views. The American mind is active, and the national heart very susceptible; but the head of the one and the yearnings of the other are not based on such light and discreditable grounds as many have supposed.

THE NAPOLEON BUGBEAR.

Kossuth has made another of his wonderful speeches to the people of Manchester. His subject was the war in Italy. He has professed that he highly approved their neutrality, because it was the best thing for England; but for his part he heartily sympathized with France and Sardinia. Perhaps, said he, Napoleon may have other designs to which the liberation of Italy is only a prelude. But his (Kossuth's) opinion was nothing, as he was not in the Emperor's confidence. But one thing he could say, namely, that if Italy, having regained her independence through French aid, became subject to France as she is subject to Austria, it would be her own fault. Italy has also learnt that whatever Napoleon's secret wish may be, the visions of conquest inspired to him could only lead him to another St. Helena: his interest clearly lies the other way.

It will be very curious to watch what effect these weighty truths will have on the mind of the British public. John Bull is so obstinate a fellow, as a general rule, that unless years of suffering and prodigious punishment be visited on him of his prejudices when once rooted. In cost England nearly twenty years of war, forty years of deferred reforms, and over fifteen hundred millions of dollars, to learn that it was ridiculous on her part to go to war to keep Continental despots on their thrones. We must now see whether the anti-Napoleonic prejudice, which seems to have killed upon at least a portion of the British people, will require as severe a treatment for its cure.

A most pitiable spectacle to all admirers of great intellectual power is the present state of Dr. Lang in these days. He will hardly struggle to escape the merited penalty for its stupid blunder, during about the Russian treaty! How it distorts facts and falsifies history to make a case for the Austrians! With what cousummate malevolence does it continue to misrepresent Napoleon and his army!

Thus we learn from that "leading journal of England" that the peasantry of Lombardy are the best friends of Austria, and that the latter lives to save the Austrian soldiers from drowning after the battle of Solferino. Cyclist troops, who stripped Vercelli, Novara, and Magenta cities of every thing portable, and bastinadoed the magistrates where the would not pay, behaved with the utmost gentleness; that Austrian officers, many of whom have become infamous for their cruelty to the unarmed people of Venice and presz chevalier; that the war has been got up by a few lawyers of Turin, who want to make a name for themselves; that the battle of Magenta, in which 5000 French threshed 15,000 Austrians, reflects no credit on the French, that Napoleon, who has just offered the Duke, or $500,000,000 in money to carry on the war, is bankrupt; and so on to the end of the chapter.

It will be curious to watch how long the British will be content with such disingenuous balderdash. It is not, we believe, Napoleon's late jealousy of every thing French in England, as there is of every thing English in France, that has misled the public mind, but the disposition to be more friendly to the Hapsburgs than to the Bonapartes; between the two it is possible that such ingenuous old shakers as the Leeds Times may contrive to drive England into war from the mere side of despotism, cruelty, oppression, and wrong. Such an event would be shocking to all but the gloomy philosophers who are always preaching about the perversity of mankind. But more unlikely things have happened.

GINSENG.

A VERY remarkable piece of intelligence reaches us from China. The Chinese villages are deserted by their people, who have flocked to the woods to seek—not for gold, but for a little root called ginseng.

This root is the most popular medicine in China. The Chinese doctors have written whole libraries, we are told, to prove that it will cure all diseases, from a headache to a broken leg or old age. Accordingly the people of China, all the Chinese empire, are at its weight in gold: and as the plant of which it is the root—the panax quinquefolia of botanists—is only found on the mountain ranges in Tartary and in parts of our far West, then is no reason why they should not pay handsomely for it.

The export of ginseng from this country has thus far been inveiced at something under $200,000 a year; but an easy gathering, and will take measures to renew the crop. The papers of that region notice already that the export of ginseng has equaled the exchange between New York and Minnesota. It will be time, then, that it would have been a great thing for the West if the great fortunes who have gone to starve and devour each other at Pike's Peak had set out in search not of gold but of ginseng.

☞ At the request of Mr. C. H. Stanley, who has lately contributed a chess column to the Weekly, we append a list of the games played in the meeting room for it has compelled us to discontinue its publication.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PROFESSOR JAEGER AND MR. DITSON.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

A few days since I received a book entitled "The Life of North American Insects," by B. Jaeger, late Professor of Zoology, etc., in the College of Kasan. I found it to be a most interesting and very entertaining work; but imagine my surprise when, among the Colophon, I discovered my own name.

It seems that the author traveled in the Crimea in 1825, and becoming acquainted with a widow lady, named after the name of Armitage, heard a different story from the one told me concerning the Ireland and learned English lady. The story is perfectly correct in his version of the affair—not probably is so—and I am doubtless deserving of some extent of the censure implied where he speaks of "the superficial and one-sided view of things a traveler is liable to take who rapidly passes through a country and receives his impressions from only partial sources"; for I did pass somewhat rapidly through the country on my way to Circassia (in 1847), and may have occasionally received very wrong impressions. I have, however, the satisfaction of knowing that I belong to a very large class who finds imperfection to be almost a part of its nature: indeed, if Mr. Jaeger himself will consult Sir William Jones's "Supplement to Bell, Cheyne," and Higgins's "Anacalypsis," p. 534, Ed. Chron.," and Higgins's "Anacalypsis," p. 534, he will find that he has given in his new essay on geological work an erroneous impression concerning the famous "Argonautic expedition"—an error I have also committed in my "Christian Cabala." He will further carefully examine the writings of Higgins, of Faber, of Bryant, of Cheyne, of Colonel J. W. Vincent, copies of the icons in the Hindoo temples, etc., etc., he will laugh at himself, when, on turning to page 186 of Vol. I. of "Lots of North American Insects," he re-reads "how dearly we pay for the privilege of life!"

I am very glad, if my statement be false, that it evinces no ill-will toward the distinguished naturalist of the Russian Government—that it simply shows an unfortunate result produced by Catherine II's unaccommodating climate. I am glad Mr. Jaeger does not grieve, however, that I was wrong. Indeed, his own words go to sustain me; for he says that "if, for the death of the Emperor, Pallas sold a great portion of the estates she had given him, and returned to his native place." Now, if he continued my information respecting Pallas's exile I do not now remember, but probably from a Russian, or other Georgian, officer with whom I was travelling, and who was himself (so he told me) returning to his home in Pallas, after a ten years' exile—from this it seems that I suppose Pallas suffered.

Hoping that Professor Jaeger will receive the above remarks with the same friendly feeling that dictates them, and that he will live many years to give us other valuable work, such as is in his love of the natural sciences, and with his eminent abilities he is so capable of producing, I have the honor to subscribe myself, his most obedient humble servant,

H. L. DUTCHER.

MANSION HOUSE, BROOKLYN, May 30.

THE LOUNGER.

BOMBA.

SOME few years since, when our lounging was along the Chiaja in Naples, a murmur ran through the street, and our interpreter, and all the vetturini, with one start, driven by a man, who looked like a bandit, lead-ish hat, and followed by two grooms on horseback, rapidly approached. Every body stopped and turned, most of the vetturini bowed, but nobody—not even we thought God bless you! The big-faced man drove on without taking the least notice of the crowd or of the salute.

It was a booby—a despot—a tyrant—a Bourbon—the King Bomba of Naples.

Ten years ago there would have been thirteen thousand political prisoners in his dominions, treated with every conceivable barbarism. But the days of modern times has been so detested, or so resembled the mean tyrants of history. And this King literally rotted to death.

It is terrible to think of. The torments he had caused others were remembered against himself. Neither the blood of Jansurius, nor a lions whom the Pope sent, could avail against a mortal and loathsome disease. Probably not a man in the world wanted him to live, for any love it bore him. Probably several thousands would have rejoiced in the thought of every pang that rent him. His Queen was busy intriguing for her son against her husband's dead bier. He died: like world to well rid of him. May God show him the mercy he denied to other men!

If the result of the war shall only be a united Italy—an Italy which secures to the lovely shores of Naples Day the same government as that of Sardinia, and surely extirpates every vestige of the terrible tyranny of the Bourbons, every lover of liberty will rejoice.

MORE CHAMPIONSHIP.

WHILE the great powers of Europe are throwing down bloody gauntlets, England and America are exchanging friendly challenges. The emulation is kindly encouragers of intellectual skill and scientific recreation. The Yankee Sullivan, indeed, lost his laurels without even fighting for them. His trust to sneer at Paul Morphy, but feared to play with him.

But now Mr. Roberts, who appears upon good authority to be more renowned as a talked player than any man who ever lived, has dispersed the commissioner [!]—such is the proper description—authorized to treat with Mr. Michael Phelan, who is our best player.

Ten thousand dollars a side, and "more if desired." That is to begin with: Mr. Roberts to have five hundred dollars for his traveling expenses from England. Each player will naturally have preferred the game usually played in his country; but they gallantly compromise upon the French three-hall game.

The commissioner has returned to England, and until nothing unforeseen occurs, the high contracting parties will play an international game of billiards some time during the next autumn.

Let us hope that the one who is beaten will not immediately challenge the victor to another game. Let it be understood that either one may, or one rubber, settles the question. And if any body objects to the balls, or the cushions, or the table, or the cues, or has the rheumatism, let him object before he is beaten, and not after.

TALK OF KOSSUTH AND THE WAR.

WITH a steamer every three days, and the constant expectation of a great battle, of course the war is the chief topic of the moment.

Kossuth has made a speech at the London Tavern, which is very interesting as showing the view taken by an enthusiastic liberal leader of the chances and conduct of the struggle. His view was considered important enough by the London Times to be considered and combated in a long article. And the article is a singular illustration of the reckless ability of that paper. It deliberately disfigures the well-known fundamental political theory of Kossuth, and insists that in his view the war is "sentimental and geographical." It asserts that, according to Kossuth, "it is absolutely necessary, in the nature of things, that the country south of the plain of Lombardy should by the presence of a people speaking a language with many consonants and few vowels, a people that it has been reserved by the express order of Providence for a nation speaking a language in which vowels greatly predominate."

This is puerile and not powerful ridicule. It is the traditional trick of the journal which it calls "political sentimentalism." The Times says that Kossuth has no wish to lighten any burden that rests upon the Italian people, but that all he wants is merely wishes to restore the vowels.

Now Kossuth's theory is simple and very simple. A great state, he insists, can only exist by the natural cohesion of nationality. That is to say, its limits must coincide with those of nationality. In proof of this he points to every great living nation but one. That one is Austria. Austria has no nationality—that is, a community of race, language, and history—except one, and that is Austria, which is the result of the union of many of different nationalities, without the slightest inward or natural cohesion, and only held together by the most brutal despotism.

As the treaties of Vienna recognized this anomaly, Austria has a right to exist. Still, upon just national grounds, no more right in Italy than the last by Turin, Milan, Venice, and Naples. To do this effectually she ought to be driven within her own borders, and there, as a political element, destroyed. But the only power in Europe which is the reason that induces other Governments to prevent it. That power is more than maintained by the states that would spring out of her several nationalities. The object of the war, therefore, ought to be to shield humiliation of Austria.

The question what would be the guarantee of England against Austria in case the power and pride of the Austrians is answered in what Kossuth says of the balance of power, "which would be merely changed in its aspect.

Against this timely and vigorous and eloquent statement the Times has only a sneering cry to oppose but ridicule. Its sole argument is a laugh at Kossuth for believing in the good sense of Louis Napoleon; proving that Austria is still and Austria would be the ruin of England.

Now Louis Napoleon is not likely to become a saint immediately; but no man is shrewder than he. His object is to confirm his seat—not to humiliate England. The London Times seems to think that the ultimate end of Louis Napoleon is the conquest of Italy. But such an experience and common sense knows perfectly well that the time for great military conquests is passed. Kossuth's love of liberty, however, is not pure, prevents such conquests. They belonged to the plans of the great princes because he hastened to the last age. In spirit he was a son of the Middle Ages, and not of the nineteenth century. But Louis Napoleon is a thoroughly modern and profoundly ambitious, has proved that he is not a child. He has not been very long. For each of them must see that there is no other possible end to the war—that the Austrians must be driven from the peninsula, which is, virtually, her reduction to a second-rate power—and yet they remain neutral.

FROM THE PROVINCES.

PLENTY of fun has been poked at some noted gentlemen in Boston for having given a dinner to Lola Montez, and at such they are not afraid, and such a great many good things. The persons implicated in this "dreadful affair" have been "set off" when they have been called "modern Athenians," "Boston wits," or "mutual admirers." This style of the merry-andrew is a dangerous attitude to have strong offenders over the wire.

There have been a few words used—so that if the objection were justly taken that the Boston occasion and the performances were disproportionate, or, as it is called fairly enough, that the performances were not less suited to the occasion than the occasion to the performances.

If the cannoneer laugh to see the solemnity and length of tongue with which the chameleon devours a fly, what business has the cannon to be solemn about the cannoneer who brings out his seventy-two pounder for a chameleon?

If we look into the matter a little, it may not be so very clear that the Boston banquet was so extravagantly ridiculous. It was the unfortunate fate of Boston, just now, to contain an exceedingly clever set of literary and other people-noted men. They are no less genial, it seems, than they are accomplished. By comes another clever fellow—no clever, indeed, as they, but yet so clever that his name is familiar, and his peculiar successes are remembered, and he is an eminent intellectual pre-eminence among all games.

Thereupon the Boston people say, "Let us give him a dinner, and eat and be merry. We'll have good things to eat, good wine to drink, good tobacco to smoke; and if any body, old or young, legal or clerical or Presidential or Senatorial or Professorial, or stride of any kind, can say or sing something eloquent, or graceful, or gay, it shall be no shame to him and no harm to us."

So they had their dinner, and their speeches, and songs. But the droll part is, that while these Boston people at the feast enjoyed it exceedingly, those who were not seem to have had no enjoyment of it at all. They are not content with themselves that they are ready to swear that the chief men at the dinner like each other; that they admire each other's humor and genius; that they see the point of each other's jokes; that they acknowledge each other's eloquence, and don't give themselves up to bitterness and envy because their friends are clever as well as themselves.

And after all, if Agassiz will persist in being one of the most eminent living savans—if Emerson will be a poet—if Longfellow will be a poet—if Peirce will be our great mathematician—if Everett can't write anything but the most graceful, lucid and famous orators—if Longfellow and Lowell will be counted in among our chief poets—if the Lowells, and Sumners, and Sears and Ticknors will be, and other men who happen to live in Boston will be scholars and orators and authors of reputation, what shall we do about it?

Because one of them, in an exuberant gush of spirits, calls Boston the hub of the universe, why should we, who are mere outside spokes, get hot? I have an idea that Boston is a very good hub.

One is, to call New York the metropolis of America. That gives great consolation to the patient. The other is, to assume that Poe called Boston "Frogpondia," which is also very soothing to localized feelings.

We have read carefully the published offenses of these provincial persons, which have sometimes startled the quiet of the metropolis from the shores of their congenial Frogpond, but upon no page of Agassiz's introduction to the Natural History of America, nor in any book of Emerson's, or any poem of Longfellow's or Lowell's, or any history of Prescott's, or Motley's, or any volume of Hawthorne's, or any essay of Whipple's, or plea of Dana, or speech of Sumner's, have we detected any reasonable insinuation against the majesty of the metropolis. They do not malign living, or Bryant, or Halleck, or Irving, or Cheyne, or any one in eminent in his calling.

To be sure they will have an occasional good dinner, as in the present instance, and they will not confine themselves to platitudes afterward. Even a dinner party will sometimes be pressed —even a mathematician will not be insufferable—even a college professor will become quite human—and scholars and clergymen sparkle and shine.

But the occasion!

Yes—that is. The occasion. If it had only been the meeting of somebody who had done only how many thousands a year for not speaking the language of the country in which he lived, and misgovernment of the country by some fools—if it had only been some military chieftain—somebody who had always voted with his party through thick and thin—some General William Walker—then guns and trumpets and colonial banners would have been in order—then you might give a dinner and welcome!

But for a company of clever men to dine a clever man, and say clever things at table, simply because they choose to enjoy themselves, pah! it is a low, grovelling, envious, and self-abasing to a perfectly metropolitan degree.

THE ART OF SELF-DEFENSE.

PUBLIC men and institutions of every kind, as well as all great enterprises of commerce and trade, are necessarily subject to the severest criticism, both public and private. Many a man and many bodies of men are seriously compromised —to do when attacks are made upon them; —there is happily one very simple thing which should always be observed under circumstances. That is—nothing.

The appeal to the public is useless, for the public cares nothing about the difficulty, and will not inform itself correctly. A man who rushes into print upon personal provocation is a man who perpetually writes himself down an ass. He unknows his wrong to a confidant who desires him for his confidence.

Every editor and publisher of every book or periodical receives daily letters of angry and disagreeable character, and every one of them is the answer of complaint; letters of advice; letters of remonstrance; letters of correction, and so on. I mentioned two or three weeks ago, letters of abuse, chiefly anonymous.

If the editor of a daily publication will notices, explanations, and defenses of all these things, the public would forget it in half a day, and stop the paper. The public would justly say, We don't want to hear about your private affairs. Do, then, publish the trash your friends write to you.

So, when any business is conducted according to a thoughtful principle, it is the worst and the wisest way to let the markers or to snarl back again. Success is always a mean for scores of dogs to bay at. Let the successful man rival his temper of the angels, and remain calm and superior.

The measure simply, whether direct or indirect—whether in the shape of insinuated ridicule, or solemn cavil, or open denunciation—is asserted from one man, or newspaper, or publication. The answer or abuse or misrepresentation of another, there is one first and final impression which is made by the whole attack, namely, "I must rest that other article, because this reply is evidently the sudden result of being touched on the raw." The reply, in fact, is accepted as proof in full that the attack had a sting of truth in it.

Any extreme impersensitivity of a paper or periodical, for instance—that steady pursuit of its own course which is the surest answer to attack by the way—disdaining to account for itself to any contemporary, either by defending its course or by retorting, never for ease, is the highest method it can propose to itself.

The reason is, that every business, like every man, is really judged by what it is, not what it professes. How many novels are published every week which are announced as the greatest works of the age, and which, for that very reason, are known to be almost worthless by every body who reads the advertisement! Wares are pulled in pieces by their worthlessness. And every attack upon a neighbor is an indirect puffing of one's self, which is perceived directly, and returns to plague the puffer.

Pure puffery rarely succeeds. Barnum was called a humbug; but Barnum puts on Jenny Lind. So a paper is said to be advertised into a large circulation; but if the purchasers whom the advertisements lead to buy the paper are not satisfied with their purchase, all the columns of all the papers in the country swarming with advertisements will not persuade them to buy another copy.

Success is the fame and light. There is plenty for all aspirants. A man may go into the market with hemp or molasses, and sell a better article than his neighbor, or the same article upon more favorable terms, he will hardly fail to build up a business. It is in vain that other dealers ridicule his manners. He is in vain that they run him and try, and they are the final judges. Certainly that should be true. But there is a small consideration if he should begin to sneer in turn.

So with books and periodicals. A new one appears to claim public favor. It has to do with that favor by saying that it is the best of all, and that its contemporaries are rag-tags and rubbish. That may convict itself of envy, but it will hardly prove the inferiority of the other. What the public want of the Jonathan Corinne is not its opinions of the Smithin Transport: it wants a fulfillment of its promise to be an agreeable literary companion. People don't care to pay three dollars a year to hear that Home of the Cherries thinks Smith of the Transport an ass.

MANIACS IN RAILWAY CARS.

SEVERAL months since, as a quiet Lounger was taking his seat in the morning express train for Boston, he observed a man, whose peculiarly watched a little in front of him, but thought nothing of it, and went to sleep. Just when the woman became very much excited, began to talk, and in a loud, piercing, distinct voice, full of repressed fury, threw herself upon the gentleman of whom, et seen in the car, asserting that she was being carried away against her will. The gentleman tried to pacify her, but in vain; and she rose from her seat, and moving through the car, addressed any body who for any reason happened to pass her, of whose appearance promised succor. Her voice was of remarkable power, her appearance sufficiently showed her insanity, and every body was glad when the train reached Hartford.

But a later and more startling case has come to our knowledge. Upon the same train a maniac was carried from New Haven, who threw off a cloak one of his keepers and hit a piece out of his throat—almost free from the car in which they tried to confine him—threw himself down upon the rails of the car, and created profound terror among all the passengers, who left the train as soon as they could at the way to Hartford.

Railway travel has been thought a little dangerous hitherto, but if we add to the list of horrors that are known the nuisance chances of travelling in the same cars with maniacs, and sensitive wives and children to travel in them also, the rates of life-insurance will probably rise.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—S. E. P. C., Troy, New York. If a merchant wished to have his store kept in order by day during the month of May last, he ought not to say, "I have been in business," for that is not the reason why a thing is to convey that it is finished; or that you have been in a place, that you are there no longer.

—GET, New York. Charles Dickens lives in London. Formerly, and for many years, his residence was in Devonshire terrace, formerly called one of the Tavistock House. Frank Stone, the painter, and Maxiini were both living there many years ago.

JENNY GREENWOOD, Bath, Maine, writes a most touching ditty upon "The Orphans":

"The orphan children sat there was,
Yet why they was was many a cause;
Some by poor family grief,
The mother was the sister's all."

Jenny should not write such poetry.

—M. L. S. laments the want of attention paid to celebrities and gymnasiums in general. She regrets that the arts of dressing and of cooking take precedence, in general interest, of the art of exercising; and she wisely suggests that a gymnastic system of education be established in every school. Undoubtedly, if as keen a degree of attention were given to this as is given in the country, and devoted to the scientific practice of gymnastics, the health, strength, and physical health of the country would be greatly improved.

—MISSISSIPPIAN wishes to have a picture of the "Pons Asinorum." We have not the picture, but on the other side of the river for a donkey, and he replied that he should and if he does not return, vere only a "pons asinorum," so as to bridge, over the stream. Upon which Mississippian remarks that he had made a dumb pun. So M. says that there is no such bridge in that neighborhood? Very well, then there is a large share of his country. (N. B.—In this city there are no bridges.)

—AN APPRENTICE AND CONSTANT READER partially requests us to publish a list of the principal ports of the world.

—TRUE. Philadelphia wishes to know the author of his poem.

—TOM. The French army numbers 400,000 men, of the Austrian 350,000, of Prussia 300,000, of Russia 900,000 men, of the English army 250,000 men, of the United States 18,000 regulars, 40 corvettes, and 52 smaller ones, including 12 steamers of from 1,000 to 2,000 tons. The vessels. They require a force of 1,000 to 1,200 guns: English navy has 32 first-rates, ships of 110 to 120 guns; 76 second and third rates; 126 fourth, fifth, and sixth rates, 79 sloops, 58 brigs, 22 steamships and frigates, 42 sloops, 83 gun-vessels, 2 screw schooners; making a total of 459 vessels, and about 20,000 men.

—INDO, Chicago. The population of Italy proper is about 20,000,000. Sicily, Corsica, and Malta have about 2,200,000 souls. Of these 28,000,000 Naples has about 6,000,000 souls; Sardinia, about three and a half millions and a half; Sardinia, about three and a third; Lombardy, about a quarter; Tuscany, nearly two; and the Roman States, nearly 3,000,000.

THE FRENCH ARMY MARCHING THROUGH A SARDINIAN FORTIFIED PLACE TOWARD THE AUSTRIAN LINES.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

We give herewith a fine engraving of the march of a French corps d'armée past one of the great fortresses in Sardinia. It will be noticed that the grateful Italians have strewed flowers on the path of the troops, and are displaying great delight at their presence. We also give a picture of Francis Joseph, the Emperor of Austria, and his leading Generals.

Brief biographical sketches of the Emperor and General Gyulai, comprising all that is known of them, will be found in Nos. 125 and 126 respectively of this journal. The other prominent Austrian generals, Hess, Benedek, and Hebel, may be rapidly disposed of.

THE EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA AND HIS GENERALS.

General Hess is usually reported to be Austria's best soldier—now that Radetzky is dead. It was, indeed, mainly to the vigor and skill with which Hess, as the chief of Radetzky's staff, carried out the plans for the reduction of Italy in 1848 that the latter owed his reputation. General Hess is a German, having been born at Vienna in 1788. At the age of seventeen he was placed in the army, and is said to have fought bravely throughout the Napoleonic wars. When Napoleon was sent to Elba, Hess, whose interest at Court was good, obtained an office in the War Department with the rank of major. He subsequently served as lieutenant-colonel for a year or two; and in 1820 obtained his full colonelcy, and was sent to Lombardy. There he won credit by his skill and soldierly qualities, and rose gradually to the rank of Field-Marshal, which he obtained in 1842. Since then his active services have been confined to Italy. Unlike most of the Austrian generals, he is well spoken of even by foreigners. He is said to have blamed General Gyulai bitterly for his movement on the Tchiese.

General Benedek is also a soldier of high repute. He was a cavalry officer, who entered the army thirty-seven years ago, and fought his way—over the bodies of his recalled fellow-citizens, by-the-way, for he has seen no foreign service—to the rank of General. In Galicia and Italy he fought with distinguished valor. He was at the taking of Novara in 1849, and did not leave a very pleasant memory among the Italians.

General Heinl is another prominent Austrian officer, of whom we may hear presently. He was a colonel in 1848, and fought in Italy. Rumor says that he has an objection to keeping prisoners of war, and that having taken a number of patriots at Trent, he had them shot in the presence of the fortress. But, after all, war is a sorry business at best. Did not the English hang Tantia Topee, and take down the Hindoo rebels? The Austrian officers are of this stamp they must expect little sympathy here.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XXXI.

DOG-DAYS.

The great city roared and steamed and smoked. Along the hot, glaring streets by the river a few yawning grocers hurried about, hoping the house wall for a thin strip of shade, too narrow even to cover their feet. All the windows of the stores were open, and within the offices men were thinking and writing, with a little turn of the pen and a tossing in ink magically warding off impending disaster or adding thousands to the thousands accumulated already—men, too, were writing without thinking—mechanically copying or posting, scribbling letters of form, with hands clear or hands aching, with hearts burning or cold; full of ambition and hope, or vaguely remembering country hill-sides and summer rambles—day's toiling—night's frolic—Sunday-school—singing-school, and the girl with the chip hat garlanded with sweetbriar: hearts longing and loving, regretting, hoping, and remembering, and all the while the hero above them calm and smooth, and the hands below them busily doing their part of the great work of the world.

WHAT ANY WARDEN WAS DOING IN TOWN.

In Wall street the war vexes and rests running about. Men in white clothes and straw hats darted in at doors, darted out of doors—carrying little books and rolls of bank-bills in their hands, nodding to each other as they passed, but all infected with the same fever. Pale faces with faces, and a general rushing and hurrying as if every body were haunted by the fear of arriving too late every where and losing all possible chances in every direction.

Within doors there were cool bank-parlors and insurance offices, with long rows of comely clerks writing in those dozes—or perched high on office-stools eating apples—while Presidents and Directors, with shiny bald pates and bewigged heads, some heroically with permanent spectacles and others coyly and weakly with eye-glasses held in the hand, sat perusing the papers, telling the news, and gossiping about engagements and marriages, and family reunions and secrets with the air or practical men of the world, with no nonsense, no fanaticism, no fiddle-de-dee of any kind about them, but who profoundly believed the Bible theory that wives and daughters were a more sacred kind of property than sheep-pastures, or even than the most satisfactory bond and mortgage.

They talked politics, these banking and insurance gentlemen, with vigor and warmth. "What on earth does this General Jackson mean, Sir? Is he going to lay the axe at the very roots of our national prosperity? What the deuce does a frontier soldier know about banking?"

They talked about Morgan, who had been found in Lake Ontario; and the younger clerks took their turn at it, and furiously denied among themselves that Washington was a Mason. The younger clerks held every Mason responsible for the reported murder. Then they turned pale lest their neighbors were Masons, and might cause them to be found drowned off the Battery. The older men shook their heads.

Murders—did you speak of murders, Mr. Van Boozenger? Why, this is a dreadful business in Salem! Old Mr. White murdered in his bed! The most awful thing on record. Terrible stories are told, Sir, about respectable people! What are we coming to? Mr. Daniel Webster is going to speak against the prisoner. What can you expect, Sir, with Fanny Wright disseminating her infidel sentiments, and the Rev. Orestes Brownson's The Friend of Man was Jephtes? Equal human fiddlesticks, Mr. Van Boozenger!

To all which from the mouths of many Directors that eminent officer nodded his head, and looked as if what it was very well acknowledged so many foolish transactions took place under his administration.

And so writing in large books and little books, and counting, and paying out, and receiving, and grumbling, and gossiping, and making sapless and dismally foreboding, the people in the offices stood in the shimmering sidewalk of Wall Street did their share of the world's work.

And in all the streets of the great city, in all the lofty work-shops and yards and factories, huge hammers smote and clashed, and men, naked to the waist, rocking in dingy interiors, bent like gnomes at their tasks, while saws creaked, shrieked, paused and mutilated; while chisels shoved and cut and struck; and down in damp cellars tallow ghastly men and women drew rope-yarns and twisted and twisted in the midst of litters of puny, pale children, with bleared eyes and sore heads and dirty faces, tumbling, playing, shouting, whimpering—a temporary fever the pigs that came rooting and nosing in the liquid filth that simmered and stank to heaven in the gutters at the top of the steps; and the houses above the haunts of the ghastly men and women were swarming rookeries, hot and close and bare, with windowpanes broken, and hats and coats and cloths stuffed in, and men with bloodshot eyes and desperate faces sitting dogged with their hair on, staring at nothing, or leaning on their ragged elbows on broken tables, scowling from between their dirty hands at the world and the future; while in higher rooms sat solitary girls at their wooden chairs, a pile of straw covered with a rag in the corner, and a box to put a change of linen in, driving the needle silently and ceaselessly through shirts or coats or trousers, stooping over in the foul air during the heat of the day, straining their eyes when the day darkened to save a candle, hearing the roar and the rush and the murmur far away, mingled in the distances, as if they were dead and buried in their graves, and dreaming a horrid dream until the resurrection.

Only sometimes an acute withering pain, as of touching or somebody were sewing the sewer, and pierced her with a needle sharp and burning, made the room swim and the straw in the darkness glimmer; and the girl dropped the work and closed her eyes—the cheeks were black and hollow beneath them—and the gasped and panted, and leaned back, while the rear went on, and the hot sun glared, and the neighboring church clock, striking the hour, seemed to beat on her heart as it smote relentlessly the girl's returning consciousness. Then she took up the work again, and the needle, with whose little point in pain and sickness and consuming solitude, in darkness, desolation, and flickering, fainting faith, she pricked back death and dishonor.

And neighboring repairs were the reefs upon which human health, hope, and happiness lay stranded, broken-up and gone to pieces. Blood-red faces glowered through the open door—their humanity sunk away into mere bestiality. Human forms—seen no longer—lay on benches, hung over chairs, babbled, maundered, shrieked or wept aloud; while women came in and took black bottles from under tattered shawls, and said nothing, but put down a piece of money, and the man behind the counter said nothing, but took the money and filled the bottles, which were hidden under the tattered shawls again, and the speechless phantoms glided out, guarding that little travesty of modesty even in their wild ruin.

In shops beyond, yards of tape and papers of pins, and boots and shoes and bread, and all the multitudinous things that are bought and sold every minute, were being done up in papers by complaisant, or surly, or conscious, or well-behaved clerks; and in all the large and little houses of the city, in all the spacious and narrow streets, there were women cooking, washing, sweeping, scouring, rubbing, lifting, carrying, sewing, reading, sleeping—tens and twenties and fifties and hundreds and thousands of men, women, and children. More than two hundred thousand of them in all were toiling, suffering, struggling, enjoying, dreaming, despairing on a summer day, doing their share of the world's work. The eye was full of the city's activity, the ear was tired with its noise, the heart was sick with the thought of it, the streets and houses swarmed with people, but the world was out of town. There was nobody at home.

In the mighty stream, of which men and women are the waves that poured ceaselessly along its channels, friends met surprised—touched each other's hands.

"Came in this morning—off to-night—droll it looks—nobody in town."

And the tumultuous throng bore them apart. In the evening the Park Theatre is jammed to hear Mr. Forrest, who made his first appearance in Philadelphia nine or ten years ago, and is already a New York favorite. Contoit's garden flutters with the cool dresses of the promenaders, who move about between the arbors looking for friends and awaiting ices. The click of billiard balls is heard in the glittering cafe at the corner of Reade Street, and a gay company smokes and sips at the Washington Hotel. Life burns with fever every where from every window, but there is nobody in town. Only more than two hundred thousand men, women, and children go to their beds and wake up to the morrow, but there is nobody in town.

Nobody in town, because Mr. Boniface Newt & Co. have gone to Saratoga—to cathedral left, because some plasterer, too tumbled off an upper stone—to forest left, because a fair lawyer and whirled away.

Nobody in town, because Mrs. Boniface Newt & Co. have gone to Saratoga, and are doing their part of the fashionable week.

Such was substantially Lawrence Newt's reverie as he sat by the window in his office on one of those hot summer days, looking out upon the shipping in the river, and the oily gleam of the water as the ripple rose. The reflection of the white sails glimmered down into the depths, quite out of sight. So over the surface of his mind, as it roamed to him, as hushed as that water, faces and forms, and even thoughts and fancies, floated, half-distinct, and tremulously faded away.

Such also was Amy Waring's reflection, except that to no young woman could know that men ever gossiped in their offices.

All the way that the sad sun saw that day she, too, had seen; and at this very moment she was putting on the lightest of shawls and the airiest of bonnets, and tilting a little basket with tea and sugar, and the nameless small articles, which no woman instinctively selects for another who is in want then. Amy Waring slipped into the street, and turned her steps down town.

CHAPTER XXXII.

OUTSIDE AND IN.

It is a full costume of white duck, crowned by a jaunty Panama hat, with a light blue ribbon, light cut of amber sticks, languidly puffing a full-blazing cigar. Havana, and consequently as of his soul were tried—behold Mr. Zephyr Wetherley.

He was going down street, and Amy, walking more rapidly, overtook him. As she saw him she was conscious of a painful sympathy with him, because it seemed to her that it must be forever tortured with the harassing self-inquiry, "What on earth am I created for?"

His very air of fatigue appeared to her to be the unconscious result of the eternally baffled effort to solve that problem.

In a great city, rocking with opportunities of action—swarming with an infinite variety of questions to be answered, which any man could answer—and wants which every man could fulfill—of misery that nobody was so poor he could not succor, either with actual material assistance or with sympathy and advice—of work, work of dark deeds just outside the sunny streets where the coming of a kindly human face was like the stealing in of sunshine—in the midst of endless opportunities of interest, excitement, and employment, Mr. Zephyr Wetherley, young, well, comfortable in purse, fortunate in position, was sauntering in the sunshine, perishing of ennui, longing for a sensation, nervous about a wrinkle in his trousers or a stain upon his glove, sweating at the heat, and the dust, and the smells, afraid he should have no appetite for dinner, utterly listless, good-humored, and forlorn, and, so far as the finite mind could discover, of no conceivable use to any body or thing in the universe.

It made Amy Waring a great deal warmer to see that slouching costume of cool white duck wearily drifting before her. She felt so deeply Zephyr Wetherley's probable consciousness of his ridiculous and melancholy position that she wanted to pass him by without allowing him to see that she had observed him, as a well-bred woman hastens by a gentleman who has lost his temper and is swearing at his groom or grumbling at his wife—with an apparent profound unconsciousness of the gentleman's presence.

AUNT MARTHA.

But when, by the collision of Alfred Dinks and Bowdoin Beacon, who joined him from another street, Mr. Zephyr Wetherley was suddenly plied by three, Amy Warring's feeling became almost ludicrous.

There was an immense explosion of adjectives expressing surprise when the three young gentlemen discovered that the young lady who was passing them was Miss Amy Waring.

"Why, Miss Waring!" cried they, simultaneously.

She bowed and smiled. They lifted their hats.

"You in town?" said Mr. Beacon.

"In town?" echoed Mr. Dinks.

"Town?" muttered Mr. Wetherley.

"Town," said Miss Waring, with her eyes sparkling.

"Where did you come from? I thought you were all at Saratoga," she continued.

"It's stupid there," said Mr. Beacon.

"Quite stupid," echoed Mr. Dinks.

"Stupid," murmured Mr. Wetherley.

"Stupid?" asked the lady, this time making the interrogation in the anti-strophe of the chant.

"We mustn't call them so."

"A little fun."

"Fun," replied the gentlemen.

"Well, I'm going about my business," said she. "Good-morning."

"About your business?"

"Your business!"

Unanimous murmured the youths, in order, Zephyr concluding.

"Business!" said Miss Amy, bursting into a little laugh, in which the listless, perfectly good-humored youths cheerfully joined.

"It's dreadful," said Mr. Beacon.

"Oh! horrid!" said Mr. Dinks.

"Very," said Zephyr. And the gentlemen wiped their foreheads.

"Coming to Saratoga, Miss Waring?" they asked.

"Hardly, I think, but possibly," said she, and moved away, with her little basket, while the gentlemen, swarming on the bench, sat down and the smells, unnatured on, asseverated that Amy Waring was an idol of grit, and finally went to look at the Washington Hotel, where each lolled back in an arm-chair, with the white dust legs reposing in unaccustomed exposition. Dinks, who poised his boots upon one of the window-sills that commanded the office—a position accounted with a cigar in the mouth, and a glass of iced port-wine sangaree in the hand—told the many young gentlemen that through the hot hours until dinner.

Amy Waring walked quite as rapidly as the best would permit. She crossed the Park, and striking into Fulton Street, continued her course to the river, but turned into Front Street. The old peach women at the corners, sitting under huge cotton umbrellas and surrounded by the heat, saw the lovely face going by, and marked the peculiarly correct step, which the silence in the streets, and consequent sharp students of faces and feet, easily enough recognize as the step of one who is bound upon some especial errand. Clerks looked idly at her from open shop doors, and from window-sills; and when she entered the marine region of Front Street, the heavy stores and large houses, which here and there were covered with a sort of awning, as if the squalor which had receded through the dingy side streets, seemed to have met at last unkindly, and sullenly ask why youth and beauty and cleanly modesty should insult with sweet contrast that sordid gloom.

The heat only made it worse. The houses looked dogged and desperate with it. Half-naked children played in the foul gutters with the pigs, which resumed freely at large, and comfortably at home in the putrid mud and slime and the quarter of poverty. Carts jostled by with hogsheads and boxes, and the drivers, with red-faced carmen, furious with their horses, or smoking pipes whose odor did not sweeten the air, starved with thirst, carrier-eyes, at the last making her way among the casks and bales upon the sidewalk. There was another, that would possibly cheer the eye or ear, or heart or imagination, in any part of the street—not even the haggard faces with vast, red eyes, and the air of leprosy, and dull with drink, that listlessly looked down upon her from the windows of lodging-houses.

The door of one of these was open, and Amy Waring went in. She passed rapidly through the desolate entry and up the dirty stairs with the broken railing—stairs that reeked and made her light step. At a room upon the back of the house, in the third story, she stopped and tapped at the door. A voice cried, "Come in there!" The girl answered, "Amy," and the door was instantly unbolted.

The room was clean. There was a rag-carpet on the floor; a pine bureau nearly varnished; a bed without a curtain but whole chairs; a bedstead, upon which the bedding was scrupulously neat; a pine table, upon which stood a small thumbed leather-bound family Bible and a few religious books; and between the windows over the bureau hung a common engraving of the Christ upon the Cross. The windows themselves looked upon the back of the house on South Street. Upon the floor was a large basket full of work, with which the occupant of the room was evidently engaged. The whole room had an air of severity and cheerlessness, yet it was clear that every thing was most carefully arranged and continually swept and washed and dusted.

The person who had opened the door was a woman of nearly forty. She was dressed in a tidy but not much as a single spot of white any where about her. She had even a black silk handkerchief twisted about her head in the way that negro women twine gay cloths, and such was her expression that it seemed as if her face, and her heart, and her soul and all that she felt, or hoped, or remembered, or thought, were all clothed and dyed in the same mourning garments and utter gloom.

"Good-morning, Amy," said she, in a hard, dry, but not unkind voice. In fact, the rigidity of her aspect, the hardness of her voice, and the singular blackness of her garments seemed to be to monotonously uniform and resolute not to indicate something willful and forced. It was a woman's uniform, as if the whole had been rather superintended than naturally developed.

"Aunt Martha, I have brought you some things that I hope you will find comforting and agreeable."

The young woman glanced around the desolately regular and forbidding room, and sighed. She placed the basket and stepped to a closet, but paused as she opened it, and turned to Amy, and said, in the same dry, hopeless manner:

"See the weakness of the flesh! This bounty is not needed, nor is sinful; and I will look the unpardonable sin for so great a sinner to receive her own."

The solemn woman put the contents of the basket into the closet; but it seemed as if, in that gloom, the sugar must turn to bitterness, the sweetness and the tea its flavor.

Amy still glanced round the room, and her eyes filled with tears.

"Dear Aunt Martha, when may I tell?" she said, with gentle entreaty.

"Amy, would you thwart God? He is too merciful always. I almost fear that you underrate our sympathy and kindness in a sore offense in me. Think what a worm I am! How utterly lost and helpless in sin!"

She spoke with clasped hands lying before her in her lap, in the same hard tone as the words were cut in ebony, with the same fixed lips: the same pale, unsmiling severity of face, and yet with the abundant hair, streaked with early gray, was almost entirely lost in the black handkerchief.

"But surely God is good!" said Amy, tenderly and sadly. "If we sin, He only asks us to repent and be forgiven."

"But we must pay the penalty, Amy," said the other. "There is a price for every deed on earth; and mine is so vast, so enormous—"

She paused a moment, as if overwhelmed in the contemplation of it, and then, in a lower tone, she continued: "You, Amy, can not even conceive how dreadful it is. You know what it is not how bad it is."

She was silent again, and her soul appeared to sink itself in sheer abyss. Amy felt that the room seemed to Amy sinking. The next moment the girl saw her own pierced with sharp spears of ice. She sprang up.

"I shall smother!" said she; and opened the window.

"Aunt Martha, I begin to feel that this is really wicked. If you only knew Lawrence Nest—"

The elder woman raised one thin finger, almost lifting the whole hand, as if to bid her enough. Amy stopped.

"Amy—child—girl. The mention of that name is another blow. I bend to the rod."

Implacable darkness seemed to Amy to be settling upon her face.

"At least, nun, let me have you moved to some less heated room."

"Foulness and filth are too sweet and fair for me," said the dark woman; "and I have been long used to them."

She lifted the work and began to sew. Amy's heart ached, as she looked upon the poor woman's toy for her suffering and a sense of inability to help her.

There came a violent knock at the door.

"Who's there?" asked Aunt Martha, calmly.

"Come, come, open the door, you crazy one! what's going on!" cried a loud, coarse voice.

"Who is it?"

"Who is it? Why, it's me—Joseph!" replied the voice.

Aunt Martha rose and unlocked the door. A man whose face was like his voice bustled noisily into the room, with a cigar in his mouth and his hat on.

"Come, come; where's that work? Time's up! Quick, quick, or you'll get it over!"

"It is not quite done, Mr. Joseph."

The man stared at Aunt Martha for a moment, then laughed in a coarse way.

"Old lady Black, when you findertake to do a piece of work she's mean by not having it done? Danat it, there's a little too much of the lady about you! Show me that work!" and he seized hastily upon it.

The woman brought the basket to him, in the bottom of which several pieces were concealed and carefully folded. The man turned them over rapidly.

"And why, in the devil's name, haven't you done the rest? Give 'em here!"

He took the whole, pinched and unfinished, and bundling them up under for the door. "No time, no pay, old lady; that's the rule. That's the only way to work such inferually jimmy old bodies as you!"

The surprised woman remained perfectly passive. Amy stood upon passing out; but Amy became surprising forced back from the door.

"Stop, Joseph," said she, firmly. The man involuntarily turned, and each was his overwhelming surprise at seeing a lady suddenly standing before him, and a lady who spoke with perfect authority, that, with the obsequiousness instinctive in every man who depends upon the favor of customers, he took off his hat.

"If you take that work without paying for it you shall be made to pay," said Amy, quietly, her eyes flashing, and her figure firm and erect.

The man hesitated for a moment.

"Oh, yes, ma'am, oh, certainly, ma'am! Pay for it, of course, ma'am! 'Twas only to frighten the woman, ma'am, oh, certainly—certainly—Yes, ma'am, pay for it, of course."

"At once," said Amy, without moving.

"Why, certainly, ma'am; here's the money," and Mr. Joseph counted it out upon the pine table.

"And you'd better leave the rest to be done at once."

"I'll do so, ma'am," said the man, putting down the bundle.

"And remember that if you ever harm this woman by a word or look, you'll find Amy Waring's her friend toward her aunt, "you will repent it bitterly."

The man stared at her and fumbled with his hat. The cigar had dropped upon the floor. Amy pointed to it, and said, "Sir—"

The man stooped and picked up the stump, and departed. Amy felt weak. Her aunt stood by her, and said, calmly:

"It was only part of my punishment."

Amy's eyes flashed.

"Yes, aunt, if my body should break into your room and steal every thing you have in the world, and beat you, and break your old bones and leave you here to die of starvation, I suppose you would think it all part of your punishment."

"It would be no more than I deserve, Amy."

"And I tell you, Aunt Amy, if you don't take care you will force me to break my promise to you."

Amy, to do that would be to bring needless disgrace upon your mother and all her family who have been kind to you, and cared for you the last long years. They have long ago shed the bitterest of regret for one whom they had loved, but who is dead now. Why should you take her to them from the tomb, living still, but a living corpse, as she is? I am equal to my destiny. The curse is great, but I will bear it alone; and the curse of God will fall upon me if I shrink."

Amy was startled by the intensity with which these words were uttered. There was no assignment of the hands or head upon the part of the elder woman. She stood erect by the table, as before, and her expression, the gloom of her appearance seemed to intensify itself, as a thunder-cloud grows imperceptibly heavier and blacker.

When she stopped, Amy made no reply; but, trembling with emotion, she drew a chair to the window and sat down. The other woman took up her work again. Amy was silently thinking, wondering what she could do. She saw nothing as she looked down into the dirty yards of the houses, and the same time, unconsciously interpreted to herself thus—"I know you, angel of mercy! You have brought some angelic soup and some telegraphic wine. The only reply was a smile that shone down from the window into the heart of the sick man, and made it bloom. It was followed by a wave of the hand from above that said farewell. Lawrence Nest looked up and kissed his own—not his—a dandy to a bone—but like a man to a woman.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NARROW ESCAPE OF THE STEAMER "NEWFOUNDLAND."

A TELEGRAM from St. Johns, Newfoundland, dated Wednesday, June 8, says: "The steamer Newfoundland, from New York, for Glasgow, put in here at 7 o'clock this morning in a state of the greatest distress. After having struck on Seaking on Monday at 11 30 A. M., 150 miles from this port, and 30 miles from Cape Race, she first discovered shortly afterward that the water was rising in the hold. The pumps were put hard apart, but the water gained rapidly. The passengers were taken above water, but struck under water a little aloft the vessel bow, and there is no sign of the vessel but the spars which the water rushed.

"The engine room stopped and backed, but the ship had passed the iceberg before her way was stopped. The after forward compartments were found filled forward with water. The pumps were quickly set going, and again and hopefully gained upon the water. The male passengers assisted the crew in working the pumps and bailing. There was no sleep for any one during Monday night, with rain—and fog. On Tuesday morning the fog lifted, and an observation was taken for the first time for two days. The ship's position was 46° 51' N., 52° 41' W., distance from St. Johns 150 miles.

"At—o'clock she made the land, all hands working vigorously at the pumps, and bailing, to keep the ship from sinking. The water was only kept from flowing into the other compartments by their strenuous labors.

"The passengers speak in the highest terms of Captain Cumming's management of the ship. Every precaution was made, even to preparing the small boats, and providing a raft, in case the ship should sink. The ship's forward bows were stove in, and the fore hold was filled with water. Passengers also carefully prepared. The lady passengers sat up all night, ready dressed to leave the ship. A fellow on Tuesday morning a number of the male passengers had become exhausted, and put the severe labor imposed upon them was continued until the crowded port. All the passengers and crew are safe.

"The Captain speaks of the passengers as having behaved with the utmost coolness and labored unremittingly for thirty hours. The extent of the damage is not ascertained, but the ship will probably have to discharge her cargo to undergo repairs."

THE FROST OF JUNE 4.

The Herald contains the following: "We have taken some pains to look over the accounts of the damage done by the frost of June 4, and we find that the first, so severe for the season, which occurred on the night of the 4th and 5th of June, was confined to the low and northern parts of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and all the States further north. Corn was not generally injured, and find that the general reports which first reached us were greatly exaggerated. The damage done may be expressed in them had very little foundation.

Cotton was not injured in the least, for nearly all of the crop had been planted before the frost, and that only set, but these in yet time for it to mature a perfect crop. In other words, the cotton was not so forward as being materially injured, but not to such an extent as to be considered damaged. Wheat was cut down in roots and yielding a reasonable crop. Apples, where the fruit was not severe, are killed outright, and many other descriptions of fruit have suffered past redemption. Wheat, rye, oats, and barley escaped with very little damage, Grass was not damaged in the least."

THE NEW PEACH AND PEAR TREE.

We learn by telegraph from Leavenworth that the engagement between the Kickapoo Indians and the Delaware City to the last inst. They contain extraordinary peaches, and pears. The gold fever will be very much greater than ever. Rich boggards had been discovered in the north fork of Pawnee Rock, principally water pot and decomposed quartz. Great excitement prevailed in consequence of the discovery. Information of the finding of Gregory's and other mining companies were almost the first and most extensive. Gregory's party took from $500 to $500 a day. There are other accounts of the same character. The Indians on the Arkansas River have received seven to have been written under the prevailing excitement. The Indians on the Arkansas River have reported. The Indians on the Arkansas River. The Mining Company alone is estimated at $20,000. The Indians are very much excited by the discovery of the gold mountains. Previsions continued scarce. Twenty-four thousand dollars in gold dust, from Pike's Peak mines, arrived at Leavenworth payment in hand, and for half an hour a furious struggle ensued, finally ending in the Austrians retreating from Montebello, and subsequently from Casteggio.

AFTER THE BATTLE.

"The French statement is that the Austrians commenced their retreat in the proportion of three to one—that is 15,000 Austrians to 5,000 French. Not a single French prisoner was taken, and the killed and wounded were few and not to exceed 500. General Forey was struck by a ball on the scabbard of his sword, and is slightly injured from the contusion. Marshal Baraguay d'Hilliers is lying forward to receive the Emperor's warm felicitations. When his brigade arrived on the ground he was still strewn with dead bodies. He was accompanied by Marshal Canrobert, and the latter, seeing the dispositions pointed out to him by the former, exclaimed, 'Why, Marshal,' he said, to receive a high recompense for his conduct.' The Austrian position has since been occupied and united to the Emperor. Some of them had figured only a few weeks before on the ladder of the Malakoff. The wounded French were delighted with his Majesty's attention, and raised their Italian vivas in salutation."

THE AUSTRIAN ACCOUNT.

The official Wiener Zeitung publishes General Gyulai's report to the Emperor of the defeats of the 20th and 21st. It says:

"Genoa: 7 Wounded, 718; killed, 230; missing, 582. The enemy numbered 40,000 men, has obtained from all the result.

The Emperor had addressed to General Gyulai an autograph letter, expressing to him and the troops in general, his Majesty's thanks for their remarkable valor.

The letter also directs a list of all the killed and wounded to be drawn up, in order that their names may be made known in their respective houses.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Times furnishes a version of the battle to the effect that Count Stadion passed the Po on the 20th, by the strongly fortified bridge-of Vaccarizza, with 15,000 men, to ascertain the position of the enemy. He found the latter encamped in such an extended line

He then came upon Baraguay d'Hilliers's army near Montebello. He attacked it so as to make its enemy display his strength.

In the fight that then was wrought

The French brought up fresh troops by rail during the battle. At night the French retired, leaving effected his purpose.

THE EMPEROR'S ACCOUNT.

The following dispatch from Napoleon to Eugénie was received by the Regent in Paris on May 21:

EMPEROR TO EMPRESS.

ALESSANDRIA, May 21, 1859.

Austrians, about 15,000, attacked yesterday the corps of Baraguay d'Hilliers, which was at Montebello.

The battle lasted all the afternoon, which behaved admirably, and carried the Austrian intrenchments at the bayonet four hours' engagement.

Richmondes massacre General Sonnaz, showed uncommon energy. Two hundred Austrian prisoners, among whom a colonel, were left killed and wounded. Austrians in retreat since last night.

HOW RUEBET WAS KILLED.

A letter-writer says that General Dieulafoy, in attempting to rally his men, moved from the rear, which is the place assigned on such occasions to field-officers, to the front, and was leading his men up the slope a second time when he was shot. The ball struck him in the left side, and he fell to the ground. Two hours after the battle was over, General Forey, with more gallantry than discretion, rushed to the front and, General Dieulafoy was not dead shivered his scabbard and struck his leg, and another two of a part of his body which he could not have spared, and made a sally they could easily have destroyed or captured the whole of the enemy's force; but at that moment a strong reinforcement came up, and after a stout contest the church—and was thrown back on the rear, with the loss of 600, wounded, or prisoners fell back on their main body."

THE AUSTRIAN PRISONERS.

A Marseilles letter says: "The Austrian prisoners have arrived at Marseilles. They disembarked at the head of his wounds. The officers number about twenty. After the combat they were lodged in a neighboring barracks, etc., were sent to them, and an aide-de-camp from the Emperor came to inquire if they had any wish that they had received all the courtesy they obtained demanded. It is said that one of them bluntly replied that bruiquets in return for these attentions."

GARIBALDI'S MOVEMENTS IN THE NORTH.

The papers give accounts of the expedition of Garibaldi and his volunteers across the Lago Maggiore to the Austrians in Upper Lombardy, which has been by far the most striking and successful movement of the campaign. On the evening of the 17th, after a furious fight, which lasted from five to eight hours, Garibaldi crossed the Ticino at Sesto Calende, and the general illumination of the town. The combat was one of the severest of the war. The Austrians again gave way and retreated. All the steamboats on the Lake of Como were in possession of Colonel Garibaldi has reinforcements of troops. At Cogne the artillery has been brought up. The Austrians are much disheartened, and volunteers are hastening to increase the ranks of Garibaldi. Advices from Turin of the 19th state that the Austrian General Urban, with 10,000 men, were widening the breach. General Garibaldi had occupied Canobio and Luino. Considerable reinforcements have taken place in the Valtelline, and 500 Volunteers of Garibaldi's corps have been put on board an Austrian steamer. Valtelline is a circle of the Austrian dominions, consisting of the upper valley of the Adda, a tributary of the Grisons, and forming the Austro-Italian delegation of Sondrio, which, with Bormio, Chiavenna, and Morbegno, are its chief towns.

PRINCE NAPOLEON'S PROCLAMATION.

The following is Prince Napoleon's proclamation to the Tuscans:

"OF DUBNO THE 'SEINE RIGHTEOUS'.

"LEGHORN, May 20, 1859.

"INHABITANTS OF TUSCANY!—The Emperor sends me to your country, on the demand of your representatives, to assist in the war against your enemies—the oppressors of Italy.

"My mission is entirely military.

"I have nothing to do with the question of organization that you and I accept as a fact.

Napoleon III. has declared that he had but one ambition—that of obtaining for Italy, at the end of the war—the delivery of a people; and that he should never be guided by local interests. He has not changed this. He is the only object of France, satisfied with her power, is to have no fear therefore of a conquest. You are to be her first regeneration. Should the Almighty protect and bless Victory, Italy will be constituted happily for her, resting in future among other nations, will guarantee her the independence.

"Think, then, that there is no sacrifice too great for the independence of Italy. Let the cry of your soldiers be that for your union and your country. Let your arms be worthy of your energy, that you are worthy of that liberty.

"Long live Victor Emmanuel, the valiant General!

"PRINCE, Commander-in-chief of the Fifth Corps of the Army of Italy."

THE PRINCIPLES ON WHICH THE WAR WILL BE WAGED.

The Piedmontese Gazette of May 21 contains the following notice or proclamation:

The government has been informed by the King of Sardinia has already publicly declared that, in the conduct of the present war, it would be guided by the principles of moderation and humanity which do honor to modern times, although the violence and rapine of all kinds committed by the Austrian army in our territory may give it the right to use reprisals.

The King's government, which contributed to the abolition of maritime rights, made by the Congress of Paris of 1856, and 1858, has not the intention of abandoning so generously observing its prescriptions.

"Desiring to avoid the infliction of unnecessary evils on war, the undersigned in a more explicit manner, declares that:

"Austrian subjects now in the Royal States may continue their residence there as long as their conduct gives no grounds for offense.

"2. The commerce into the Royal States shall be conceded to these Austrian subjects who shall obtain special and previous authorization from the King's government.

"3. Correspondence is interdicted.

"4. The national flag covers the enemy's merchandise, except contraband of war.

"5. The merchandise of neutrals shall not be captured under the enemy's flag, except contraband of war.

"6. Blockades must be effective.

"Finally, the King's government having intelligence of the Austrian government, that it would observe, under all circumstances in the interest of science, declares that it will not interfere with the vessels that may cross its lay her voyage, and that the proper instructions to this effect have been given to the officers of the navy.

"As to the capture of the Austrian ships on which an embargo has been placed, the government reserves to itself all the courses its decision, which will hereafter be made known."

THE EMPEROR'S RULES FOR HIS ARMY.

The late Army Regulations of Napoleon I. prohibitions some general prescriptions agreed to by the limits. Here are the rules of the Emperor's army at the present time:

"Every evening, at nightfall, the King and the commanders of the different corps d'armee are to send to the Emperor a succinct account containing the number of the enemy's troops with which they have come in contact, which have taken place during the day, and every information which they may have obtained of the movements of the enemy. Every day, half an hour before sunrise, the troops will get under arms. The marches will be made so as not to be attacked, and after daylight, when it shall be certain that the enemy's movements will not be concealed by mist, the troops will return to their bivouacs. At that hour the Emperor will give the commandants of corps d'armee the orders for the day. The men in the ranks are to have no other arms but their muskets and cartridge boxes. It is forbidden to any soldier to have his knapsack on his back, except for the purpose of changing his linen. The soldiers are to wash accommodation in the houses near their bivouacs, and to keep their arms and accoutrements at a distance from any habitation, tents will be supplied to them from the commencement of the campaign. Each himself carry his cloak across his shoulders, and a case for his linen on the day's journey. The Emperor, however has decided that, during the continuance of operations, the officers shall only carry their cloaks, their great-coat, jacket and trousers, two pairs of shoes—one pair to be worn and the other carried in the knapsack—and a change of linen. The men in the ranks are to be equipped immediately to the depôts of the corps, which is to be established at Alessandria. They are to carry with them their knapsacks, their cloaks, their tents, their canteens, their ball blanket, except for Zouaves and the Algerian battalions, which will be left at the depôts of the corps. The hat is suppressed, and replaced by the képi during the whole campaign, and the shako abolished.

THE EMPEROR IN THE FIELD.

In a letter from Valenza, dated the 19th of May, published in the Constitutionnel, we read:

"The Emperor set out at night with the officers of his staff, at the gate of Asti, and arrived at Valenza at 5 A. M. The Emperor, who had left Paris on the 14th, had not received unexpectedly on horseback, in a general's uniform, with a gray hat and a white feather. He was followed by a numerous staff, in which the uniform was on foot, the streets were filled with people, who saluted the Emperor with cries of the troops. His Majesty proceeded slowly up his street to the Piazza, where the municipality awaited him. Napoleon can see the vast plains of the Po and the Lomellina. The Emperor, however, remained but a few minutes, and without danger. I had the honor of approaching the Emperor, who received me with great kindness. He asked me if I had seen the troops. I replied that I was a journalist, who had ventured to the front to see the army. He then questioned me about the state of public opinion. I showed him detachments of their troops on the banks of the Po, and pointed out the position of the 1st Corps at Mortara, their head-quarters. His Majesty, by means of his glass, examined the enemy's camp, and the bridge in the belfry of the church of Evarcharde, and even distinguished the flag of the 1st Corps on the top of the way bridge, of which the enemy has blown up two arches. The Emperor then left Valenza at 6 A. M., and the shakes of sensitive on the banks of the river could be distinguished from the road. The Emperor was received with some of the Italians. His Majesty spoke to them in Italian, and they replied in the same language. The Emperor then left Valenza at 6 A. M., and in a few minutes, the Emperor turned to leave. As he did so the people, who had assembled in the Piazza, cried out from their hapnoots, and cried out, a thousand times, 'Vive l'Empereur!' 'Vive Napoleon!' The Emperor left Valenza since 1859, approached, and cried out, with tears in their eyes, 'Vive l'Empereur!' 'Vive Napoleon!' 'Vive Victor Emmanuel!' 'Vive Italie!' The Emperor seemed affected, and answered by waving his hat. The Emperor then turned to meet mine, and, in the emotion of the moment, I venture to cry out, 'Vive l'Empereur!' His Majesty with a smile, to grasp it. This is an incident which I shall never forget in my life."

THE EMPEROR'S PROCLAMATION AT NOVARA.

The Opinione of Turin publishes, as a curiosity, the following proclamation issued by General Gyulai to the authorities of the province of Novara:

"HEAD-QUARTERS, AT NOVARA, May 18, 1859.

"The following articles are required, which must be delivered to the Austrian troops in the course of the day, by the authorities of the district, and by the owners of the estates, the contractors, with whom the said authorities must distribute proportionately the following articles, which shall deliver within forty-eight hours 700 oxen, and forty-five thousand rations of bread, forty thousand pounds of spirits, 60 cwt. of hay, and 500 sacks of oats, and the same quantity of barley, by May 20, 1859. The proper functionary of the Intendance, who shall dispose of them in a manner which he considers the most beneficial to the troops.

"Should the authorities, or the owners, not have these quantities ready, both for the troops delivered there and for the transport, they shall be obliged to comply with the above requisition within twenty-four hours, and obtain the regular and exact delivery of the articles demanded.

"GYULAI."

HOW THE AUSTRIANS BEHAVED IN PIEDMONT.

A letter-writer says: "Now that the Austrians have left Piedmont, we can form a correct idea of their behavior. They could scarcely commit more acts of pillage than they did, and they committed their atrocities. What is more shameful is that these acts were committed by officers. I will relate to you one of these acts, which I had from the lips of the victim, the chief of the Austrian commissariat actually stole a cloak and a pair of boots from a poor coachman. The poor coachman who had driven him to Mortara thought he was his due for his services, and asked for payment of the latitude. The coachman then asked to have his cloak restored to him. The reply was, 'Be off, you rascal, or I will have you shot.' The cloak will be useful to me.' My servant was present at the scene, and told me that Austrian official had the impudence to write to Count Cavour to demand the reimbursement of the expenses. An old peasant of the farm Abbiategrasso begging for a piece of bread was struck by a soldier because he had not supplied him with wine. A boy, fifteen years old, was sent to the bastinado at a place called the Cappuccini, in the neighborhood of Vercelli. The poor lad has been removed to the hospital, and there is but little hope of saving his life. At Cilicolalio, a small hamlet, three English miles from Voghera, a young girl has been violated by a German soldier, and has died from the excitement. The poor creature could not stand the shame of the outrage. Another girl, at Vigevano, is in a state of which she has been half dead. The beautiful church of Vigevano, which contains the tombs of many eminent Italians and Lombards, has been shamefully plundered and devastated by the Austrians. The picture gallery, one of the finest in Lombardy, has been all destroyed in the last picture. A famous Madonna of Leonardo is thus lost to the artistic world. At Finalle, a village near Voghera, the church has been plundered, and men and women barbarously wounded by the Austrian sharp-shooters, stationed in a ravine. Every bushel of corn, every sack of flour has been taken away, and every cask of wine emptied and wasted, the poor peasants being thus left starving and helpless."

THE EMPRESS AT MONTEBELLO.

The accounts received from the French themselves of the Empress's residence for a month under the most favorable circumstances afford a striking picture of the misery which the war has caused. Montebello has become a little black point is discerned by the Tyrolese rising in the midst of the vineyards, with the white spire capital in their rank. The unseen village is run over with weeds, the fields abandoned, and the vines, which form one of the glory the rank and seeding vegetation, not a furrow is to be seen, not a trace of cultivation, nearly their women and children, are obliged to huddle in by the side of the ruined houses, and there, on the damp earth, are the glad tidings of Italian regeneration. Day after day, night after night, the Empress has passed in the midst of this desolation. Her own apartment has its walls, and whose star grouth the next thirty years will secure to the glory. The unhappy victims of warfare recruits them for ditions, the Empress has been unceasing in her efforts to was looking about him a sharp "drop" was heard, and Tyrolese bullet lit on the loins.

The Empress has also discovered his error withdrawn to the Emperor what they may know of the position of the enemy. Every day, half an hour before sunrise, the troops will get under arms. The marches will be made so as not to be attacked, and after daylight, when it shall be certain that the enemy's movements will not be concealed by mist, the troops will return to their bivouacs. At that hour the Emperor will give the commandants of corps d'armee the orders for the day. The men in the ranks are to have no other arms but their muskets and cartridge boxes. It is forbidden to any soldier to have his knapsack on his back, except for the purpose of changing his linen. The soldiers are to wash accommodation in the houses near their bivouacs, and to keep their arms and accoutrements at a distance from any habitation, tents will be supplied to them from the commencement of the campaign. Each himself carry his cloak across his shoulders, and a case for his linen on the day's journey. The Emperor, however, has decided that, during the continuance of operations, the officers shall only carry their cloaks, their great-coat, jacket and trousers, two pairs of shoes—one pair to be worn and the other carried in the knapsack—and a change of linen. The men in the ranks are to be equipped immediately to the depôts of the corps, which is to be established at Alessandria. They are to carry with them their knapsacks, their cloaks, their tents, their canteens, their ball blanket, except for Zouaves and the Algerian battalions, which will be left at the depôts of the corps. The hat is suppressed, and replaced by the képi during the whole campaign, and the shako abolished.

THE EMPEROR IN THE FIELD.

In a letter from Valenza, dated the 19th of May, published in the Constitutionnel, we read:

"The Emperor set out at night with the officers of his staff, at the gate of Asti, and arrived at Valenza at 5 A. M. The Emperor, who had left Paris on the 14th, had received unexpectedly on horseback, in a general's uniform, with a gray hat and a white feather. He was followed by a numerous staff, in which the uniform was on foot, the streets were filled with people, who saluted the Emperor with cries of the troops. His Majesty proceeded slowly up his street to the Piazza, where the municipality awaited him. Napoleon can see the vast plains of the Po and the Lomellina. The Emperor, however, remained but a few minutes, and without danger. I had the honor of approaching the Emperor, who received me with great kindness. He asked me if I had seen the troops. I replied that I was a journalist, who had ventured to the front to see the army. He then questioned me about the state of public opinion. I showed him detachments of their troops on the banks of the Po, and pointed out the position of the 1st Corps at Mortara, their head-quarters. His Majesty, by means of his glass, examined the enemy's camp, and the bridge in the belfry of the church of Evarcharde, and even distinguished the flag of the 1st Corps on the top of the way bridge, of which the enemy has blown up two arches. The Emperor then left Valenza at 6 A. M., and in a few minutes, the Emperor turned to leave. As he did so the people, who had assembled in the Piazza, cried out from their hapnoots, and cried out, a thousand times, 'Vive l'Empereur!' 'Vive Napoleon!' The Emperor left Valenza since 1859, approached, and cried out, with tears in their eyes, 'Vive l'Empereur!' 'Vive Napoleon!' 'Vive Victor Emmanuel!' 'Vive Italie!' The Emperor seemed affected, and answered by waving his hat. The Emperor then turned to meet mine, and, in the emotion of the moment, I ventured

THE GREAT BALLOON VOYAGE FROM ST. LOUIS TO NEW YORK.

ON or about 22d June instant Professor Wise and two friends will, wind and weather permitting, depart from St. Louis, Missouri, in a balloon, with a view of arriving at a point on the Atlantic shore between New York and Baltimore. We are enabled to present our readers with engravings illustrative of this remarkable event, and a portrait of the leader of the enterprise.

Professor Wise, as his portrait indicates, is a man over fifty years of age, a resident of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and an aeronaut by profession. He is a very quiet, undemonstrative gentleman; and, strange to say, for a man who for twenty years has been advocating Transatlantic aerial navigation, seems any thing but a sanguine enthusiast. Though positive that his views will eventually prevail, and aerial navigation become generally practicable, he is very slow in predicting the success of this or that particular experiment, and keenly alive to the mischances which await the intrepid voyager of the air. It is difficult to realize, after a conversation with him, that the cool, sober, practical man who converses so modestly of his exploits, can be the foremost champion of a science which the public mean to consider purely visionary.

Mr. Wise's first ascent was made at Philadelphia rather more than twenty-four years ago. Since then he has ascended in balloons more than two hundred and thirty times; so that he is at the present time the most experienced aeronaut living. Of course, in so many adventures, he has run some risks. Of these, however, he is slow to speak. Indeed he positively says that "the dangers" the papers say he has run have been "purely imaginary." It is true that on one occasion, when he was several thousand feet above the earth, his balloon exploded, and he came down by the run, the collapsed balloon had car whirling round in oblate and jagged circles, and getting rid of their burden, reaching the earth, by throwing Mr. Wise ten feet from them. But the veteran aeronaut insists that this was nothing but a successful experiment, illustrating the capacity of collapsed balloons to act as parachutes; and really, this being his view, it is nobody's business to question it. On another occasion his balloon happened to come down in the middle of Lake Erie—apparently a rather awkward accident, had he not been picked up by a brig, and carried safely to land. But, as Mr. Wise philosophically observes, people may say what they like about his having run risks; he was saved, whereas the brig which rescued him was afterward lost in sailing from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands. It was, in fact, the old song over again:

"The man recovered of the bite,
The dog it was that died."

After seven years' practice of aerial navigation, Mr. Wise at length began to ascertain a principle which constitutes the corner-stone of his great theory of practical aeronautics. After an ascent from Lewistown, Pennsylvania, in 1842, he made an entry in his diary to this effect:

"It is now established—that is my mind established that a current from west to east in the stratosphere is constantly in motion within the height of 12,000 feet above the ocean."

In order that those of our readers who are not familiar with aeronautics may realize the importance of this discovery, it is necessary to observe that, as early as the year 1783, the brothers Montgolfier, Frenchmen, proved by practical experiment that men could be raised to great heights above the earth in balloons, and could descend without ill-ways being killed. This single fact established, the science of aeronautics remained stationary for nearly sixty years. Many improvements were made in the Montgolfier balloon. Hydrogen gas was substituted for the smoke which they used to elevate their machine. Great improvements have been made in the construction of balloons, in the selection of materials, and in the regulation of the rise and fall of air-ships. Montgolfier and his successors for half a century rose and descended, it is true; but where, when, and how, were questions which Providence usually relieved them of the trouble of deciding. Our balloonists nowadays can regulate their ascent and descent mathematically, parting with so many pounds or ounces of ballast, and by systematic discharges of gas through cunningly devised valves. The art, in fact, which Montgolfier discovered has been brought to such perfection that, though we can not do much more than he did, we can do it safely, and with comparative certainty in respect to time and place. Beyond this nothing had been achieved when Mr. Wise discovered his secret of western trade-wind.

THE "ATLANTIC" BALLOON IN WHICH THE VOYAGE FROM ST. LOUIS WILL BE MADE.

Balloons could be made to rise and to descend; a rapid descent could often be made very near the point from which the balloon had started (Mr. Wise once came down on the very spot from which he had started), as a general rule, from the moment once in air was not only at the mercy of the winds of heaven, but the aeronaut could form no opinion, previously, of the probable direction or character of these winds. He could not undertake to travel in any direction he might be carried in the very opposite. Like a Jack-in-the-box, his sphere of action was confined to the perpendicular.

Our readers will now be ready to share the emotion and delight with which Mr. Wise hailed his discovery that, at a certain height in air, an invariable current blows from west to east. For several years after he made this discovery its verification was the principal object of his ascents. Unhappily for him, and perhaps for science, he had not the means to undertake at once a series of careful experiments for the purpose of testing his principle thoroughly. But for many years a balloon ascent has been a popular feature of public festivities in our part of the country; Mr. Wise has often been engaged by city corporations and other public bodies to give éclat to a Fourth of July celebration, or some similar fête, by ascending in a balloon. Whenever this occurred Mr. Wise took care to test his favorite theory. He made straight for his familiar current; and it is gratifying to know that it, at all events, was always faithful, and never disappointed him.

A series of ascents, spread over several years, having uniformly confirmed his views, he sought further evidence on the point from abroad, and wrote to the famous English aeronaut, Green, to know if he had noticed any western current. Mr. Green immediately replied in the affirmative, and gave the statistics of a dozen ascents made in Great Britain, in every one of which he had observed the invariable western trade-wind in the upper region of the air. He had met with it at various altitudes; at 2554 feet above the earth, at 11,000, at 16,000, at 2082, at 12,583, at 3000, at 4300, and at other altitudes. Mr. Green told Mr. Wise an anecdote confirming his theory in a striking manner. On one occasion Mr. Green had agreed to make an ascent from Liverpool. At the hour fixed it was blowing a gale from the eastward, and the magistrates and citizens waited upon Mr. Green to remonstrate with him on the folly of making an ascent while the wind blew from that quarter, as it was evident that the balloon would be blown out to sea as soon as it rose above the earth. The aeronaut, relying on his knowledge of the upper current, refused to be dissuaded; he made the ascent, was blown out to sea at a terrific rate, but boldly continued to rise, and soon had the satisfaction of entering the western current, which blew him back to shore, and landed him safely in Lancashire. Mr. Green had in fact made the same discovery as Mr. Wise by the same experiments, and had the same faith in the western current as his American colleague.

The point thus settled to Mr. Wise's satisfaction, he proposed to turn it to account by planning a Transatlantic balloon voyage. He knew that he could make a balloon which would remain afloat for three or four days, which would supply sufficient for the voyage, as fifty miles an hour is quite moderate speed for air-ships; and he knew that the current was there. All that he wanted now was a little of that wretched dross, the want of which keeps so many valuable discoveries in the shade—hard cash. He had no means to build and equip a balloon of the requisite size and strength for a three days' voyage. Nor could the money—small as the sum was in comparison with the enterprise projected—be easily raised. Mr. Wise applied in his friends, who gave him the cold shoulder. He memorialized Congress; the memorial was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, where it slumbers still. He petitioned the merchants of New York and other large cities; they went on selling cotton and flour, and looked upon Wise as a madman. So after years of anxious, weary struggles, the poor aeronaut was forced to abandon, or at least to postpone, his darling experiment; and contented himself by astonishing the public by making short voyages always from west to east, and descending at the point he had selected with wonderful accuracy.

He was indeed badly treated. During the war with Mexico he offered to take Vera Cruz without firing a man, if General Scott—then Secretary of War—would only give him the money to build a big balloon and to hire a few assistants. He engaged to float his balloon a mile above the forts of Vera Cruz, and from that eminence rain down a thousand bomb-shells on the heads of the Mexicans, who, as he naively remarked, could not bring their guns to bear on an object directly above their head. Fancy the chagrin of poor Jean d'Ulloa aiming at Mr. Wise in his balloon, at a height of a mile or so from the ground as this ad Unhappily again, Mr. Marcy was one of those incorrigibly hard-headed men who could not be convinced that Vera Cruz was to be taken by Mr. Wise; he preferred General Scott, and again disappointment befell the luckless aeronaut.

"The expenses of our Government," says he, with a flash of acerbity, in his memorial to Congress, "have now reached the sum of $60,000,000 annually. The amount which I ask to demonstrate the truth of all I have said is to the nation a mere pittance, yet to me individually beyond my means. I have stated nothing problematical, nothing but truth made evident by experiments; and to realize the advantages it only requires the public, individually or nationally, to say it shall be done, and it will be done!"

Stupid public! They wouldn't say any thing about it; and so it happens that now, nine years after that touching appeal was written, we are still only on the threshold of the experiments which are, in the opinion of the aeronaut, to demonstrate the practicability of turning the western aerial current to good account.

In May last a Convention of aeronauts was held in this city, at which Prof. Wise was present. It was there proposed and agreed that three or four prominent aeronauts, whose views coincided in the main, should associate themselves together for the purpose of carrying out a series of experiments, too costly for any one of them singly. Professor Wise thus associated with himself Mr. Gager, of Boston, the inventor of a balloon boat with air wheels, which we shall describe below; Mr. Lamountain, of Troy, a balloon builder and a fertile inventor in the science; and, subsequently, Mr. James P. Gage, of New York, the patentee of a new contrivance entitled Gage's " halyard kedging disc," which we illustrate and describe elsewhere. These gentlemen agreed that the question to be determined was whether long aerial voyages from west to east are practicable; and for the purpose of determining this question they projected three voyages, the first of which, from St. Louis to New York, will, as we said, be attempted on 22d June. If this be successful, the next voyage, from San Francisco to New York, will be attempted this fall. And if that also succeed the aeronauts will, next spring, endeavor to cross the Atlantic.

CUTTING LOOSE, IN CASE THE BALLOON FALLS INTO THE SEA.

The St. Louis voyage is to be undertaken in the balloon "Atlantic," of which we give an engraving herewith. The balloon "Atlantic," which is entirely constructed of the best Chinese silk, is sixty feet in diameter, and has an ascending power of nearly eight thousand pounds. She is rigged with Gage's boat, provided with fan-wheel propellers, that can be used to elevate, to depress, to give forward and backward motion to the balloon, as occasion may require. The boat is also provided with sails and spars, which may readily be brought into service should the air-ship descend upon lake or sea. The "Atlantic" was projected by Mr. O. H. Gager, of Boston, and built by John Lamountain, at Lansingburg, New York, under the instructions of Professor Wise.

Her crew is to consist of Professor Wise, as director-in-chief; Mr. Lamountain, as aeronaut; and Mr. Gager, as navigator.

The aeronauts say that their voyage is to be made at night, so, by this arrangement, they secure for the latter part of the voyage daylight—a consideration necessary to the safety and success of the enterprise. Should the night voyage not result successfully, however, then they will try again by starting in the morning. To secure to the aeronauts land-marks for the night voyage, a request will be made to ten different municipal corporations along either side of the route to keep their street lamps burning all that night, with such forms of figures, to be arranged by the lines of lamps, as will indicate the place to represented. One may form a right-angle, another a square, another a cross, another a chevron, another a double parallelogram, etc.

Professor Wise wishes us to say that the public must not expect perfect and unvarying success in their experiments, as mishaps may occur which could not have been foreseen. But he also assures us that no effort or labor will be wanting on his part and on that of his associates to secure success. He considers Mr. Lamountain a practical aeronaut of great energy; and Mr. Gager a gentleman of nerve, courage, and clear head.

The other balloon of which we give an engraving, the "Nineteenth Century," is 68 feet in diameter, and is capable of raising and carrying off ten thousand pounds. The contrivance between the boat and balloon is a modified form of Mr. James P. Gage's patent, and is intended to be used in giving the balloon direction, so as to enable the aeronaut to select his particular landing-place, by putting it in his power to glide laterally to the right or left, or to pass further on, or to cut short its forward current motion. It is termed " Gage's patent halyard kedging disc," and its efficiency is to be tried by Professor Wise, according to an arrangement with the patentee. The boat suspended below is so arranged with sails and spars as to be readily converted into a sea-sailing craft, should accident render it necessary. The "Nineteenth Century" was built in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, by Professor Wise, and on his own account, simply to demonstrate the practicability of long aerial voyages from west to east, and in the hope, that the success which he feels confident he will attain will enable him to carry out his long-cherished project of crossing the Atlantic and circumnavigating the globe.

THE "NINETEENTH CENTURY" BALLOON FOR THE VOYAGE FROM SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. Gager's boat, which is represented in the water, was built by O. R. Ingersoll, of this city. It is 16 feet long, 4 feet 6 inches wide, and 20 inches deep. Mr. Gage has attached to it two propeller wheels of 5 feet in diameter, one on the starboard quarter and the other on the larboard bow. They are so arranged as to be worked at any angle, thereby enabling the aeronauts to use their whole power either to drive them up or bring them down; thus —if the scheme works well—ascents and descents may be managed without throwing out ballast or discharging gas. Mr. Gager says: "It is not contended that the balloon can be driven against strong currents of air, nor is it requisite to the practicability of aerial navigation. If the buoyant power can be taken into the air and retained there, and some mechanical power that will enable us to ascend and descend without a diminution of that buoyant power, we conceive the practicability of air navigation is established beyond a doubt. It is upon the fact of the variable lower and constant upper currents of air, so elsewhere noted, that we base the feasibility of successfully navigating to any given point."

Mr. James P. Gage's disc, which is represented in the accompanying engraving, will not be used in the voyage from St. Louis. An adaptation of it is connected with the "Nineteenth Century;" and the inventor believes that balloons constructed wholly on his principle will eventually supersede the present spherical ones. He calls his machine his "improvement in air sailing upon the bird principle," and describes it as follows:

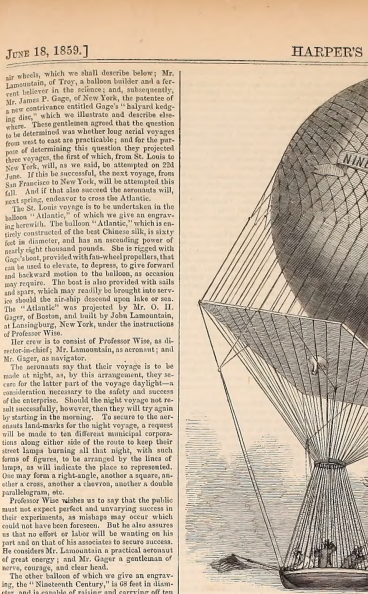
"One form of my present improvements consists of a balloon, composed of silk or other suitable material, the lower or under part of which is semi-spherical, or round, like the upper part of the common balloon; but the top or roof of the balloon is to be a flat surface, and is retained as such flat surface by seams of a netting, from the corners of each mesh of which are lines or cords passing through the roof of the balloon itself, and netted to the meshes down through the mouth or opening of the balloon, where they are contracted and drawn together, fastened to and by a ring, and carried down through and made fast to the car underneath. This ring is permanent and unelastic, and should be made large enough to admit the body of a man. When the lines pass through the roof of the balloon they should be surrounded by an elastic sleeve, closing close to them, pressing tight to the upper connection, and extending downward a short distance below the roof. Another cord is a draw or contracting string, or sheet, as sailors would term it. The upper part of this cord or line encircles the outer suspending cords from the netting, which come through the roof of the balloon, and it passes through small blocks with sheaves, so as to be easily contracted by drawing in, or loosened, so as to enlarge. The ends of this draw-string (which may also be termed a reefing line) descend to the car, so as to be within reach of the aeronaut. The use of this cord is to draw in the outer suspending lines or close them together, so that the balloon itself can be contracted or reefed by the tackle next to be described.

"Around the exterior of the balloon, and passing through suitable blocks, is the reefing line. The lower ends of this line also come within reach of the aeronaut within the car. By drawing up the ends of this line (the contracting line having been first drawn in) the lower part of the balloon will be taken in or reefed. The upper ends of the halyards are connected to auxiliary lines, which diverge from the point where they are fastened to the halyard, and their opposite ends are fastened to the angles of the meshes in the netting, so as to set over a considerable surface.

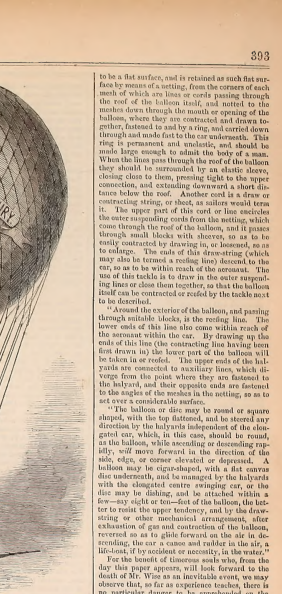
"The balloon or disc may be round or square shaped, with the flat surface, and be moved any direction by the halyards independent of the elongated car, which, in this case, should be round, as the balloon, while ascending or descending rapidly, will move forward in the direction of the side, edge, or corner elevated or depressed. A balloon may be cigar-shaped, with a flat canvas disc underneath, and be managed by the halyards with the elongated centre swinging car, or the disc may be dishing, and be attached within a few—say eight or ten—feet of the balloon, the latter to resist the upper tendency, and by the drawstring or other mechanical arrangement, after exhaustion of gas and contraction of the balloon, reversed so as to glide forward on the air in descending, the car a canoe and rudder in the air, a life-boat, if by accident or necessity, in the water."

For the benefit of timorous souls who, from the day their paper appears, will look forward to the death of Mr. Wise as an inevitable event, we may observe that, so far as experience teaches, there is no particular danger to be apprehended on the voyage from St. Louis. Similar, and even more dangerous, voyages have been frequently undertaken and successfully carried out. On January 7, 1785, a Frenchman, M. Blanchard, and an American, Dr. Jeffries, crossed the Straits of Dover in a balloon, and landed safely in France. It is true that an adventurous voyager, who attempted shortly afterward to return the visit, and sail from France to England, was lost on the way; but then he was careless, at least the aeronauts say so. On September 2, 1803, another Frenchman, M. Arban, sailed successfully from Marseilles to Turin, beloboning, so to speak, with the peaks of the Alps as he passed over these. Many similar voyages have been made both in this country and in Europe, the course of the voyagers being invariably from west to east.

There have been some attempts made to explain, on scientific principles, the aerial trade-wind to which we have so often made allusion. But none of them are very satisfactory. Some say that it is due to the rotary motion of the earth; others



GAGE'S PATENT HALYARD KEDGING DISC.



PROF. WISE, THE AERONAUT.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

ascribe it to planetary influences; others to electrical agency. Professor Henry once hinted that it might be the return current of the eastern trade-winds. The upshot of the whole is, that we don't know any thing about it except that it exists. It has been supposed, with some plausibility, that at the height where it blows—from one and a half to two miles above the earth—the ordinary causes of winds, the rarefaction and condensation of the air by heat and cold, can not act with any great force, and therefore that it must be of a different family to the lower area of wind-currents. But we know too little of the regions above even to assert this much positively.

It is difficult, in writing or thinking on the subject of aerial navigation, to keep within bounds. On one side, the imagination rejoices and refuses to indulge in sanguine visions of the balloon era, when every one shall travel in aerial conveyances, and railroads and steamers will only be used for the conveyance of freight; on the other, a sound, conservative judgment confesses to a hopeless distrust of all aerial contrivances. There is a certain class of people whom nothing could induce to listen for a moment to the scheme and hopes of aeronauts. Between there two the path of common sense will be found.

It is reasonable to expect that aerial navigation will be improved, and will be turned to some practical account; but how, and to what extent, no one can tell. Aeronauts have already done some service to science and civilization. They have known of serology, and much that we have learned of climatology, are due to Guy Lussac's discoveries made in a balloon. The battle of Fleurus was won, in a great measure, in consequence of the thorough reconnoissance of the enemy's position, which was made the day before the fight by two French officers in a balloon. It may be exercised to expect, with Professor Wise, that aerial ships will be circumnavigated by-and-by in balloons; but no one can foretell the form of the vessel, the factory without becoming convinced that mere discoveries, and more services to science and civilization, will grow out of air voyages.

KATE CRAWFORD.

"We had several female Specials in Sydney," said an old lady, the widow of a British officer who had long been connected with the police establishment in that colony; "but the most remarkable of them was Kate Crawford, or Beautiful Kitty, as she used to be called. She was very handsome, certainly, and not more than nineteen when she came to the colony."

"What had been her condition in life?" I asked.

"She was the daughter of a Yorkshire squire, in short, she was a lady by birth," was the reply, "and had received the education of persons in her father's position and circumstances, and she was accomplished, according to the standard of that day."

"And what was her crime?"

"Horse-stealing!"

"Horse-stealing!"

"Yes. That was the offense of which she was convicted, and, in those barbaric days, sentenced to be hanged. In that sentence, however, was commuted to transportation for fourteen years."

"Rather a severe punishment for a young lady, ma'am, I 'm inclined."

"Very true; but you must bear the particulars, just as she related them to me and to several other ladies who took a very great interest in her. And remember that all she told us—I mean all the facts she stated—corresponded exactly with those detailed in the report of her trial, which I saw subsequently, at her request, obtained from England. In one genus of the word Kate was a very bold girl; in another sense, she was the very reverse of bold. Her manners were in perfect harmony with her person—soft, gentle, and feminine; but if she were resolved upon carrying out any project, great indeed must have been the obstacle she would not surmount. Her story was this: she was this:

"My father (Squire Crawford) and one Squire Pack lived within a mile of each other. Their estates adjoined. Squire Pack had a son, John Pack, of about twenty-four years of age, and I 'm then between seventeen and eighteen. John Pack was a very good sort, and I was an only daughter. Both Squire Pack and my father were widowers, and had housekeepers. The old people, over their bowls of punch one night, settled that John Pack should be my husband. Now it to happened that John Pack—though I liked very much, he was such a good-natured goosey—was already in love with a secretly engaged to a farmer's daughter, a stout, tall, red-haired girl, with blue eyes, and a very florid but clear complexion. Just the girl, in my father's opinion, poor John, whose mother was very particularly refined. She had, besides, the exact amount of learning to suit poor John, who was not an erudite person by any means. I, too, had a secret engagement with a younger son of Sir Francis Bowman, and we made a limitation in a script each of foot. Squire Pack and my father were both great tyrants, and to have offered the slightest opposition to their plans would probably have led to their putting into execution, respectively, that threat which was constantly on the lips of either of them: 'I 'll turn you out of doors, and cut you off with a shilling!' John Pack and I therefore came to an understanding. We were both to live in the presence of the old people; but, to every other intent and purpose, we were to meet each other in correspondin with our true loves—trusting, as we did, to some accident or some quarrel between our fathers to annul the marriage contract they had entered into on our behalf. Matters went on this way for several months, and nothing could be more satisfactory to us young people. John Pack frequently wrote letters and message for me, and I as frequently did the same for him. Squire Pack and my father used to quarrel once in every year, and for a month or two were the most implacable enemies; but at the end of each term, the one or the other would give way, make an advance (which was always met), shake hands, and become as good friends as ever. The truth was, that when the evenings drew in they missed their game of cribbage; for John Pack was a very sleepy person over cards, and as for myself, I could never play at any game except beggar-my-neighbor.

"One morning in the month of December the bounds met a few miles from our house. Squire Pack and his father rode to cover-side, Squire Pack, who had brought me a letter from my lover, accompanied them and joined the hunt. For some reason they were out of the gate I broke the seal and read as follows:

"'DEAREST KATE.—If you possibly can, meet me on the Hollins road, near The Men and Chickens. I will be there at eleven, and will wait till two o'clock. I am dying you. I have something very important to communicate. My father intends having an interview with your father the day after to-morrow. I would have ridden over to the Hatch, only my father would have seen me not doing so, or even coming near the place at present. In haste,

"'Ever affectionately yours,
"'FRANCIS BOWMAN.'

"The Hen and Chickens, a roadside inn, was distant from the Hatch (the name of my father's estate) about six miles; and Francis Bowman's lover's letter it was nearly half past ten o'clock. I flew to the stables and ordered the groom to saddle my horse. To my infinite astonishment I found the animal was as lame as a cat. I then ordered him to put on another. He demurred, and pointed the hunter of my father's. The groom told me that the horse had been taken to a point called Millbank, where the Squire expected to find a fresh fresh. I then said 'Saddle the old mare,' and was given to understand that she had gone lame. Where's to be shod. What was to be done? I deliberated for a few minutes, and then ordered the groom to take my side-saddle to the Hatch, and go on to Squire Pack's; and, hastily attiring myself in my riding-habit and hat, I ran out and found that it fast as I could, and rode for the stables of our neighbor. The only saddle-horse in the Squire's stables at the time was a magnificent thorough-bred colt, which had just been broken in: and this colt the Squire's groom was ordered to saddle for me without the Squire's personal order. Becoming very impatient, for it then wanted only three minutes to eleven, I said to the man in command, and said: 'Saddle him this instant! Remain at your peril!' 'Shall I put the breeching on, miss, very night!' All Squire Pack's servants, as well as our own, believed that I was to be John Pack's wife; and the groom, who knew that I was a capital horsewoman, no longer hesitated to obey my instructions. The colt was saddled and bridled, I mounted him, and hid him along the road at the very top of his speed, perfectly satisfied that John Pack would take care that my father got no start of me in adventure, and that his father would say nothing about it—because as I was to be the wife of one of John, to lie delivered on his return from the chase.

"It was exactly nineteen minutes past eleven when I reached the Men and Chickens, and found George Bowman waiting for me. He had walked over from his father's house. The colt, meanwhile, was so bathed in perspiration that I alighted, and caused him to be taken into a shed and rubbed down. While he was undergoing the operation, George and I walked along the road, and discussed matters relative to our affairs over half an hour and a half. We then returned to the inn, and I gave orders for the colt to be saddled. But alas! the colt was not to be found. He had been taken and placed after he had been rubbed down, not as a traveler, who was deemed but a gentleman, and by road came to the inn to bait his jaded horse shortly after my arrival, to be found on the premises, though he was not to be seen by the ostler's horse that must have been a very swift and valuable creature—for he had been ridden almost to a broken-winded. There could be no doubt that this person, whoever he might be, had made the extraordinary, and for a stable where only farm-horses boys were taking their dinner. A well-dressed man had evidently paid a handsome sum to myself while we were walking on the road; but we were far too much engrossed in conversation to take any particular notice of horses, or of the men who were riding. Under these awkward and distressing circumstances I had no alternative but to ride the poor pony I had ridden, and I was anxious to return to my house. I therefore (accompanied by George Bowman) rode back to the Hatch, and immediately on foot. As soon as I was in my own room I seated myself at my writing-desk, and wrote a letter to John Pack, requesting him to meet me at the earliest moment possible. It was past four o'clock when my father returned, and I encountered him but I discovered that he was much the worse for the refreshment he had taken at the house of our neighbor. He told me, and it was quite true, that Jack Pack had had a bad fall in the field, had broken his leg, and would be laid up for a month; that he was then lying in a dangerous state at a public-house in the town of Bradford. I begged of him to let me go and see the sufferer. But he said No! and then informed me that he had had such a violent quarrel with Squire Pack as to render it unfit for us to be on speaking terms again. It was all about the subscription list, and I must on no account dream to hold off coming down with any money till his death; that the Squire (Pack) had broken his word (that of his father) and had cut him off with a shilling of his mind; that he told the Squire that neither he nor his father should be invited to my wedding; and that, after all, it would be a disgrace for a Crawford to have a Pack for a husband. All this distressed me very much; but I still hoped that this, like their other quarrels, would be made up in the long run. I was wrong. Squire and Jack Pack would recover, and Sir Francis Bowman tempt my father to listen to the liberal proposals that were about to be made to him with regard to a union with George. It was, however, a frightful day when all light that which I passed. My dreams, when in at last stole over me, was a troubled one, and my dreams a succession of horror upon horror. When I awoke I fancied that all was a dream—the accident to John Pack, the quarrel between my father and the Squire, the meeting between myself and George Bowman, and the loss of the colt at the Hen and Chickens. But alas! I was speedily awakened to the reality, by my father calling out, 'Kate! Kate! come here! What have you to been about? Here are the officers of justice come to take you before the magistrates!' I flew down stairs, trembled every thing, and entreated him to forgive me. Like most of the old squires, he was very violent and headstrong and, and on this occasion his anger was terrible. 'Take her!' he cried to the officers. 'She 's a thief! She 's to be hanged, by all I care! She deserves it for deceiving me!'

"It seems that as soon as Squire Pack heard of my taking the colt away, he vowed that he would have me tried for horse-stealing, and was under the impression that man who called him such vile names and said such bitter things to him. And, in fulfillment of his vow, he went to the nearest magistrate, accompanied by his groom and another servant, and made a deposition upon oath. The magistrate was an old clergyman to whom Squire Pack had given the 'living,' and who was in the habit of receiving his rents 'of course' to avoid the sentence the Squire uttered. A warrant for my apprehension was immediately issued, and I was taken into custody. What impression before the clerical magistrate I can not recollect; but I can remember being placed several hours in the 'lockup' of the town, and, at length, being taken to the magistrate, accompanied by his groom and another servant, and made a deposition upon oath. The magistrate was an old clergyman to whom Squire Pack had given the 'living,' and who was in the habit of receiving his rents 'of course' to avoid the sentence the Squire uttered. A warrant for my apprehension was immediately issued, and I was taken into custody. What impression before the clerical magistrate I can not recollect; but I can remember being placed several hours in the 'lock-up' of the town, and, at length, being taken to the magistrate, accompanied by a police-officer, and made a deposition upon oath. The consequence was, I was committed to take my trial at the Spring Assizes, which were to come on while sent to prison.

"While I was in those cold and dismal cells my father never came near me; nor did he write to me, or even send me a message. The only person who came to see me was Francis Bowman, the son of Sir Francis Bowman, who did all in his power to comfort me, although, I was told, he was and shrunken form plainly betrayed that he was bordering on insanity, caused by grief. George told me that Sir Francis Bowman had gone to Squire Pack; but the Squire would not listen to him, and that he was resolved to recover the colt, or double the value, of the colt which had been stolen' by me—swearing that 'the law should take its course.'

"The day of trial came, and I was arraigned. George Bowman had engaged a barrister to plead my defense, but his advocacy was of no avail. He urged that I had not taken the colt with the intention of stealing it, but in the belief that it was to be ridden to. To this the other counsel replied, 'Why did she take another horse because it was lame? Why not her at the inn,' was the rejoinder. This the jury regarded as a very foul foolish tale, and found me guilty. Judge Gaselee, who tried me, put on the cap, and sentenced me to be hanged by the neck until I was dead.

"What happened afterward—whom I saw, or what they said—I know not. I was in a perfect lethargy, and did not recover my senses until more than half of the voyage to the colony was concluded."

Here the old lady paused for a brief while, and then resumed.

"What Kate's sufferings must have been, when she was conscious of what was passing around her, it would, indeed, be difficult to describe. She was not only to bear the companionship of the three hundred degraded wretches who were her fellow-passengers, but she endured the unspeakable horrors of the Navy surgeon, who had charge of the convicts, and who had become enamored of her detestable beauty. The captain of the vessel, also, fell desperately in love with her, and on several occasions proposed to her that she should elope with and settle in the colony. The surgeon having heard of this, quarreled with the captain, and informed Kate that if she ever spoke or listened to the captain again he would have her hair cut off, and that he would flog her himself. This was a fearful power, you know, of inflicting such punishment upon any female convict who was under the ship's command. The captain, being informed by one of his officers of this threat, thrashed the surgeon on the quarter-deck, to the delight of the convicts, who looked on and cried 'Bravo!' The surgeon called the guard, (all-by soldiers (recruits). But as each man had his sweetheart among the convicts, the affair was regarded as the 'woman's cause,' the guard declined to interfere, and the captain, in a fit of rage, struck the surgeon a shot, so far as discipline was concerned, but it tended very materially to Kate Crawford's advantage, for the captain, and contending passions of the two men she was in a fair way to suffer severely at the hands of both self. When the ship arrived in the harbor the surgeon preferred a complaint against the captain and his officers, as a result of which the latter, which resulted in a manner rather prejudicial to the surgeon, and the commander of the vessel found it was not to be permitted to depart the colony until the pleasure of his Majesty's Government was known. Such pleasure was never known to be afterward. It was to the effect that the surgeon was to be sent to England in another vessel, in the first man-of-war that touched at Port Jackson. He had seen the prisoners on board and administered at the investigation to warrant and insure his removal from the service of the state.

"Soon after her arrival Kate had to undergo fresh persecutions. She was 'assigned' to a gentleman of very large possessions, each of whom was anxious to have her 'assigned' to him as a servant. It was not uncommon in those days for officers to marry their assigned servants and make them sell rum at the back doors of their private houses, or quarters, by private subscription, for the sum of fifty (fifteen pence) a glass. It was by these means that many of them amassed their large wealth in ready money."

"Did the Government know of this?" I asked.

"That is a question I decline to answer," replied the old lady. "But this I know that, when the duty was taken off rum imported to the colony, very few people were licensed to keep public houses. However, none of these gentlemen were destined to be the master of Kate Crawford. The statement she made at the investigation aroused the sympathy of Mrs. Macquarie (the Governor's wife), who evinced the respect and affection of all who knew her. Mrs. Macquarie was driven in her private carriage to the Factory at Parramatta—a institution to which female convicts were taken on their arrival in Sydney—and there had an interview with the unfortunate girl. I accompanied Mrs. Macquarie on that occasion.

"When Kate was brought by the matron superintendent into the room in which Mrs. Macquarie and myself were seated, she was dressed in the uniform garb of females under sentence of transportation—a coarse cotton petticoat, a check, a white apron, white cap without frills or strings, thick-soled shoes, and no stockings. The things were made short, so that the ankles and the lower part of the legs were visible, while the arms were perfectly bare from the elbow joint. Notwithstanding these hideous garments, Kate still preserved the bearing of a well-bred gentlewoman. There was no low courtesy—no 'May it please your ladyship'—no folding of the hands; but there was a gentle inclination of the head and of the body, and a honest, modest look, which would at once have satisfied the most inexperienced person in the world that the girl was incapable of committing any crime. And when Mrs. Macquarie, with a gracious movement of the hand, motioned her to be seated, she thanked and obliged the old lady similarly unconsciously.

"I have not come to see you out of mere curiosity,' said Mrs. Macquarie, 'nor have I come without cause to see you. I have heard of your situation as that in which you are now placed. I simply come, armed with the authority of the Governor, to know by what means I can serve you. The colony may be rendered the least painful.'

"On hearing these words, and the accented kindness, the poor girl burst into passionate tears, and Mrs. Macquarie and myself followed her example.

"When she had recovered, and in a condition to listen, Mrs. Macquarie again put the question to her, and the girl replied, with a burst of sorrow:

"'Do with me, or for me, whatever your kind heart may dictate.'

"Then you shall live,' said Mrs. Macquarie, 'in private apartments, in the house of Mr. Hawkins, the chief superintendent, and nothing more shall make you as comfortable as circumstances will admit of. Under that roof you will be perfectly safe and protected from insult, annoyance, or impunes. And if you will allow me, I will not even the means of providing you with such work as suitable apparel than that you are now wearing.'

"Poor Kate expressed her gratitude in becoming terms, and was conducted by Mrs. Hawkins. The quarie then ordered the coachman to drive to the house of the chief superintendent of convicts at the Khersines. They were very respectable people, the Khersines; and Mrs. Macquarie considered that Kate was to board with them. I don't know whether Khersin and his wife were recompensed by a payment from the colonial chest, but I am quite satisfied that they lost nothing by the kindness they showed to the unfortunate girl.

"Whenever the Major and myself went to Parramatta, we never failed to pay Kate a visit, and after a long period of time, it was considered by us that she had received a reply to a letter she had written to her father, in which Mr. Crawford, George Bowman, she said, had, shortly after her conviction, become insane, and was a hopeless lunatic in an asylum. That her father had married a young damsel, and had by her an infant son. John Pack had died, and, consequently, was out of the cruel course of conduct his father had pursued, quarreled with the old man, flogged him in his passion, and threatened to shoot him with a pistol, farmer on his own account. Squire Pack, too, had been quite a changed man, and had made up his quarrel with Squire Crawford.

"Kate was only three years a prisoner of the Crown, at the end of which period she became a convict. General Macquarie one morning, accompanied by Mrs. Macquarie, Kate, and myself, and their wives, journeyed from Sydney to Parramatta. The cottage drew up opposite to the chief constable's house, and Kate, Mrs. Macquarie, and myself were the only persons who alighted. After a brief interval they returned, bringing with them Miss Kate Crawford. The General handed her to the carriage, and then ordered the postilion to go to Parramatta—to the house of the Commissariat House in Parramatta. There, in the presence of a numerous party, the General performed service with the King's pardon, and at the same time handed to her a piece of parchment, sealed with the seal of the colony, which was the lady's own signature. It was the title-deed of a great tract of land, situated in one of the best parts of Sydney, and situated in one of the best and most all-vivial districts. This ceremony over, the General bid Kate adieu, and the carriage in which we were already. The poor girl—she was then only twenty-three—was overcome by the excitement of her feelings; but she struggled hard to subdue them, and succeeded."

"And the name of her?" I asked.

"You shall hear," said the old lady. "While she was under the protection of Mrs. Hawkins' confidential servant, she became acquainted with the household. All all matters connected with the household, all all cows, the pigs, the poultry, etc., had each and all some share of her attention. And she kept the accounts—for Mrs. Hawkins was ignorant of the animals which they reared. In short, although she did not cease to be what the vulgar call a 'fine lady,' she acquired a woman of business, and a shrewd one, too—not that she ever took an advantage of those with whom she dealt.

"Now free to do what she pleased, and with a great deal in her possession, Kate resolved upon remaining in the colony, and devoting herself to farming and the rearing of cattle. Both the General and Mrs. Macquarie were so fond of her, that any favor she asked was at once accorded. She applied for fifteen convicts; they were assigned to her. She then engaged a very respectable overseer—a man of firmness and integrity. She bestowed three hundred pounds, wherewith to commence operations and build a house. At the end of two years she paid off this debt, and had a considerable balance in hand. The wheat and the Indian maize grown on her farm always brought the highest prices in the market, and she was equally fortunate with her live stock. Many offers of marriage were made to her, year after year, by persons in eligible positions and circumstances; but Mrs. Crawford, as she was now called, was determined on remaining single. She had built for herself a vehicle called a sulky, a gig which had a seat for the accommodation of one person only, and in this she used to drive to Sydney once in every year. Upon all these occasions she was the guest at Government House. In eighteen hundred and twenty-three, she was the owner of twelve thousand pounds in money, which was the average percentage of landed property in the town of Sydney; and in eighteen hundred and thirty-one, when I last saw her, and laughingly said, 'You must be frightfully rich by this time, Kitty,' she replied, 'Well, if I were to die here, there would be about one hundred and twenty thousand pounds to be divided among three or four children, and my will. Your boys are down for a few pounds—not that I fancy they will ever want them.'

"'Is she still alive?' I asked.

"'Yes,' replied the old lady, 'and likely to live for the next twenty years; for although she has many days of sorrow, she never had one of sickness, to my knowledge.'"

[Since the history of Mrs. Crawford was related to me, she has departed this life. The memorialist who gave me this information lived many years in Australia. On asking him what the died possessed of, he answered: "The value of her estate, real and personal, was as nearly as possible half a million sterling."]

MODERN MENDICANCY.

A few days since an indigent female called to see me. She snuffled for alms, which I denied her, being displeased with the mingled odor of spirits and onions that stood on her breath. I did not sympathize; nor would I care to bestow charity on M. Lamartine himself were he to come to me and ask in the scent of that vegetable. Neither do I desire to be placed under the influence of spirits, particularly at second-hand. So the subject of her income indulged, cursed me and my country, and retired under the impression that she had now wrought her own pity-ic service, while the first sense from the fierce, "Get out!" was mine. The smallest silver coin of the republic would have changed that curse to a blessing, but the fact would have been only lip-service, while the first sense would have been heart-felt humor.

Although the squalid columns of beggary encompass the old world capitals here, yet the counterpart in America, we have, nevertheless, a tolerably efficient guerrilla force, whose work it is to levy the means of existence from the unsuspecting: safe citizens who possess a local habitation or an office of any sort. Such people will not go to work make, nor do they ever constitute a castle impregnable to the assaults of these "free lances:" and after the departure of any fair specimen of the mankind very naturally became busy with the adventurous troop, of which she was one of the humblest specimens.

The decayed clergyman—who does not know him? The man in genteel bombazine and white cotton cravat, who drives a precarious trade in books and pamphlets—sermons and homilies mostly in themselves, but so wonderfully stupid that a scornful generation left them to rot, high and dry, on the shelves of second-hand booksellers' shops. He comes in melancholy state, armed with a faded cornpocket, containing his wares, and presents you his steel-bound spectacles, for sympathizers in clerical destitution. He is a beggar of talent. He is effected with bronchial ophthalmia, and a cough from sincere bombazine recesses certificates stating the fact, signed by the secretary of the church to you, the style of whose chirography seems monotonously similar. He exhibits to great a partiality for trade, as your humble correspondent the value of your time, that you wonder why he did not employ decency devoted to truth and sound theology. His talk has a fraternal tone, his manner an august familiarity which is not pleasing. He takes occasion to allude to the sacred text between and their ultimate unhappy destiny; and, with an eye to the pecuniary reward of the missionary, states what might be done for those remote sinners if Christendom would but do its duty, while your own heart, it may be, is wringing at the remembrance of some poor lost sheep wandering away from our own fold, and treading the way to ruin and death! And yet, mentally chilled and benumbed by the torrid stream of the man's eloquence, you give him sixty cents, take his card, and bid him "Good-morning."

The black-haired gentleman, oily-curled, snaky-eyed, hooked-nosed—you have seen him, I think? He wears a dirty mahogany box, and claims to be a Pole of noble birth, exiled for devotion to liberty. You, on the contrary, suspect him to be a German Jew, whose mission is to swindle you through the medium of steel-pens. This nobleman has genuflexions of supreme bigotry of his Israelitish ancestry, and you sturdily decline to trade with him, in the course of the transaction, the taint in his noble blood should poison the pure through plebeian current of your own. He has an unpleasant way of creeping near you while praising his pens, as if determined to possess fabulously what may not be extorted by the milder and more venial process of deception; and you feel strongly impelled to call upon the police to rid you of the enthusiastic patrician before he shall stain his escutcheon for the sake of here.

But this lovely woman appears upon the scene flight in, indeed, your only safety. If you remain, foolishly confident in your own power, you will be lost. Smarting under the loss of her title, she relations to beg for public charities, foreign missions, fallen women and help thirsty; and, as the superannuated mariners, silk robes for the Reverend Stiggins, and napkin-rings for that diminutive preacher's sticky wife in your own, you must finally yield: the voice of the charmer will have so much the effect of the serpent's when dance from your obdurate pockets to the silvery music of her tongue. You will be coaxed, wheedled, taunted into giving. Something of the Shylock—the Polish remnant of nobility you may send away—but they'll beggar, never! Or the lovely woman, to her charities, her missions, her wooden legs, black robes, and napkin-rings: do it at once, with a cheerful air, as though the thing were a pleasure, and you will find it less irksome; then she also will have to demand you can make the result at your leisure. And the each which your conscience tells you ought to be proportionally divided among the butcher, the baker, and candlestick maker (who unsupply beggar, never!) for the whole sum, to devote that to the benevolent purpose of redeeming from bondage the wife and numerous progeny of your colored fellow-citizens, or to any other object you, but in hand, launching from a double tier of unchanging eyes, and you will be saved from the fatally abandoning the suspicion that this captive family has no real existence, you feel you would like to see them. So the "Society for Aiding Females, and the pursuit of happiness"; but you wonder how the jolly-looking, well-dressed ladies (the bears his troubles bravely) will manage to feed his dark-skinned wife and children, should their boats be "stove" in the ice, or their coal, and I am in a question solved by Time, but often in a fearful way.

Has that strolling North Briton, who dealt in illustrated works, published monthly, at twenty-five cents a number, gone West, or back to Canada? Perhaps he has placed the "multitudinous seas" between him and the sheriff of Rockbesher. May some honest lassie hold him her prisoner and Scotland's henceforth! Doubtless he was a man of great benevolence, and I have an aversion to him personally; yet I shall live regret, if not forgive him, if I should find that he never meet again; for did he not persuade me to subscribe to his book, and have I not for two years, punctually, at each quarter, received from him receiving and paying for the numbers? Although it was an arduous task to me, and a severe piece of fatuity, a fanatical belief in mercantile integrity has hitherto prevented me from cancelling this vertical contract. I have left their favor to them, and the thing completed. Yet there is a limit to every thing, and I am sorry that my country is about to invade and my reputation still be stainless. Six months hence I think I can with honor decline to receive the publications of that Scotch gentleman, with great severity of manner, offer to sell back to the publishers the unpaid for numbers. Gentlemen, as I have intimated, has lately vanished) my accumulated stock at half price.

But the last and most savory Englishman with him when he departed that Scotchman would have deserved well of the country. In England he did no such thing. The Englishman is still with us. I saw him yesterday, and the day before, and last week. His country is my country's enemy, his smuggled lace and hosiery, or to sell pictures of the Queen and Albert—pictures of the Prince Consort, which that eminent warrior is depicted in a Field-Marshal's uniform—and other vendible and unvendible articles, which he designates as "gifts" to "swell" and "suck" of John Leech, the souls elsewhere of the unsuspecting. In England he did no such thing. The Englishman is still with us. I saw him yesterday, and the day before, and last week. His country is my country's enemy, his smuggled lace and hosiery, or to sell pictures of the Queen and Albert—pictures of the Prince Consort, which that eminent warrior is depicted in a Field-Marshal's uniform—and other vendible and unvendible articles, which he designates as "gifts" to "swell" and "suck" of John Leech, the souls elsewhere of the unsuspecting. In England he did no such thing. The Englishman is still with us. I saw him yesterday, and the day before, and last week. His country is my country's enemy, his smuggled lace and hosiery, or to sell pictures of the Queen and Albert—pictures of the Prince Consort, which that eminent warrior is depicted in a Field-Marshal's uniform—and other vendible and unvendible articles, which he designates as "gifts" to "swell" and "suck" of John Leech, the souls elsewhere of the unsuspecting.

The decayed clergyman—who does not know him? The man in genteel bombazine and white cotton cravat, who drives a precarious trade in books and pamphlets—sermons and homilies mostly in themselves, but so wonderfully stupid that a scornful generation left them to rot, high and dry, on the shelves of second-hand booksellers' shops. He comes in melancholy state, armed with a faded cornpocket, containing his wares, and presents you his steel-bound spectacles, for sympathizers in clerical destitution. He is a beggar of talent. He is effected with bronchial ophthalmia, and a cough from sincere bombazine recesses certificates stating the fact, signed by the secretary of the church to you, the style of whose chirography seems monotonously similar. He exhibits to great a partiality for trade, as your humble correspondent the value of your time, that you wonder why he did not employ decency devoted to truth and sound theology. His talk has a fraternal tone, his manner an august familiarity which is not pleasing. He takes occasion to allude to the sacred text between and their ultimate unhappy destiny; and, with an eye to the pecuniary reward of the missionary, states what might be done for those remote sinners if Christendom would but do its duty, while your own heart, it may be, is wringing at the remembrance of some poor lost sheep wandering away from our own fold, and treading the way to ruin and death! And yet, mentally chilled and benumbed by the torrid stream of the man's eloquence, you give him sixty cents, take his card, and bid him "Good-morning."

The black-haired gentleman, oily-curled, snaky-eyed, hooked-nosed—you have seen him, I think? He wears a dirty mahogany box, and claims to be a Pole of noble birth, exiled for devotion to liberty. You, on the contrary, suspect him to be a German Jew, whose mission is to swindle you through the medium of steel-pens. This nobleman has genuflexions of supreme bigotry of his Israelitish ancestry, and you sturdily decline to trade with him, in the course of the transaction, the taint in his noble blood should poison the pure through

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

EXPERIMENTS WITH DIFFERENT MANURES.

Much capital and labor are lost in making useless experiments with different kinds of manures, which, for the most part, lead to no exact knowledge. On a part of a given surface of soil wood-ashes are applied; on another part, plaster of Paris, or gypsum; on another, lime; on another, guano, etc., and that which gives the largest crop is said to be the best manure. It may or may not be the best, but whether or not the result is no exact guide to a rational system of practice, because we have no explanation given of the requirements of the soil and the conditions caused by one manure compared with another. Some farther who may happen to see an account of such experiments in an agricultural paper or book copies them in every essential particular: that is, he applies to a given surface of soil the same quantity of manure, and of the same kind, as may have been spoken of, and the same crop is grown; but if his land varies much in quality from that of his friend who made the experiment he copies, and very unlike results are obtained, he can only help thinking that some more fortunate farmer has given to a true account or that he has made a mistake himself. If the former, the latter is right; if the latter, the former must be right. If both these persons have no means to doubt the correctness of their experiments, it becomes evident that like manures have a different effect on different soils. But seldom is the difference attributed to a difference of conditions, because the experiments have been made on but a single acre of country, without the slightest attempt being made as to the character or requirements of the soil. Hence it is that we find one farmer advocating enthusiastically that lime is the best manure, and another farmer who is equally warm in favor of some other substance. Both are right, and such large crops on his fields that he is satisfied if every farmer knew its importance as well as he does the prosperity of agriculture would be at a point limit; forgetting, in his enthusiasm, that what is adapted to one soil is not suited to another, and consequently, that what cures one patient will kill another. But all this mode of procedure is groping in the dark. What is still worse, prejudice shuts our eyes to be blindfolded in the light of day. Chemical science has given us the true nature of the soil, the plant, and the air, and has shown that the word soil means several substances rather than one, and that a single one of the word plant, and the word air. The soil and the air are the sources whence the raw material necessary for the building of the plant is obtained.

Let it be remembered that the plant is not a single or simple substance, but is made up of several. If a piece of wood is burned, ashes will be left behind. Suppose the burning some parts of the wood pass into the air. The housekeeper is in the habit of washing the ashes to get lye for making soft soap; a large percentage of this lye is potash, which came from the ashes, which came from the wood, which came from the soil in which the wood grew. This substance, potash, is one of the several which compose the ashes, such as lime, soda, etc. If, then, experiments have shown that a sequence of particular substances in the soil prevents a certain plant from successfully growing in it, then supplying them in a proper manner restores fertility, we get at a simple and truthful explanation of the principle that each plant must grow on its own soil fertilizers. The word manure, like the word soil, means many substances than one, and different manures must vary in action as they vary in composition, even if all other things are equal. These principles are their best to be applied, and we do say any claim to their discovery. The honor of this is due to Liebig alone. We are but the errand-boy giving the message to our readers.

THE CROPS.

What we hear from our correspondents all over the country about the crops is, for the most part, very cheering.

The fruit crop of South Carolina is said to be quite promising. A writer says: "We do not remember ever to have seen a better prospect—the prospect of a fruit crop, both as regards quantity and quality."

The wheat-growers of Pennsylvania are delighted with the prospects of an abundant harvest.

The wheat crop of Iowa looks remarkably well; but as there was not an extensive breadth of land sown last fall, it is feared that there will not be enough to supply the State. Seed for spring wheat was scarce, and not of good quality.

There is good news of the corn crop in the southern part of Illinois.

In the northern part so far is held in St. Louis will take place September 26, 1859, and the millers of said place offer premiums for the best qualities of the same. Entries may be made up to the 20th inst. Satisfactory testimony must be given of the wheat the superior flour. The premiums are as follows: Premiums per acre, etc. The premiums offered are as follow:

For the largest and best crop of white fall wheat—First premium, $125; second premium, $75.

For the largest and best crop of red fall wheat—First premium, $125; second premium, $75.

For the largest and best crop of blue stem wheat—First premium, $125; second premium, $75.

For the largest and best crop of golden chaff wheat—First premium, $125; second premium, $75.

For the largest and best crop of spring wheat—First premium, $125; second premium, $75.

For the largest and best crop of oats—First premium, $125; second premium, $75.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRIDAY EVENING, Saturday, June 11, 1859.

The week which ends this day has witnessed an increase of activity and more buoyancy than before in the demand for gold for export, and to the prudent policy of restriction practiced by the Banks. Money on call remains plentiful enough at 5 @ 6 per cent.; but for the accommodation of the discount market, and very good paper is done at 8 @ 9. Exchange on Europe is higher than it was last week, but the remittances have been so liberal that there is little or no demand, and the rate quoted is still

It is understood that the great railroad lines to the West have settled their differences, and are about to establish an equitable tariff of rates. This, if confirmed, will cause an improvement in the stock market, which continues sadly depressed.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, June 11, 1859.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have been very quiet for Breadstuffs, which have been freely offered at reduced prices. Yet the demand has been unusually tame. The startling fresh accounts from the West has not affected trade to any important extent. The general belief is that the injustice to the crops have been greatly exaggerated, and purposely to influence the markets on the seaboard. Corn, under these circumstances, stands an improved eligibility. The available supply here is 83,675 bales, against 91,703 bales same time last year. The receipts at the shipping ports to latest dates this season have been 1,300,000 bales, against 2,128,000 to the corresponding period of last season. The total exports from the United States so far this season have been 2,674,402 bales, against 3,511,000 to the same period last season. The total stock on hand and in shipment at the Southern ports at the latest dates is 1,300,000 bales, against 61,479 bales at the same time last year. The receipts at the interior towns at the latest dates are 1,164,000 bales, against 62,975 bales at the corresponding date a year ago. Provisions have been on hand for trade, and, as prices have declined, ... Groceries have been unsettled. Sugars have been pressed for sale, and at reduced rates, while Coffee, Teas, Rice, and Molasses have been in very moderate request. Hides, Hops, Bale Leather, Common Rosin, and Spirits Turpentine have been in good demand. Ashes, Bristles, Hemp, Oils, Tobacco, and Wool have been in slack demand. ..... Trade in Dry Goods has been quite unsettled at prices, and movements are of insufficient importance, either in their extent or in their effects, to require special notice. Generally holders of desirable goods are firm, and are not pressed for sales. Some lots of cotton goods, however, are offered on much easier terms, such as Carolina Wovens, for which the demand is very limited. Clothiers have been buying moderately. The under-current of activity in Dry Goods over $274,000, against $467,858 same week last year. Imports entered at N. Y., $4,051,661, against $28,177,476 same time last year. ..... The movements in the Breadstuffs have been the production of any remarkable character. ..... We append a related list of the leading articles in the Produce Market:

Standard Super State Flour, per barrel	$6 10	@	$6 40
Extra State Flour	6 60	@	6 90
Superfine Western	5 75	@	6 00
Low to Choice Extra Ohio	6 20	@	6 35
Superfine Ohio	5 75	@	6 00
Superfine Southern	7 10	@	7 50
Extra Southern	6 60	@	6 75
Superfine Rye Flour	4 00	@	4 75
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 75	@	4 00
White Michigan Wheat, per bushel	1 55	@	1 80
White Southern Wheat	1 55	@	1 80
Red Western Wheat	1 45	@	1 50
Milwaukee Club	1 35	@	1 50
Red Kentucky	1 45	@	1 50
New Yellow Corn	1 0	@	1 06
Mixed	1 0	@	1 06
Barley	1 0	@	1 10
Canada Barley	1 0	@	1 10
Black Oats	0 55	@	0 58
Prime Canada Peas	1 0	@	1 02
Southern Oats	0 48	@	0 50
Prime Timothy Seed	4 00	@	4 50
Prime Clover Seed	6	@	7
Prime Flax Seed	1	@	1 05
Mess Pork, per barrel	15 75	@	16 00
Hams, per pound	8	@	8½
Shoulders	6½	@	6¾
Lard	11	@	11½
Fair to Prime State Butter, new	12	@	16
Ohio Butter, new	13	@	17
Prime Cheese	7	@	8
Rice, per 100 pounds	3 50	@	5 00
Rio Coffee, per pound	10	@	11
New Orleans Sugar	4½	@	7½
Havana Brown Sugar	6½	@	7½
Prime Teas, per pound	35	@	65
Young Hyson	25	@	45
Domestic Molasses	25	@	30
Hops, Crop of 1858, per pound	9	@	12
Hops, Shipping Crop	10	@	12
Tallow, per pound	9	@	11
Spirits Turpentine, per 100 pounds	4	@	4
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	47½	@	47½
Rosin, per 280 pounds	2 50	@	3 00
Common Stain, per 310 pounds	1 55	@	1 87½
Crude Sperm Oil, per gallon	1	@	1
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	6	@	12
Seed Leaf Tobacco	6	@	12
American Fleece Wool	31	@	36
Pulled Wool	30	@	50

Freights have been somewhat brisker, rates having declined. To Liverpool, Cotton, per pound, 3-16d. @ 7-16d. per barrel; Beef, 1s. 3d. per tierce; Heavy Goods, 30s. per ton. The number of vessels cleared at all classes in port is 370.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were heavy, and lower for the entire supply of which was large. ..... Milch Cows were in excess of the demand, and prices were depressed. ..... Veal Calves fell off materially for the week were fair, but the demand was good, and all sold at last week's rates. ..... Sheep and Lambs were in large request at full rates. The receipts of Swine were somewhat adequate to the demand, and prices were steady.

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday were as follows:

Ordinary to Premium Beeves, per pound	$ 8½	@	$ 11¼
Extra Cows and Calves, per head	45	@	55 00
Veal Calves, per pound	4½	@	7½
Sheep and Lambs, per head	3	@	6
Lambs, per pound	5½	@	8
Swine	6½	@	7
Dressed	8½	@	9½
Shedding Pigs, each	3	@	3 50

The Country Produce Markets were freely supplied with new Fruits and Vegetables, as well as with Poultry. The demand was brisk. The following are the Fruit and Vegetables and limited for Poultry. Eggs were less plentiful, and the demand was good, and prices firm.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Strawberries, per 16-quart basket	$1 50	@	$3 50
Cherries, per pound	4	@	10
Gooseberries, per quart	6	@	8
Apples, per barrel	1 75	@	2 50
Potatoes, old, per barrel	1 75	@	2 00
Potatoes, new, Southern	2 75	@	3 50
Onions	1 50	@	2 00
Onions, new, per dozen bunches	37	@	50
Beets, per barrel	1 00	@	1 25
Carrots, per barrel	1 00	@	1 25
Cabbage, new, per 100	4 00	@	6 00
Garlic, per 100 bunches	4 50	@	5 00
Green Beans, per bushel	1 75	@	2 00
Eggs, N. Y. and N. J., per dozen	13	@	15
Chickens, per pound	12½	@	15
Chickens, Ducks	13	@	15
Geese, Spring	1 50	@	1 75
Turkeys	12	@	16
Veal, per pound	6	@	8
Hams, per pound	12	@	14
Pigeons, per dozen	1 25	@	2 00
Milk, per quart	6	@	8
Snipe, per dozen	25	@	1 50

THE NEW KING OF NAPLES.

THE NEW QUEEN OF NAPLES.

THE NEW KING AND QUEEN OF NAPLES.

THE accompanying portraits are those of King Francesco Secondo, who has just succeeded his father on the throne of the Two Sicilies, and of his wife the Queen, the late Duchess of Calabria.

Francesco is the eldest son of that monarch who, under the nickname of Bomba—from his bombardments of his own cities to punish revolutionary movements—became infamous throughout the civilized world. Allowance must always be made for partisan spite in reading popular lives of monarchs who have opposed the popular will; but every allowance made for this perturbating element, it is impossible to study the historical facts of his career without becoming convinced that he was one of the worst monarchs of his day—a type of blood superstition, cruelty, debauchery, and treachery. Ascending the throne in the same year as Louis Philippe, he found his kingdom quiet, poor, and sadly in need of administrative reform and fostering care on the part of the monarch; it would have been rebellious, but Austria took care to prevent that. Bomba let his people thrive or starve as they could; he took no concern about public affairs, save to collect his taxes; his time he divided between very gross debauchery and very silly superstitious performances. In 1848 he met the revolutionary storm with the treachery of his race. He granted a constitution, summoned patriots to his councils, encouraged democratic sentiment, advocated universal suffrage, patronized political clubs, even sent troops to Charles Albert, his brother-in-law. The popular sentiment thus appeased, the King made a secret alliance with the lazzarone, the street populace of Naples, who are always to be found on the side of plunder and brigandage; then, having laid his plans warily, under Austrian counsels, at the first convenient period he proceeded to undo his work. He abolished the constitution (receiving a special dispensation from the Pope to enable him to violate his oath); put the patriots in dungeons, where they perished by the hundreds; bombarded his cities; imprisoned those who spoke or wrote in favor of liberty, put an end to suffrage of every kind, suppressed all public meetings, and taught his soldiers to use their weapons against the best and purest citizens of Naples.

For this great crime against Heaven and truth he was fearfully punished. During the ten years of life which remained to him he never had a day of peace. He was in such dread of assassination that he hardly dared show himself in public, and his meals were all tasted by a number of public officials before he would touch them. Even these precautions could not shield him from the most agonizing fits of terror; though he kept from 10,000 to 15,000 men in prison for political opinions, torturing them with the cap of silence and all sorts of similar fiendish inventions of cruelty, he saw an assassin in every stranger, and almost fainted at the sight of a naked sword. His early vices recoiled upon him in the shape of a complication of hideous, loathsome diseases, for which European science was puzzled to discover a name. His body was covered with putrid sores; he had tumors in various parts (one of them was cut out and burned with religious honors in consecrated ground); his bones were attacked with the agonizing disease known as ostosarcosus, or cancer of the bone; tubercles formed in his lungs.

If any thing was wanting to the misery of this wretched man, thus racked in body and spirit, the deficiency was supplied by the Jesuits. Under the French rule at Naples the Jesuits were barely tolerated; under the Bourbons, who preceded Bomba, they were allowed to exercise their calling under supervision; under Bomba they became the rulers of the state, the fountain of all power, the source of all instruction, the keeper of all men's consciences, the thieves of all men's purses, the directors of all men's views. And of all the men whom these Jesuits trampled in body, spirit, purse, public action, and private life, the most cruelly trodden was King Ferdinand. Him the Jesuits beset with such devilish cunning and pertinacity that had he possessed a sound mind at nay time they would have driven him mad. They made him confess twice a day, and perform all kinds of preposterous penance—one for his real crimes, another for imaginary sins. They taught him to expect a visit from the Virgin in person, and the poor wretch fancied that every sound which disturbed his slumber was her tread, and relapsed into an agony of disappointment when the vision did not appear. They made him believe that the medicines he took (which, in truth, could be of little service in such a desperate case as his) were of no use unless a ray which the Pope had blessed; and the severing King, in his paroxysms of pain, poured the rag on the seat of his suffering, cursed himself that he felt no relief, wept bitterly at having backslid again, and spent hundreds of pounds on confessors to give him poison, and so end his unendurable tortures.

TWO SPIES BROUGHT INTO THE FRENCH CAMP AT ALESSANDRIA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY VIZETELLY.]

Even his wife did her share toward imbittering his last moments. Her—a princess of Austria—he had married eleven months after the death of his first wife, the mother of the present King. She set at heart on having her own children reign here, and her chief son substituted in his stead as heir to the throne. Poor Ferdinand had strength enough to prevent the accomplishment of this part of the scheme, and devoted to the Jesuits, and they to him; so the wife failed, though for the very life of Ferdinand's death she persecuted him with her entreaties.

Such was the life of the father of the young king whose portrait we have given. It is a terrible example for him.

Of Francisco himself but little is known. A writer who has good opportunities of acquiring information says of him:

"He is represented as having, under his father, led a very secluded life, being kept at a distance, indeed from out, and, above all, from the city. He is described also as a recreationist, and was even in close confinement. His education is said to have been at first neglected, but nothing much neglected—not without intention or without effect. While yet an infant he was placed exclusively in the hands of the priests, who were deputed not to train him nothing, and have succeeded to perfection. He is represented as having no taste for the practices of devotion, his bed being completely covered with crucifixes, rosaries, and holy pictures, and having the greater part of the day in uttering paternosters and Ave Marias. Timid, and shrinking from the presence of strangers, he knows no one, and no one knows him. The reputation and the accomplishments of his sister, Isabella, nevertheless, the most excellent intentions, and believed has to be kept down by the priests, who fear and hate the hatred of the Queen, and feared, like the ancient Roman, to give the part of a king to one who is not to be suffered to be a Brutus. They assumed that his exaggerated devotion was but a false form of that sentiment which precious actions of famous and benevolence; and promise, in his mind, insensibility to the ties of nature to the throne, the constitution and a general amnesty."

Of his wife a Paris letter thus speaks:

"The only influence on the mind of the Spanish minds can found any hope is that of the Duchess of Calabria, his wife. It is notorious how the day after the day she arrived at Naples this young Princess entered into direct opposition to the King, and how she succeeded in driving them by small intermissions, which mean without importance, but which are strongly characteristic of the strictness of the Court; an extravagant luxury of dress and passion for pleasure, a taste for hunting and horses; and, since we must tell all, the new mania for tobacco, seen in broad daylight and in the open air. But the young Duchess has also a taste for literature and romance reviews, and proves that she can resist and will have her to command. She is very much liked by the persons who are near at the head of the opposition—although she must be pretty just before the Queen, and the favored Flanglezi, for example, is one of her most favored friends. It is, however, believed that she will not be favorable to the Italian movement. Her family, indeed, even all its importance by Austria, she, and its house, animates a little, by her youth and vivacity, the palace of Caserta, which is more like a hospital than the seat of a Court, and has already the appearance of a tomb, closed to all visitors, and hiding from all eyes its profound, crowded with priests, who brings relics and miraculous objects than to restore the poor fatherly, shaded by physicians. The palace recalls forcibly the gloomy cities which are strikingly painted by St. Simon, of Versailles during the last days of Louis XIV."

THE CAPTURE OF SPIES BY THE FRENCH.

THE engraving on the previous page depicts the capture of two wretched Italian spies who were lately taken within the French lines near Alessandria. As is well known, their fate will be death. Indeed, we hear already of one having been shot, and they probably are among the number. The author of the sketch, Mr. Vizetelly, thus alludes to its subject:

"It is scarcely matter for surprise that strict surveillance should be enforced, as the Sardinians have much to apprehend from Austrian spies. One was taken last Saturday, and shot on the following Monday. He was from Pavia, and an Italian, which makes the matter all the more disgraceful. Two other spies were arrested on Sunday morning, and, from their appearance, Italians also. They were escorted to the citadel by some of the 7th Piedmontese Regiment of Infantry. I send you a sketch of the party."

During the Crimean war the French showed a remarkable alacrity in shooting spies. Many persons will still remember the story of an unfortunate German artist who had contrived to obtain permission to visit the allied camp to sketch; one day he strayed into the French quarters, was seized as a spy, and, before he could obtain witnesses to identify him, was dragged out and shot by a hasty colonel, who sent his compliments and a thousand apologies to his family when he discovered his error.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

In Three Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

To be Printed from early Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers pay the Author

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK II.

THE GOLDEN THREAD.

CHAPTER IV.

CONGRATULATORY.

FROM the dimly-lighted passages of the court the last echo faded away, and the measured tramp of the watch in the corridors, falling heavily upon the ground without, died softly away.

Mr. Stryver, the bustle, Lucie Manette his daughter, Mr. Lorry, the solicitor for the defense, and its counsel Mr. Stryver, stood gathered round Mr. Charles Darnay—just released—congratulating him on his escape from death.

It would have been difficult by a far brighter light, to read the story of this group, in the faces. Much of face and upright of bearing, the shoulders of the great stalwart Mr. Lorry, on one could have looked at him twice without looking again; even though the opportunity of observation had not extended to the mournful cadence of his low grave voice, and to the abstraction that overclouded him fitfully, without any apparent reason. While one external cause, and that a reference to his long lingering agony, would surely—so the face—strike anyone observing from the depths of his soul, it was also in its nature to arise of itself, and to draw a gloom over him, as incomprehensible to those unacquainted with his story as if they had seen the shadow of the actual Bastile thrown upon him by a summer sun, when the substance was three hundred miles away.

Only his daughter had the power of charming this black brooding from his mind. She was the golden thread that united him to the past. Except his mercy, and to a Present beyond his recovery, and to a Future based on his histories, the love of her was the golden thread that bound her face, the touch of her hand, had a strong beneficial influence with him almost always. Not absolutely always, for there were occasional occasions on which her power had failed; but they were few and slight, and she believed them over.

Mr. Darnay had kissed her hand fervently and gratefully, and had raised her from the ground whom he warmly thanked. Mr. Stryver, a man of little more than thirty, but looking five years older than he was, stout, loud, red, bluff, and free from any drawback of delicacy, had a pushing way of shouldering himself (morally and physically) into companies and conversations that succeeded well for his shouldering his way up in life.

He still had his wig and gown on, and he said, squaring himself at his late client to that degree that he squeezed the innocent Mr. Lorry clean out of the group: "I say, Carton, I'll be glad to be counsel to-day, you know. Mr. Darnay. It pays not quite disinterestedly, but with the interested object of squeezing himself back again.

"You think so?" said Mr. Stryver. "Well! you have been present all day, and you ought to know. You are a man of business, too."

"And as such," quoth Mr. Lorry, whom the counsel learned in the law had now shouldered back into the group, just as he had previously shouldered him out of it—"as such, I will appeal to Doctor Manette, to decide for me, whether in reference and order as all to our houses. Miss Lucie looks ill, Mr. Darnay has had a terrible day, we are worn out."

"Speak for yourself, Mr. Lorry," said Stryver; "I have had a night's work to do yet. Speak for yourself."

"I speak for myself," answered Mr. Lorry, "and for Mr. Darnay, and for Miss Lucie, and— Miss Lucie, do you not think I may speak for us all?" He asked her the question pointedly, and with a glance at her father.

His face had become frozen, as it were, in a very curious look at Darnay: an intent look, deepening into a frown of dislike and distrust, not even unmixed with fear. With his strange expression on him his thoughts had wandered away.

"My father," said Lucie, softly laying her hand on his.

He slowly shook the shadow off, and turned to her.

"Shall we go home, my father?"

With a long breath, he answered, "Yes."

The friends of the acquitted prisoner had dispersed, under the impression—which his lifelong self had originated—that he would not be released that night. The lights were nearly all extinguished in the passages, the iron gates were being closed with a jar and a rattle, and the dismal place was deserted until the next morning's interest of gallows, pillory, whipping-post, and branding-iron should repeople it. Walking between her father and Mr. Darnay, Lucie Manette passed into the open air. A hackney-coach was called, and the father and daughter departed in it.

Mr. Stryver had left them in the passages, to shoulder his way back to the robing-room. Another person who had not joined the group, or interchanged a word with any one of them, but who had been leaning against the wall where its shadow was darkest, had slowly strolled away after the rest, and had looked on until the coach drove away. He now stepped up to where Mr. Lorry and Mr. Darnay stood upon the pavement.

"So, Mr. Lorry! Men of business may speak to Mr. Darnay now?"

Nobody had made any acknowledgment of Mr. Carton's part in the day's proceedings; nobody had known of it. He was unrobed, and was none the better for it in appearance.

"If you know what a conflict goes on in the business mind, when the business mind is divided between good-natured impulse and business appearances, you would be amused, Mr. Darnay."

Mr. Lorry reddened, and said, warmly, "You have mentioned that before, Sir. We men of business, who serve a House, are not our own masters. We have to think of the House more than of ourselves."

"I know, I know," rejoined Mr. Carton, carelessly. "Don't be nettled, Mr. Lorry. You are so great a man, I believe in business; hence, I dare say."

"And indeed, Sir," pursued Mr. Lorry, not minding him, "I really don't know what you have to do with the matter. If you'll excuse my saying so, very much office, for saying so, I really don't know that it is your business."

"Business! Bless you, I have no business," said Mr. Carton.

"It is a pity you have not, Sir."

"I think so, too."

"If you had," pursued Mr. Lorry, "perhaps you would attend to it."

"Lord love you, no!—I shouldn't," said Mr. Carton.

"Well, Sir!" cried Mr. Lorry, thoroughly heated by his indifference, "business is a very good thing, and a very respectable thing. And, Sir, if business imposes its restraints and its silences and impediments, Mr. Darnay, as a young gentleman of generosity, knows how to make allowance for that circumstance. Mr. Darnay, good-night; God bless you, Sir! I hope you have been this day preserved for a prosperous and happy life.—Chair there!"

Perhaps a little angry with himself, as well as with the barrister, Mr. Lorry bustled into the chair, and was carried off to Tellson's. Carton, who smelled of port-wine, and did not appear to be quite sober, laughed then, and turned to Darnay:

"This is a strange chance that throws you and me together. This must be a strange night to you, standing alone here with your counsel present on these street-stones?"

"I landed this morning, as you learned Charles Darnay, "to belong to this world again."

"I don't wonder at it; it's not so long since you were pretty far advanced on your way to another. You speak faintly."

"I begin to think I am faint."

"Then why the devil don't you dine? I dined, myself, while those blockheads were deliberating which world you should belong to—this, or some other. Let me show you the nearest tavern to dine well at."

Drawing his arm through his own, he took him down Ludgate-hill to Fleet Street, and, up a covered way, into a tavern. Here they were shown into a little room, where Charles Darnay was soon recruiting his strength with a good plain dinner and good wine; while Carton sat opposite to him at the same table, with his separate bottle of port before him, and his fully half-conscious manner upon him.

"Do you feel yet that you belong to this terrestrial scheme again, Mr. Darnay?"

"I am feeling strangely confused regarding time and place; but I am so far mended as to feel that."

"It must be an immense satisfaction!"

He said it bitterly, and filled up his glass unconsciously as it was a large one.

"As to me, the greatest desire I have is to forget that I belong to it. It has no good in it for me—except wine like this—nor I for it. So we are not much alike in that particular. Indeed, I begin to think we are not much alike in any particular, you and I."

Confused by the speaker's emotion of the day, and feeling his being there with this Double of coarse department, to be like a dream, Charles Darnay was at a loss how to answer; finally, answered not at all.

"Now your dinner is done," Carton presently said, "why don't you call a health, Mr. Darnay; why don't you give your toast?"

"What health?" What toast?"

"Why, it's on the tip of your tongue. It ought to be, it must be, I'll swear it's there."

"Miss Manette, then!"

"Miss Manette, then!"

Looking his companion full in the face while he drank the toast, Carton flung his glass over his shoulder against the wall, where it shivered to pieces; then rang the bell and ordered in another.

"That's a fair young lady to hand to a coach in the dark, Mr. Darnay!" he said, filling his new glass.

A slight frown and a laconic "Yes" were the answer.

"That's a fair young lady to be pitied by and wept for by! How does it feel? Is it worth being tried for one's life to be the object of such sympathy and compassion, Mr. Darnay?"

Again Darnay answered not a word.

"She was mightily pleased to have your message, when I gave it her. Not that she showed it much, perhaps, but I suppose she was."

This allusion served as a timely reminder to Darnay that this disagreeable companion had, of his own free-will, assisted him in the strait of the day. He turned the dialogue to that point, and thanked him for it.

"I neither want any thanks, nor merit any," was the careless rejoinder. "It was nothing to do, in the first place; and I don't know why I did it, in the second. Mr. Darnay, let me ask you a question."

THE LION AND THE JACKAL.

"Willingly, and a small return for your good offices."

"Do you think I particularly like you?"

"Really, Mr. Carton," returned the other, oddly disconcerted, "I have not asked myself the question."

"But ask yourself the question now."

"You have acted as if you do; but I don't think you do."

"I don't think I do," said Carton. "I begin to have a very good opinion of your understanding."

"Nevertheless," pursued Darnay, rising to ring the bell, "there is nothing in that, I hope, to prevent my calling the reckoning, and our parting without ill-blood on either side."

Carton rejoining, "Nothing in life!" Darnay rang. "Do you call the whole reckoning?" said Carton. On his answering in the affirmative, "Then bring me another pint of this same wine, drawn, and cork and wire me at once."

The bill being paid, Charles Darnay rose and wished him good-night. Without returning the wish, Carton rose too, with something of a threat or defiance in his manner, and said, "A last word, Mr. Darnay: you think I am drunk?"

"I think you have been drinking, Mr. Carton."

"Think? You know I have been drinking."

"Since I must say so, I know it."

"Then you know likewise how shy. I am a disappointed drudge, Sir. I care for no man on earth, and no man on earth cares for me."

"Much to be regretted. You might have used your talents better."

"Maybe so, Mr. Darnay; maybe not. Don't let your sober face elate you, however; you don't know what may come to, Good-night!"

When he was left alone this strange being took up a candle, went to a glass that hung between the windows, and surveyed himself minutely in it.

"Do you particularly like the man?" he muttered, at his own image; "why should you particularly like a man who resembles you? There is nothing in you to like; you know that. Ah, confound you! What a change you have made in yourself! A change you have made in yourself! A good reason for taking to a man, that he has come upon the ruin you have fallen away from and what you might have been! Change places with him, and would you have been looked at by those blue eyes as he was, and commiserated by that agitated face as he was? Come on, and have it out in plain words! You hate the fellow."

He resented the light of wine for consolation, drank it all in a few minutes, and fell asleep on his arms, with his hair straggling over the table, and a long winding-sheet in the candle dripping down upon him.

CHAPTER V.

THE JACKAL.

Those were drinking days, and most men drank hard. So very great is the improvement Time has brought about in such habits, that a moderate statement of the quantity of wine and punch which one man would swallow in the course of a night, without any detriment to his reputation as a perfect gentleman, would seem, in these days, a ridiculous exaggeration. The learned profession of the law was certainly not behind any other learned profession in its Bacchanalian propensities; whether such practice has already fast shouldering his way to a large and lucrative practice, behind his compeers in this particular, any more than in the drinking of the legal race.

The advocate of the Old Bailey, and eke at the Sessions, Mr. Stryver had begun cautiously to hew away the lower staves of the ladder by which he mounted. Sessions and Old Bailey had now to summon their favorite, specially, to their longing arms; and Mr. Stryver stood toward the visage of the Lord Chief Justice in the Court of King's Bench, the florid countenance of Mr. Stryver might be daily seen, bursting out of the bed of wigs, like a great sunflower pushing its way at the sun from among a rank garden-full of flaring companions.

It had once been noised at the Bar, that while Mr. Stryver was a glib man, and an unscrupulous, and a ready, and a bold, he had not that faculty of extracting the essence from a heap of statements which is among the most striking and necessary of the advocate's accomplishments. But a remarkable improvement came upon him as to this. The more business he got, the greater his power seemed to grow of getting at its pith and marrow; and however late at night he might be working with Mr. Carton, he always had his points at his fingers' ends in the morning.

Sydney Carton, idlest and most unpromising of men, was Stryver's great ally. What the two drank together, between Hilary and Michaelmas, might have floated a king's ship. Stryver never had a case in hand, a brief anywhere, but Carton was there, with his hands in his pockets, staring at the ceiling of the court; they went the circuit Circuit, and even there they prolonged their mad orgies late into the night, and Carton was always retained to be seen at broad day, going home stealthily and unsteadily to his lodgings like a dissipated cat. At last it began to get about among such as were interested in the matter, that although Sydney Carton would never be a lion, he was an amazingly good jackal, and that he rendered suit and service to Stryver in that humble capacity.

"Do you think, Sir," said the man at the tavern, whom he had charged to wake him—"do you think, Sir—"

"What's the matter?"

"Ten o'clock, Sir."

"What do you mean? Ten o'clock at night?"

"Yes, Sir. Your honor told me to call you."

"Oh! I remember. Very well, very well."

After a few dull efforts to get to sleep again, which the man dexterously combated by stirring the fire continuously for five minutes, he got up, tossed his hat on, and walked out. He turned into the Temple, and having revived himself by twice pacing the pavement of Fleet-street, walk and Paper-buildings, turned into the Stryver chambers.

The Stryver clerk, who never assisted at these conferences, had gone home, and the two principal representatives were alone. He had his slippers on, and a bone bed-gown, and his throat was bare for his greater ease. He had fire and candle wine, drawn, and several books and papers, which may be observed in a live lawyer of mature years, from the portrait of Jeffries downward, and which can be traced, under various disguises of Art, through the portraits of every Lord Judas Iscariot.

"You are a little late, Memory," said Stryver.

"About the usual time; it may be a quarter of an hour later."

They went into a dingy room lined with books and littered with papers, where there was a blazing fire. A kettle stood ready to their hand, in the midst of the wreck of papers a table shone, with plenty of wine upon it, and brandy, and rum, and sugar, and lemons.

"You have had your bottle, I perceive, Sydney."

"Two to-night, I think. I have been dining with the day's client; or seeing him dine—it's all one?"

"That was a rare point, Sydney, that you brought to bear upon the identification. How did you come by it? When did it strike you?"

"I thought he was rather a handsome fellow, and I thought it would be a pity to see him put to the same sort of fellow, if I had had any luck."

Mr. Stryver laughed, till he shook his precious paunch. "You and your luck, Sydney! Get to work, get to work."

Sullenly enough the jackal loosened his dress, went into an adjoining room, and came back with a large jug of cold water, a towel, and a towel or two. Steeping the towels in the water, and partially wringing them out, he folded them in his head in a manner common enough, and lay down at the table, and said, "Now I am ready!"

"Not much594 will be done to-night, Memory," said Mr. Stryver, gayly, as he looked among his papers.

"How much?"

"Only two sets of them."

"Give me a couple of pints first!"

"There they are, Sydney. Fire away!"

The lion then composed himself on his back on a sofa on one side of the drinking-table, while the jackal sat at his own paper-bestrewn table proper, on the other side of it, with pens, bottles and glasses ready to his hand. Both resorted to the drinking-table without stint, but in a remarkably different way: the lion for the most part reclining with his hands in his waistband, looking up at the ceiling or occasionally flirting with some lighter document; the jackal, with knitted brows and intent face, so busy in his task, that his eyes did not seem to follow the hand he stretched out for his glass—which often groped about, for its master co-operated with it freely, without help from his lips. Two or three times the matter in hand became so knotty that the jackal found it imperative on him to get up and steep his towels anew. From these pilgrimages to the jug and back he returned with such accumulations of damp head-gear as no words can describe which were made the more ludicrous by his anxious efforts to keep them cool.

At length the jackal had got together a concise result of the whole, and presented it to the lion. The lion took it with care and caution, made his additions in it, and his calculations upon it, and the jackal assisted both. When the repast was fully discussed, the lion put his hands in his waistband again, and lay down to meditate. The jackal then invigorated himself with fresh towels, and a bracing mental application to his head, and applied himself to the collection of a second meal; this was administered in the same form, and was not swift, and was not disposed of until the clocks struck three in the morning.

"And now we have done, Sydney, fill a bumper of punch," said Mr. Stryver.

The jackal removed the towels from his head, which had been steaming again, shook himself, yawned, shivered, and complied.

"You were very sound, Sydney, in the matter of those crown witnesses to-day. Every question told."

"I always am sound; am I not?"

"I don't say you are not. But you have roughened your temper? Put some punch to it and smooth it again."

With a deprecatory grunt the jackal again complied.

"The old Sydney Carton of old Shrewsbury School," said Stryver, nodding his head over him as he reviewed him in the present and the past, "the old sea-saw Sydney. Up hill and down the next; now in spirits and now in despondency!"

"Ah!" returned the other, sighing: "yes! The same Sydney, with the same luck. Even then, I had my turns for other boys, and seldom did my own."

"And why not?"

"God knows. It was my way, I suppose."

He sat, with his hands in his pockets and his legs stretched out before him, looking at the fire.

"Carton," said his friend, spurring himself as him with a bullying air, as if the fire-grate had been the fortress in which sentiment and cookery was forged, and the one delicate thing to be done for the old Sydney Carton of Old Shrewsbury School, was to shoulder him into it, "your way is, and always was, a lame way. You summon no energy and concentration. Look at me."

"Oh, botheration!" returned Sydney, with a lighter and more good-humored laugh, "don't you be moral!"

"How have I done what I have done?" said Stryver; "by hard work. It's what I do."

"Partly through paying me to help you, I suppose. But it's not worth your while to spoon upon yourself, or me, about it. You were driving at work, and driving well, when I began to dig myself out of a bad business. And mine was a bad one; a real bad one. I was incapable and reckless, and in the last degree unpromising. You take credit to yourself for having done more than I have done, and you are right."

"You were not in a position to do it," said Stryver, shaking his head, with a dissatisfied air of being compelled, against his will, to admit the force of the other's position.

"I was not in a position to do it," repeated Sydney, firmly. "Look at me. I am incapable and reckless still, and I shall be both to the end. But you were always driven through life. Not quite in the same way at school, for you were always beyond the rest, and I was always behind."

"I had to get into the front rank; I was not born there, was I?"

"I was not present at the ceremony; but my opinion is you were," said Carton. At this he laughed again, and they both laughed.

"Before Shrewsbury, and at Shrewsbury, and ever since Shrewsbury," pursued Carton, "you have fought your battle, your battle alone, as you have fought it all through. Even when we were fellow-students in the Temple, picking up our bits of Greek, and French law, and other French crumbs that we didn't get much good of, you were always somewhere, and I was always somewhere else."

"And whose fault was that?"

"You know well enough. I am not sure that it was not yours. You were always driving and driving at something or other, shouldering and pressing, to that restless degree that I had no choice but to be driven. I am not reproaching you, I only remember it. It's a theory, however, that I have, that we are all born with a tendency to some one thing or other, and that, however we may resist it, or however we may be dragged aside by incidents, we are never thoroughly laid asleep. Something will always arise to prick us, and we shall start broad awake, and automatically go to that one thing as to our destiny. That's all."

"Well then! Pledge me to the pretty witness," said Stryver, holding up his glass. "Are you turned in to be pleasant to-night?"

Apparently not, for he became gloomy again.

"Pretty witness," he muttered, looking down into his glass. "I have had enough of witnesses to-day and to-night; who's your pretty witness?"

"The picturesque doctor's daughter, Miss Manette."

"She pretty?"

"Is she not?"

"No."

"Why, man alive! she was the admiration of the whole Court!"

"Rot the admiration of the whole Court! Who made the Old Bailey a judge of beauty? She was a golden-haired doll!"

"Do you know, Sydney," said Mr. Stryver, looking at him with sharp eyes, and slowly drawing a hand across his florid face: "do you know, I rather thought, at the time, that you admired her yourself? Don't answer, if you were quick to see what happened to the golden-haired doll?"

"Quick to see what happened! If a girl, doll or no doll, swoons within a yard or two of a man's nose, he can see it without the assistance of eye glass. I pledge you, but I deny the beauty. And now I'll have no more drink; I'll get to bed."

When his host followed him out on the staircase with a candle, to light him down the dreary, dirty dark and dim, the whole scene like a lifetime dwelt, with a shudder of chill and solitude, around and round before the morning blast, as if the desert-sand had risen fast far away, and the first energy of its burning wind began the long whelming of the city.

Waste forces within him, and a desert all around, this man stood still on his way across a silent terrace, and saw for a moment, lying in the wilderness of wasted power and homeless ambition, self-denial, and perseverance. In the fair city of this vision there were airy galleries from which the loves and graces looked upon him, gardens in which the fruits of life hung ripening, waters of flow and ebb made his sight. A moment, and it was gone. Climbing to a high chair in his own dining-room, he threw himself down in his clothes on a neighbored bed, and its pillow was wet with wasted tears.

Sadly, sadly the sun rose; it rose upon no sadder sight than the man of good abilities and good emotions, incapable of their exercise, incapable of his own help and his own happiness, sensible of the blight on him, and resigning himself to let it eat him away.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE following is entirely authentic, and is taken from the record:

In August, 1845, Hon. William Z. Stuart, since a Judge of the Supreme Court of Indiana, was prosecuting attorney for the circuit embracing Lawrence county, Calcutta. At that term of the court, and in that county, a prisoner was put on trial for stealing a pair of homespun flat bank-notes. The proof was direct and clear, and the jury retired to find a verdict of guilty, which they did in short order. They had a remarkably dull, stupid, old jury, although perfectly satisfied of the guilt of the prisoner at the bar. They therefore came into court the following written:

"We, the jury, acquit the defendant by the skin his teeth; and hope he will do so no more; and that his left ear may be cut off. We give him one bit for costs."

The Hon. Stuart was the celebrated Judge John W. Wright, who was in the habit of solemnly lecturing prisoners who were brought before him. The defendant was lectured as recommended; and it is believed that he did not steal any more bank-notes. The prisoner had to retire on the skin of his teeth for an acquittal.

The French poet, M. Arnaud, was one day at an assembly where a prominent figure was a man with black hair on his head, and a white beard to his chin. A lady inquired of M. Arnaud if he could explain the contrast. "I suppose, madam," he replied, "the gentleman's chin does more work than his head."

ON A MERRY FELLOW.

"I laugh," a would-be-cynic cried,
"At every one who laughs at me."
"Good lord!" a sneering friend replied,
"How very merry you must be."

Summer Resorts.

Conover Hotel, West Point, N. Y.
La Tourette House, Bergen Point, N. J.
Trenton Falls Hotel, Trenton Falls, N. Y.
Hazelcroft House, Lake Hopatcong, N. J.
Round Hill Water Cure Hotel, Northampton, Mass.
Nahant Hotel, Nahant, Mass.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.

Messrs. Joseph Burnett & Co., Boston, are the well-known manufacturers of this celebrated article for the hair, which is now fully established in its popularity, and recommended and used by physicians throughout the United States. Mr. Burnett's abilities as a chemist seem enabled him to produce a compound, combining the properties of the Cocoa-Nut Oil, with a peculiarly elastic tonic sufficiently to preserve and promote the healthy growth of the hair, at the same time that it is unequaled as an article for the toilet.—Trenton Gazette.

TRENTON FALLS.

This most picturesque of the WATER FALLS OF AMERICA can now be reached at small expense a few hours from Utica by Railroad.

N. B.—Three trains a day.

LA TOURETTE HOUSE,

BERGEN POINT, HUDSON CO., N. J.

Wesley W. Hall (late of the Lafarge House), Proprietor.

This fine and delightful Summer Resort is beautifully situated on the banks of the Kill von Kull, opposite Staten Island. Excellent Bathing, Boating, Fishing, and Sporting in the immediate vicinity. Gentlemen with their families can find, Now York, will find this a most desirable convenient hotel in town, as it takes no longer time only 15 minutes by steamboat to reach it, than to go from South Ferry to Fulton Ferry.

COZZENS'

West Point Hotel

is

NOW OPEN.

Round Hill Water Cure Hotel.

THE Northampton, Mass., continues to be a favorite resort of invalids, and of families and others seeking recreation and health. The Water Cure Establishment is unsurpassed in its appointments, and is fully supplied with a fine array of treat pure, which gives a delightful tonic to invalids. The location is one of the most beautiful and picturesque in the country, while the scenery in the immediate vicinity is unrivaled. Visitors can reach Northampton from any part of the country in a very short time, and by a journey to see. No place within four hours of New York offers such attractive and comfortable accommodations, good table and home comforts.

The season of HALL, the proprietor and principal physician, in the cure of woman's diseases, is well known. For the past twenty years the number of cases other chronic complaints at Round Hill, are Circular sent on application to the Proprietor. Post Office address, Northampton, Mass.

"This much is true; Dr. Halsted has great success in the treatment of female complaints."—Springfield Republican and Express.

"Miss Dix's success in the treatment of diseases peculiar to females, at Round Hill, is one of the most remarkable facts within the knowledge of the public."—Springfield Republican.

"Here nature is clothed in her most attractive garb, and wealth gives luxuries to the eye, each contributes in part to make Round Hill a desirable spot for rest."—Advertiser.

"Round Hill. We freely, and with the unanimous consent of all who have visited the Round Hill Establishment, commend it as a delightful place of sojourn. The scenery is of unrivaled beauty, while the air is pure and free from baneful vapors, which have been established by hundreds of years of cultivation. The medical attendance in the vicinity, and the place itself has been improved at great expense, and with the best taste, and everything of every necessary nature for a person's well for their comfort as amusement."—N. O. Picayune.

LAKE HOPATCONG HOUSE, AT HOPATCONG,

NOW OPEN.

Gentlemen with their families, or single gentlemen, can make arrangements for Summer Board at reasonable prices. Parties wishing their meals served, via "GOOD FISHING," can enjoy it at this beautiful place to perfection. GOOD BATHING. It is the one-and-a-half hours' ride from New York, by Morris and Essex Railroad. Depot at Hopatcong. Stages will be in waiting to convey passengers to and from the house at three miles. Post Office address—Drakeville, Morris county, N. J. DAVIS.

NAHANT HOTEL.

This favorite establishment, situated at Nahant, is unsurpassed by any Hotel in the United States, and is NOW OPEN. It contains accommodations for 1000 guests. Music for the season will be furnished by GILMORE'S BAND, and ample provisions are provided for Bathing, Driving, Boating, Sailing, Fishing, and every other desirable recreation and amusement. There is communication with Boston four times daily by railroad and also by omnibus and cars from Lynn. Season tickets can be had of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, Boston, and on leaving to pass a few weeks at the most desirable and healthy summer resort on the New England coast, can be accommodated at very moderate rates.

THOMAS RAND & SONS.

GENIN'S SUMMER HATS,

100 Styles,

FRENCH FELTS, PANAMAS, LEGHORNS, DUNSTABLES, DIAMOND BRAIDS, RIO STRAWS, FANCY STRAWS and CHINA PEARL; with a Variety of other seasonable and elegant fabrics.

To suit all ages and complexions.

At GENIN's Hat and Cap Store,
507 Broadway, New York

E. A. BROOKS.

575 Broadway—150 Fulton Street.
A splendid Assortment of Ladies', Gentlemen's, and Children's Boots, Shoes, and Gaiters.

The Oriental Fruit Paste, or Aromatic Jelly of Figs and Senna.

Combines all the laxative properties of pure extract of Senna, in a delicious sugar-coated paste, and is the most agreeable and effectual medicine known for all irregularities of the bowels. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

T. W. HORCROSS & CO., Wholesale Agents,
71 Fulton Street, New York.

PUBLIC SPEAKERS AND SING-ERS can use "Brown's Bronchial Troches" for Coughs and Voice Lozenges as freely as requisite—containing no opium or any thing that can injure the system. They are invaluable in allaying the hoarseness and irritation incident to vocal exertion, and also a powerful auxiliary in the production of melodious enunciation.

Blasser's 5 Minute
ICE CREAM FREEZERS,
As I improved for 1859.

With Standard Iron Cover and Bottoms—Tinned, It

The only Freezer known which is constructed on true Scientific principles.

The Cheapest, Best, and most Economical, requiring less ice and less labor than any other, being at the same time the most durable in structure, and most certain in its operation.

Sole Agents for the United States,

E. KETCHAM & CO., 7

Manufacturers of Japanned and Planished Tin Ware, 263 Fearl Street, New York.

Charles Grobe's new Method
FOR THE
PIANO FORTE.

Mr. Grobe is as well known, that any remarks as to his qualifications would be superfluous. Suffice it to say that he has produced in his New Method a work for elementary teaching superior to any other. It is eminently the Book for the Parlor, and from the result of the ripe experience of the author, it is invaluable to Teacher or Pupil. Nothing is attempted in advance of the Pupil's ist by any, pleased, and gradual means to the desired end. The Exercises are complicated of in works of instruction is altogether avoided, and the Publishers believe it to be the most perfect, the progressive, and judicious system of instruction extant. The Publishers have spared no pains in producing the finest possible edition of the books and type. The type is new and unusually beautiful and distinct. The paper is of the best kind, and the Binding Substantial. Price $2 00; in Cloth, $3 00. Copies sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of the marked price. A liberal reward. A handsome discount to Teachers and Seminaries.

FIRTH, POND & CO., 547 Broadway,
New York.
LEE & WALKER, Philadelphia.

Something New.

Agents wanted, to go into a New and Honorable Business, which will pay from $15 to $30 weekly.

No Humbug.

Satisfaction guaranteed. Send stamp for particulars, which are free.

S. M. MYRICK & CO., Lynn Mass.

The Best in always Cheapest.

ROTHES'
New and Improved Hair Dye.

From the recipe of a celebrated German Chemist, it is a superior color, is easily applied, and always gives entire satisfaction. Ample testimonials, not published, to be seen, to prove the superiority of this dye to all others. Warranted the best Hair Dye in the market.

Sold by all Druggists.

J. W. NORCROSS & CO.,
91 Fulton Street, New York.

Ready June 15th,
THE STERLING ENGLISH NOVEL,
The "Three Clerks" of Anthony Life.
BY ELIZABETH ELTON SMITH.
One Volume 12mo, price $1 25.

This book is the production of a superior mind; a vivid but not overwrought picture of the commonplace of society with a more philosophical spirit than is commonly realized by the delineators of those scenes, action and its worshipers delight to honor. The style and narration of the work are charming, the dialogue is spirited, the ideas striking, and the remarks sound.

From the numerous commendations of the press of the English Press, we select the following extracts:

"We have been struck by the intelligence power displayed in these volumes, and have passed upon many striking and original passages, happily expressed, which entitle authorship of a superior talent. We have read the work with interest and pleasure."—London Literary Gazette.

"We are not unwilling to commend to our readers a novel. The girl, Lucy Elton, is a charming creation. The Devonshire squire that she was brought up with is admirable; and with equal truth, delicacy, and fidelity has the drawn her pictures. The characters are well developed in an interesting story."—Lond. Lit. Gazette.

C. O. H. P. BUCKHAM, Publisher, 18 Spruce Street, Boston.

Sent by mail to all parts of the U. S. under 3010 miles on receipt of $1. For sale by Booksellers everywhere.

MICHELET'S L'AMOUR.
M. MICHELET'S GREAT WORK.
LOVE.
Translated from the last Paris Edition.
One Volume, 12mo, Muslin. Price, $1 00.
RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers,
130 Grand Street, New York.

 Sent by mail, pre-paid, on receipt of price.

THE AMERICAN NEW FREEMA-SON'S Monthly Magazine, edited by ALBERT G. MACKEY, M.D., and other prominent Masonic writers. For sale by all Book-sellers throughout the country, and supplied by

HENDRICKSON, BLAKE & LONG,
31 and 33 Ann Street, New York.

EMPLOYMENT
For 100 More
ENERGETIC YOUNG MEN.

Who are willing to devote their leisure time and talent to selling LIBERAL HISTORICAL WORKS. The MANUSCRIPT OBLIGATION BOOK, which we issue to Agents, tells them what to do. They desire to know my "PLAN OF OPERATIONS," how to "APPROACH" a subscriber, how to "overcome objections," and what, and how much they are (MADE OF PORTAGE.) A FULL STATEMENT of what engaging men have done, and have yet to do, is the reason why you may not "GO AND DO LIKEWISE." Address

MACK W. BARNITZ,
Book and Map Publisher, Cincinnati, O.

100 Songs for 25 Cents.

"THE ROME MELODIST" contains nearly 100 of the most popular Songs,—Words and Music. Bound in Boards. Price 25 cents.

Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

PATENT STRENGTHENING POSTAGE POROUS PLASTERS

THESE PLASTERS ARE APPLIED, WE ARE ALWAYS ON THE GIVE NO EIGHT SUFFERING FROM ALWAYS STOCK NO MACKINTOSH, THE NEW RELIEF MOISTURE, UNDER- LUMBAGO, NATURE, WHICH IS STRENGTHEN AND GIVE RELIEF WITHIN MINUTES WHEN ONE HAS TO WALK WITH DOUBLE SIDE, IN ASTHMA AND ALL PAINS IN THE BACK AND SIDE, IN AGUE OF THE BREAST THEY ARE INVALUABLE, PREVENTING TENSION WHILST THEY RELIEVE PAIN. IN ALL CASES WHERE THE PLASTERS ARE HIGHLY RECOMMENDED BY THE FACULTY, AND ARE SOLD BY CHEMISTS GENERALLY.

Sold by ALLCOCK & CO.
254 Canal St.
NEW-YORK.
Sold by all Druggists.

N. B. LAST TRICE AS LONG AS OTHERS & ONLY 25 CTS.

Sold also at Burnham's, 259 Bowery, and Rushton's, 41 Broadway.

THE ECONOMIST
COOKING STOVE,
FOR WOOD OR COAL,
WITH A RANGE OVEN.

This is the most valuable improvement that has been made in Cooking Stoves during the past twenty years.

THE ECONOMIST OVEN

Relishes the heat long after the fire has gone out.

THE ECONOMIST

Will bake in less time all the bakers in the world.

THE ECONOMIST

Wynnyer the Sand Oven, is ahead of all competitors; Wyns the Sand Oven, is at the head of them.

THE ECONOMIST

Is the most economical and durable Stove in the world.

THE ECONOMIST

Has a most perfect arrangement for broiling.

THE ECONOMIST

Heats water for the Bathing Room, &c., as quickly as any Range, and at half the cost for fuel.

Do not fail to examine it!! It is manufactured by

W. & J. TREADWELL, PERRY & NORTON,
ALBANY, N. Y.

And for sale everywhere.

☞ 5000 AGENTS WANTED—To sell a new Invention. Agents have made over $25,000 on one article. Sells at sight to every family. Send four stamps and get $2 worth of sample, gratis.

EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

Singer's Sewing Machines.
New Styles.
From $50 to $125.

SINGER'S FAMILY MACHINE, the price of which is only $50, is a light and elegant machine, capable of executing, of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

SINGER'S STANDARD MACHINES for manufacturing purposes are well known to be without any successful rival in the market. Important improvements exhibited in regard to various stitches made by Sewing Machines, Singer's Machines make the best stitch ever invented, and do it in the best style. A great discount is made to tailors.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full information, sized prices, size, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

☞ AGENTS WANTED in this State to canvass for the GOLDEN SAFE. Sells rapidly. Can make good pay. For terms, &c., send stamp.

C. P. WHITTEN, Lowell, Mass.

To Teachers.

My Correspondence Class is increased to almost one hundred, since, after to the "Case of HARPER & BROTHERS, New York City." Thirty-two Copper and Circular, Vernier and Post-Office Address of Schools, Educational Boards, &c., are solicited. MARCUS WILLSON.

Rutland, Vermont.

FINKLE & LYON'S
SEWING MACHINES,

For Family Use, Tailoring Purposes, Saddlery, &c. Warranted to do better satisfaction than any other machine in markets, or money refunded. Agents wanted.

503 BROADWAY,
Next to the St. Nicholas Hotel.

Lord Ward's Worcestershire Sauce.

IS THE ONLY Worcestershire Sauce. Is excellent for all purposes.

ASK FOR, and HAVE ONLY LORD WARD'S.

Used at every Hotel, and sold by all Grocers and Oil Dealers.

Wholesale and for Exportation, by

JONATHAN JONES & CO.,
40 Broad Street, New York.

Sold Retail by the Grocers and Oil Dealers. Half Pint, 30 cents per bottle; Pints, 50 cents per bottle.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S PERFUMERY DEPOT, from every flower that breathes a fragrance

SWEET SCENTS
THE FLOWER OF THE DAY
KISS-ME-QUICK
FRANGIPANNI
And a Thousand others

In 6d. each to Save
2 Wye Bond St. London.

Sold by all Druggists and Perfumers in every city.

Wholesale Agent,
J. PHILLIPS,
87 Pearl St.
New York.

PURCATION WITH
BRANDRETHS PILLS
PURIFIES THE BLOOD & CANNOT FAIL
TO CURE WHEN ENFORCED
IN TIME.

AND LET ME SAY THAT THIS KNOWLEDGE IS A SECOND ONE WITH CHRISTIANITY IN THE ATTRIBUTES IT IS CAPABLE OF CONFERRING UPON MANKIND. THE MAN WHO CAN TRULY PERSUADE YOU BRANDRETH'S PILLS ARE A QUACK REMEDY, IS INSOLENT OR A FOOL TO YOU FOR 3 SHILLINGS WHAT I TELL YOU THESE ARE

I CANNOT NOT SUPPLY FOR ONE DOLLAR

MY HERBS AND EXTRACTS ARE ALL PREPARED BY MY OWN LABOR, AND IN THE VERY SPOT WHERE OF 140 HORSE POWER IS EMPLOYED EXCLUSIVELY IN THE MANUFACTURE OF THESE PILLS, FACT SUCH AS WAS EVOLVED BY THE

RESEARCHES OF DR. BRANDRETH.

IN USING THESE PILLS YOU RISK NOTHING FOR THEY HAVE BEEN USED BY MILLIONS.

IT IS POSSIBLE TO FEEL DISPOSED TO TAKE A SIX DOSE YOU WILL BE CERTAIN TO FEEL DISPOSED TO PERSEVERE IN THE OPERATION; AND YOU MAY HAVE THE LAUDABLE SOLACE, WHILST THE DOCTOR IS TELLING THAT HE WITH YOU CAN EXACERBATE WITH THAT LAST SYMPTOM, TO CRY OUT IN THE VERY TONE OF FULL CURE WITHOUT HURTING YOUR TEETH

Dr BRANDRETH'S PRINCIPAL OFFICE
324 CANAL STREET NEW YORK.
Sold by all Druggists Everywhere.

Song of the Meerschaum Colorers.

By one who has read the "Leader."

Color your meerschaums, and color them carefully,
Honestly, thoroughly, impartially, prayerfully;
All the day long smoking pipes without number,
And learning to like the thing more and more.

See as you puff the tobacco-filled chamber
Ashy-white turning to golden amber;
Wife may complain, but in pearly smoke drown her,
Just like good-bye—it grows warmer and warmer!

Let us be workers, and patient and dutiful,
Labor and sweat are the prize of the beautiful!
Sink your losses in rising in the price of "genius,"
And color your tubes to the dirt of dark dahlia!

Color your tubes! But for health's sake remember,
That this month's dahlia will by to-morrow December!
And yet you make mid to your female divinity
Just purchase a seat at the Astor's Widdna Tragedy.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,
The Marble Stores,
122, 138, and 140
Fulton Street,
Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT J. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW-YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.
DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.
DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.

The Remedy of the Age.
The Remedy of the Age.
The Remedy of the Season.

Coughs, Colds, Consumptions, Asthma,
Bronchitis, Whooping Cough, Croup,
Inflammation of the Throat, Lungs, and Chest,
Influenza and Consumption, are all cured by this incomparable remedy.

Beware of counterfeits, and purchase only that having the written signatures of "I. Butts," as well as the printed one of the Proprietors, SETH W. FOWLE & CO., 13 Tremont Street, Boston, on the outer wrapper.

BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.
BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.
BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.

Sold everywhere.

Save Your Carpets
From Wear and Moth.

The attention of Housekeepers is respectfully called to Harrington's Carpet Lining, a substitute for paper, straw, or any other article used under Carpets, Oil-cloth, or Matting. It protects the Carpet against any unevenness in the floor, and is warranted to add fifty per cent. to the durability of Carpets, &c. Its cheapness puts it within the reach of all. To be had of any of the Upholsterers, or at the Manufactory of the

NEW YORK CARPET LINING CO. 67 Warren Street, corner College Place, J. E. HARRINGTON, Agt.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

TIFFANY & CO.
Importers & Manufacturers,
No. 550 Broadway, New York,
And Rue Richelieu, No. 79, Paris,
DIAMONDS, AND OTHER PRECIOUS STONES.
FINE JEWELRY. WATCHES.
SILVER WARE, PLATED WARE, TABLE CUTLERY.
CLOCKS, BRONZES, ARGENTE, ORNAMENTS.
DESKS, DRESSING-CASES, WORK-BOXES, TRAVELLING-BAGS, FANS, RICH PORCELAINS.
And many other Articles of Ait and Luxury.
The only Agents in New York for the sale of Cha. Frodsham's Watches, whose superiority over any other pocket time-piece ever made is unquestionably established.

Every article is marked in plain figures the Lowest at which it will be sold for cash.

Parties personally visiting the Establishment are respectfully invited to strangers on invitation to inspect our stock, which is so large that it can still more not be kept obligation to purchase.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,
The best Alterative and Tonic.

We take pleasure in remarking that the numerous cases that at this season of the year the most beneficial results may be obtained by the use of the above medicine, and by purifying the blood, its cutaneous disorders, and invigorating the entire system.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 141 William Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York,
Have just Published:

ALFORD'S GREEK TESTAMENT. The Greek Testament; with a Critically Revised Text; a Digest of Various Readings; Marginal References to Verbal and Idiomatic Usage; Prolegomena; and a Critical and Exegetical Commentary. For the use of Theological Students and Ministers. By HENRY ALFORD, B.D., Minister of Quebec Chapel, London, and Dean of Canterbury. Vol. I. Gospels. Vol. II. Acts, the Epistles of the Four Gospels. Vol. III. Epistles, Apocalypse, and Critical Index. 8vo, 30 cents.

HUMBOLDT'S COSMOS. Cosmos. A Sketch of a Physical Description of the Universe. By ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. Translated from the German by E. C. OTTE and W. S. DALLAS, F.L.S. 12mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

ANCIENT MINERALOGY; or, An Inquiry respecting Minerals Referred to and mentioned by the Ancients; with Occasional Remarks on the Light which the Subject has applied. By JOHN MILLS, M. Modern Lecturer on Colombia College. A New and Improved Edition. 12mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

THE BERTRAMS. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Doctor Thorne." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

LEVER'S GERALD FITZGERALD. Gerald Fitzgerald, the Chevalier: A Novel. By CHARLES LEVER, author of "Charles O'Malley," "Harry Lorrequer," "The Irish Family Abroad," "Sir Jasper Carew," "Maurice Tiernay," etc. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

LOVE MY LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, author of "Christie Johnstone," "Peg Wolfington," "Never too Late to Mend," &c. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

THE AMERICAN HOME GARDEN. Being Principles and Rules for the Culture of Vegetables, Fruits, Flowers, and Ornamental Trees. Also, select Brief Notes on Farm Crops, with a Table of their Average Produce and Chemical Composition. By JOHN JAMES WATERS. With several Numbered Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 50.

THE LIFE OF NORTH AMERICAN INSECTS. By JOHN LAWSON, Esq., Professor of Botany and Botany in the College of New Jersey. Assisted by H. C. FARNHAM, M.D. With Numerous Illustrations from Specimens in the Cabinet of the Author. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

MORE ABOUT JESUS. By the Author of "Reading without Tears," "Peep of Day," &c., &c. Beautifully Illustrated. 18mo, Boards, 25 cents.

THE ROMANCE AND ITS HERO. By the Author of "Mademoiselle Mori." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above Works by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 96 to 98 pages—and from one third to one half of its reading matter more than any other like magazine.

Commencement of Volume XIX.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR 1859.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Twenty-four Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
TERMS.—One Copy, one year . . . $2 00.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S New Serial, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," is regularly illustrated by MR. MCLENAN, was commenced in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" of April 30, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS'S Illustrated Serial Tale of American Life, entitled "TRUMPS," was commenced in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" of April 9.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 00
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Three Copies for One Year 6 00
Twenty Copies for One Year 30 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or FIFTY-TWO SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

SYMPATHY FOR ITALIAN ORGAN-GRINDERS.

BROTHER JONATHAN. "Here, Old Fellow, just you send that there squeak-machine to Barnum, and go and play upon this instrument in your own country. The Russian Steamship General Admiral will give you a free passage home to Italy."

ALDERMANIC DIGNITY.

Teaching position of the New York Alderman who prefers being smothered in mud and slush to exercising an iota of his imaginary dignity. [See the official Report on the Reasons why the Board of Aldermen won't confirm any Street Inspector the Mayor may name.]

☞ GIFTS. ☜

SPLENDID GIFTS

IN

Purchasers of Books,

AT

THE ORIGINAL

AND

☞ THE ONLY ☜

Gift Book Enterprize

Established in 1854.

HEAD QUARTERS

FOR THE

UNITED STATES

AT THE

PUBLISHING HOUSE

OF

G. G. EVANS,

439 Chestnut Street.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE

Since I originated the Gift Book Enterprize, I have repeatedly called the attention of the public to my large stock and liberal style in which they have always warmly responded. I can now do more satisfaction than ever, call attention to my facilities for obtaining Books to purchasers. Being very largely engaged in publishing, I exchange my own publications for those of other houses, and am enabled to procure all my books at the original cost of making, and thus can and do supply the majority of the other houses engaged in the Gift Book Trade, with their books, cheaper than they can procure them from their publishers. I can state, by my latest purchases of Watches and Jewelry, for cash, that with them with their Gifts at lower rates than they can buy them from the manufacturers.

Having such an advantage in buying, I can insure my customers better Gifts with Only Books than any other house, and can give my Agents a larger commission. A valuable Gift will be delivered with each Book at the time of sale. Gifts worth $800, at the lowest wholesale prices, will be impartially distributed with every $1,000 worth of Books sold.

A Descriptive Catalogue, which will be mailed free to any address, containing the most valuable collection of Books ever offered, embracing in Literature, Philosophy, History, Geography, Travels, and the Sciences, with all the favorite works of Fiction and Romance, and every other department of Literature, classified as described below, and for it, for if you don't wish to order Books, you will obtain a very valuable Book for reference, as it contains all the desirable books in print, and will cost you nothing.

Particular attention is requested to the List of my Publications, which will be found in the latter part of my Classified Catalogue. It contains a large number of decidedly popular works, by various authors; among which will be found the most salable work, well bound on a moral, instructive and pleasing nature, interesting biographies, travels, &c.

CLASSIFICATION OF BOOKS.

AGRICULTURAL.—This department embraces all standard works on Agriculture, Horticulture, Cotton Planting, Flowers, Gardening, Farm Implements, Horses, Sheep, Cattle, Dogs, &c., &c.

ALBUMS—Ladies' in great variety: Floral, Cap Quarto, Royal Cap, Demy Quarto, Autograph, &c.

ANNUALS.—A large and elegant assortment.

BIBLES.—A splendid assortment of Pocket, Pew and Family Bibles, in every style, from $1 to $50.

PRAYER BOOKS.—A complete assortment, in every style of binding.

BLANK BOOKS.—As used by the different denominations.

BIOGRAPHICAL.—Washington Irving, Irving, Wermo Sparke, Bancroft, and every other standard author.

BOTANICAL.—By Comstock, Gray, Lincoln, Darby, Wood, &c., &c.

COOKERY.—Receipt and Cook Books, by Mrs. Hale, Leslie, Widefield, McIvenzie, &c.

GERMAN.—Standard German Literature.

DICTIONARIES.—Webster's, English, French, German, Scottish, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, &c.

CYCLOPEDIAS.—All the standard authors.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—The latest and most approved Geographies and other Geographies, Maps, and Travelers' Guides.

GEOLOGY.—The works of Hugh Miller, Harris, Hitchcock, Lyell, and others.

HISTORICAL.—By Prescott, Irving, Bancroft, Robertson, Hume, Gibbon, Macaulay, and others.

HUMOROUS.—Embraces a World of Fun.

JUVENILE.—Every description of Illustrated Books for Children.

MAW AND MEDICINE.—The Standard Works of these professions.

MECHANICAL AND SCIENTIFIC.—The most approved works on Mechanics, Architecture, and the Occupied Arts.

POETRY.—English and American. Octave and Literary editions of the Standard Poets: Pocket and Cabinet editions—plain and illustrated, bound in every style to suit the taste of all.

WORKS OF FICTION.—By Scott, Irving, Cooper, Dickens, and all the approved writers.

SCHOOL AND CLASSICAL.

TRAVELS AND ADVENTURES.

GAMES, SPORTS AND PASTIMES.

RELIGIOUS, BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

MUSICAL AND GLEE BOOKS.

ODD FELLOWSHIP AND FREE MASONRY.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Our Miscellaneous Department embraces every thing not included in the above classification, of an interesting or instructive character, that is in print.

The Gifts consist of Gold and Silver Watches, Gold Chains, Ladies' splendid Stock and gold silk Dress Patterns, Parlor Time Pieces, Silver-plated Ware, costly Sets of Cutlery, Breast, Finger-rings, Coral, Garnet, Turquois, and Lava Jewelry, Gold Lockets, Pencils and Pens, Ladies' Neck and Chatelaine Chains, Gents' Button Studs and Sleeve Buttons, Pocket Knives, Portemonnaies, and a thousand articles of Gifts of use and value.

Agents Wanted Everywhere.

To Agents I can give more liberal inducements than can be offered by any other house. In addition to large commissions, I give to each Agent to get subscribers for my enterprise their Gift free.

The peculiar advantages are—

A Larger Stock and Better Catalogues to select from.

A Better Assortment and Quality of Gifts.

More Punctuality and Correctness in filling Orders.

By acting as Agents for me,

Persons wishing a Valuable Library can procure it gratis.

Persons seeking an easy method of earning a livelihood can find it. Any one desiring a good Watch can obtain it.

For full particulars sent free a Catalogue.

My large capital, together with my long experience in the business and consequent familiarity with all its details, gives me an almost inexhaustible advantage over all competitors.

All I ask is a trial. Send me an order, and you will be convinced that there is no exaggeration.

DO NOT FORGET TO SEND FOR A CATALOGUE.

Persons visiting the city, are requested to call and examine for themselves.

G. G. EVANS'
HEAD-QUARTERS,
439 CHESTNUT STREET,
Philadelphia, Pa.

BRANCH STORE, 48 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.

Special Notice to Book Buyers.

As there are parties of doubtful responsibility advertising to sell books at auction, and making many large promises, without intending them, without the intention of trying to fulfil them, hoping, through the popularity of my enterprize, to deceive and plunder the public, a strict sense of duty compels me to warn all against them. And if any are deceived and cheated by them, they should not be so unjust as to condemn me along with them, for they are base imitators of an enterprize that has cost me an immense amount of time and money to place in the position which it now occupies, commanding an extensive and increasing trade, approved and endorsed, with the most flattering testimonials, from the entire Publishing Interest in the United States—a position which I intend to retain in my possession, and will be produced and given at any time with the greatest pleasure.

G. G. EVANS.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
'UTERINE CATHOLICON
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

With such universal distress and suffering as saddens the female life, a really good Medicine must be their best friend. The numerous cases of Constipation, Sores, Ulcerations, Discharges, Obstructions, Falling, Womb, Leucorrhœa, Irregularities, Suppressions, Pains, and Weaknesses, given it a reputation and popularity never obtained by any other article. It does what it promises, and can be relied upon. When every thing has been tried, the best physicians consulted, years spent in anguish, and fortunes wasted, this Catholicon has restored health to the patient and gladness to the fireside. It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the female sex, and should never be dispensed with previous to and after confinement. Numerous letters testify that it is

NEVER TAKEN WITHOUT BENEFIT.

Daughters, Wives and Mothers! this medicine will not disappoint. Use it long and favorably testify. As an evidence of its efficacy, its money will be refunded where results are not as indicated. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered at the counter of any agent. Do not confound Dr. Marchisi with any other name. It can be had in most every town. If not found, it can be sent by express. Price $2 per bottle, or 3 bottles for $5. Refer to General Address.

DARNES & PARK, General Agents,
13 and 15 PARK ROW, N. Y.

DR. J. H. ROBINSON
ON THE NORTHERN TRAPPING GROUNDS.
AND
NICK WHIFFLES "IN THE PIKON NEWSPAPERS AGIN, BY MIGHTY!"
IN
THE NEW YORK MERCURY,
FOR JUNE 25, 1859,

(which will be ready at all the news-rooms and book-stores this week, and not this week alone, Nick says, but next week.)

Will contain the opening chapters of Dr. J. H. Robinson's new story, entitled

PATHAWAY;
Or, the
MOUNTAIN OUTLAWS!

A TALE OF THE NORTHERN TRAPPING GROUNDS.

BY
ILLUSTRATED BY FELIX O. C. DARLEY.

For the exclusive right to the eminent services of
DR. J. H. ROBINSON,
The Publishers of The MERCURY pay a large sum of money than any other American author has ever yet received from the newspaper press, and they take pride in announcing their determination to continue to excel in every department, as long as HONORABLE COMPETITION will secure first-rate talent

ACKNOWLEDGED LAXATIVE TROCHES.
CATHARIC LOZENGES.
A mild, efficacious, and palatable remedy

FOR CONSTIPATION OF THE BOWELS,
HABITUAL COSTIVENESS,
BILIOUS and NERVOUS SICK HEADACHE.

Brown's Laxative Troches,
FOR VARIOUS FORMS OF DYSPEPSIA,
INDIGESTION, FLATULENCY,
DISTRESS OF FOOD AFTER EATING.

Brown's Laxative Troches,
FOR PILES, FLATULENCY,
INACTIVITY OF THE LIVER,
BILIOUS AFFECTIONS.

For many unpleasant symptoms caused by irregularity and neglect of nature.
For all purposes of a FAMILY MEDICINE.
For any slight disorder of the stomach.
For Children they are admirably adapted, being simple and safe.

MADE BY JOHN I. BROWN & SON, BOSTON.
Sold by all Druggists at 25 cents per box.

PRINCE IMPERIAL
CHAMPAGNE,
FROM
DE VENOGE & CO., EPERNAY, FRANCE,
as used at the
IMPERIAL TABLES OF THE CONTINENT OF EUROPE.

A Perfectly Pure and Delicate Wine
at a moderate price and admirably adapted for family use.

Nearly every leading Hotel and Dealer throughout the country.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT, Sole Importer,
Corner of Broadway and Broome Street.

Curtis' Cure for Baldness.

This remedy is reliable; restores an oil, bald, or sore place; it has been tested in Boston, Providence, and Hartford. CHAS. J. W. CURTIS, Proprietor, Providence, R. I. Sold by E. M. Quinn, 127 Bowery; J. & J. Coddington, 770 Broadway; C. Oakley, 357 Grand-st; John Jones, 722 Houston Street, New York; Silas Hayes; G. F. Silliss; and Reynolds & Co., Brooklyn; P. Selleck, Jersey City; U. Y. Mower, Newark.

BARNES & PARK, Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row, General Agents.
And all Druggists.

Excelsior Fireworks.

Funsten & Scofield,
General Agents,
62 John Street.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—NO. 130.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND AND HER FAMILY.

THE accompanying engraving is from a photograph, taken for Queen Victoria by a leading firm of photographers in London. It probably dates from a day or two before the marriage of the Princess Royal; the Queen may naturally be supposed to have wished to preserve some record of her united family, which was then on the point of being separated.

Nine children are represented in the picture, of whom three are known by name to the public. The eldest, the Princess Royal, is remembered by the fêtes which accompanied her marriage to Prince Frederick William of Prussia. From all that we can learn, she is a good wife and a fond mother, and stands very well among the people of Berlin. It is said that she shocked the prejudices of some of the Court dowagers, when she first went to Prussia, by showing herself capable of doing many useful things, and overseeing much household work which, at some continental courts, are deemed beneath the attention of a royal princess. But it is said that when she was reminded of her dignity she cut short the remonstrances of her Prussian friends quite abruptly by telling them that her mother is not above taking care of her children and her household, and she proposed to follow the example.

The Prince of Wales, who is to be the next King of England if he lives, has "come out" within the past twelvemonth. He has traveled through a large part of Europe, and has spent the winter in Rome, greatly to the disgust of a number of excellent Protestants, who are afraid that the air will convert him. We have conversed with a gentleman who used to meet him frequently at Rome. He describes him as a well-bred, ingenuous young man, with hearty English appreciation of fun and frolic, and no apparent tendency to the vices which have disgraced so many of his family. He is traveling in company with a brother of Lord Elgin's, Colonel Bruce, a very fashionable man, with the manners of a Frenchman, and no very great intellect, but an excellent entrée, no doubt. The Prince rather enjoyed occasional flashes of freedom from the Colonel's society, and bore his part in the well-known festivities of the Carnival as jovially as any plebeian. His confetti were showered with unsparing hand, and gossip says that more than one fair Roman girl still treasures the bonbons which the Prince threw at her with a meaning glance. He was fond of visiting the studios, and showed good taste in becoming the purchaser of our countrywoman, Miss Hosmer's, "Puck." Altogether, the Prince made a good impression on his Roman acquaintance, and led them to hope that, when his turn comes to wear the crown, he will wear it as worthily as his mother has done.

Prince Alfred, of the Euryalus, is the midshipman of whom so much has lately been said, and in honor of whom so many officers and officials have —to borrow the Lounger's expression—partaken of that delicious food, the veal. The toad repasts at Malta, Gibraltar, and elsewhere, are doubtless well remembered by our readers; it is a mercy that no indignation or dyspepsia has followed them. The Queen, it is said, deserving the toad so popular as an article of diet among her people as to need no further encouragement, has given orders that for the future, when loyal officers desire to eat it in connection with her son, the meal must be consumed in private; so there are to be no more feats in honor of the boy sailor. Report says that he did his duty and keeps his watch as faithfully as any other officer; also, that he is learning his trade honestly. Let us hope so. There is no reason why a boy should not be able to learn seamanship simply because his mother happens to be a queen. If the rate of toad-eaters will only be high enough, there is no reason why Prince Alfred should not some day do credit to his country.

PRINCE ALFRED. THE PRINCE CONSORT. PRINCESS HELENA. PRINCESS ALICE. PRINCE ARTHUR. HER MAJESTY, WITH THE INFANT PRINCESS BEATRICE. PRINCESS ROYAL. PRINCE LEOPOLD. PRINCESS LOUISA. PRINCE OF WALES.

QUEEN VICTORIA AND HER FAMILY AT OSBORNE.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY CALDESI AND MONTECCHI.]

The younger children are yet unknown to fame; their names will be found at the bottom of our engraving.

Of their parents there is happily very little to be said. As that country is the happiest and most prosperous whose history is the dullest and least essential, so the monarch whose life affords no piquant materials for the biographer is sure to have made a good king. It is at all events certain that She has reigned over twenty years over one of the greatest kingdoms of the earth—a country which the genius is as rare as it is here, and where scandal is highly popular, and yet no one knows any thing of her or of her husband except that she is a woman of quiet behavior, motherly affection, and Christian virtues. She is followed by no swarming train from her palace at Windsor to her highland retreat in Scotland, and to her marine villa at Osborne: but they tell us nevertheless that she shares and governs with her family, given prompt audience to her Ministers, goes regularly to the drill-ground to review her shows the demonstration of her minister, so he preach humility and carefully, and dispenses a gracious bounty to foreigners. Such is the portrait our Captain Hartstene, who took the Resolute to England, leave gratefully testimony.

One or two peeps at that inner life which is—and ought to be—as sacred from the public gaze as that of any other lady, have been vouchsafed to the curious.

That touching little romance in which the Queen's name was mentioned in connection with Lord Alfred Paget's—twenty years ago and more —is yet remembered. They were both young, she gentle, tender, as susceptible as all right-hearted girls of eighteen or nineteen, and he handsome, accomplished, chivalrous, high-bred, passionately in love with her. Where it would have led had the affair happened latter in the days of Parliamentary ascendency who shall say? She was Queen of England by courtesy only, and not only of herself but of that great realm. And she solemnly vowed—to the story goes—that she loved Lord Alfred well at her feet, and would have none have, or would die, like her predecessor Elizabeth the unrelenting. It was all wrong, according to the by law she could not wed a subject; and Lord Paget was a boy of whom nothing could be foreseen. But she was Queen, and had the right to choose? Happily Lord Lord Melbourne, before whom the fateful minister of the realm was a wily counter, a finished diplomatist, a sagacious lady's man, who had lived many a day, and whose end of ere more than it was sought to deprive the young Queen. He contrived—how we may now know—to separate the lovers, and to post six or seven thousand miles between them; then to green the suit which that good-looking lad rather disengaged young man, Prince Albert of Saxe-Gotha, was only too ready to prefer. So the little romance ended, and we dare say not only the Queen nor Lord Paget—who has as many children by his time as her Majesty—suffered much if at all, while Prince Albert—who is undoubtedly the right man in the right place—very probably remembers Lord Melbourne with a good deal of gratitude.

Another glimpse of the royal interior was granted to the public at the time of the birth of the Princess Royal's baby. We mentioned it in these pages. The Queen's anxiety about her daughter was such that a telegraph line from Osborne to Berlin was that night kept disengaged for the purpose of transmitting the news. The lapse of a retired, leaving word that the message must be brought her the moment it reached the castle. Presently the message came, and a private gentleman, too excited to dwell upon formalities, burst open the door, and found the Queen on her knees, in tears, praying earnestly. Her thankfulness, when she heard that all was well, could not find expression in words.

There is no royal family in the world so beloved by their subjects, or so universally respected by foreigners, as the family whose portraits we now lay before our readers. In this country no foreigner would be received with such respect as the Prince of Wales, or any member of his family. The Prince does not certainly come, and observe the working of Democratic institutions.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1859.

IS NATURALIZATION A FARCE?

WE showed in a late number that the refusal of the Administration to protect naturalized citizens against compulsory enlistment in foreign armies rendered the naturalization law nugatory, and gave the lie to the principles which were asserted by Mr. Madison during the war of 1812, and more recently by Mr. Marcy in the case of Kossta. We have received from an obvious source at Washington the following reply to our remarks, which we print from respect for Mr. Cass:

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

I have just perused an article in your issue of this date styling American citizenship a farce, because naturalized citizens will not be protected from forced enlistment if they return to the native land in time of war. Allow me to correct you. General Cass, in his Le Clerc letter, simply lays down the law as recognized by all civilized nations. Under it naturalized citizens will be as much protected as they ever have been by the United States. The Constitution and law knows no distinction between native and naturalized citizens duty, but when a foreigner returns to the land of his nativity he incurs responsibilities that his adopted country can not control and have no claim upon them. The case of the Iowa merchant may be a hard one in a certain sense, but that same merchant, under the Treaties has, even though he be a naturalized citizen of the United States, may hold the rank of commander-in-chief of the Prussian army, exercising his government denies the right of expatriation. The same principle does not prevent this case that you urge as the cause of the war of 1812. Then the British Government sought to take men from our ships by force of arms. Now it does not do it, it is altogether different, for the naturalized citizen forsakes his adopted country and temporarily places himself under the protection of his own country, and he does this voluntarily when he knows the risk he incurs. General Cass's position then is true one, and it will keep us out of many difficulties in future. Other governments have rights as well as our own, and especially in regard to naturalization; and if we are to set up as reformers of the law of nations, we must have a navy, and a large one and navy than we now possess, before we can convince the world that we are the only judges of law and the rights of the civilized world. It is not after doctrine than this would lead us into constant trouble, and I presume no one will be able to find a naturalized citizen from Germany or Italy who does not manifest even here such active sympathy for the country to which he has gladly contribute material aid to insurgents who want to break down legal government and to plunge it at peace. As neutrals we can not take any other safe course than that laid down by the Secretary.

The statements of fact contained in the above will be news to most readers. All histories of the war of 1812 state that the treaty of Ghent, by which men were made prisoners at Queenstown and sent to England to be tried for treason were abandoned, and that the British Ministry "tacitly," and "knowing the risk they incurred." Congress, ignorant of the refinements set forth by our correspondent, refused to make any law for the protection of the United States, and passed an act (1813) authorizing the President to retaliate upon British prisoners for the acts of magistrates practiced upon them. Mr. Madison, unlike Mr. Cass, proceeded accordingly to retaliate, and after a long controversy the United States abandoned her claim. Had the case occurred under the present Administration, it seems clear that the Irishmen would have been executed. It was lucky for them that in their day Mr. Cass was a soldier, and not a Secretary.

It is news, also, that "all civilized nations recognize" the Cass doctrine of letting their naturalized citizens be compulsorily enlisted abroad. The recent cases of the English engineers at Naples and the French sailors in Portugal do not support Mr. Cass's view, and in both, in fact, the outraged citizens were amply and promptly avenged by their Governments. Should Portugal become a French citizen.

But, in truth, if the just rights of our Government had been consistent with that of Mr. Cass, instead of being diametrically opposed to it, we and European Governments all refuse protection to their subjects who always—as they do not—all this would make no sort of difference to the main question. The act of naturalization is a civil contract between an individual and a state, by which the one renounces allegiance to his native government and owes allegiance to the country he adopts, which, in return, guarantees to him that protection which is the right of her citizens. It matters not a word in the law or in naturalization papers limiting the protection or the allegiance. If it had been intended, as Mr. Cass pretends, that the United States should not be bound to protect their naturalized citizens abroad, the law would have stated so, and the solemn contract by which a foreigner is made a citizen would have expressly stated that it was only valid in this country. It states, on the contrary, in the plainest words, that on such a day, for such and such considerations, "the said applicant was admitted a citizen of the United States of America." No more—not a word of limitation to this or that place. It is there a court of law in the world which, if called upon to interpret this contract, would decide that it was only valid in certain localities, or that prior circumstances, of which the United States were cognizant at the time, could relieve them from fulfilling their part of it?

We repeat what we said in our first article—there is nothing in the law or the Constitution to justify any distinction among citizens. A man is a citizen, or he is not. If he is not, he incurs no obligations and acquires no rights. If he is, he is bound to serve in the militia, to pay taxes, to serve on juries, to defend the country at need, and to fulfill each and several the recognized obligations of citizenship; in return for which the country is bound to protect him wherever he goes, and in whatever quarrel he may be engaged. For the nation to shirk these plain duties, after exacting from the citizen the fulfillment of his part, is a farce.

That "Mr. Cass's doctrine will keep us out of many difficulties" is highly probable. Cowardice is often safe. It would keep many excellent persons who thought it absurd for the United States to rush into war in 1812 to protect American ships from search; they, too, wanted to "keep out of difficulties." Nay, not a few persons of Mr. Cass's age and respectability were very much opposed to "getting into difficulties" with Great Britain about a paltry stamp tax, just before that great "difficulty," the Revolution. But they were contumacious. It will be so now. Some day some new Secretary will take up the case of a naturalized citizen who shall have been compelled by a foreign monarch, and will build a great reputation by undoing Mr. Cass's work. And in those days people will think of Mr. Cass as we do now of the Tories of the Revolution or the Blue Light Federalists of 1813.

RAILROAD LIQUIDATION.

It was foreseen, at the time of the crisis of 1857, that one of the results of the suspension of companies would be compelled to enter into liquidation, and would need to slough off a large portion of their indebtedness before they could pay profits. As they stood at that time, many of them were carrying a load of debt on which they could not expect to be able to pay interest; it was therefore a mere question of time when they should seek relief at the hands of the sheriff.

This time has come for several—among others, for a road whose name has become synonymous throughout the world with the very confusion and mismanagement—we mean the "La Crosse and Milwaukie Railroad." A few days since the trustees of the third mortgage bondholders sold out this road, thus wiping off at a stroke all the original stock and a large amount of indebtedness of various kinds. The enterprise has since been reorganized under a new title, and started afresh, with a capital of millions of debt on 200 miles of well-built road, and a very good title to a large quantity of land. Now if anything, in its new shape, is pronounced safe, and likely to prove lucrative.

We commend the example to other railroad enterprises which are struggling with difficulties, owing to pay interest on enormous loads of accumulated debt, and sinking every day deeper into the mire. Such enterprises will never improve unavailing in the end; forbearance on the part of creditors, and petitions for indulgence on the part of debtor corporations, are generally injurious to both parties. The first offer of a bankrupt is always the best he will make; and the best defender of a corporation is the one upon which the creditor should appeal to the law. Temporizing is fatal in nine cases out of ten.

The railroad interest of the North and West is going through the process through which the railroads of England and the Continent generally have passed. There are those who, seeing the suspension of dividends, and the steady decline in the market value of the bonds and shares, argue that the age of railway property has passed, and that it will all be sacrificed. This is an erroneous view. As compared with the thousands of other parts of the world, ours have cost very little money—about one-sixth that of the English road, on the average, and, as compared with foreign roads, ours can calculate on traffic unparalleled elsewhere. It is true that competing lines have been freely built in most States; but all the roads, with the help of enterprise, will receive a local traffic which, even in the course of time, will render them fair property almost independently of through business. In a few years the Pennsylvania Central, York Central, the Michigan Southern, and other great central lines, will be able to pay dividends out of their local business alone, in the common sense and rational harmony among the managers. As soon as the leading railroad managers agree to cease to cut each other's throats, his own profit rather than his neighbor's injury, the railroad interest—in which over a thousand millions of dollars are invested—will become as safe property as the banking interest.

We have long thought that it would be a great thing for the railroads of the United States if concert of action and a common policy were established and maintained among them by means of a central organization. The rivalries and jealousies of railway managers, at which a frank interchange of views might take place, and sound principles of railway policy be ventilated, would undoubtedly tend to diminish the chances of such reckless competition as we have this spring witnessed. The establishment of a Central Committee, with power to hear all charges of unfair dealing between road and road, and adjudicate upon each case, would enable the general body to enforce any terms which it might be deemed proper to adopt, by cutting off any offending road from its connections: for that would be the penalty the country is such that every road which we have in mind or less dependent upon its connections for business. The establishment of such a Committee, and all the roads organized into one controlling body, nothing could be easier than to enforce discipline among them. The simplest circumstance to the laws of the organization.

Events will probably soon suggest the necessity of some such arrangement as we propose. Railway fights, such as have taken place in the North this spring, are fatal to the roads, and vastly benefit no one—not even shippers, who know to their cost the mischief wrought by sudden reductions and as sudden augmentations of rates. What has been a system of railroads is speed, safety, and fair and uniform rates of fare. The shortest way of securing these conditions would seem to be through the establishment of a general organization of all the railroad companies.

LOST CHILDREN.

One day last week the writer was passing through Broadway, opposite the City Hall. His attention was attracted by two little children, apparently about three years old. One of the band, were walking hurriedly along, and crying bitterly. Several persons stopped and spoke to them; but all, with an evident expression of fear, with an air which seemed to say that "it wasn't their business, and they couldn't help it," passed on.

Presently the writer overtook the children. They were rather smartly dressed. Their faces were red and swollen with crying and the heat, which was intense. One of the girls tottered in her gait, and would have fallen frequently, but for the protecting hand of her companion. She looked dreadfully frightened.

"What is the matter?" asked the writer.

So answer, but more cries.

"Where are you going, children?"

"Home!" sobbed the stronger of the pair.

"Where is your home?"

"Don't know!" And at this sad confession the unfortunate pair of little hearts would break.

"Where have you been?"

"Don't know."

"Where do you live?"

"Don't know."

"What's your name?"

One of the two uttered a sound which resembled Quin; but even if the word had been distinctly uttered the writer could not have spelled it without but little information, the family of Quins being very, very numerous. He therefore found it impossible to law obliging all the Quins to get into the Directory.

By this time the writer, who is a dull person and slow of comprehension, had made up his mind that there were two lost children, all rights of property in the wood, but very little better off than those famous characters in juvenile history.

By this time, too, these events around the group several personages of both sexes; some impelled by curiosity, others moved by the cries of infants, but others evidently viewing the writer's commerce with the children with a suspicious eye, even mutely but strongly suggesting that he was being the cause of their sorrow. These latter persons were inclined, apparently, to be very prejudiced to the writer by the circumstance that he wore an eye-glass, which offending instrument attracted their hostility more than their sympathy.

Happily by this time the party thus compound found itself opposite a police-station-house, into which haven of refuge the writer, conscious of virtuous intents, incontinently proceeded with a baby under each arm.

The Captain heard the story with official contempt, and evidently thought it a right of property the lost children into an inner room, where they rested their weary little hot feet, and eagerly drank of a cup of water. The Captain was a very man, and does not wants words. His decided "All right!" closed the subject as far as the writer was concerned.

But a small entry having been made in a sort of day-book in which the names of the lost children were brought in by a citizen at 12.10 P.M., the writer looked about for a policeman, and found at 12.15 P.M. every police-station throughout this great city knew that two little children, whose ages and appearance were briefly described, were awaiting recognition at the police head-quarters in Broadway.

At 12.20 P.M. the intelligence was conveyed to the mother, who was over a mile away, and who had been in search of the lost children ever since they were brought in by a citizen at 12.10 P.M. The whole affair had occupied a little more than ten minutes.

The little creatures had wandered a mile away from home. But for the police telegraph and the admirable system at present adopted, who knows whether their mother would ever have seen them again?

It is not generally known that scores of children are lost every day, and returned to their parents by the aid of the police. On holidays, when families and mothers sometimes forget to watch the youngest amongst their families, there have been as many as a hundred children "awaiting recognition" at the various city station-houses. The rols is, that all "lost children" are kept at the station-houses till eight or nine at night, in the hope that their relatives will claim them; each station being supplied by telegraph of the foundlings in charge; at which time, if by 8 or 9 P.M. they are still unclaimed, they are sent to the alms-house, by the working of the system is now so well understood that a mother no sooner misses a child than she hastens to the nearest station, and waits for it there, which almost always arrives before the close of the day.

MRS. EATON AND GENERAL JACKSON.

The recent marriage of Mrs. Margaret L. Eaton, wife of General John H. Eaton, Secretary of War under President Jackson, with Mr. Antonio Buschigliani, a dancing-master, nearly forty years of lady's junior, suggests some queer reminiscences, which, but for this just brought about our happy conjunction, might have been consigned to oblivion.

It is well known that at the time General Jackson assumed the duties of Chief Magistrate he was intensely suffering from the slanders that his political opponents had heaped upon his wife, whose memory, even to the last moment of his life, he cherished with the fondest affection. Mrs. Eaton, who had been previously married to a purser in the navy named Timberlake, was unhappy in having severe reports cast upon her conduct, no doubt entirely without foundation. While laboring under this misfortune she was about to contract with "Old Hickory," and had not enough to engage his active sympathies. Through her influence (and her's alone) Buschigliani (Mrs. Eaton) General Eaton was appointed to a place in the Cabinet, and the lady became soon after a sort of semi-official lady of the White House. Her influence finally became supreme; and, of course, created a host of enemies. She was a consummate party partisan, and he went so far as to make it a "party measure" that Mrs. Eaton should receive the most marked attentions from all who came to the White House, and more especially from those who were dependent on him for favors. As a general thing the wives of the members of the Cabinet, who were especially expected to receive Mrs. Eaton with attentions, gave her the coldest look with apparent sincerity at least, but Mrs. Calhoun would not and did not receive her. She was cut from this little incident arose circumstances which finally broke up the Cabinet, and drove Secretary Calhoun into the Opposition, and absolutely changed the political character of the Democratic party. The following letter from Mrs. Calhoun to Hermitage, once remarked that he found bearing the British at New Orleans a much easier task than trying to make Mrs. Eaton agree who had determined they would quarrel; and he concluded this very natural criticism with the following remark: "A child could take a horse to water, but that a whole regiment of men could not make him drink." The story, however, is one we desire to relate, connected with the "old General" and Mrs. Eaton, as it is said to have originated in a trait characteristic of the energy and promptness of the old hero.

In the height of Mrs. Eaton's White House popularity the attacks made upon her brought about a severe sickness, and she was pronounced by her doctor in a critical state. In the midst of this peril one of the servants rushed into the General's sitting-room, and, with considerable excitement, announced to him "that unless Mrs. Eaton could immediately have some wine and jelly she would die, and she might possibly die." The General, who was at the moment sitting with his feet over the fire-place, subjected at the same time to a steam wash and hot for to mend the chimney-back*: The servant retreated, bearing the desired articles, and the old General quietly resumed his pipe, the grim expression called forth by his unexpected exercise gradually fading away as the influence of the burning smoke. It is no wonder that a man who thus stood up to the ban of the whole United States, and who knew so well how to serve them, should have been the popular idol of the people.

THE LOUNGER.

THE GUILTY PUBLIC.

It is a part of the hard duty of those of us who are "gentlemen of the press" to belabor the Public unmercifully. For the Public is the most remorseless of monsters. The Public is but another name for Whim. The Public grows and comes, like real diabolical sea-serpents, the withering objurgation, the serious argument and the sarcastic jest, and shows not the press shower upon it. The Public buys it cheerfully; and if the abuse be spicy, it reads it before passing on to its next purchaser. The Public is the John Bull of Punch—greatly amused by its own ridiculous likeness.

And we gentlemen of the press take the shortcomings of the Public so deeply to heart! 'Tis touching!

The last outrage for which we have to take out our blodgeons of satire and reproach, and proceed to thwack the universal offender, is operatic in its nature. In truth, the offense often is operatic. It is the melancholy duty of us gentlemen of the press who are admitted to the opera for nothing constantly to rebuke the absence of those who must pay eight or twelve shillings to enjoy the same privilege.

In the present case, for instance, it is in vain that it is the height of June—it is nothing that the heat is willing—it is of no account that there has been a great deal of opera: why didn't the Public go to hear Madame La Grange?

Consider the object for which she sang. It was a noble object, and one for which appeals so strongly to general sympathy, of so radical and Christian a benevolence that how many names of eminence were attached to the advertisements, and every one of those names, of course, stood for a corresponding amount of every one of them represented at least a hundred tickets.

And the house was comparatively empty! The Public did not come. Instead of a benefit to the Woman's Hospital, it was a loss of eight hundred dollars to the treasury of that charity.

There is one moral, at least, which we gentlemen of the press are compelled to draw—namely, that the name which they often use in the way of testimonial of this kind—the names that earnestly recommend, Dolcino, repeat the almost universal Fossil Humbugs—the names that commend a special theatrical or musical performance in aid of some charitable object, are fictitious, for those who wished to get rid of an annoying applications. Even the names in signed lecture notices of a route signed—third, for those who wished to associate themselves with some literary, scientific, or charitable movement, are fictitious, and for every one any thing about it—and, fourth, for those who will not go to hear Dolcino, repeat the almost, who take tickets to sell to their friends; nor mention the matter; nor in any way further the object.

Morel, indeed, is the only name which has discovered all this, and carefully abstains from all performances so advertised.

IN RE THOWERS.

THE Lounger spoke in the spring, soon after its arrival, of the magnificent testimonial to Daniel Webster purchased by a hundred Boston gentlemen. The first one was lost at sea. The second arrived, after the statesman's death and interment, since the middle of February last, in the vestibule of the Historical Gallery in Boston. Public opinion has condemned it without distinction of party. Even the committee of one hundred, who were all friends of Mr. Webster, can not agree that they are pleased with the work; and at a late meeting are reported to have said that when it was erected within the State House grounds, as the Legislature had allowed, it was resolved that it should be taken down.

The eloquent author of the Mount Vernon Papers protests against the statue, and in the most discriminating speech, giving details of the personal appearance of Mr. Webster at various times, quoting passages like the following from a little book just published him, from Mr. Fletcher Webster, his son, which finally appears to be the only true personal acquaintance with Mr. Webster, to prove that the statue was a good likeness.

"In person, the head is resting, he did not defend. But he stood by the body itself, and the bronze represents it with the same accuracy as every thing under heaven but human garments. If they are known to experience, the speaker defies the bronze to express them more than the old trowsers in a full length photograph made of him by Mr. Brady. Mr. Webster's wife was the only possibles, although they had been worn for several weeks, were not recognized by members of his family who had been constantly with him.

Even this was not enough for the committee, and in fact the sculptor had a little hard work. The object of a memorial statue or picture is to represent persons and things as they looked. If, then, the trowsers have become shabby, and worn by the spectator as the garments appeared in nature, nature can not give them. Accordingly, the sculptor Bostonian of the nineteenth century is certainly competent to decide what does or does not remain in the human body, and has accordingly given the bronze does not present that appearance, how is it to be known that it is a likeness? And what are bronze trowsers in a photograph are not recognized by their most familiar friends?

The argument was audacious, but it was not satisfactory. The committee declined to take the view of the trowsers urged by their president, who thereupon resigned.

Now the head of this statue is a repetition of Powers's colossal bust of Webster, by which nobody has ever quarreled. The difficulty lies in the trowsers. Might it not be surmounted by ordering a new pair?

OF HOOPS AND MANNERS.

THE Lounger calls attention to the following communication:

"Mr. Blushy presents his compliments to the Lounger, and begs to inform him that on Tuesday last, as he was coming down Broadway, he called an omnibus, which seemed to be full, and therefore, to contain several ladies. Judge how disappointed he was, upon entering, to discover that he had made a serious mistake. He found that there were four persons upon each seat, but that all the seats were occupied by gentlemen in shirts. The appearance of ladies was a delusion. Looking about for a moment, and expecting some skirt to appear, he was quite disappointed, for they remained firmly planted, while the persons gazed out of the window. Mr. Blushy could not rest himself upon the skirts; to raise them so as to secure a seat upon the bench was difficult and awkward; and while he stood hesitating, a sudden lurch of the omnibus threw him head-first against one of the skirts, and, endeavoring to right upon which the lady who sat nearest to it, and who seemed to be peculiarly attached to it, scowled, and said, audibly, 'What ill manners!' Mr. Blushy presents his compliments to the Lounger, and begs to know whose manners are ill."

THE POPE AS KING.

THE present war involves the settlement of the Italian question at large; and a very knotty point of that question is the condition of the Roman States, of which the Pope is king. M. Edmond About, the author of "Tolla," and of "Germaine," has just published a book, called "The Roman Question," which was commenced in a Paris paper as a feuilleton, and printed at the request of the Pope's nuncio in Paris; collected, condensed, and issued as a book in Brussels; circulated and read in Paris until it was seized and prohibited; and now bought and read with a hundred-fold avidity.

This pamphlet seems to be the work of telling the truth. Governments do not criminally pursue evident slanderers and falsifiers.

A correspondent of the Tribune describes the scope of the work, and calls it the finest combination of wit and good sense in political writing since Sydney Smith. M. About is a good Catholic, a loyal subject of Louis Napoleon, and a hater of socialism; but he can not praise the condition of the Papal States. He begins by a paragraph of extraordinary force:

"The Roman Catholic Church, which I respect sincerely, numbers at least 120,000,000 individuals, without counting the little Mortars. It is governed by seventy cardinals, or princes of the Church, who nominate the twelve apostles. The cardinals are appointed by the Pope; the Pope is appointed by God. The Pope is the vicar of Jesus Christ on earth; he becomes infallible, and the temporal ruler of 8,124,658 human beings who complain bitterly."

M. About's statements into the merits of this complaint, he finds that there are four violent abuses in the Papal States, that prejudice all Europe States; that an assassin is safe if he can reach a church, a hospital, or a convent—unless his crime has been committed upon a private individual, person of any kind, in which case the law cannot touch him. Of these States there have been over 60 capital executions at Ancona, and 160 at Bologna.

M. About's statements, in respect of the general condition of the country, will be confirmed by the experience of every traveler who remembers the universal shiftlessness, ignorance, degradation, and clerical vagabondism which prevail in that region. The population, by nature, are a fine race, with a lively sarcasm, although 21,415 monks exhort them to labor. There are 2,732 nuns to pray for them.

In the year 1845 the number of secular clergy was estimated at 35,000, and nuns at 8000. This luxury of religion has, by no means benefited the people. The United States have about 28,000,000 of people, and 35,000 or 40,000 regular clergy.

M. About gives also a sketch of the present papal Secretary of State, Antonelli, of whom there is a portrait in Punch every week, and who is in the real sovereign of the States, and his rule is brief and despotic.

This political condition of the Roman States will unquestionably be carefully considered when the European and general question is settled. The temporal ruler, although spiritually infallible, the Roman Church, of course, regards the Pope as he could any other king. It is not held that the Pope has an ear for music, or a fine taste in colors, because he is infallible; nor is it necessary to suppose him able to govern a temporal kingdom. The present condition of the Roman States converts the papal-king of incapacity. The congress to settle the war can hardly fail to relieve the Pope that he can not perform. It certainly ought not.

TWEEDLE DUM AND TWEEDLE DEE.

IS May we had our anniversaries, O hippy time! Delightful was the season as Orator Carey. Charity as abundant as strawberries in January. Among the new lights of the Church Militant in Convention, of which there has been a picture in the Weekly, Several was wise and witty, serious or severe things were spoken both by men and women. The audience took their part in the proceedings by laughing and hissing. They did not like it. Some men in the galleries, on the ground that the women were not well-behaved, did not like them, but others applauded them with insulting epithets. The women were saying that they thought they ought to be allowed to speak with men in every direction in which they had capacity.

It is an argument upon which the Lounger does not feel serious.

We gentlemen of the press criticised the convention variously. Some of us sneered, some of us laughed lightly, some of us commented seriously, some of us said that it were wanted to crow they might crow.

This was tweedle dum.

Our reports and comments were hardly printed when we read in the foreign news that the Empress Eugenie—late Signorina Montijo—had given a ball at the Tuileries, and soon after that the Queen Victoria had opened Parliament with her usual speech.

In vain has an expectant Lounger looked to see choice epithets tossed at these two women. In vain has he waited to hear that the British cow had been lowing and the Gallic hen crowing. It was not stated that the guns of France snickered aloud as the Empress spoke, nor that the gentlemen of England thought their Queen looked well speaking in public. We gentlemen of the press have recorded the facts with unction, and with all the picturesque details, among our interesting foreign news—not a shrug of indecency, not a hint of fans.

Dear tweedle dee.

SHAKING HANDS.

MR. SMITH O'BRIEN, before he left us, told us that we shook hands too much. Major Jack Downing relates that during those progresses of General Jackson, in one of which Harvard University, with a just sense of his scholarship and of its own selfrespect, made him a Doctor of Laws—he, the Major, often turned to and shook hands vigorously for the General with his fellow-citizens.

It is undoubtedly true. We do shake hands a good deal, and we are nervous because Englishmen laugh at us for it. But in Germany and Italy people kiss also! Men at meeting and parting kiss each other's mustaches. What is to be done? Dr. O'Brien indicated the existence of the disease but not the remedy.

Suppose, all, it is to heal? If one man—General Walker, or Mohammed Pasha—or Mr. Bluhm, himself, have a reception in the Governor's room, it must be tiresome to shake five or six thousand hands. But that is exceptional, if you think of it. Most of us hardly have more than six or eight hands to shake during the day, and as we have agreed that it is to do it in a hearty and good feeling, as a man is apt to behave better with one with whom he has received palms, as it establishes a kind of magnetism between parties. The bore, now Mr. O'Brien has gone, we continue to shake hands.

HOUGHTS UPON HUMDUG.

AMONG the pleasant events which grow in the testing of flowers upon the stage for the singers. In Italy a dove is sometimes loosed from the upper part of the house and seen across the boxes to fly into the Prima Donna, bearing a song of felicitation, down to his mouth, but until now it seems to have a simultaneously observed with printed copies of the song. Furthermore, the canticles is called "Houghts upon Humdug—Or Life and Death Days of the" Puritans" in Paris—or the composer thirty years—or Verdi—or Mr. Bluhm. Then the bouquet crown is presented, or jewels in some dainty guise; but in any event, all is applause, enthusiasm, and joy.

The dove dodge—if so irreverent a term may be used—was practiced in this city some years since at Parodi in "Norma" at the Astor Place opera-house—there was some semblance of a crown, too, at the Academy, for Malvina Cavalieri. So we believe, upon occasion of her fifteenth last appearance and farewell to the stage. But as the crowning of flowers is incessant, so incessant that a Lounger has been sometimes tempted to observe whence they came.

Some evening at the Academy—say an evening when Trovatore is going to be sung—the first time—as you sit comfortably in the parquette, look at the various gentlemen in colored clothes, at the back of the parquette circle, and see whether who hardly look as if they could often afford the delicable shirt of the evening, and whether the tall side aisles near the stage. When Zerlina is about coming on in the fife-scene, mark your men, and see how they are dressed. Then watch them carefully, and as she bounds on in the Bridesmaid's Chorus, and pretty Zerlina in the palace, to which they forcibly contribute, is really hearty, see how a few of them let fly bouquets—see how they reach the Prima Donna—how carefully she bows—and, when her song is over, how the waves fall again, and the boxes are filled again.

And how they continue to fall through the opera.

And how they are the same flowers!

It all belongs to the mystery of management—to the system of puffing and advertising which Mr. Barnum so eloquently that the wax tapers, when they appear, are a profound disappointment. The cultivation is provided by the management. The flowers are reckoned in the expenses. They are a part of the corps. And the person upon whose stage is so many in the house to be enthusiastic and fling flowers.

The good old belabored and bebumbugged Public sits sparsely about the house—knows all about it—has paid its dollar—is a little disappointed—looks up the paper in the morning to see itself reproached for not supporting the Opera.

Humbug is as necessary at the corner of Fourteenth Street and Irving Place, in the Opera House, thus in the Academy of Music—Grand Street and Broadway, in Stewart's. When managers have learned that, they will not issue card-of and appeals to the unfortunate public. They will, however, use the same answer to all such cards: "You asked me for a child of young years and piety, very well, dad, and, and meally. Next time when you offer fresh eggs, I shall know they are addled."

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—A correspondent, who desires that neither his initials nor his name should be published, asks the Lounger, "Is the Lounger old friend the Easy Chair of Harper's Magazine, who has left us for the Lounger that the author may censor hear from it, a little poem, of which he says, and one very conversant of current periodical lore will be the same good sense." If after two numbers I do not see my offering in print, I will conclude that your good judgment is correct, and that will content me."

—A READER, Pomeroy, Tennessee, is sorry that the Lounger should say "infamous stuff" in his address. But then a reader should consider how difficult it is to obtain "good letter-paper," as he calls our imaginary singers. Wouldn't one's indigenity qualify qualified with linguals, as Tennessee?

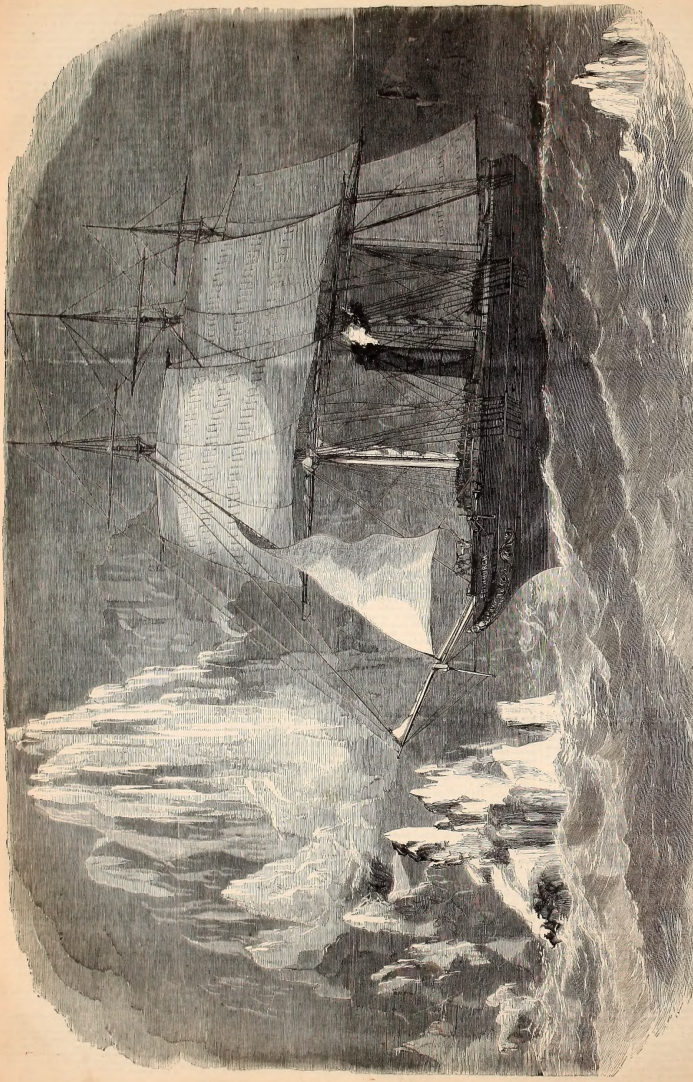
—Mr. Charles Sidon, Massachusetts, may be very sure that whenever any author in a person of sufficient personal interest to the Lounger to require biography, it will not fail to appear in the pictorial history of the times called Harper's Weekly Magazine.

—C. S. H., Dubuque, Iowa. Mrs. Caroline Norton is the author of "Allen Percy," and Clarence Cook of "Studies," in Putnam for February, 1855.

—PHILO, Charleston, South Carolina. Gun-cotton is cotton chemically prepared, so as to have an extraordinary explosive power. The patent was recorded in England in 1841, and it was then estimated that three parts of the best gunpowder were equal to four to eight parts of Tower-proof gunpowder. It has been used in Austria for blasting purposes on smoke. It explodes at temperature of 250° to 400°.

---

* She did it by examination this year: she usually does it in person.



COLLISION BETWEEN THE STEAMSHIP "EDINBURGH" AND AN ICEBERG, 180 MILES FROM NEWFOUNDLAND, ON JUNE 6, 1859.

ACCIDENT TO THE STEAMSHIP "EDINBURGH."

We give on the preceding page an engraving of the collision of the steamship Edinburgh with an iceberg, which took place on June 6, 189 miles east of St. Johns, Newfoundland. The iceberg was first discovered directly ahead of the ship, being in lat. 47° 46′, long. 48° 20′. The helm was put hard aport, and she passed close alongside without touching the port shore ropes, but struck her starboard bow on the fluke of the port anchor, which is one of her forward plates, through which the water rushed.

The engines were stopped and backed, but the ship had passed the iceberg before her way was stopped. The two foremost compartments filled almost immediately with water. The pumps were quickly set going, and sails and bedding forced over into the holes. All the male passengers assisted the crew in working the pumps, and bailing out. There was a dense fog all day Monday and Monday night with rain—wind fresh, but sea smooth. At noon of Tuesday an observation was taken for the first time for three days, and the ship was found to be in lat. 47° 41′ N., long. 50° 29′ W.—distance from St. Johns 47 miles.

At — she made the land, all hands working regularly at the pumps, and bailing, and the ship in ship form sinking. The water was only kept from flowing into the other compartments by their inpenetrant labor.

The following letter is written by Mrs. Adelia P. Pulbeck to her husband in this city. Mr. Pulbeck was a passenger on the Edinburgh, and was out on the deck at the time of the collision:

"ST. JOHNS, N. F., June 7, 1859.

"MY DEAR HUSBAND.—Since I parted from you I have passed through fearful peril, and never expected to see you again. We were steaming along last Monday at the rate of eleven miles an hour, through a dense fog. At about twenty minutes past eleven I was on deck, looking over the stern of the vessel, and had just remarked to a fellow-passenger that the air seemed unusually cold and chilly. At that moment I turned around and a frightful scene met my view. Mountains of ice lay on the leeside of the steamer. It was a foggy day we could not see fifty feet around us; and though the vessel's head was immediately turned we passed so near the iceberg that a cowlid was thrown on again and again. We said that it was a wonderfully narrow escape, and thought that we were safe, when suddenly there was a heavy shock of striking." All the boats, eight in number, were cut loose, and furnished with blankets and provisions. We were shut one hundred and seventy miles from land at the time. The passengers and crew worked hard. A watch of two hours each, and then worked for thirty hours. The women also worked, and among others I helped at the pumps for three hours without stopping. The captain was as calm as if nothing was the matter. We passed a dreadful night. We were all numbered for the boats, for which we were liable at any hour to be forced to enter. The rain came down in torrents, and the ship labored so we thought every moment that she would sink. At last, to our great relief, the day dawned, and at about eleven o'clock the fog, which had all the time continued, cleared away. The captain was out on observation, and found we were about forty-seven hundred miles from land. There were no signs of land. About four o'clock our signals for a pilot were observed, and at seven o'clock we reached St. Johns."

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

In Three Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

Printed from early Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers pay the Author

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK II.

THE GOLDEN THREAD

CHAPTER VI.

HUNDREDS OF PEOPLE.

THE quiet lodgings of Doctor Manette were in a quiet street-corner not far from Soho Square. On the afternoon of a certain fine Sunday when the waves of four months had rolled over the trial for treason, and carried it, as to the public interest and memory, far out to sea, Mr. Jarvis Lorry walked along the sunny streets from Clerkenwell where he lived, on his way to dine with the Doctor. After several relapses into business absorption, Mr. Lorry had become the Doctor's friend, and the quiet street-corner was the sunny part of his life.

On this certain fine Sunday Mr. Lorry walked toward Soho, early in the afternoon, for three reasons of habit. Firstly, because on fine Sundays he often walked out before dinner with the Doctor and Lucie; secondly, because on unfavorable Sundays he was accustomed to be with them as the family friend, talking, reading, looking out of window, and generally getting through the day; thirdly, because he happened to have his own little shrewd doubts to solve, and knew how the ways of the Doctor's household pointed to that time as a likely time for solving them.

A quainter corner than the corner where the Doctor lived was not to be found in London. There was no way through it, and the front windows of the Doctor's lodgings commanded a pleasant little vista of street that had a congenial air of retirement on it. There were few buildings then north of the Oxford road, and forest trees flourished, and wild flowers grew, and the hawthorn blossomed, in the now vanished fields. As a consequence, country air circulated in Soho with vigorous freedom, instead of languishing into the parish like stray paupers without a settlement; and there was always a good sunny wall, not far off, on which the peaches ripened in their season.

The summer moon-beams that shone into the corner brilliantly in the earlier part of the day; but when the streets grew hot the corner was in shadow, though not in shadow of so serene but that you could see beyond it into a glare of brightness. It was a cool spot, staid and thoughtful, wonderful spot for echoes, and a very harbor from the raging streets.

There ought to have been a tranquil bark in such an anchorage, and there was. The Doctor occupied two floors of a large old house, where several lodgings purported to be parsued. But but whereof little was audible any day, and which was unusually still on the day when he sat in a building at the back, attainable by a courtyard where a great many people could get, and church-organs claimed to be made, were known to be chased, and likewise gold to be beaten by mysterious giants who had a golden stamp at starting out of the wall of the front hall—as if the hall were full of Midas's ears, and menaced similar conversion of all visitors. Very little of these trades, or of a lonely lodger rumored to keep up state, and to be a valetudinarian, ever asserted to have a counting-house below, was ever heard or seen. Occasionally a stray workman putting his coat on traversed the hall, or a stranger peered about there, or a distant clink was heard among the roof-trees, or a thump from the golden giant. These, however, were only the exceptional incidents to prove the rule that the sparrows in the plane-trees behind the house, and the echoes in the corner before it, had their own way with little disturbance from Saturday night.

Doctor Manette received such patients here as his old reputation, and its revival in the fleeting whispers of his story, brought him. His notable knowledge, and his vigilance and skill in conducting ingenious experiments, brought him otherwise into notoriety. Wherefore a quiet and he earned as much as he wanted.

These things were within Mr. Jarvis Lorry's knowledge, though he came only now and then to the door-bell of the tranquil house in the corner on the fine Sunday afternoon.

"Doctor Manette at home?"

Expected home.

"Miss Lucie at home?"

Expected home.

"Miss Pross at home?"

Possibly at home, but of a certainty impossible for handmaid to anticipate intentions of Miss Pross, answering in admission or denial of the fact.

"As I am at home myself," said Mr. Lorry, "I'll go up stairs."

Although the Doctor's daughter had known nothing of the affairs of business, she appeared to have innately derived from it that ability to make much of little means, which is one of its most useful but most agreeable characteristics. Simple as the furniture was, it was set off by so many little adornments, of no value but for their taste and fancy, that its effect was delightful. The disposition of every thing in the room, from the largest object to the least; the arrangement of colors, the elegant variety and contrast obtained by placing in every light a few choice flowers, the best literature, and good sense, were at once so pleasant in themselves, and so expressive of their originator, as Mr. Lorry stood looking about him, the very chairs and tables seemed to ask him whether he approved of the general expression which he knew so well by this time, whether he approved?

There were three rooms on a floor, and the doors by which they communicated being put open that the air might pass through them all, Mr. Lorry, smilingly observant of that fanciful propensity which he detected all around him, walked from one to another. The first was the best room, and in it were Lucie's birds, and flowers, and books, and desk, and work-table, and box of water-colors; the second was the Doctor's consulting-room, used also as the dining-room; the third, changingly speckled by the ruttle of the plane-tree in the yard, was the Doctor's bedroom—and there, in a corner, stood the disused shoemaker's bench and tray of tools, as it had stood on the fifth floor of the dismal house by the wine-shop, in the suburb of Saint Antoine in Paris.

"I wonder," said Mr. Lorry, pausing in his looking about, "that he keeps that reminder of his sufferings by him?"

"And why would he not?" was the abrupt inquiry that made him start.

It proceeded from Miss Pross, the wild red woman, strong of hand, whose acquaintance he had first made at the Royal George Hotel at Dover, and had since improved.

"I should have thought—" Mr. Lorry began.

"Pooh! You'd have thought!" said Miss Pross; and Mr. Lorry left off.

"How do you do?" inquired that lady then sharply, and yet as if to express that she was bound to be polite.

"I am pretty well, I thank you," answered Mr. Lorry, with meekness, "how are you?"

"Nothing to boast of," said Miss Pross.

"Indeed?"

"Ah! indeed!" said Miss Pross. "I am very much put out about my Ladybird."

"Indeed?"

"For gracious sake say something else besides 'indeed,' or you'll fidget me to death," said Miss Pross, whose character (dissociated from stature) was shortness.

"Really, then?" said Mr. Lorry as an amendment.

"Really is bad enough," returned Miss Pross, "but better. Yes, I am very much put out."

"May I ask the cause?"

"I don't want dozens of people who are not at all worthy of Ladybird to come here looking after her," said Miss Pross.

"Do dozens come for that purpose?"

"Hundreds," said Miss Pross.

It was characteristic of this lady (as of some other people before her time and since) that whenever her original proposition was questioned she exaggerated it.

"Dear me!" said Mr. Lorry, as the safest remark he could think of.

"I have lived with the darling—or the darling has lived with me, and paid me for it; which she certainly should never have done, you may take your affidavit, if I could have afforded to keep either myself or her for nothing—since she was ten years old. And it's really very hard," said Miss Pross.

Not seeing with precision what was very hard, Mr. Lorry shook his head; using that important part of himself as a sort of fairy clerk that would fit any thing.

"As if a people who are not in the least degree worthy of the pet are always turning up," said Miss Pross. "When you began it—"

"I began it, Miss Pross?"

"Didn't you? Who brought her father to life?"

"Oh! If that was beginning it—" said Mr. Lorry.

"It wasn't ending it, I suppose? I say when you began it, it was hard enough; not that I have any fault to find with the Doctor himself, except that he is not worthy of such a daughter, which is no imputation on him, for it was not to be expected that any body should be, under any circumstances. But it really is doubly and trebly hard to have crowds and multitudes of people turning up after him (I could have forgiven him) to take Ladybird's affections away from me."

Mr. Lorry knew Miss Pross to be very jealous, but he also knew her by this time to be, beneath the surface of her eccentricity, one of those unselfish creatures—found only among women—who will, for pure love and admiration, bind themselves willing slaves, to youth when they have lost it, to beauty that they never had, to accomplishments that they were never fortunate enough to gain, to bright hopes that never shone upon their own sombre lives. He knew enough of the world to know that there is nothing in it more worthy of respect or love, or more rarely rendered and so free from any mercenary taint, he had such an exalted respect for it, that, in the retributive arrangements made by his own mind—we all make such arrangements, more or less—he stationed Miss Pross much nearer to the lower Angels than many ladies immeasurably better got up both by Nature and Art, who had balances at Tellson's.

MISS PROSS AND MR. LORRY.

"There never was, nor will be, but one man worthy of Ladybird," said Miss Pross; "and that was my brother Solomon, if he hadn't made a mistake in life."

Here again: Mr. Lorry's inquiries into Miss Pross's personal history had established the fact that her brother Solomon was a heartless scoundrel who had stripped her of every thing she possessed, as a stake to speculate with, and had abandoned her in her poverty for evermore, with no touch of compunction. Miss Pross's fidelity of belief in Solomon (locked away in a little effe for this slight mistake) was quite a serious matter with Mr. Lorry, and had its weight in his good opinion of her.

"As we happen to be alone for the moment, and are both people of business," he said, when they had got back to the drawing-room, and had sat down there in friendly relations, "let me ask you—does the Doctor, in talking with Lucie, never refer to the shoemaking time yet?"

"Never."

"And yet keeps that bench and those tools beside him?"

"Ah!" returned Miss Pross, shaking her head, "But I don't say he don't refer to it within himself."

"Do you believe that he thinks of it much?"

"I do," said Miss Pross.

"Do you imagine—" Mr. Lorry had begun, when Miss Pross took him up short with—Never imagine any thing. Have no imagination at all."

"I stand corrected. Do you suppose—you go so far as to suppose, sometimes?"

"Now and then," said Miss Pross.

"Do you suppose," Mr. Lorry went on, with a tempting twinkle in his bright eye as a looked kindly at her, "that Doctor Manette has any theory of his own, preserved through all those years, relative to the cause of his being so oppressed; perhaps even to the name of his oppressor?"

"I don't suppose any thing about it but what Ladybird tells me."

"And what is—?"

"That she thinks he has."

"Now don't be angry at my asking all these questions; because I am a mere dull man of business, and you are a woman of business."

"Dull?" Miss Pross inquired, with placidity.

Rather wishing his modest objective away, Mr. Lorry replied, "No, no. Sensible not. To return to business: Is it not remarkable that Doctor Manette, unquestionably innocent of any crime as we are well assured he is, should never touch upon that question? I will not say with you, whom we know so well, and whose intentions with me many years ago, and we are now intimate; I will say with the fair daughter to whom he is so devotedly attached, and who is so devotedly attached to him? Believe me, Miss Pross, I don't approach the topic with you out of curiosity, but out of zealous interest."

"Well! To the best of my understanding, and I have the best (you'll tell me), Miss Pross, softened by the tone of the apology, "he has a dread of the whole subject."

"Afraid?"

"It's plain enough, I should think, why he may be. It's a dreadful remembrance. Besides that, his loss of himself grew out of it. Not knowing how he had himself, or how he recovered himself, he may never feel certain of not losing himself again. That alone wouldn't make his subject pleasant, I should think."

It was a profounder remark than Miss Pross had looked for. "True," said he, "and fearful to reflect upon. Yet a doubt lurks in my mind, Miss Prose, whether it is good for Doctor Manette to have that suppression always shut up within him. Indeed it is this doubt, and the uneasiness it sometimes causes me, that has led me to our present confidence."

"Can't be helped," said Miss Prose, shaking her head. "Touch that string, and he instantly changes for the worse. Better not touch it. In short, must leave it alone, like or no like. Sometimes he has dreams in the night, and will be heard by us overhead there walking up and down, walking up and down in his room. Ladybird has listened to know then that his mind is walking up and down, walking up and down, in his old prison. She hears him, and they go on together, walking up and down, walking up and down, until he is tore-downed, walking up and down, walking up and down, by his side and near his face whenever he speaks in his old way. Whether he hears sounds in the real passage of his door once a week, or whether he is moved in his room by the footsteps coming and going, as he has been used to do, I don't know. But, I do know that he is then terribly haunted by the echoes of his own footsteps, and by the echoes of all the footsteps that have gone to and fro in his life."

Notwithstanding Miss Prose's denial of her own imagination, there was a perceptible touch of pain of being monotonously haunted by one sad idea, in her repetition of the phrase, walking up and down, which testified to her possessing such a thing.

The corner has been mentioned as a wonderful corner for echoes; it had begun to echo so resoundingly to the tread of coming and going, that it seemed as though the very mention of that weary pacing to and fro had set it going.

"Here they are!" said Miss Prose, rising to break up the conference; "and now we shall have hundreds of people pretty soon!"

It was such a curious corner in its acoustical properties, such a peculiar Ear of a place, that as Mr. Lorry looked at the upper windows, almost for the father and daughter whose steps he heard, he fancied they would have originated in the footsteps of the echoes. Not only would the echoes die out, when the steps had gone, but echoes of other steps that never came would be heard in their stead, and would die away for good when they seemed close at hand. However, there were no echoes at all at last appear, and Miss Prose was ready at the street door to receive them.

Miss Prose was a pleasant sight, albeit wild, and red, and grim, taking off her darling's bonnet when she came up stairs, and touching it up with the ends of her handkerchief, and blowing the dust off it, and folding her mantle ready for laying by, and smoothing her rich hair with as much pride as she could possibly have taken in her own hair if she had been the vainest and handsomest of women. Her darling was a pleasant sight too, embracing her and thanking her, and protesting against her taking so much trouble for her—which last she only dared to do playfully, for Miss Prose, sorely tried by anything, retired to her own chamber and cried. The Doctor was a pleasant sight too, looking on at them, and telling Miss Prose how she spoiled Lucie, in accents and with eyes that had as much spoiling in them as Miss Prose had, if she would have had more if it were possible. Mr. Lorry was a pleasant sight too, beaming at all this in his little wig, and thanking his bachelor stars for having forbidden him in his declining years to take charge of a daughter of his own to come to see the sights, and Mr. Lorry looked in vain for the fulfillment of Miss Prose's prediction.

Dinner time, and still no Hundreds of people. In the arrangements of the little household Miss Pross took charge of the lower regions, and always sustained herself sacredly as to those matters, of a very modest quality, were so well cooked, and so well served, and so neat in their contrivances, that English and half French, that nothing could be better. Miss Pross's friendship being of the thoroughly practical kind, she had ravaged Soho and the adjacent provinces in search of impoverished French, who, tempted by shillings and sixpences, would exchange their mysteries to her. From these decayed sons and daughters she had acquired culinary secrets worthy all that the woman and girl who formed the staff of domestics regarded her as an amazing cook, or Cinderella's godmother, who would send out for a fowl, a rabbit, a vegetable or two from the garden, and change them into any thing she pleased.

On Sunday's Miss Prose dined at the Doctor's table, but on other days persisted in taking her meals, at unknown periods, either in the lower regions, or in her own room on the second floor—a blue chamber, to which no one but her Ladybird ever came, and which was the picture of neatness. On this occasion Miss Pross, responding to Ladybird's tender face and pleasant efforts to please her, underbent exceedingly, to do dinner a very decent nut too.

It was an oppressive day, and after dinner Lucie proposed that the wine should be carried out under the plane-tree, and they should sit there in the air. As every thing turned upon her and revolved about her, they went out under the plane-tree, and she carried the wine down for the special benefit of Mr. Lorry. She had installed herself some time before as Mr. Lorry's cup-bearer, and while they sat under the plane-tree, talking, she kept his glass replenished. Mindful of their conference of the previous night, she avoided any allusion to the terrible occurrence of the day, and so pointedly did she keep clear of it, that Mr. Lorry began to think he had been needlessly disturbed, and that he would find no other reference to the matter in the morning than he should meet in the casual gossip of the day.

The wine was Chateau Lafitte. How Mr. Lorry knew that, and knew it to be dear and good, is not to be told, in an age of adulteration; but he knew it well, and moreover knew that there was no business in hand at present that could justify him in sitting down with a bottle before him. So, the bottle was set on the table, and he encouraged Lucie to sit down with her father, and talk to him.

Lucie did so, and the conversation soon turned to the resources of this wine of Chateau Lafitte. How a bottle of it had been laid down in the year one, for the solace of some polished lover, on the occasion of the marriage of the Seigneur de Something-or-other with the Mademoiselle Such-a-one, and how the bottle had been brought out from its place of honour in the Seigneur's château, on the occasion of the birth of his first child, a son, and had been displaced by other bottles, grown scarce in their turn, on the occasion of the birth of his second child, a daughter, whose birth had occasioned the decease of the Seigneur's wife, who lay buried under the château wall, with a carved stone monument to her memory, sacred to her many virtues and tenderness, and bearing touching inscriptions in two languages, representing her as having been entirely regardless of herself in her devotion to others, and as having heaped coals of fire on the head of her husband by dint of relentlessly forgiving him every thing, and dying while he was still infamous.

Mr. Lorry asked Lucie, when she had finished her narrative, if she had remembered all this, readily? Lucie replied, Yes, quite readily, because her father had related it so often that she knew it by heart.

Mr. Lorry then put a few questions to the Doctor, touching the time when he had been solicited to undertake the management of the Seigneur's affairs, and touching the present posture of those affairs, and touching the collection of the Seigneur's debts at the present juncture. The Doctor answered all readily and clearly, and seemed quite willing to be questioned, but by no means wished to enter on the subject himself. He shewed no disinclination to speak of the Seigneur generally, but always avoided coming down to particulars. His conversation was mostly general; the circumstances of his imprisonment had been mentioned, and Mr. Lorry once or twice remarked on his having been overlooked and forgotten, but the Doctor seldom proceeded beyond that point. He expressed no bitterness against the Seigneur, but seemed to regard him as one might regard a powerful tree, which had accidentally fallen across his path, and which he saw no present hope of getting out of his way.

As to the general objection to the Seigneur's character, the Doctor agreed that he was an honourable gentleman, a man of honour and truth. While the Doctor thought that the Seigneur might have been a better landlord than many landlords, he had no doubt that he had been wronged in his absence, and knew that he had always been anxious to redress wrongs. Upon the whole, he spoke of the Seigneur in terms which showed Mr. Lorry what he was willing to have said, and Mr. Lorry left the conversation more encouraged than he had been yet.

And now, as they sat under the plane-tree, talking hopefully of these things, Mr. Lorry's thoughts seemed to be drawn to the echoes again, and he asked the Doctor whether he had ever heard them before?

"Often. In my cell in the Bastille, before my release."

"But even then, when you were talking with your friend, the Marquis?"

"I was not then aware of echoes. I heard the echoes of history, not the echoes of sound. A echo from the past in the echoing corner here, begins to talk to me."

"Echoes are very numerous there," said Mr. Lorry, smiling.

"They are very numerous in many places," returned the Doctor, gravely. "They exist in the air, and in the water, and in the earth. There are echoes for which the mere dust in the road was once stirred. There are echoes that have been asleep for hundreds of years. Echoes that repeat themselves, faithfully, after long intervals. Echoes that were set going in forgotten times, by people whose very graves are lost. Echoes that would die out, if they could find the right ear and the right moment, on the breath of a whisper. Echoes that have been silent for centuries, stimulated to life anew by the wind that moves a mountain leaf. Echoes that go down, down, down, into the mines of the earth, and there touch other echoes that have been shut up there for ages. Echoes that swell and fade and swell again, as the sound of the cathedral organ rolls through the arches high overhead. Echoes of curses and cries, of sighs and laughter, of jests and earnest, of active and passive, of light and darkness, of day and night, of the tempest and the calm, of destruction and life."

As the Doctor progressively dropped into his subject, he forgot the bystanders, and spoke as if he were reciting from memory. His manner became unconscious and dreamy.

"Echoes," he went on, "are produced in the terrible prisons that I know, by the echoes of the cries that have preceded them. Echoes of wailing and lamentation, of sickness and poverty, of starvation and rags, of mocking laughter, of hard and bitter speech, of heavy footsteps going away. Fainter echoes, of sighing that only arose with the death of the last echoes. Echoes of the roar of the city changed by the distance to the murmur of the wind. Echoes of innocence and youth, of traitors and true men. All echoes that have been set in motion in those prisons, perpetually vibrate there, and will vibrate until the last echo shall utter its last sound. You hear me speak of echoes often. I hear them often. Echoes are very loud to me, at times."

Lucie coming to him hastily, he added, after a few moments, in a changed voice, and with a smile that had more of gratitude in it than mirth in it:

"And I hear them!" he added again, after a pause of thought. "Here they come, fast, fierce, and furious!"

It was the rush and roar of rain that he typified, and it lasted until it passed by, and was no more heard in it. A memorable storm of thunder and lightning broke with that sweep of water, and there was not a moment's interval in crash, and fire, and rain, until after the moon rose at midnight.

The great bell of Saint Paul's was striking. One in the clear air, when Mr. Lorry, escorted by Jerry, left Soho and Sobering a lantern, set forth on his return-passage to Clerkenwell. There were solitary patches of road on that way between Soho and Clerkenwell, and Mr. Lorry, mindful of footpads, always retained Jerry for this service: though it was usually performed a good two hours earlier.

"What a night it has been! Almost a night, Jerry," said Mr. Lorry, "to bring the dead out of their graves."

"I never see the night myself, master—nor yet I don't expect to it what would do that," answered Jerry.

"Good-night, Mr. Carton," said the man of business.—"Good-night, Mr. Lorry. Shall we ever see such a night again, together?"

Perhaps. Perhaps see the great crowds of people, with its rush and roar, passing above and below them, too.

LITERARY.

ALFORD'S GREEK TESTAMENT, published by Harper & Brothers. This work demands more than a passing notice, and we direct to it the attention, first, of all Biblical scholars; second, as all students of the Bible; and third, of all who are interested in a thorough understanding of the Word of God.

We have had various and learned editions of the New Testament in the English Tongue, and we have without notes, but never an edition to be compared with this. It is a magnificent specimen of typography, and as such it will be treasured by the type ever issued from an American press. But what is the learned world to do with the work if learned man. In this respect it will meet universal commendation. The knowledge, critical acquirement, assiduity, and labor bestowed upon it, will shine forth as an annotator, which Dr. Alford has brought to the work, alone make it the first of its class extant. In the next place, the compilation of learning from previous annotators is enormous. He has gathered and garnered the wisdom of every critic from the earliest ages, and has brought it together before us in a convenient form for the modern student.

No suggestion of a different reading, or hint of the means of explanation, wherever and whenever made, has escaped the educated eye of our editor. He has in one word summed up, in a few pages, a hundred editors who have preceded him.

To give in our notice any complete idea of the work is out of the question. The volumes before us contains the Four Gospels, preceded by the introduction or prolegomena of Dr. Alford. In this latter we have a history and a critical examination of the works which he edits. The examination is so clear, simple, and masterly in its arrangement, that some persons have thought it verging on disrespect to the Sacred Scriptures to treat the gospels which he edits. It is far from being so, however, to the mind of the scholar. Dr. Alford does not believe in a verbal inspiration, but a general and fully believe in the plenary inspiration of the sacred books. In the introduction to the words as he would the words of Sophocles, and seeks to find their true sense from the means at the command of a thorough scholar. Indeed, in almost every page are therefore of incalculable value, and we know of no work which will be of more Christian household in the land, who can read Greek even with difficulty, will find near light and knowledge in the New Testament in the edition of the Gospels. Not only have we the advice of Dr. Alford, but we have the advice and gost of the different readings in the various manuscripts of early times which are extant, and the text itself is revised in such a manner as might be expected from the scholarship of the editor.

The prolegomena are worthy of study for the worth the price of the volume to those who do not read Greek. It contains a history of the text of the New Testament, a discussion on the authorship of the various portions, and the dates at which they were written, a comparison of the Gospels and their harmonies, with a noble and triumphant defense of their inspired origin and holy character.

No clergyman or theological student can fail to place great value on the work; and as these classes of gentlemen are seldom able to increase their libraries, we take the liberty of suggesting to any one who desires to purchase a present for a friend who is studying theology, that this work will prove most valuable and acceptable.

It should certainly be in every clergyman's hands in the country.

Bangs, Merwin, & Co. continue their sales of articles of verts, coins, medals, etc., from time to time. They advertise a sale of coins, etc., for the 21st and successive evenings, which, from an examination of the catalogue, we are able to pronounce the most extensive and varied sale of valuable coins which has as yet been held in this country. We observe, among other articles, the rare New England pieces, either of which will be cheap if sold at $5; also the Baltimore grout, which may sell bring $10 to $50.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

[The following important letter will be read with interest. It is addressed to A. V. Heiler, of Cincinnati, by Secretary Cass, and is self-explanatory.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, June 14, 1859.

SIR,—In answer to your letter of the 9th inst., I have to inform you that the brief letter from this Department to which you refer, dated the 17th of May last, and addressed to Mr. Felix Le Clere, was in reply to an application for information which was originally intended to recommend caution to our naturalized fellow-citizens, who, after a residence of five years in France, and the expression of the French conscription law were not prepared to return home, and might bear allegiance to the cities of American citizens. Most of the Continental States require military service from their subjects, and this Government regards the exemption from it as a favor to be sought for, as in France, where a system of conscription prevails, and from which, therefore, every person is required to take his turn as a soldier.

HOW THE ADMINISTRATION WOULD LIKE TO ACT IN THE CASE.

"The condition of American naturalized citizens returning to their native country has been the subject of repulsory service recruits, and who had left before permanently domiciled in the United States, and of discussion with some of the European Powers. Quite recently the Government of Prussia has issued a decree, and the representative of this country at the Court of Prussia has received from the Minister of Foreign Affairs a communication, in which the subject is treated with much candor and liberality. By the decree of May 15, 1859, the Government of Prussia declares that it considers the question as one of international allegiance, and maintains the right of acquisition and loss of nationality by emigration and naturalization. Upon this subject it is observed that in this age of the world the right of emigration is a matter of course, and of a house and binding him by a mere political theory to the land of his birth, when he has made it his choice and desires to leave, can hardly be entertained by any government whatever."

THE SMALL HOLE THROUGH WHICH MR. CAIN CRAWLED.

"The position of the United States, as communicated to the Minister of the Interior in the information of the Prussian government, is that native born Prussians naturalized by the United States, and returning to the territory of their birth, are not liable to any duties or penalties, except such as may be imposed by treaties or by exemption. If at that time they were in the army or actually under the laws of military conscription, they can not exempt them from the legal penalty which may be incurred by their non-appearance. But there is a reserved against them whenever they shall voluntarily place themselves within the limits of the territory of their native country and shall be proceeded against according to the laws of the country. Prussia claims the right to fix the period of such emigration, and to require that in the case of such persons they shall have the right of a considerable time, and that they shall be subject to military service, and the attempt to do so would be considered as a violation of the laws of nationality by the United States. This question can not of course arise in the case of a naturalized citizen who returns to the United States. It is only when he returns to the country of his birth that he is subject to the laws of that country in him. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

LEWIS CASS."

NEWS FROM UTAH.

Additional advices from Salt Lake inform us that Governor Cumming had ascertained that a twelve-pound howitzer could be taken from Camp Floyd to Salt Lake. The Marshal has addressed a communication to the Governor asking for the loan of the howitzer, stating that there are no bodies of armed men gathering in the mountains which were to be in military requisition. The howitzer had promised protection to emigrant trains going to California, and that the Marshal was engaging a force of some common point, when he would afford them an escort. The Mormons are said to be manufacturing powder of with government stock. "A big blow," or worn, did some damage to Salt Lake City and Governor on the 3d inst.

ANOTHER SICKLES APPEAL.

The West Troy Democrat has been put in possession of the particulars of the suicide of Mrs. Sickles, the wife of the father of a girl said to have been seduced by the young son of Mr. Sickles, the late Secretary of Legation.

We give the account as furnished the Democrat, from which paper readers are enabled to draw their own conclusions:

"The citizens of this place were thrown into great excitement last night by the announcement that Mrs. Sickles, a niece of Mr. Sickles, had been shot by Arthur Hoffman for outraging the person of her daughter. The deceased Case was formerly clerk in a dry goods establishment in this village, but for the last two years has been in business north of this place. Last December he came here and boarded at Mr. Sickles's, and during his stay here he got acquainted with Miss Holden. She was the daughter of a poor man, but was of a respectable family. Circumstances have since shown, Case, under promise of marriage, ruined her. Mrs. Sickles, it is said, was aware of the fact, but swears that Case should answer for the crime. Case left here for Albany, and Mrs. Sickles followed him and with him to the house of Mr. Hoffman, where Case was found. He was decided with his parents, and last night came down to Albany, and while walking with Miss Sickles on State street through the heart with a rifle. He died almost instantly.

Before leaving for the scene of assassination, and with no residence, simply remarking that he had done his duty. Thus he has gone before his God to answer for the subject, and a large number of people have been to the same where the murder was committed. Mrs. Sickles is now in the custody of the Sheriff."

DAUGHTER IN JAIL.

The Cincinnati Inquirer says: "A day or two since Stephen J. Wheeler, a resident of the Ninth Ward, was on a prison awaiting a new trial for killing Singston, the murder of one of Wheeler's daughters. Wheeler, after a reconciliation between the father and his two girls, had left the daughter Mary in jail charged with murder, and not spoken since the Monday morning of the murder, 30 years ago.

"By the kindness of the Jailer the daughter was allowed to visit their father in his cell. Finding a most affecting interview took place; the girl falling on his neck and weeping bitterly. Wheeler, who from the eyes of the world, supposing him not to have the wife destroyer of his child's honor, and had known her to fall step by step in degradation and despair, the great heart ran like rain the agony of a heart wrung by affliction and agonized by terrible suffering to a woman's tenderness.

"For some minutes no one of that trio spoke. The father folded their arms around the child of his love. The daughter sent them into silence. Their sorrow was too deep for utterance, and love and grief, memory and despair filled their hearts to bursting. In that moment they were purified; in that hour their errors were blotted out by the tears of deepest contrition, and cleansed away by the blood of their Redeemer.

"At last one of his girls, the dishonored and avenged, the father's first love, and said, with still streaming eyes:

"Oh father, dearest father, can you forgive me?"

"Yes, my child, with all my heart," was the answer, and impressive answer, "as I hope to be forgiven!"

Then both his daughters knelt and received his blessing, and a moment after he was by their side offering up a prayer of gratitude to Heaven for restoring to him his daughter. The father embraced them tenderly again and again, and then, with the child who had been lost, and who, by her penitence and amendment, had made herself more dear to his comfort and support in the faith, their joyful meeting was ended.

Of course, as witnessed, was extremely pathetic, and the scene was one which can not paint. Before and after the reconciliation were, in spite of themselves, much moved, and the tears of the girl who had been in the human nature which, however it may err, is always kept by a golden though humble thread to its native heaven.

PERSONAL.

The Galveston (Texas) News, of the 16th ult., has a letter from Rome, near San Antonio, dated May 7th, in relation to the illness of General Twiggs. The letter says: "General David E. Twiggs is very low with a fever at this place. He is given up by his physicians, has made his will, and given directions as to his funeral. An ambulance is noted for the frailty attending the commanding officers of the United States troops in Texas, and especially the gallant old veteran of the Mexican war. Before the border, General Worth was General Twiggs is likely to die, of a disease which has never failed to carry off its victim."

The wife of Mrs. John C. Calhoun is still alive and in good health, and is now at the house of her son-in-law, Professor Clemson, at Middleburg.

Herr Alexis, the well-known dancer, having bereft himself of a considerable number of dollars, and his daughter, who is now his wife of Prince Troubetzkoi, a Russian nobleman, has so far recovered from her late sorrow as to have married the Count de Rayneval, now on the 30th of May.

Sabastian Diaz Gomez, the last surviving son of Major General Gomez of the Revolution, died at his residence in Montevideo, Uruguay, on Wednesday, the 4th inst., at the age. The only surviving child of General Gomez is Mrs. Lizardoz.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR.

THE BATTLE OF MAGENTA.

The long-expected great battle has at last been fought. We—or rather we left behind us—have fought it from Novara to Milan. The grandest bridge at Buffalora is only feebly destroyed at the commencement of the war. The French threw across bridges at Turbigo, and passed over to rear on the morning of Tuesday, the 4th inst., the day the fight commenced, and lasted two days. It took place at Magenta, whose native name Marcallo Mills, and it is stated that three hundred thousand men were engaged in the conflict. The Austrians were entirely outmanœuvred, and the King of Sardinia was near the French Emperor during the whole of the battle. The Austrian loss in the two days' fighting is stated at 40,000, and the French loss at 20,000 killed and wounded. Five French Marshals and Generals and nine Austrian superior officers were killed. The battle was fought by the Austrians, and its inhabitants had declared in favor of the King of Sardinia. The city of Milan had not escaped the city. On the reception of the news of the victory in Paris the city was illuminated.

THE BATTLES OF PALESTRO.

The battles of the 30th and 31st ultimo found the allies under the King of Sardinia, had crossed the Sesia and forced the Austrian post at Palestro. The capture of the last brings the intelligence that the Austrians encountered to retake the captured post, but were driven back with tremendous loss. The Austrian force consisted of 17,000 men, among them Croats, who fought with their output had been considerably strengthened the previous day, and at seven o'clock in the morning the movement took place toward the lately captured post of Palestro. The Austrian artillery opened a heavy fire, and the 3d Zouaves received the attack, and repulsed them after a severe struggle. The 4th Zouaves, commanded by the King in person, were then ordered to the position, and the Austrians were already obtained a name. The Austrians are said to have left 2,000 dead on the banks of the allies, besides having 400 men drowned in the canal which they had thrown. The Austrian prisoners were left in the hands of the Italians and French, the latter having by the imprisonment of 1,000 men by the Piedmontese friends of Garibaldi.

MOVEMENTS OF GARIBALDI.

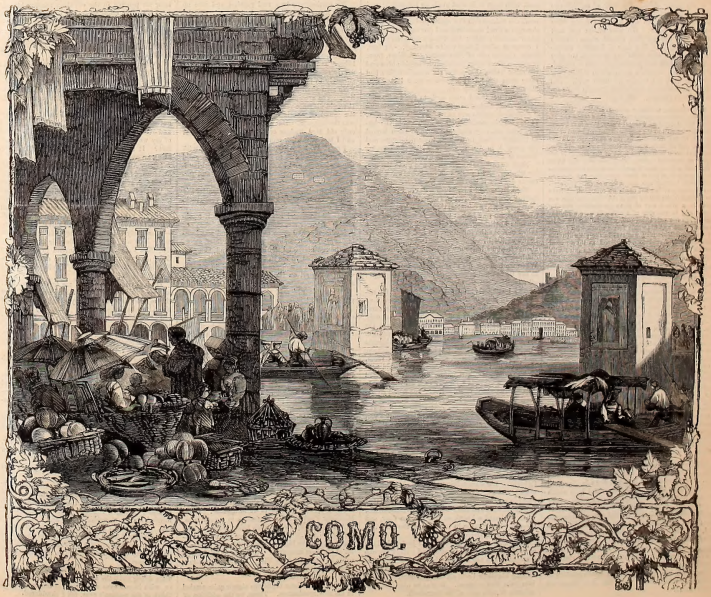
The following telegrams have been received in England.

TURIN, May 29.—Como has decidedly declared an adhesion to the Government of Victor Emmanuel. The demographic connection between Turin and Como is re-established. Another record will be made in the annals of the surrounding country in hastening to place itself under the flag of General Garibaldi. The Commissioner Luc Lago Magliore are preparing a fierce resistance to the victorious attack of the Garibaldians.

MILAN, May 28.—Yesterday, after a severe contest, the Austrians evacuated Orzinuovi and retired upon Lodi. The Austrians, in a retrograde dispatch sent by General Garibaldi, to the Austrians, in a retrograde dispatch sent by General Garibaldi, to the Austrians, in a retrograde dispatch sent by General Garibaldi, to the

THE BATTLE OF MONTEBELLO.—THE ZOUAVES CHARGING THROUGH THE STREETS.

AUSTRIAN EXACTIONS AT VERCELLI.



THE WAR IN ITALY—MONTEBELLO, VERCELLI, AND COMO.

We continue our illustration of the war in Italy with a large engraving of the Battle of Montebello, composed from sketches and wood pictures; a view of Como, just taken by Garibaldi; and a picture, from a sketch by Lieutenant Forli, in the Sardinaux army, of the Austrian exactions at Vercelli.

With regard to the first, it is hardly necessary to add any thing to the very full accounts of the battle which we have already published. As usual in such cases, we are more indebted to the Correspondents between the Austrian and the French narratives of the affair. But it is certain, as the Austrians admit the fact, that the latter were the victors; and it is also certain, though the Austrians deny this, that they were repulsed with losers to their antagonists. The day was won by the pluck of the French troops engaged, under Cavalero, who led the bayonet—a weapon which the Austrian soldiers could not withstand. A correspondent of the Evening Post, who is following the armies, says that wherever the French charged with the bayonet the Austrians ran away: he tells a story of a gigantic chasseur who proved to having run eleven Austrians through the body with his bayonet—some of them in the act of running away. It is very easy to accuse the Austrians of cowardice for taking to their heels; if the correspondent had ever witnessed a charge with the bayonet, he would realize their feelings more accurately. Soldiers say that if a bayonet charge can not be checked by musketry or grape, it can not be resisted at all, and the party charged has only the simple option of running away or being run through.

The scene which took place at Vercelli have been the subject of some discussion, a correspondent of the London Times, writing from the Austrian head-quarters, distinctly denying that any of the Austrians committed no outrages, and that the people of Vercelli were not ill-treated. This statement is not credited, for two reasons: 1st, by the evidence, which has been collected with care, in substantially opposite form; and 2d, because it would have been an unexampled thing if the Austrians had not extorted all they could out of the Piedmontese. Military usage, under ordinary circumstances, justifies a commander in making the enemy's country support his army while it lasts. Gyulai would have displayed unusual forbearance if he had acted on any other principle.

Whether the Austrian soldiers made their exactions gaily and humanely, or savagely and brutally, is another question; and we are inclined to say that, despite the denials of the Austrian organ, the London Times, the weight of evidence is in favor of the latter view. We hear of outrages being instituted by Austrian soldiers in cities whose contributions to the Austrian army are not deemed unduly light. We hear of the last sack of flour being carried from houses whose inmates were left to starve. We hear of dispossessed proprietors of peasants who could not or would not give the Austrians as much provender as was demanded. Our illustration depicts a scene which tallies very accurately with the stories we have read. The Piedmontese correspondent of the Evening Post supplies further evidence. He says:

"At Castreggio, a village near Montebello, through which the Austrians were on the march, and which took on the division of General Forey, they found some of the families still in town, and the rest all came back on the approach of the Austrians in time to escape. In the house of one of these families they found a good fire, which had been used by the head of the family in his quality of Austrian officer, and the soldiers made free of the nice genoese that formed the family for this reason. Among these you'd search there were two children under seven years of age, and three women. The attendance basely of the sick women in the house, who had been assured of the fact by one of the villagers, who was detained in a place as sort of place for keeping provisions, steadily dog in the side of a hill. From his hiding-place he saw the soldiers eat, drink, when nothing was left, his eye glared and his whole frame shook with horror and emotion. This scene was still in the act when the Austrians were forced to retreat, and as they passed through the village he counted 360 wagons filled with their wounded."

And again:

"At a village near Voghera, during the time that the Austrians occupied that place, they sent out each day parties of troops hunting for provisions, which they took without payment from the country people. Every morning a house they found in it a journal that is inimical to Austria. Then, on the whole family in front of the public square, and shot them all—men, women, and children. They were not always thus indiscriminate in the choice of the men, who is now lying in the hospital at Voghera, where he was rescued by the people after the departure of the Austrians. I have seen the man and conversed with him—his name is Antonio Bassi—and although I will not have seen the person and heard his account of the atrocious action perpetrated by the Austrians.

"To-day I have seen a letter written by the vicargeneric of Voghera, who was taken by the Austrians as a hostage when they were in the place yesterday. They have a hard time of it during this when the people whose importance renders his fate an object of interest to the people, and from this he will be released without much threatening, upon non-compliance with these demands, to put the hostage to death. Thus his own family, in his letter, announces that, unless the people give them the information required about the movements of the French, they will shoot him."

Our picture of Como will delight all who have been fortunate enough to visit this enchanting spot. It is indeed the loveliest town in Northern Italy, bathing its feet in the beautiful lake which bears its name, and resting its head against a spur of the Alps. It is a thriving town of some 20,000 people, busy manufactures, and successful tradesmen; fond of their town, and their noble cathedral, and their worthies, among whom the two Plinys and Volta are reverently counted. Only twenty-eight miles from Milan, a railway connects it with the great city; at peace time few roads do a better business.

Garibaldi has established his head-quarters at Como—uncomfortably near the Austrians, one would think.

MOTHER'S FIRST LODGER.

WHEN my mother and I took No. 32 of the High Street, Ackeyog (of which the ground-floor is a shop, sublet to the butcher), we found that, after purchasing off a tidy parlor, a room for ourselves, and a cupboard for the maid, there yet remained two nice front rooms, one just over the shop-window, the other right above that, which, as I said to my mother, were just the thing for a lodger.

"Our drawing-room," I said, "and that," a little help of this sort would be most desirable. And it is one of the best situations in the place—just opposite the Town-hall, and all the people with for country air, the buck windows look right down on the church-yard. Besides, the gutenel-looking house; the side-passage and green door make it very private: and the people coming and going to the shop below give it a genteel appearance. I am sure, if we bought a bit of drugget, and put a chiffonier into the corner, and a sofa, and the horse-hair sofa, the round table, and that picture of you in your green satinet, we should save our rent at least a year by it."

My mother looked up sharply from her knitting (an ugly shaped thing and a dark colored ball), and made a mem with her stocking, that kept me bothering over it for the next half hour. "I don't know no person, I can tell you, Patty," she said, decidedly. "No young men. It wouldn't be right, my second. Now, if it was a respectable woman, Patty, and people might talk. I don't know that I approve of the idea in any'ow. But if you say, it's a delikit thing to ask, I'll think of ours has made a hole in the last quarter. We might look about us, and see what we can do."

My mother took out her red silk pocket-handkerchief (which had been my father's, and she used it in remembrance of him) and a bit of snuff, and then her week eyes. The sunlight was gleaming into the room over the geranium pots in the sill, how along the faded carpet, a white star on the polished back of the mahogany arm-chair, falling on my mother's face and hair, and then on the thing itself among the gilt bindings in the book-case.

Well, that night I will I gave her my mind to it, and made my mother so comfortable in the armchair, with the red handkerchief over the back for her hot oil and peppermint, (she always sits in an old one in the evening, when it was too late for visitors), that she promised to think of it, and left me to follow my own devices.

Then I sat myself down on the floor, by the oak bookcase, and sitting a candle on one of the willow-seated chairs, began a long hunt on the bottom shelf. I will I pull out a book or two, books with only one broken leg, and two little shepherdesses that held matches behind them, and a bird's nest, with eggs in it, and a few other things that when I had dusted them, I put them aside to ornament the drawing-room with. Then I looked through my red work-box, and put out some patches for mother's quilt; but it was a long time before I came to what I was in search of. There it was, under a great pile of Manchester Guardians, there it was—a bit of dingy paper-hanging that I found on the other white, that about six months before had come from the linen-draper's with a lot of new muslin for my print dresses.

When I got this I went back to the table, and, with a great deal of trouble, succeeded in writing "Furnished Apartments to Let" on the white side. It was legible, certainly; but I am afraid the letters were not very regular, and were rather crooked as if they wished to fisticuff their neighbors, and the great A in Apartments was like the Leaning Tower of Pisa I've read about somewhere.

Next morning my pattebourd was up in the parlor window, and I was all in a hurry and worry and not to see how it looked from the street.

Then there was a knock at the door. I persuaded mother she spoke hoarsely, rubbed her chest with camphors for five minutes, then had her safe in bed half afternoon; and then, with a candle in each hand, sing, and polishing, and getting Joe from the shop below to move the coals, I made the house ready before eighthall. I went in the last thing to look how and aimed at my handiwork, and really it did look very well, and I was all in a glow of pride. When we had got the new drugget, I'd be bound to see three people out of a dozen take a lodging in all Ackeyog.

All! but all that hurry and scurry came to nothing. In spite of the big hand-bill, and even an advertisement in the weekly paper, no one came near us for close upon a week. Then, at last, came an application from an old lady who thought the rent too high, and wanted a deal of attendance. After her arrived a widow and family, who said they would be just the thing; but it turned out that she had a pet dog, and a parrot, and children. Goodness me! I thought those rooms would never be let; and indeed, I could have cried with vexation when I remembered all the trouble I had taken about them. Every one found an objection; and one lady declared that she liked the other that they were too dark; one disliked the butcher's shop, and another the church-yard. You never saw such dissatisfied folks in all your life.

Well, again mother and I were sitting in the parlor. We had given up all hope, and the weather was so warm, and the grate was well polished, and the fire-irons shone, and the paper neat. And mother's eyes had been bad, and she had grown shade, and moaned herself with nursing mothers. We were talking about the lodgers (as usual; and mother was just saying it was no use keeping up the hand-bill, for no one came, and she would spend no more money in advertisements, when we heard a knock at the passage door, and presently Betsy came in to say a gentleman wished to see the apartments.

I did not keep him a minute. I just picked the ends of cotton from my gown, and pulled my cap straight before the looking-glass, and went out to him. A tall man, standing at the bottom of the stairs wiping his dirty boots on the door-mat. I liked him from that moment. It was so nice and considerate to take care of the door-cloth.

He looked up at the sound of my "Good-morning, Sir!" and I saw his face. It was foreign, dark-complexioned, with a ruddy color on the cheek; a quantity of curling black hair, a twinkling black eye, and a little curled mustache, giving him a piquant expression; and as he turned to me with a courteous smile and the most charming broken English—I must confess it—my heart was taken by storm.

His fumbled in his coat-pocket, and then in his waistcoat, then in his trowsers, and produced, which he presented to me. It was printed in fussy little letters—"Signor Antonio Pasticcio, Professor of Language"—and, while I was wondering how on earth to pronounce such an outlandish name, he began, "Madame, I perceive you have rooms. I did hear of your lodgings; I am the new professor at the grammar-school at Ian Hallen. I want a lodging, I remain me, Missis Flint—"

What he did not say he insinuated by bows; and, charmed by his confidence, I gave my self an extra smooth, and threw open the parlor door.

I had received so many rebuffs and so disappointments that I had grown somewhat modestly than heretofore that I proceeded to draw up the insisted mind (quarreling appearance and a bit Missed in the distance) and decanted on the various merits and convenience of the apartments. I had paid little attention to my explanations, hardly noticed my beautiful stand of wax flowers under a glass shade, or my wax-dolls in a case, I stood aside on purpose to draw his eye to it. His great anxiety seemed to be to secure the rooms before we had satisfactorily arranged that, he only made one suggestion:

"I have a many pictures, and such things," said he. "Perhaps you would not object to remove those portraits in the drawing-room. It is not that the subjects are not good, but instead of being Mrs. Flint, I was only Miss Patty. Good man! how he hated the sight of his family cyclorama, laying his hand on his heart as he said,

"It is possible."

I suppose he had been equally impressed, and wondered at the blindness of the men of this generation. But I was not in a critical humor then, and I was at liberty to return and break the news to my mother.

My mother was in a real passion, and tore up all her lighter paper into crooked strips. She declared that a man who had a wife like that was a fool. As for me I was beside myself. I never thought my mother would have persisted in such a fanciful resolution; and when I went to the parlor and let the rooms, and every minute expected the new lodger to knock at the door, I was nearly in hysterical cried my eyes out, but my mother sat obstinately in the corner, every moment repeating, "No man shall ever come into my house while I live. You are as unmarried woman, Patty Flint. It would disgrace you to have a husband." And then the sound of wheels in the street and thought it was the luggage. But the wheels passed on, and I had still a few moments's reprieve.

Presently, I was sitting in the window-chair with my handkerchief up to my face. My mother did not notice me, and I gave a moan—moaned loudly, and began to rock myself to and fro with my hand.

"What ails ye Patty, what's the matter?"

No answer. Only moan, moan, and rock, rock, as if I were distracted.

"Good gracious! is it lie, Patty? Is it toothache? Answer me, child."

My mother had come quite close, and was leaning over me. I removed my handkerchief, showing the red marks on the left cheek, and, shutting my eyes, moaned and rocked more than ever.

"It's no use asking, mother," I said, in a feeble voice; "it's all on the nerves." And I moaned afresh.

"Dear, dear!" said my mother, "what could put it there?"

I looked up again, and made my red cheek very conspicuous. It was the boldest stroke of my strategy. I was so fidgeted after I had made the arrangements. And really I did all for the best."

My mother looked fairly overcome.

"Don't vex yourself, Patty, about that. Don't! Moment vexation is not worth thinking of. Let me see as you with. I dare say you meant well, and—Did how bad you are! Hadn't I better send for Dr. Rothwood?"

I caught the sound of wheels really stopping this time: "I cannot see a doctor. I will not have be any alteration. My poor head would be distracted by noise. Let them take the boxes up quickly as can, and, dear mother, don't leave me on my account." I was in such a fright she would get out and blow them up, and so for the next hour I kept her fomenting my face and pitying my sufferings.

At the end of that time it was necessary to prepare dinner, and I heard the footsteps of my lodger in the sitting-room; so I dried my eyes and thought I felt better. The tic was going away almost as suddenly as it had come on, and perhaps if I moved about I should get rid of it altogether. So Monsieur Pagliadrin a beef-steak to a very turn, and sent it up by Betsy, with baked potatoes, and a rhubarb tart. I got out one of the best tablecloths, and gave him my own pickles, as well as a bit of Durham mustard. I am sure he might well smile at Betsy, and say Miss Patty was a first-rate cook. I know he did, for I was peeping in at the door to see if he took pickles.

A day or two later found the signor quite settled in his new apartments. Then, by the addition of his bits of ornaments, so changed that you could hardly recognize them. The portraits were gone. I managed tastefully about them. I told mother I was quite miserable when shut out from the contemplation of my beloved parents; and, by the slightest return of tic, persuaded her to allow them to be hung opposite the fire-place in our sitting-room.

Monsieur nodded to me when I went to see them taken down in safety, and asked Joe to remain and do some jobbing for him. Oh me! how grateful I was half an hour examining them when I met with the nuts, and the nose-nipper-and-eye, views, and waterfalls and ruins. But, first of all, there were two portraits of monsieur himself. One over the fire-place—Mr. Pasticcio in life—a beautiful thing! with a genuine look in the eyes, and lips like vermilion, and shaped by a master, but rather peculiar. It represented him standing with his hands under his coat-tails—just as I have seen him stand fifty times in the course of a day. I could have told it any where, though there was not a morsel of his face to be seen—only the top-knot, short figure, and the curly hair. It was the thing altogether that was so like.

And there was another portrait. I don't over, look that; for it was a lady's picture. A dark, cold face, with a great black eye that always looked at you wherever you stood in the room, and long hair falling in disorder over the one cheek, while the other side was all combed up in a bandeau. I dare say it was what people call a fine face, but I didn't admire it. For a long time I thought it was monsieur's sister, but I found out afterward that it wasn't; and I never can have any patience with a woman who is not content to be herself, but she couldn't do up both sides of her hair, even to have her pictures taken.

So, unmarked by any very great event, passed the summer and autumn, and the evenings began to close in shorter, and monsieur had taken a fire to sit for him when he came in after tea-time. And regularly I put on my evening-gown and slippers before the fire, and drew the curtains, and made the teathings. And as regularly when he passed the kitchen door, Betsy Ann, who had been out and was also with his day's work, I popped a bit of bacon or something else on the fire to comfort him. No doubt I was a little afraid of trouble about only a lodger; but there are some people for whom one can never do too much, and monsieur was one of them.

"Miss Patty," he would say very often, "you was too good. You pierce my heart with your kindness." And then he would take my hand with his hand on heart, as if it did really pain him. What wonder, then, that I was more and more interest in one so grateful, that as I saw him grow pale, and thin, and lose his appetite, hour after hour sit pressing his head between them with a visible effort when one of his many pupils came for a lesson, and could not help that he was lacerated by compassion? Or that one night, when he had sent away his tea untouched, I ventured to knock at his door, and ask him to tell me my duty for his comfort?

To this day I can see him as he was that night —sitting in the easy-chair, in his shawl-patterned dressing-gown, with his feet crossed on the fender. A little glow of the fire, and the bright light of the lamp falling on the lady's picture in the corner—all the rest of the room half-dark.

"Dear monsieur," I said, "I am afraid you are not well. You do not eat, and you seem harassed and overworked. Shall I recommend you a little cup of my warwood-tea every morning before breakfast? It is the finest thing in the world for creating an appetite."

Signor Angelo jerked his hand from his forehead, and leaned back in his chair. There was something in his eye, and his voice trembled with earnestness:

"Mrs. Patty, you are very good—you are lovely good. But will remedies for the body effect a cure to the mind? No! there are some ailments that are beyond the reach of all remedies except time. Mr. Patty, there is a disease called LOVE. Nay, Mrs. Patty, you must hear me. I have known you from me! You will drive me to despair if you look so. Oh, Miss Patty, I did not intend to address you thus; but you are so kind, so compassionate, so. Would you give me leave? Would you sit down for one minute?"

He had risen and drawn me to the arm-chair; and he now stood with his folded arms resting on his mantle-piece, and his eyes fixed on me on the chin shepherdess.

I pitied him very much that I was just going to assure him of my anxiety to relieve him at my expense— But I did not wish to be precipitate. As I only thought it, and the sound made in the corner would take her eyes off me.

Signor Angelo took breast in the vehemence of his feeling. Monsieur Angelo continued:

"Miss Patty, your feminine tenderness will have sympathy with mine, surely. You have observed that picture in the corner? It is a feeble representation of the original; but, believe me, my brothed is an angel!"

I jumped up as if I had been shot. "Excuse me, Sir," I said, and ran out of the room. I hear I boiling over."

I could hear a feet a "Yes" as I hurried from the room.

There are some moments in life stamped so indelibly on memory that not even the friction of long years can annihilate the impression. One is least, standing a lifetime in a dream, almost subconscious of the transient dream and a rude awaking. Until now I had not known that I dreamed. I only knew it when I awoke. I only knew it as I sat with my apron over my head, in the kitchen, and felt my eyes scorched by the unconsumed fire at my heart.

There was no sauce-pan on the fire—the embers were dying out—the cat was lying inside the fender, with its red eyes shining up at me, making me think of the woman's eyes, till I shuddered.

Poor me! That little romance was swallowed down like a bitter pill. It was a bit of summer to look back on afterward—a summer that never could come again. A while after, I copied some lines into the cover of my hymn-book, something about

"'Tis better to have loved and lost,
Than never to have loved at all.

And I think it is a true saying; for though I get over the bad feeling in a short time, the sympathy my weakness gave me with other people never passed off.

I did go back to Signor Angelo that evening; I could not; and I made an excuse when he asked me the next day, and said it was mother kept me, but about a week afterward he invited me again, and I went. Yes, I sat and listened to his story—heard all about Victoria, how she was beautiful and clever she was, and how he loved her; and I tried to take an interest in her and to pity him as much as I could.

He told me how he had met with her and her cousin Gertrude in Germany, and described them both. Victoria, with her proud, high nature, and Gertrude, soft and gentle, like a spring flower. Then he went on with his plans for the future, and how his improved circumstances allowed of his marriage; how he had written to his Christmas, and waited an answer. I asked with a sinking heart if he would leave us then, but he said, "No, Victoria would be quite satisfied," and I felt happier. Only when he kept watching for the morning post, sitting at the window, with his eye fixed on the post-office, it was hard to bear with him.

It was Monday morning, just after post-time, and there had been two letters for me, and I sat with a feeling post-mistress, which Betsy had taken up to his room. I was washing in the back kitchen, with a great fire on, and my hands elbow in soap-suds, not altogether in a good humour, when Betsy rushed into the room, and declared that the Foreigner monster had gone demented.

I gave her a box on the ear as an impudent hussy, but, for all that, I thought something "Monsieur was rushing about his room, uttering loud cries," she said, and she had heard a heavy sound like the fall of furniture.

I wiped my arms in a great hurry, and rushed out to listen.

There were strange sounds, as Betsy had represented; but it was in vain that I knocked at the door, or tried to reach—the key was drawn, and no one answered—only the sounds quieted, and I heard a succession of moans.

"Monsieur Angelo—Monsieur Angelo!" I said, "it's me—it's Patty. What's the matter? What's the matter? Are you ill? Oh, monsieur!"

At last came an answer. "What do you want? Go away—don't bother!"

Later in the afternoon I heard his bell with, drawn, and a low voice inside. I knocked, and rushed out. If only just caught sight of his face, very white and care-worn, as he drew back and rebolted the door; but at that moment I only felt the note that I seized hastily. It was directed to Miss Patty, and I popped it into the bosom of my dress, and went upstairs to read it.

"Dear Patty," it said, "would be sure to sympathize with the extreme agony of mind I am under—one who was sinking in the very depths of despair. Then came a very incoherent list that I could not understand, and, to be brief, it told me Victoria's father, having always opposed his daughter's union with the signor on the score of his want of means, had latterly so goaded her with entreaties, commands, and arguments, that in a fit of despair she had plunged into a marriage with him. Then were the words of the note, ending with wild apostrophes, and requesting me to speak to union. I read and re-read the note in trembling eagerness. One thing was clear: Victoria was dead, and Angelo, in consequence, was in a sad state—distraction; I alone aware of the catastrophe, and with the power of preventing further mischief. But how?

I dropped a tear over Victoria's untimely fate, and took out my desk. It was a time to attempt to speak to him, but I might write. And I did write. I found a sheet of paper, and in the loud black edge I had used while mourning for my father, and, for the first time, addressed Angelo by name. I began by condolence, and went on to talk of sympathy and resignation. It took me a long time to do, and I thought myself never have managed at all had it not been for the packet of letters, labeled "Condolences," that my mother had received in her grief, which I took a nice saying out of each of these, and strung the bits together by words and bits. I wrote a most beautiful letter when it was done, and the termination, "Your sincere sympathizer," looked so nice at the bottom of the page—so very sincere, and not warm.

I folded and sealed the note, carried it downstairs, slid it under the door, and gave a low tap to attract his attention. Then, in breathless anxiety, I waited for further news.

They came at last—a low-toned "Miss Patty"—and I found myself admitted into the parlor where poor Angelo was sitting over the fire, looking the picture of misery.

"Be ready, my hand," "Mrs. Patty," he said, "I thank you for your sympathy. But I find I was mistaken in some of the particulars of the letter before acquainted you. I have been re-reading the letters, and see that I jumped to hasty and erroneous conclusions. Victoria is not married (her name), Victoria is not dead, but she is lost to me.

I received two letters this morning—one from her, talking wildly of the roaring and foaming sea that she overlooked from her windows, hinting at despair and self-destruction. The other was from Gertrude, to tell me that her cousin was lost to me forever. Further than this I did not at first peruse—every thing seemed evident, Victoria's devotion quite death, and my necessary despair. But now I find there is a very different interpretation. Victoria still lives, but so dead to me. Over-persuaded by her father, she has agreed to better her fund on another.

Angelo paused, overcome by his feelings; and, burying his face in his hands, sobbed like a child. I did not try to quiet him. I let him cry, and cried with him. It was the best relief. When he was quite wearied I spoke to and comforted him, brought him some warm tea, and insisted on his going to bed.

Next morning I had removed the picture, put it away in the chiffonier, and, by tacit consent, we both from that day avoided her name. I went back to his old habits and his teaching. I did my best to make him forget the past and enjoy the present.

So time passed. Winter came with its sleet and snow; and December 23d found me busy at dozen boys crowding the railway omnibus, and singing "Domum, domum, dulce domum" with heart of not with lungs. Angelo, in a cab with others on passage entrance, with a portmanteau strapped to the top; while Betsy, in a dreadful state of excitement, armed with a carpet-bag and umbrella, and, holding out his hand to me on the lowest step, said, "Good-by!" and, pressing a drizzling kiss on my apron to my eyes, and I called him back, and handed him not the medicine-bottle, but a little packet in my pocket, and the medicine bottle full of wine and water; and to mind and write to me from Germany. He was to go home, as he said, to die for holidays—for, though Italian by parentage, he had been brought up in Germany, and loved it best; and even his late disappointment had not sufficed to cool the feeling.

Mother and I spent a dull Christmas together, hardly reminded of the season save by the vicissitudes at tea, when the plum-pudding would not break. I put up the holly sprigs as I had ever done, for custom's sake; and even carried a few branches into the empty parlor, and placed some into behind the china shepherdesses, on the windowsill, and two on the picture-frame, representing portraits. The room looked very dull without its occupant; and I stood looking at the picture over the mantle-piece, and felt that I should have given away with a tear in mine. What was that poor fellow doing in Germany? I heard of him but once more in his time when it came in from the waste, and see it was well aired? Oh dear! what would be do without me?

And now in my turn I watched for the post in the house; and I dropped my Christmas-boxes academy was to reopen on Tuesday, the grammar-school the next day, and by the Monday post, or the next, came a letter for Miss Patty.

Monsieur Angelo returned thanks that evening—but not alone. He brought with him a certain Signor Pagliardini, the little fair-haired Cousin Gertrude, who had written to tell about Victoria's infelicity.

From the very first moment I thought the lady but out of the fly with tender pride, and bring her into the house—and I dropped curtsies to her and ushered run into my fingers, and told myself over and over again that I hated them both. But I was obliged to go and attend to my school duties, and set sorts of congratulations, and give my hand when the signor introduced me to his good lady. She was, I would, be hoped, be his wife's friend too. I did not raise my eyes to Madame's face, but I saw her hand as it lay in mine, quite beautiful, with long, tapering, horn soft and white as a lily, with pink palms like the blush of a conch-shell. It was a regular beauty, and it made me more bitter. I thought that men never looked beyond appearances, and moralized in my own mind on the fickleness of the signor, irrespective of its setting.

But before spring had brought the fresh flowers it was fain to confess that earth had few young people in it so fair and sweet as my second lodger, the ring in the waxy-white lily. Her light hair falling on her long golden hair, and her violet eyes watching the street-corner for her husband's home-coming.

Poor little Gertrude! poor little darling! with all her heart would have liked to slaughter her husband—far more dearly than my calm middle age had ever been able to love him in the days when I believed in perfection. Now that my eyes were open, opened, I saw him so differently. I heard his occasional harsh answers to his pretty wife, I noticed his invincible vanity, and I wondered how I had ever overlooked it with that constant record in my heart.

Self got a long way with most men, but not with Gertrude's husband. He was self-centered in her love, and comfort, and thought as well. It were her life away with its continual fret. Not that he was unkind—unkindness was not always thought whatever he said or did must be right.

It strange—strange—but I thought. But by spring I loved Gertrude, by summer I doubted her husband, and with the autumn harvest a shadow had sprung up like a new flower. Gertrude had no great mind, no strength of character. She was not even fitted to be a wife—a warped and changeable nature. When she had given her warm love and perfect trust she had given all; you had looked to be very happy with Gertrude. So Angelo took her first as a fresh, pure flower; entwined his heart and life with her's, thinking it a child fickleness, let it fall away from his grasp. He did not throw it away—he only let it drop down a slowly to the ground. And at the close of all this was Victoria. Oh! had I not reason to hate her name?

She was Angelo's first and only love. It was in a moment of pique against her that he had taken to Gertrude, gentle sweet, and when, by some wayward sense of fortune, Victoria's engagement was again broken off, she would not be loved by Angelo, and suffered his old love to revive.

I do not know if Gertrude ever knew all this, but I sometimes fancied that she guessed it. At least she saw that he was changed, and the light in her blue eyes faded, and her step grew very slow and very weak. Then came a long period of illness, and at its close Gertrude was again at her old station by the window, watching the road. But not so earnestly; her gaze was oftener directed to the fender-seat. And at last she took to her bed, as she was all in all to it. One evening monsieur was later than usual in coming in, and I had been sitting with madame in the twilight, helping to nurse the baby, and trying to cheer its mother, for she was out of spirits, and said she did not feel well. There was a step on the stairs, and a faint color came into Gertrude's cheek, and she popped the baby into its cradle. I was leaving the room as monsieur entered. I saw him kiss his wife, in quite after her health. I heard his words.

"Now feeling strong?" the fast is, Gertrude, you will never be strong while you're poking in the house. I'll bire Barnes's gig, and take you a drive to-morrow. There, don't say "No," I will do you good."

I did not hear her answer, but I know she never went contrary to any thing he said; and next morning she asked me to take baby while she was out. The baby was a girl, and I had taken such a passion of her countenance, as she looked up to the window where I was holding the baby, and nodded forward.

It was late before she came in. The wind had risen, and there was a drizzling rain in the air. Her cheek was wet when I helped her off with it, and she complained of dullness.

Before that day week she was dead. The exposure had caused inflammation, and she sank rapidly.

She sent for me into the room, that last night, and kept me by her side in my arms, and laid me kept and quiet as my own child. And, with the night-light only breaking the gloom, and the fire flickering with recurrent flame, and the dying mother and received the trust, to guard and give to Angelo, and love as a sister.

We buried her in the old church-yard behind the house, where we could see her grave as we worked, and Angelo went forward, and took the baby's eye might fall on her place of rest. Poor Gertrude!—poor child! poor girl!

At Christmas the signor gave up his engagements in the town, and went abroad. He was going to his father's estate. Some weeks after he heard he had married Victoria Ernstein, and it did not surprise me. Her name to Angelo's mind, the estimate whose other engagement in the south, for his place at Aisbridge was filled up. Once they were married, and had had a child, but the offer was not made earnestly, and when I repeated the story of my promise to the dead mother, he said no more. So Gertrude's baby stays with us in the old house, and makes our hearts' sunshine with her sweet voice and mother's ways. "Angelina" her mother called her; and so she is—our little angel. God bless and make us better, for her sake!

THE KISS IN THE STREET.

THE world is a world of glorious themes,
The world is a world of wonders;
A web and a tissue of beautiful dreams,
A well and a fountain of splendor.
The world is an image of beauty,
The world is a type of bliss;
If the world would love of its own
There would be no world like this.

I walked in the street on a sunshiny day,
The people were busy and merry.
The crowd that were looking so happy and gay
Were all in a holiday flurry.
I held by the hand my darling girl,
She skipped and she danced along.
And, children, laughed at the hum and the whirl
Of the countless moving throng.

I walked, and I watched the myriad mass
Of the busy living city by,
And it made me glad to see them pass
With a smiling lip and a laughing eye.
And so I sang to myself a song,
A song on the happiest theme,
To the crept that was slowly passing along,
Like the mythical forms in a dream.

And so I sang, as I walked along,
Pretty, and merry, and gay;
And a man came out of the midst of the throng,
Who walked by my darling's side.
He was plain and vulgar, and walked with woe,
But his clothes they were rich and fine,
And a diamond glowed in his shirt of snow,
Which I wished at the moment were mine.

He walked for a while with a downcast eye,
And seemed stupid and sullen to me;
And I heard the moan of an inward sigh
As he kissed my darling's cheek.
In vain was the moment we quietly stand,
While neither offered to stir;
And he softly said, as he pressed my hand,
"I have lost a child like her."

Then silently passed that haggard man
To the midst of the crowd again,
And the song I had in my heart began
Was hushed in a throb of pain.
It is wrong to sing since that sunny day,
And my darling lives above;
The song and all that I learned away
But the memory of my love.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

TOBACCO.

TOBACCO SEED FROM CUBA.—Mr. Bragg, of St. Louis, Missouri, who has just returned from Cuba, where he has been for some months, and giving his special attention to the culture of tobacco, tells us that he knows that the Cuban tobacco may be cultivated in our climate with success.

Mr. Bragg brought home the seed of the genuine Vuelta de Abajo from one of the largest Vegas in the District of Pinar del Rio, in the western part of the island. These seeds are known in Cuba by the name of Semilla de Tabaco de la Vuelta de Abajo from the Vuelta Vegas. This tobacco is used in the manufacture of the finest Havana cigars; and most of this brand is monopolized by the well-known cigar manufacturers of Havana—viz., Cabana & Carbajal, Opulance & Co., and Vegay. This tobacco is so valuable it is difficult to get the seed. Mr. Bragg has the genuine seed, which he will give to all agriculturists to test its culture. He will send seed to those who want it, free of all charge, expecting them to report the results.

Whoever wants seed will address Mr. Oliver Tordell Bragg, box 2291, Post-office, St. Louis, Missouri.

Tobacco is grown for special purposes in many Northern districts. This is known as the Virginia Leaf, of the northern shore of Lake Erie and elsewhere, while often sells at a higher price than the best the more Southern districts, because of the finesses of its texture, which is mainly due to the influence of the cool growth. The best brand good of the thin leaf of Canada as compared with the Black Fats of Virginia. The light-colored leaf of the Eastern shore of the Maryland soils result in the finest markets, for the manufacture of Kile Foot, Cavendish, and other fine manufactures. The almost favorites, is used in Havana to wrap the Manufacturer's cigars. Therefore a small crop here, at high prices, will pay. The old which grows the Wrapper Leaf can not grow the plant as well as the Seed-leaf. Hands do not like the way to raised in hot-beds, as early embogues; then transplanted to the proper distance apart, and cultivated in the usual manner.

The exhaustion of the soil by tobacco should not be a matter of serious alarm to the farmer, if taken away by crops. Constant cropping, without any return, is not a system of robbery. Experience shows that a soil is not inexhaustible because it is not yet exhausted. Liebig says: "The first culture of tobacco in Virginia found a rich soil, and harvests of wheat and tobacco were obtained for a hundred years without any return to the land the aid of manure; but now whole districts are abandoned, and converted into unfruitful pasture-land. The Virginian planters, however, know well what tobacco. From every acre of this land there was removed with the spoon of the sale, 3,000 pounds of alkalies in leaves, grain, and straw; it became unfruitful, therefore, because it was deficient in mineral particles of alkali in the condition, and because that which was rendered salable was not the soil, because it was not sufficient to satisfy the demands of the plants."

Again he says, in his "Familiar Letters on Chemistry," p. 74: "It is possible, by the successive investigation into the origin of the elements of vegetables and vegetables, that the alkalies, of lime and the phosphates, any doubt can exist as to the principles upon which a rational agriculture depends? Can the art of agriculture be based on any thing but the restitution of a disturbed equilibrium? Can the fertility of any country, however rich and fertile, with a flourishing commerce, which for centuries exports its produce in the value of gross sums, not restore to its fertility if the same commerce does not restore, in some other form of value, those elements which have been removed from the soil, and which can not be replaced by the atmosphere? Must not the same law hold in each every portion of which has actually befallen the once prolific soil of Virginia, which now scarcely yields the seed which it formerly stapple productions—wheat and tobacco?"

Again, in his "Modern Agriculture," which is now in press by the Messrs. Harper & Brothers, he says: "The tobacco-planter takes away, in the tobacco-crop, an immense amount of mineral elements (in clover-hay, for instance, not above 10 per cent.; in tobacco-leaves from 18 to 24 per cent.)."

Eight hundred pounds of tobacco gave 160 pounds of ashes, which were composed of—

Potash	49.42
Soda	1.44
Lime	17.14
Magnesia	10.04
Chloride of sodium	6.32
Chloride of potassium	6.03
Phosphate of iron	1.20
Phosphate of lime	10.16
Sulphate of lime	2.25
Silica	12.93
	100.00

Here are substances, and how to return them to the soil most economically we may speak of at another time. From the figures given by Liebig as to the composition of the tobacco-plant, are as exact as figures can be in any other business. The tobacco-plant grows the soil the 500 pounds of ashes of tobacco are removed 160 pounds of substances spoken of in the table. If they are not returned, the same will be true of rich soil now which, as Liebig says, "has actually befallen the once prolific soil of Virginia." Although the tobacco-planter takes out of the soil in every 800 pounds of tobacco 160 pounds of ashes, and four-fifths of which the growing crop can take from the air, and keeps up this wasting system, his soil will grow poorer and his crops smaller, until at last it is exhausted, like a rich man who throws his money away at the rate of five dollars a minute. Let those who want to deceive farmers cater to prejudices as they may, the time is coming when the truth will be known; it has come when worn-out lands should awaken our minds to the national importance of this subject, and free soil lands should learn a useful lesson. Let us talk as we may about developing the resources of our country, but without the assurance it not development. The census of 1840 says that the tobacco crop of that year amounted to 215,000,000 pounds, and that of 1850 to 199,752,646 pounds. These figures show a decrease of 19,410,573 pounds. It will therefore be seen that this crop once, and even now, so important a staple, is fast lessening in value. Its decline and fall are mainly due to the exhaustion of the soil.

We hope tobacco-growing readers will look at these facts well. They are of as much importance to them as were those given in the articles on Wheat and Corn-growers of the West, on the exhaustion of the soil by that staple production of our country.

ONE-HORSE MOWING-MACHINES.

Mr. JOHN PAYNE, Canada West, writes:

"Is there a one-horse mowing-machine that will do good work, and can it be used among stumps?"

There is a one-horse mower that will do good work, but not among stumps if the land is thickly studded with them. Until lately we saw no one-horse machine worthy the farmer's attention. One is being built, known as an improved one-horse mower, of light draught, works easily, and is sold for about $75. The driver's seat is so arranged that his weight in it causes a proper pressure on the horse's back, and no more. The cutters are not liable to clog. It has a wheel and lever attached, so that the driver can raise the cutter-bar six to eight inches, thus allowing it to pass over stones or other things in the way, without injury to the machine, which may thus be drawn to the field over a common road. The driver in his seat can throw the machine in or out of gear by a short lever within his reach. We saw the machine of which we speak work on the morning after a heavy rain on a side-hill—old apple-trees at the usual distance apart, the soil rough and spongy, the grass fallen, tangled, very fine, and wet. A light-built horse drew the mower with ease, while the grass was closely cut around the bodies of the trees. It worked well, through these difficulties, up and down hill, but it was guided by a skillful operator. Excellent work may be done on lawns and other intricate places where a two-horse machine can not be used.

A PARTY OF BERSAGLIERI, SUPPORTED BY THE 10TH INFANTRY, FORDING THE SESIA AT VERCELLI, AND SURPRISING THE AUSTRIAN REAR-GUARD.

THE PASSAGE OF THE SESIA BY THE PIEDMONTESE BERSAGLIERI.

THE spirited engraving which we give herewith represents the passage of the Sesia by the Bersaglieri, on 21st ultimo, and is from a sketch by Mr. Vizetelly. The author thus describes the scene:

"An officer told me that no attempt was about to be made to surprise the Austrians, who still remained on the opposite bank of the Sesia. He recommended me, if I wished to witness a feat of arms, to make Vercelli, by fix a spot on the right bank of the river, which he indicated. The attempt to cross the stream was to be made in two places simultaneously, so as to surprise the enemy on both flanks. You will have heard that the Austrians, on vacating Vercelli, blew up the bridge in their rear, funeying by this act to secure their retreat. The river, therefore, had necessarily to be forded by the Sardinians.

"As a measure of precaution no one was allowed to leave Vercelli on the side of the Sesia, which is barely a quarter of a mile from the outskirts of the town, and sentinels were posted at short intervals to enforce the foregoing order. My permit made me an exception to the rule, as I had taken care in it to have it distinctly specified that I was to be allowed to make sketches of the bridges which had been partially destroyed, and of the town, from any point I thought proper. Having passed the line I proceeded in the direction which had been pointed out to me, and soon came upon a large body of Bersaglieri and a considerable force of the 10th Regiment of Piedmontese Infantry, concealed in a hollow formed by the rising bank of the river. I held aloof, watching their movements, screened by some tall wheat and a clump of trees. I could not see the Austrians on the opposite side, owing to the right bank of the Sesia rising considerably at this spot. Presently there was a hasty movement among the troops; officers passed quickly to and fro; and it became evident something was about to take place. In another moment the first ranks of Bersaglieri rushed over the bank, speedily followed by the remainder, with the exception of a certain number told off as skirmishers, who spread out, occupying every spot of rising ground, and forthwith commenced a rapid discharge from their rifles, under cover of which the bulk of the force proceeded to ford the river. I rushed off to a raised bank slightly to the left of the skirmishers, and from my position had a good view of the affair. On the opposite bank were the Austrians, apparently in great disorder, firing, as it appeared to me, at random, for many of their shots came short, duck and drake fashion through the water, and rolling at my feet quite out of the line of troops that were crossing. Perhaps some of the enemy caught sight of me, and did me the honor to exercise their skill upon me. Having, however, no inclination to be a target for Tedeschi bullets, I lay down perfectly flat, only keeping my head sufficiently up to see what was going on.

"The ferment of the Bersaglieri had by this time reached the other side, and without waiting to discharge their rifles, went in at the Austrians (who were retiring through the trees) with their sword-bayonets down. I noticed that the first few paces Bellone fell heavily forward, as they ran up the bank, under the fire of the Austrians; while among those who were still crossing more than one waved his arms—a signal that he had been struck—and, after floating for a short distance, sank beneath the rapid waters of the Sesia. The remaining parties were soon screened from view by the foliage, as the Austrians, making no stand, were followed up by the Sardinians through a thick plantation of trees, and I was unable to see what further took place, but imagine the fighting must for a time have been sharp from the continued rattle of musketry. The skirmishers still occupied their positions, ready to cover the retreat of their comrades should it be necessary. This brilliant coup de main, however, turned out perfectly successful, and a considerable number of beggars, as also some few prisoners, fell into the hands of the Sardinians, who were enabled to make good their position on the left bank of the river, where they were speedily reinforced.

"It appears the Austrians were taken completely by surprise, and were cooking their dinners, which the sudden rush of the Piedmontese made this an unnecessary meal for many of them."

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE CAMPAIGN.

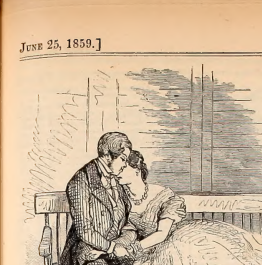
MISS FANNY NEWT went to Saratoga with a perfectly clear idea of what she intended to do. To brief, she intended to be engaged to Mr. Alfred Dinks.

That young gentleman was a second cousin of Hope Wayne's, and his mother had never objected to his little visits at Fleetwood, when both he and Hope were young, and when the unsophisticated human heart is flexible as melted wax, and receives impressions which only harden with time.

"Let the children play together, my dear," she said, in conjugal seclusion to the late Honorable Budlong Dinks, who needed only sufficient capacity and a proper opportunity to have been one of the most distinguished of American statesmen. He indeed thought he was such already. Why undecieve him? asked Mrs. Dinks of herself. Why indeed? she answered. It was quite unnecessary. There was plenty of diplomacy in the family already, and that most skilful of all diplomatic talents, the management of distinguished statesmen, was not unknown there. Mrs. Budlong Dinks, for instance— But why anticipate?

Mr. Alfred, as we have seen, wore seven and a half, lady's size. He was also a sportsman. But it is an unkindness of Nature that makes an American gentleman a sporting gentleman. Sporting in the broad sense belongs to feudal times and countries, when people had to work hard to amuse themselves. But a sportsman is rather a dreary spectacle in times and countries in which people earn their own livings. There is nothing more melancholy than the American race-course, excepting, perhaps, the American steeple-chase.

Fanny Newt had made the proper inquiries.



ALFRED DINKS AND FANNY NEWT.

The result was that there were rumors—how do such stories start? asked Mrs. Budlong Dinks of all her friends who were likely to repeat the rumor—that it was a family understanding that Mr. Alfred Dinks and his cousin Hope were to make a match. "And they do say," said Mrs. Dinks, "what ridiculous things people are! and they do say that, for family reasons, we are going to keep it all quiet! What a world it is!"

The next day Mrs. Cod told Mrs. Dod, in a morning call, that Mrs. Budlong Dinks said that the engagement between her son Alfred and his cousin Hope Wayne was kept quiet for family reasons. Before sunset of that day social gossip was keeping it quiet with the utmost diligence.

These little stories were brought by little birds or by some other equally effective agency to New York, to that select Mr. Dinks arrived the air was full of hints and suggestions, and the name of Hope Wayne was not unknown. Further acquaintance with Mr. Alfred Dinks had revealed to Miss Fanny that there was a certain stealthy ancestor still living in whom the Dinkses had an interest, and that the only participant in that interest was Miss Hope Wayne. That was enough for Miss Fanny. It occurred to her that Mr. Dinks, whose delightful acquaintance the Newts had already made, might, by the merest chance in the world, have reflected upon the remote possibility of a matrimonial alliance between her son and his second cousin.

"Mr. Dinks," said Miss Fanny, as they chatted together at the balls in the spring, "you Boston gentlemen waltz beautifully." (It was after one of the balls, in the sanctity of the matronal dressing-room, that she had made the observation which Mrs. Newt imparted to her son Abel, that the Boston gentlemen in the waltz resembled owls spinning upon invisible bottoms.)

Mr. Dinks had courage to reply,

"Oh, Miss Newt, you New York ladies flatter dreadfully."

But Miss Fanny retorted,

"Not at all; and you will see that I am correct in saying so. I say that you upon knee-action waltz divinely. (Alfred Dinks had his share of the little bit of vanity with which Nature arms the male sex, and he seemed to himself to be sipping honey-dew.) "But Mr. Dinks," continued Fanny, fixing the firm black eyes upon him with a severity there they ever] mitated Mr. Alfred Dinks), "don't you think that the Boston girls are rather much, you know, but just the leastest little bit in the world, what we sometimes call—but the leastest not much I say—just a little, little bit, dashy?"

New York bellhood had, and always will have, a certain bewildering charm to the Dinks-

ALFRED DINKS AND FANNY NEWT.

es. He faltered for a moment before betraying the very citadel of the Boston toilet (for when you have said dowdy, what contemptuous epithet remains?), and smiled. But he said that for there is nothing that a pair of firm black eyes make such game of as a sportsman.

"Well, no—yes—perhaps so—no." He saw that he was floundering. He recovered with an effort and said, gayly,

Fanny carelessly played with her fan as if there could be no serious debate about it, and said,

"I know you would agree with me—every man of sense must."

"Oh, indeed—I mean—" replied Alfred, unwilling to forfeit his reputation for sense with Miss Fanny, but anxious to speak well of his friends at home; "I guess if you could see my cousin, Hope Wayne, you would think the Boston girls were dowdy."

Miss Fanny elevated her eyes upon him, and articulated, slowly and interrogatively,

"Your cousin, Hope Wayne?"

"Yes," replied Dinks, hurriedly; "oh, she's a most beautiful girl. Lives all alone with her Grandpa Burt in the country. I don't believe she's ever seen any other man but me."

Fanny opened her eyes, still interrogating. "Oh," said Alfred, "I've seen others—known—oh, no, nothing of the sort—not at all, not at all."

And he looked and shook his head and pulled his coat up about his shoulders, and repeated, "Oh, no," in such an unassuming manner but half-knowing way that the chief engineer behind the battery of the black eyes was really outgeneraled, and thought, at the time, that he was engaged to Hope Wayne.

Miss Fanny having settled this, and upon further acquaintance with Mr. Dinks having discovered that she might as well undertake the matrimonial management of him as of any other man, and that the Burt fortune would probably descend, in part at least, to the youth Alfred, she decided that the youth Alfred must marry her.

THE ARTIST IN A REVERIE.

But how should Hope Wayne be disposed of? Let us see.

She lived in Delafield. Brother Abel, now nearly nineteen —not a childish youth —not unhandsome, not too modest—lived also in Delafield. Had he ever seen Hope Wayne?

By skillful correspondence, alluding to the solitude of the country, of Abel's and his natural wish for society, and what pleasant people were there in Delafield, Fanny had driven her lines around Abel to carry the feet of his acquaintance, if possible, by pure strategy.

In reply, Abel wrote about many things—about Mrs. Kings and Miss Broadbrid—the Sutlers and Grahams—he praised the powerful tone of rural society, and begged Fanny to beware of city dissipation; but not a word of old Burt and Hope Wayne.

Sister Fanny wrote again in the most confiding manner. Brother Abel replied in a letter of really beautiful sentiments and a quotation from Dr. Dewee.

He covered it a little, as we sometimes do in this world. We appear so intensely unconscious that it is perfectly evident somebody is looking at us. So Fanny, knowing that Christopher Burt was the richest man in the village, and lived in a beautiful place, and that his lovely grand-daughter lived with him constantly, with which information in detail Alfred Dinks supplied her, and perceiving from Abel's letter that he was not a recluse, but knew the society of the village, arrived very naturally and easily at the conclusion that brother Al 'd fall know Hope Wayne and was in love with 'er. She inferred the latter from the fact that he had long ago decided that brother Abel would not fall in love with any poor girl, and therefore she was sure that if he were in the immediate neighborhood of a lady at once young, beautiful, of good family and wealth, he would be irresistibly led in love—very much in love.

To make every thing sure, Abel had not been at home half an hour before Fanny's well-directed allusion to Hope as the future Mrs. Dinks had caused her mother to indicate an interest which revealed every thing.

If, now, Providence, Miss Fanny, "some body who shall be nameless becomes Mrs. Alfred Dinks, and the nameless somebody's brother marries Miss Hope Wayne, what becomes of the Burt property?"

She went, therefore, to Saratoga in great spirits, and with an unusual wardrobe. The opposing general, Field-Marshal Mrs. Budlong Dinks, had certainly the advantage of position, for Hope Wayne was of her immediate party, and she could devise as many opportunities as she chose for bringing Mr. Alfred and his cousin together. She did not lose her chances. There were little parties for bowling in the morning, and early walking, and Fanny was invited very often, but sometimes omitted, as if to indicate that she was not an essential part of the composition. There was music in the parlor before dinner, and wafting of purses and bags before the dressing-bell. There was the dinner itself, and the promenade, with music, afterward. Drives, then, and riding by the glowing return at sunset—the cheerful cop of res —the resplendent piazzas, in delightful toilet, for the evening dance — windows— balconies — piazzas—moonlight!

ARTHUR MERLIN'S SKETCH.

Every time that Fanny, warm with the dance, declared that she must have fresh air, and that was every time she danced with Alfred, she withdrew, attended by him, to the cool, dim piazza, and every time Mrs. Dinks noted the departure. On the cool, dim piazza the music sounded more faintly, the quiet moonlight filled the air, and life seemed all romance and festival.

"How beautiful after the hot room!" Fanny said, one evening as they sat there.

"Yes, how beautiful!" replied Alfred, who found opening a conversation difficult, alone with a girl in the moonlight.

"How happy I feel!" sighed Fanny. "Ever since I have been here I have been so happy!"

"Have you been happy? So I have been happy, too. How very pleasant!" replied Alfred.

"Yes; but pleasant, too. Sympathy is always pleasant." And Fanny turned her large, black eyes upon him, while the good young Dinks was perplexed by a singular feeling of happiness.

They were content to moralize upon sympathy for some time. Alfred was fascinated, and a little afraid. Fanny moved her somewhat Junonine shoulders, bent her somewhat swanlike neck, drooped off one hand and played with her rings, fanned herself gently at intervals, and with put enough embarrassment not to frighten her companion, opened and closed her fan, as if prodigious things might be said if it were only right to allude to them.

Alfred Dinks, good-humored chap, floated on the smooth current—so smooth that its swiftness was imperceptible.

"What a fine fellow Bowdoin Beeton is!" said Miss Fanny, a little suddenly, and in a tone of suppressed admiration, as she drew on her glove, and laid her fan in her lap, as if on the point of departure.

"Yes, he's a very good sort of fellow."

"How cold you men always are in speaking of each other! I think him a splendid fellow. He's so handsome. He has such glorious dark hair—almost as dark as yours, Mr. Dinks."

Alfred half raged, half smiled.

"Do you know," continued Fanny, looking down a little, and speaking a little lower; "do you know if he has any particular favories among the girls here?"

Alfred was decidedly alarmed.

"If he has, how happy they must be! I think him a splendid sort of man—but not precisely the kind I should think a girl would fall in love with. Should you?"

"No," replied Alfred, bewildered. He rallied in a moment. "What sort of man do girls fall in love with, Miss Fanny?"

Miss Fanny was perfectly silent. She looked down upon the floor of the piazza, lifting her eyes upon a pine-knot, and wondering which way the grain of the wood ran, while her whole mind seemed bent upon — what?

The silence continued. Every moment Alfred was conscious of an increasing nervousness. There were the Junonine shoulders—the neck —the downcast eyes—a belle—daughter of Boniface Newt—moonlight—the softened music.

"Why don't you answer?" asked he at length.

Fanny bent her head nearer to him, and dropped these words into his waistcoat,

"How good you are! I am so happy!"

"What on earth have I done?" was the perplexed and confused and ridiculous reply.

"Mr. Dinks, how could I answer the question you asked without betraying—?"

Alfred was inspired. Alfred, serenely,

"Without betraying what sort of man I love," breathed Fanny, in the lowest possible tone, which could be also perfectly distinct, and with her head apparently upon the point of dropping after her words into his waistcoat.

"Well?" said Dinks.

"Well, I can not do that, but I will make a bargain with you. If you will say what sort of girl you would love, I will answer your question."

Fanny expected to hear a description of Hope Wayne. But Alfred's mind was resolved. The foolish youth answered with his heart in his mouth, and barely whispering,

"If you will look in your glass to-night, you will see."

The next moment Fanny's head had fallen into the waistcoat—Alfred Dinks's arms were embracing her. He perceived the perfume from her abundant hair. He was frightened and excited and pleased.

"Dear Alfred!"

"Dear Fanny!"

"Come Hope, dear, it is very late," said Mrs. Dinks in the hall, alarmed at the long absence of Fanny and Alfred, and resolved to investigate it.

The lovers heard the voice, and were sitting quietly just a little apart, as Mrs. Dinks and her retinue came out.

"Aren't you afraid of taking cold, Miss Newt?"

"Oh, not at all, thank you, I am very warm. But you are very wise to go in, and I shall join you. Good-night, Mr. Dinks." As she rose, she whispered—"After breakfast."

The ladies rustled along the piazza in the moonlight. Alfred, flushed and nervous and happy, sauntered into the bar-room, lit a cigar, and drank some brandy and water.

Meanwhile the Honorable Budlong Dinks sat in his arm-chair at the other end of the piazza with several other honorable gentlemen, Major Sprigsomething from Carolina, Colonel Le Fey, from Louisiana, Captain Lamb from Pennsylvania, General Arcularius Belch of New York, besides Captain Jones, General Smith, Major Brown, Colonel Johnson, from other States, and several honorable members of Congress, including, and chief of all, the Honorable Barabbas J. Ely, a leading statesman from New York, with whom Mr. Dinks passed as much time as possible, and who was the chief oracle of the wise men in arm-chairs who came to take sprigs to drink the waters, to humor their wives and daughters in their foolish freaks for fashion and frivolity, and who smiled lofitly at the pretty game of love and flirtation going on all around them, the gay young people who amused themselves with setting up ten-pins and knocking down each other, they, the wise men in armchairs, devoted themselves to talking politics and showing each other from day to day the only way in which the country could be made great and glorious, and fulfill its destiny.

"I am not so clear about General Jackson's policy," said the Honorable Budlong Dinks, with the easy wisdom of a statesman who will not commit himself unnecessarily — of a statesman, in short, who believed that statement ship consisted in never defining your position.

"Well, Sir, I am clear enough about it," replied Major Poppycorn. "It will ruin this country just as sure as that," and the Major with great decision selected a stream of tobacco which fell with unerring precision upon the small stone in the gravel walk at which it was evidently aimed.

The Honorable Budlong Dinks watched the result of the illustration with deep interest, and shook his head gravely when he saw that the stone was thoroughly drenched by the salivary exercise. He seemed to feel the force of the argument. But he was not in a position to commit himself. He held no public office, indeed, nor had he ever held any, except when he served a term in the Legislature of his native State. At an next election he was left at home, and the electors of the district in which he resided had fallen into an unfortunate habit of leaving him at home. But he preserved an unruffled calmness. He had the air of a man who was perpetually upon the point of receiving dispatches from Washington, informing him that he was appointed Minister to somewhere somewhere. He seemed to be forever deprecating congratulations upon events which never happen; and he watched the squirting of Major Scuppernong's tobacco- juice as if it must be a deep observer that he could see the moment whose word would determine General Jackson's policy, and who must therefore be considered fully every quid, and look dispassionately into every puddle.

"Now, I think," said the Honorable Budlong J. Ele, "that it is the only thing that can save the country."

"Ah! you do," said the Honorable B. Dinks.

And so they kept it up, day after day, pausing in the intervals to smile at the people with which the women played their foolish game of gossip and mock courting.

When Mrs. Dinks withdrew from her lofty employments to the invigorating air of the Honorable B.'s society, he tagged her with sometimes with his finger — as he had read great men occasionally to their wives in moments of relaxation from intellectual toil—asked her what would become of the world if it were given up to women, and by his manner seemed to reflect her consciousness of the honor under which she labored in being Mrs. Budlong Dinks.

She, weaker vessel, smiled consciously, as if he very well knew that was the one particular thing which under no conceivable circumstances could she forget.

"Budlong, I think really Alfred ought to keep a horse."

"My dear!" replied the Honorable B., in a tone of mingled reproach, astonishment, cunning, and surprise.

"Oh! I know we can't afford it. But it would be so pleasant if he could drive out his cousin Hope, as so many of the other young men do. People get so well acquainted in that way. Have you observed that Bowdoin Beeton is a great deal with her? How glad Mrs. Beeton would be!"

Mrs. Dinks took off her cap, and without losing her color, without in the least pressing her request. Not at all. The horse was out of the question.

Now the state of the country did not so entirely engross her husband that he had not seen all the advantage of Hope's visit to Alfred.

"It is a pleasant thing for a young man to have his cousin here. My dear, I will see what can be done," said he.

Then the diplomatist untied his cravat as if he had been undoing the parchment of a great international treaty. He fell asleep in the midst of reflecting the speech which he meant to make upon occasion of his presentation as Envoy Extraordinary at the Court of St. James. His beloved partner lay by his side, and reflected that Alfred must immediately secure Hope Wayne before he himself was secured by Fanny Newt.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

ARTHUR MERLIN, PAINTER.

THE whole world of Saratoga congratulated Mrs. Dinks upon her beautiful cousin, and Hope Wayne. Could Mrs. Dugon said to every body:

"How lovely she is! And to think she comes from Boston! Where did she get her style? Fanny dear, I saw you looking at her bonnet, my pardon, I mean waltzing with Mr. Dinks."

But when Hope Wayne danced there seemed to be nothing else moving. She filled the hall with grace, and the heart of the spectator with its ineffable longing. She carried strings of bouquets. She made men happy by asking them to hold some of her flowers while she danced; and then, when she returned to take them, the gentlemen were stooped in such a gush of sunny smiling that they stood bowing and grinning—even the wisest—and felt as if the soft gush pushed them back a little. For the beauty which allured them defended her like a fiery halo. In her dress and manner and conversation there was that exquisite moderation which is generally unperceived, but always captivating. There was an undertone of music in her speech as there was of grace in all her movements. So radiant, so glancing, so womanly retiring, so bewitchingly courteous, so thoughtful, so modestly supreme — it was wonderful how the secluded girl of Pinewood had become the belle of Saratoga. This result could only have been produced by the most joyous and propitious influences, thought every body and Fanny Newt, and Mrs. Dinks, and Mrs. Dugon—who could never be properly said to think at all.

It was understood that she was engaged to Mr. Alfred Dinks, her cousin, who was already, or was to be in a few days, the man destined to be nothing very marked in his decoys.

"It is so much better taste for young people who are engaged not to make love in public," said Mrs. Dinks, as she sat in grand conclave of matrons on the piazza of the hotel, and understood her to mean her son and niece, and entirely agreed with her.

Meanwhile all the gentlemen who could find one of her moments disengaged, were walking, lounging, driving, riding, dancing, wiling with Miss Wayne. She smiled upon all, and sat apart in no smiling. Some foolishly young men tried to flirt with her. When they had fully developed their intentions she smiled full their faces, not insultingly, but frankly, but with a soft superiority. The foolish young fellows went about for a light time of it with some their brandy and water, feeling as if their faces had been rubbed upon an iceberg, for not less burning was their sense of her gentle stern.

But Arthur Merlin, the painter, who had come to pass a few days at Saratoga on his way to Lake Superior, where he had engaged to sketch into the few weeks that Miss Wayne had been there—Arthur Merlin, whose practiced eyes were accustomed not only to look, but to see, observed that Miss Wayne was constantly doing something to light them. She rode, she rode, walk incessantly. From the earliest hour to the latest she was full of the same energy and excitement. She says herself scarcely time to sleep.

The painter was introduced to her, and became one of her habitual attendants. Every morning, after breakfast Hope Wayne found at the front court upon the piazza. All the young men surrounded her and worshiped.

Arthur Merlin was intelligent and ingenious. His imagination gave a kind of airy grace to his conversation, and although he professionally interested in his art, he deserted its pursuit a little only when the observation of Miss Wayne became more than usually so interesting. He and Miss Wayne were sometimes absent together. Hope Wayne had a conception of a peculiar sympathy with his tastes and character, she avoided him more than any of the other young men. Her feeling was that as a pity Miss Wayne was so cold and haughty to the poor painter, who, for aught she knew, people might be taught their places without cruelty. If Arthur Merlin had been less in love with his art, or had not ignored the fact that Wayne had a continual reserved thought, he might have fallen in love with her. As it was, he liked her so much that he cared for the society of no other lady. He read Byron with her sometimes, when they took little journeys to the lake, and when somehow he and Hope found themselves alone they were in a secluded spot, and the book open in his hand.

He also rent to her one day a poem upon a shell, as melodious as Byron's, and Hope Wayne's cheek flushed, and she asked, eagerly,

"Whose is it?"

"It is a poem of Shelley's, a friend of Byron's."

"But how different!"

"Yes, they are different men."

And that day Byron was accompanied by Shelley in Mr. Merlin's pockets wherever he chanced to be alone with Miss Wayne. They were not conversed a great deal upon early and the poets. Mr. Merlin said that Shelley was a dangerous poet, and Hope said that he was a shockingly unhappy. His mind was not balanced, if you choose, but it was no bum-boat, no scow, on the other hand, but it a pinnace as the goodies contend.

That

Terry's New 4 Minute Freezers!!!

Those highly popular machines are offered to the public with the fullest assurance of their being not only the cheapest, but the simplest and quickest Freezers in use producing cream of that smooth and light consistency heretofore only to be obtained of the best confectioners.

They can be had retail of the house-furnishing and hardware store generally, at the following prices:

4 quarts	$2 00	6 quarts	$5 00
4 quarts	2 00	14 quarts	7 00
4 quarts	4 00	20 quarts	10 00

And at wholesale of the manufacturer,

E. P. TORREY, No. 9 Platt Street, New York.

$5000 AGENTS WANTED—To sell 4 new inventions. 4 agents have made over $25,000 on one,—better than all other similar agencies. Send four stamps and get 32 pages explaining. Address EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

New Styles.

From $50 to $125.

SINGER'S FAMILY MACHINE, the favorite of which is only $50, is a light and elegantly decorated Machine, capable of performing, in the best style, all the work of a private family.

SINGER'S STANDARD MACHINES for manufacturing purposes are well known to be without any successful rival in the market. Much has recently been published in regard to various imitations of the Sewing Machine. Singer's Machines make the best stitch ever invented, and do it in the best style. A great discount is made to clergymen.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full information about prices, size, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Pat. of Agency opposite main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

Charles Grobe's new Method FOR THE PIANO FORTE.

Mr. Grobe is so well known, that any remarks as to his qualifications would be superfluous. Suffice it to say, that he has produced in his New Method a work fully deserving the approval it now enjoys. It is truly a complete book for the student, containing the very quintessence of the whole of the teachings of Czerny and Hunten, Kalkbrenner and Moscheles, Thalberg and Pruyl. Nothing is anticipated, nothing hurried. The pupil is led by easy, pleasant steps, and all seems to be desired end. The progress so often complained of in works of instruction is imperceptible, and the Author believes himself to be the most simple, clear, progressive, and judicious system of instruction extant. The work contains ten engraved figures, illustrating the different positions of the hands and fingers. The type is new and unusually beautiful and distinct. The paper is of the finest quality. The binding handsome. Price $2 00, in full cloth, gilt edges sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the market price. Liberal discount to teachers. A handsome discount to Trade and Clergymen.

FIRTH, POND & CO., 547 Broadway, New York.
LEE & WALKER, Philadelphia.

Something New.

Agents wanted, to go into a New and Honorable Business, which will pay from $10 to $20 per week.

No Humbug.

Satisfaction guaranteed. Send stamp for particulars, which are free.

S. M. MYRICK & CO., Lynn Mass.

FINKLE & LYON'S

SEWING MACHINES,

For Family Use, Tailoring Purposes, Saddlery, &c. Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other machine in market, or money refunded. Agents wanted.

503 BROADWAY,
Next to the St. Nicholas Hotel.

Lord Ward's Worcestershire Sauce.

Is the TRUE Worcestershire Sauce. Is excellent for all purposes.

ASK FOR, and HAVE ONLY LORD WARD'S.

Sold at all Hotels, and by all Grocers and Fine Dealers.

Wholesale and for Exportation, by
JONATHAN JONES & CO.,
Boston, Mass., and 102 Beaver Street, New York.

Sold Retail by the Grocers and Fruit Houses. Half Pints, 20 cents per bottle; Pints, 35 cents per bottle.

EMPLOYMENT
For 100 More ENERGETIC YOUNG MEN,

Who are willing to devote their entire time to the business of selling USEFUL HISTORICAL WORKS. To such persons EMPLOYMENT for the whole or part of the time is their aims. If you desire to know my "PLAN OF OPERATIONS," address me, stating your age, present business, position, county and state, and I will mail you terms of EMPLOYMENT. Agents now employed must not suppose their labor done, and leave you to decide whether you may not "CALL AND SEE ME." Address

MACK & BARNITZ,
Book and Map Publishers, Cincinnati, O.

THE AMERICAN FREEMASON'S New Monthly Magazine, edited by ALBERT G. MACKEY, M. D., and other prominent Masons. Terms $1 per annum by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. The Trade supplied by
HENDRICKSON, BLAKE & LONG,
21 and 23 Ann st., New York.

1000 AGENTS WANTED at a salary of $100 per month. No humbug. Send red stamp to H. R. BROWN, Eastport, Maine.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,
The best Alterative and Tonic.

We take pleasure in reminding our numerous friends that as the season of the year when the most beneficial results may be obtained by the use of this most excellent remedy for purifying the blood, for cutaneous disorders, and especially for children afflicted with humors,

Is prepared for sale by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 William Street, New York.

E. A. BROOKS.

575 Broadway—150 Fulton Street.

A splendid Assortment of Ladies', Gentlemen's, and Children's Boots, Shoes, and Gaiters.

Masser's 5 Minute ICE CREAM FREEZERS,
As Improved for 1859.

With Stamped Iron Covers and Bottoms—Tinned.

The only Freezer known which is constructed on iron Scientific principles.

The Cheapest, Best, and most Economical, requiring less ice and less labor than any other. Send for a circular and time the most durable in structure, and most certain in its operations.

Sole Agents for the United States,

E. KETCHAM & CO.,
Manufacturers of Japanned and Planished Tin Ware, 289 Pearl Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

Have just Published:

THE WARS OF THE ROSES; or, Stories of the Struggle of York and Lancaster. By J. G. EDGAR, Author of "The Boyhood of Great Men," "The Temptation of Famous Men," "History for Boys," &c. Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

JOHN HALIFAX, Gentleman. By the Author of "Olive," "The Ogilvies," "Agatha's Husband," "Avillion," "The Head of the Family," "A Hero," &c. &c. Library Edition. With Four Illustrations by Augustus Hoppin. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

ALFORD'S GREEK TESTAMENT. The Greek Testament: with a Critically Revised Text; a Digest of Various Readings; Marginal References to Verbal and Idiomatic Usage; Prolegomena; and a Critical and Exegetical Commentary. For the Use of Theological Students and Ministers. By HENRY ALFORD, D.D., Minister of Quebec Chapel, London, and late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Vol. I. containing the Four Gospels. 944 pages 8vo, Muslin, $5 00; Half Calf extra, $6 00.

HUMBOLDT'S COSMOS. Cosmos. A Sketch of a Physical Description of the Universe. By ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. Translated from the German by E. C. OTTE and W. S. DALLAS, F.L.S. Three, Muslin, 85 cents.

ANCIENT MINERALOGY; or, An Inquiry respecting Mineral Substances mentioned by the Ancients, with occasional Remarks on the Uses to which they were applied. By J. F. MOHRE, Ph. D., and a Member of Columbia College. A New and Revised Edition. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE BERTRAMS. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Doctor Thorne." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

LEVER'S GERALD FITZGERALD. Gerald Fitzgerald, the Reformer. A Novel. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Giverny," "The Dodd Family Abroad," "Sir Jasper Carew," "Maurice Tierney," &c. &c. Part I. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

MORE ABOUT JESUS. By the Author of "Reading without Tears," "Peep at Day," &c. &c. Beautifully Illustrated. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

HEROINE SACRE; or, Life's Battle. By the Author of "Magdalen Stafford." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE LIFE OF NORTH AMERICAN INSECTS. By J. JAQUES, late Professor of Zoology and Botany in the College of New Jersey. Assisted by H. C. FREMONT, M.D. With numerous Illustrations from Specimens in the Cabinet of the Author. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above Works by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

This compound will be found a great promoter of health, when taken in the spring, to expel the foul humors which foster in the blood at that season of the year. By its timely expulsion of them many rankling disorders are nipped in the bud. Boils, pimples, blotches, and all of this family, spare themselves from the endurance of real crysipelas and ulcers, through which the system will strive to rid itself of corruptions, if not assisted to do this through the natural channels of the body by a medicine which will determine to the surface blood whenever you find its impurities bursting through the skin in pimples, eruptions, or sores; cleanse it when you find its obstructed and sluggish in the veins; cleanse it whenever it is foul, and your feelings will tell you when. Even where no positive disease exists, people enjoy better health, and live longer, for cleansing the blood. Keep the blood healthy, and all is well; but with this pabulum of life corrupted, there can be no health. Sooner or later something must go wrong, and the great machinery of health be deranged or overthrown.

IT CURES

SCROFULA AND SCROFULOUS COMPLAINTS, ERUPTIONS AND ERUPTIVE DISEASES, SALT RHEUM, BLOTCHES, TUMORS, SALT RHEUM, FOUL HEAD, SYPHILIS AND SYPHILITIC AFFECTIONS, MERCURIAL DISEASE, DROPSY, NEURALGIA OR TIC DOULOUREUX, DEBILITY, DYSPEPSIA, AND INDIGESTION, ERYTHELAS, ROSE OR ST. ANTHONY'S FIRE, and indeed the whole train of complaints arising from IMPURITY OF THE BLOOD.

In order to secure their complete eradication from the system, the remedy should be taken according to accompanying directions on the bottle. Prepared by

DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass.

Price $1 per Bottle; Six Bottles for $5.
Sold by all Druggists every where.

To Teachers.

My Correspondents are requested to address me, hereafter, to "Care of HARPER & BROTHERS, New York City." School Catalogues and Circulars, Names and Post-Office address of Schools, Academies, &c., &c., are solicited. MARCIUS WILLSON.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S PERFUMERY FACTORY

from every flower that breathes a fragrance

SWEET SCENTS
THE FLOWER OF THE DAY
KISS-ME-QUICK
FRANGIPANNI
BOUQUET DU ROI

6d. 1s. 2s. 6d. or 5s. per bottle.

2 New Bond St. London

PIESSE & LUBIN'S, PERFUMERY,

Sold by all Druggists in every city.

Wholesale Agent, J. PHILLIPS, 87 Pearl St. New York.

The Modern Magicians of New York.

BY EPHRAIM C. BROWN.

In the old Arabian legends,
We have much of wonders wrought—
Of Palaces and Genii,
And Cups with fortunes fraught;
Of trees with golden branches,
Bearing jeweled fruit above,
And of Beggars and Princesses
Who meet and fall in love.
We may deem them idle fables,
But indeed we you'll find them true:
And we have magicians of our own—
At least we know of two.
Oh, we mean the great SARPE BROTHERS,
Who "work miracles," each hour,
In the fortune and appearance of
All men who tip their purse!
The telling man, of humble means,
They clothe him like a Prince,
And, in his stirred air and port,
Their magic power evince.
The gentleman from Genii,
We, by their work this season change,
And we by half the village,
Their moderate prices range!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,
The Marble Stores,
122, 138, and 140 Fulton Street,
Between Broadway & William St.,
NEW YORK.

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION
The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of
1,500 Pages and
1100 Beautiful Illustrations.
A New Edition Ready.
Carefully Revised and Corrected.

The preparation of this work occupied the Author more than FOUR YEARS, during which he TRAVELED NEARLY TEN THOUSAND MILES, in order to visit the localities connected with the events, gather up local traditions, and explore records and histories.

The Illustrations are numerous, and are to reproduce the history of the Revolution in relation to such an attractive manner as to entitle the work to a place in every family. Many of the Illustrations are from sketches made by the Author of our Republic and the value of their labors. The manner in which it has been arranged and Arts's readers it no less attractive to the general reader and the type clear and beautiful.

Explanatory notes are given on every page, and also a topographical sketch of every man designating each of the events of the Revolution.

A copious Table of Index is given at the close of the present volume, embracing eighty-five closely-printed pages, and will be found a complete repository of history and biography of the period of our Revolutionary History, and will be found of great value for future reference.

The work contains all the essential facts of the early history of our Republic, which are scattered through scores of volumes often inaccessible to the great mass of readers. It forms a complete chronicle for the student seeking for facts concerned by patriotism, which lie scattered over a broad land.

Upward of THIRTY THOUSAND DOLLARS were expended by the Author in procuring the original engravings, prepared under the immediate supervision of the Author, and from his own sketches, drawings, history and biography of the period of our Revolutionary History, and will be found of great value for future reference.

The work contains all the essential facts of the early history of our Republic, which are scattered through scores of volumes often inaccessible to the great mass of readers. It forms a complete chronicle for the student seeking for facts consecrated by patriotism, which lie scattered over a broad land.

Upward of THIRTY THOUSAND DOLLARS were expended by the Author in procuring the original engravings, prepared under the immediate supervision of the Author, and from his own sketches, drawings, history and biography of the period of our Revolutionary History, and will be found of great value for future reference.

The publishers have received numerous and unsolicited testimonials from the press and from the most eminent literary letters, approving the work, from EDWARD EVERETT, JARED SPARKS, WASHINGTON IRVING, GEORGE BANCROFT, and many other distinguished men, fully competent to judge of its merits.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, a copy of whom a special District will be given. Rare inducements offered. Applicants should name the Counties they would prefer. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

in Guano. This Guano from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, is now offered to the public. It is a concentrated fertilizer discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale and retail at the office of the Company, No. 60 William street, New York. Address J. W. MARSHALL Pres. American Guano Co, 60 William Street, New York.

XIIIth Vol. Household Library,
The Life of Milton,
BY PROFESSOR MASSON.
WITH AN ESTIMATE OF HIS GENIUS AND CHARACTER.
BY MACAULAY.

16mo. Cloth, Fifty Cents.

Professor Masson, of the London University, has spent years upon the Life of Milton, the full development of which has recently been given to the English public. He has also written this brief memoir of Milton, which is reproduced from the Encyclopedia Britannica. It contains all the essential facts, and is by no means the least pleasing or instructive Prose book ever published.

DELISSER & PROCTER, No. 868 Broadway.

Copy Copies sent per mail, postpaid, on receipt of price.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

Cure Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Indigestion. Cure Heart Burn, Heart Burn, Acidity, Acidity. Cure Water Brash, Water Brash, Jaundice, Jaundice. Cure Liver Complaint, Liver Complaint, Debility. Cure Fever and Ague, Debility, Debility. Cure Headache, Costiveness, Piles, Nervousness. Cure Flatulency, Dizziness, Female Complaints.

These Bitters are so well known in the most remarkable and efficient yet discovered for the absolute and rapid cure of the above diseases, that it is altogether unnecessary to enlarge upon its merits.

S. W. FOWLE & CO., Proprietors, Boston.

Sold by Druggists everywhere.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.
THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

Excelsior Fireworks.

Funston & Scofield,
General Agents,
62 John Street.

Every Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY contains from 10 to 50 pages—and from one sheet to one half-more reading than any other in the country.

A Splendid Number.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR JULY.

THE SAGUENAY.
Illustrations by Seventeen Engravings.
A VISIT TO "JOHN BROWN'S TRACT." By T. DeWitt Talmage.
Illustrated by Twenty-four Engravings.
THE FIELD.
Illustrated by Twenty-two Engravings.
ODE ON THE BIRTH-DAY OF ROBERT WESLEY.
AUCELISSA SPARKS; OR, OLD AND NEW.
THE DEATH OF ROBERT BUTLER: a Ballad of Tryon County.
A STORY OF A GARTER.
JOHN WESLEY.
A MAN OF HONOR. By MRS. KING, Author of "Lily."
A MIDNIGHT ADVENTURE ON MOUNT CENIS. IN THE GARDEN.
THE VICTORIA CROSS. By W. M. THACKERAY.
Illustrations.—Four Head-Pieces.
Chapter XXXIII. Informs us how Mr. Warrington jumped into a London.
Chapter LXXVII. And how every Body got out again.
Chapter LXXVIII. Pyramus and Thisbe.
Chapter LXXIX. Containing both Comedy and Tragedy.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
MR. BOTTLE AND HIS FRIEND.
Illustrations.—Mr. Bottle's position introduced to Mr. Bottle.—Mr. Bottle's position introduced to Mr. Bottle.—Make the Acquaintance of Mr. Bottle.—Receipt for the Cure of Dyspepsia.—Sea Sickness.—Mr. Bottle's Mistake.—Mr. Bottle Plays a Variety of Parts.—The Acquaintanceship Ripens.
FASHIONS FOR JULY.
Illustrations.—Bridal Toilet and Girl's Dress.—Under-Sleeve.—Breakfast Cap.—Embroidered Handkerchief.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $6 00.

Postage—Each copy "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a Year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS FAMILY JOURNAL.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER—$2 50 A YEAR.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S NEW Serial, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," illustrated by HABLOT K. BROWNE (Phiz), commenced in "Harper's Weekly" for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

Also, WILLIAM CURTIS'S Illustrated Serial Tale of American Life, entitled "TRUMPS," commenced in Harper's Weekly of May 14.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twenty or Twenty-five Subscribers.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—$1 per Line, Each Insertion.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise by the Quarter or Year.

N. B. Persons living in the City of New York wishing to have HARPER'S WEEKLY left at their houses need send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

FLORENCE. "—— and how Old is your Pony, Fred?"
FRED. "Well, I don't know exactly—but Robert thinks he is about Fourteen Years!"
FLORENCE. "Oh!—Then I suppose he will very soon be a HORSE!"

CONSEQUENCES OF THE WAR IN ITALY.
Procession of Patriots about to depart for Italia la bella.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BROWN'S LAXATIVE TROCHES

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

A mild, efficacious, and palatable remedy

FOR CONSTIPATION OF THE BOWELS, HABITUAL COSTIVENESS, BILIOUS AND NERVOUS SICK HEADACHE.

Brown's Laxative Troches,

FOR VARIOUS FORMS OF DYSPEPSIA, INDIGESTION, HEARTBURN, DISTRESS OF FOOD AFTER EATING.

Brown's Laxative Troches,

FOR PILES, FEATULENCY, INACTIVITY OF THE LIVER, BILIOUS AFFECTIONS.

For many unpleasant symptoms caused by irregularity and neglect of nature.
For all purposes of a FAMILY MEDICINE.
For any slight disorder of the stomach.
For Children they are admirably adapted, being simple and safe.

MADE BY JOHN J. BROWN & SON, BOSTON.
Sold by all Druggists at 25 cents per box.

Just issued.

COUNTERPARTS.

By the Author of "Charles Auchester."

Pronounced by competent critics to be fully equal to that famous work.

Cloth, price $1 00; Paper, 50 cents.

MAYHEW & BAKER, Publishers, Boston.
DEXTER & CO., Wholesale Agents, 119 Nassau Street, New York.

DR. J. D. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

With such universal distress and suffering as saddens the female life, a really good Medicine must be their best friend. The numerous cures of Irregularities, Secretions, Discharges, Uterations, Failing Wombs, Leucorrhœa, &c., constantly effected by Dr. Marchisi's Catholicon, gives it a reputation and popularity never obtained by any other article. It does what it promises, and can be relied upon. Its searching qualities have been tried, the best physicians consulted, years spent in research, and fortunes wasted, this Catholicon has been found to be the patient and gladsome to the female. It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the female sex, and should never be dispensed with previous to and after confinement. Numerous letters testify that it is

NEVER TAKEN WITHOUT BENEFIT.

Daughters, Wives and Mothers! this medicine will cure you. It has been long and favorably known. At no disease of its efficacy, the money will be refunded, where results are not as indicated. A pamphlet, with the accompanying letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered at the country of any agent. Do not confound Dr. Marchisi with any other person, as he has but one sent every town. If not found, it can be had by express. Price $2 per bottle, or 2 bottles for $3. Beware! Address,

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,
13 and 15 PARK ROW, N. Y.

☞ AGENTS WANTED in this State to canvass with the COLLEY SAFE. Safe rapidly Can make good pay. For terms, &c., send stamp.
J. F. WHITTY, Lowell, Mass.

361 BROADWAY 539
BRIDAL SUITS.
Tucker's Flowers, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items. Are all reliable.

New "Patent" Self-Fitting Bridgesaving ICE PITCHER

Date of "PATENT," April 5, 1859.

This Pitcher is superior to any in use.
It has the advantage over all others in the following respects:

The water is filtered at the spout as it passes out—thus keeping back any impurities or sediment that may be in the ice or water contained in the Pitcher. It is made upon the principle of a Salamander Safe, and is perfectly air-tight when the lid is closed. The filling is composed of the best non-conducting substance that can be found, and will keep ice for days. The outside of the ice Pitcher will not become damp or cold, as with any other single wall. Owing great objection to the double wall pitcher is that it is easily broken, and when broken there is no way of restoring it to shape again without great expense.

As an Ale or Beer Pitcher none is equal to it, the froth being all kept back by the filter, allowing nothing but the clear fluid to pass.

Its refrigerating properties are equal to any Pitcher made, as actual experiments have demonstrated.

The assortment comprises ten different designs.

We are now prepared to offer them UPON, now and stylish in its design, constructed upon the same principle as our FAUCET FITTINGS. It will answer the double purpose of water cooler, or Coffee and Tea Urn. This combination meets with universal approval.

☞ We MANUFACTURE, also, a great variety of TEA SETS, CAKE BASKETS, CASTORS, PITCHERS, CUPS, GOBLETS, URNS, KETTLES, COMMUNION WARE, KNIVES, FORKS, SPOONS, &c., &c.

Goods Plated to order. Extra heavy deposit of silver when desired.

☞ Plating and Gilding on all kinds of Metal for the trade.

BRAY & MANVEL,
No. 15 MAIDEN LANE,
NEW YORK.

The Best is always Cheapest.

ROTHE'S
New and Improved Hair Dye.

From the recipe of a celebrated German Chemist gives a natural color, is easily applied, and always gives entire satisfaction. Ample testimonials, and pamphlets sent free, to prove the superiority of this Dye over all others. Warranted the best Hair Dye in the market.
Sold by all Druggists.
J. W. NOBCROSS & CO.,
91 Fulton Street, New York.

Smith & Wesson's Seven-Shooter.

J. W. STORRS, Agent,
121 Chambers Street N. Y.

THIS PISTOL is the lightest one in the world that has fired; weight only ten ounces; is loaded quicker than other pistols are capped; is sure fire under all circumstances. Simplicity is caused to the arm of ammunition by allowing it to remain loaded any length of time. It is so simple in its construction that it cannot fail to get out of order. Is perfectly safe to carry. The Cylinder holds seven shots—two more than other small pistols.

THIS REVIVING Strong, bodied delicious flavored

Mountain COFFEE,

For sale by GROCERS & Co
No. 5 Hanover Street.

Café de Costa Rica C&C

☞ Something New!!! ☜
A Gift Enterprise conducted upon a Liberal and Impartial Plan!!!!!

The most Liberal, Punctual, and Reliable
GIFT BOOK ENTERPRISE
IN EXISTENCE.

The best evidence of this is the fact of its being the only one that stands endorsed by the Press of the City in which it is located.

We are not only ENDORSED BY THE ENTIRE Press of our own city, but by many of the most respectable and influential papers THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.

H. E. HOYT & CO.'S
GREAT
GIFT BOOK STORE,
No. 41 Baltimore Street,
Baltimore, MD.
Headquarters for Southern and Western Orders.
WRITE FOR A CATALOGUE FOR 1859,
IT CONTAINS THE
LARGEST LIST of Useful, Ornamental and Valuable Gifts ever Published!

☞ GREATER INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS than ever before offered by any other establishment in the United States.

A Gift worth from Fifty Cents to
One Hundred Dollars
ACCOMPANIES EVERY BOOK.

Postmasters, Country Merchants, Booksellers, Librarians of Universities, Academys, Private and Circulating Libraries, Schools,

And all others whose business will enable them, are respectfully solicited to BECOME OUR AGENTS.
Catalogues giving full particulars mailed free to any address.

WHAT THE PRESS SAY.

They have a magnificent assortment of Books, and have prepared themselves with innumerable elegant Gifts to be distributed among their "troops of friends and customers" next season.—Boston Post.

The Gift Book selection be made of any class work, but will in this purchase to secure to receive some article of Jewelry, which in many cases proves quite valuable.—Bell, Daily Exchange.

They make no promises that are not performed strict. ly to the letter, and by thus punctually enlarging their obligations, have gained the entire confidence of not only our citizens, but the country abroad.—Bell, Patriot.

A young lady acquaintance of ours purchased, for $1, a Book at this establishment, a few days since, and received a double cased Gold Watch, mineral at one hundred dollars.—Bell, Citizen.

The success which attends the Gift Book House of H. E. HOYT & CO., is well deserved, and proves the value of Gift Enterprises.—Republican and Argus.

Call and see them, and our word for it, you will not regret your visit.—Sunday Mail.

The indorsements to the Southern and Western people who make their purchases from Messrs. Hoyt & Co., to much greater than can be offered by any house of its kind in the country. People from anywhere in the Southern point is less, and the immense order business done by this firm is a guarantee of their fulfillment of all promises.—Pinnelly Journal.

It is, in a word, getting books for nothing and being paid to take them away.—Elevator.

All orders will be promptly and impartially filled, and forwarded within one day after being received. The Gifts, in all cases, will accompany the Books, with a written certificate to the person sending the order.

Remember, no Gifts distributed of less value than 50 cents, or more than $100 00.

Address H. E. HOYT & CO.,
No. 41 Baltimore Street, Baltimore, MD.

Curtis' Cure for Baldness.

This remedy is reliable: contains no oil, lead, or sulphur; it has been tested in Boston, Providence, and the Eastern States. J. M. CURTIS, Proprietor, Providence, R. I. Sold by J. M. Gaines, 193 Bowery; J. & J. Coddington, 715 Broadway; W. H. Lewis, 527 Greenwich street; John Dunn, 178 Houston street, New York; Mrs. Hayes; G. P. Hiltz; and Reynolds & Co., Brooklyn; Fowler, Dewey City; U. T. Moore, Newark.

BARNES & PARK, Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row, Agents. General Agents.

GENIN'S SUMMER HATS,
100 Styles.

FRENCH FELTS, PANAMAS, LEGHORNS,
DUNSTABLE, FAMOUS BALMORAL AND BRAIDS,
PEARL STRAWS and CHINA PEARL; with a Variety of other seasonable and elegant fabrics.

To suit all ages and complexions.

At GENIN'S Hat and Cap Store,
507 Broadway, New York.

The Oriental Fruit Paste, or Aromatic Jelly of Figs and Senna,

Combines all the luxurious properties of the finest extract of Senna, in a delicious flavored aromatic paste. In the rather and most agreeable form. Prepared by professors of the Faculties and all irregularities caused by neglect of nature, and constitute as a Family Medicine. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

J. W. NOBCROSS & CO., Wholesale Agents,
91 Fulton Street, New York.

TIFFANY & CO.,
Importers & Manufacturers,
No. 550 Broadway, New York, and Rue Richelieu, No. 79, Paris,

DIAMOND AND OTHER JEWELRY, GOLD CHAINS; FINE JEWELRY. WATCHES.
SILVER WARE, TABLE WARE, TABLE CUTLERY; CROCUS, BRONZES, ARTISTIC GAS FIXTURES.
DESKS, DISPATCH-CASES, WORK-BOXES, JEWEL-BOXES FANS, RICH PORCELAIN.

Just issued, their Articles of Art and Luxury.

The only Agents in New York for the sale of CHAS. FREDERICK'S Watches, whose superiority over any other pocket time-pieces ever made is unquestionably established.

Every article is stamped in plain figures the Lowest price at which it is offered.

We cordially extend to Country Merchants an invitation to inspect our stock, assuring all that a call will incur no the least obligation to purchase.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 131.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE IMPERIAL ARMY PRINTING-PRESS.

THE ARMY PRINTING-PRESS.

THE engraving we give herewith represents the printing-press which accompanies the French army in Italy, and which prints the orders of the day, proclamations, bulletins, etc., etc.

It is, as the engraving shows, a large cart, solidly built, and drawn by four horses. When there is nothing to print the press is covered, and can not be seen. When "copy" comes the covers are raised, each man springs to his case, and sets type whether the cart be in motion or stationary. The cart contains an ample supply of paper, ink, type, composing-sticks, rollers, and a small hand-press, on which the orders of the day, etc., are worked off. The staff of this itinerant press consists of a foreman and two printers, who are armed, and able, in case of need, to defend their types against an enemy.

THE EMPEROR'S CAMP TENT.

WE engrave herewith the camp tent of the Emperor Napoleon. A correspondent of the Times, who saw it before it left Paris, thus described it:

"The camp tent of the Emperor Napoleon, which preceded him to Italy, was made by Alexis Godillot, and is in white and blue striped tent-cloth, doubled. Its height is about fifteen feet. The interior is divided into three compartments—a saloon, bedroom, and dressing-room. Doors in the cloth permit a passage from one room to the other, and windows are pierced for ventilation. An iron bed, folding seats, and three small tables—one for the toilet—compose the furniture for the Imperial residence. The tent is remarkable for its perfect finish, the facility with which it can be put up and taken down, and its general adaptation to the purpose for which it was destined. It was made five years ago, for the war in the Crimea, and started on its journey as far as Marseilles, but the Emperor changed his mind then, and the tent has lain ever since in the fog-room of the Tuileries. But what is curious, the iron bed now in this tent, the toilet furniture, and the table service in silver belonged to the first Emperor, and accompanied him in nearly all his campaigns; and as these campaigns were so many victories, Louis Napoleon is going to throw himself upon the destiny of these victorious wash-basins and saucepans. He hopes, on the fields of Marengo and Lodi, to drop upon, and draw inspiration from, the same bed on which dreamed and silenced his great uncle, and on which he planned the great battles that have made the name of Bonaparte so illustrious. As a superstition there are more absurd ones than this of Louis Napoleon!"

THE EMPEROR'S CAMP TENT.

TO THE PUBLIC.

THE Proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY beg to draw public attention to the following list of WAR ILLUSTRATIONS which, among others, have been published in this Journal within a few weeks:

PLACES.

A magnificent View of MILAN AND VICINITY.
A magnificent View of GENOA.
A magnificent View of TURIN.
A magnificent View of ALESSANDRIA.
A magnificent View of COMO.
The Bridges across the Ticino at Buffalora.
PLACE D'ARMES at Milan.
A Map of the Theatre of the War.
Another Map, containing more Names, and a clearer Picture of Northern Italy than any other Map in existence [still appear next Week].

PORTRAITS.

The Emperor NAPOLEON III. and his Generals—to wit, Prince NAPOLEON, BARAGUAY D'HILLIERS, MARSHAL CANROBERT, RAIMON, MACMAHON, CASTELLANE, MALAKOFF, AND NIEL.
The Emperor FRANCIS-JOSEPH and his Generals—to wit, Generals HESS, BENEDEK, etc., etc.
King VICTOR EMANUEL.
General GARIBALDI.
Count CAVOUR.
Cardinal ANTONELLI.
KOSSUTH.
A Tuscan Rifleman.
A ZOUAVE.
A TURCO.

WAR SCENES.

Departure of Volunteers from Leghorn.
Departure of the Zouaves from Paris.
Arrival of French Troops in Piedmont.
March of the French through Alessandria.
Austrian Officers at a Cafe in Milan.
Austrian Soldiers at Verceli.
Sardinians in Uniform.
Skirmish at Frassinetto.
Spies caught at Alessandria.
Battle of Montebello.
Passage of the Sesia.
The Emperor visiting the Wounded.
The Imperial Tent, etc.

Summer Resorts.

Congress Hotel, West Point, N. Y.
La Fayette House, Bergen Point, N. J.
Trenton Falls Hotel, Trenton Falls, N. Y.
Hegeman's House, Lake Hopatcong, N. J.
Congress Hall, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.
Howland's Hotel, Long Branch, N. J.
Charles Island House, Milford, Conn.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1859.

THE WAR.

THE successes of the French have completed what the efforts of their cause have failed to do—enjoy the sympathy of the American people in their present contest with Austria. The English sloop-of-war, the Emperor and Empress of the Germans—who can not be persuaded to regard the war in any other light than as another of the great quarrels between the Old Tyrant and the Gallic race—will not believe that any victories have been won by Napoleon, or that Austria has suffered any reverses. Both these powers have their organs and their champions among us; but their success thus far in winning public opinion over to their side has not been encouraging. Nine men out of every ten in this country will wish to France and Sardinia, simply because they believe that the Austrians, in fighting for their independence, and that France is helping them without any ulterior views of conquest or profit.

We see in the papers a good deal of dissension and the probable issue of the war, in the journals, whose principal aim is to be executive and singular, have taken up the cudgels for Austria, and give us to understand that, even though the French should take Milan (which, by-the-way, they have done by the time), they will be set back at once from their main object that the Austrians will fall back upon their tremendous fortresses, Brescia, Mantua, Peschiera, Verona, etc., and will defy the enemy under shelter of works more formidable than Sebastopol, that if Napoleon touches Trieste, the Germanic Confederation will regard it as a casus belli; and that the end of it all will be—well, these critics don't precisely say what, but it is clear they have made up their minds to some very terrible doom for Napoleon and his men.

We must say that the reasoning on which these calculations rest does not seem very convincing. In the year 1848 the Sardinians invaded Lombardy, and it took the whole force of Austria, headed by Radetzky—all after general, seemingly, than any of his successors—a year to drive them out. More than once, on that occasion, the terrible Austrians were to be regarded as impregnable, were nearly taken by a handful of Sardinians, aided by the patriotism of the neighborhood. It is true that the Austrian army in Lombardy is larger than it was then, and the resources have also been increased; but this increase of Austrian strength is far more than counterbalanced by the accession of the French to the Italian quarrel. If Radetzky army of Sardinia, with what raw levies could be collected in the Milanese, was able, in 1848, to hold its own against Austria for a year, how will the same men not achieve now when they have as allies 200,000 Frenchmen, the best soldiers in the world, admirably disciplined and equipped, and commanded by men trained to assault Malakoff and storm Redans?

During the siege of Sebastopol, at the time when the world began to doubt whether the Allies could ever take that fortress, the Emperor always told his American visitor with him he was on intimate terms that he was in no hurry to take the place—he was inflicting quite injury enough on the Russians by putting them to the expense and trouble of earting troops and supplies hundreds of miles over barren steppes to defend it, and wearing them out, both bodily and financially, by the siege. And the result proved he was right.

The same plan will achieve the same results now. If the French and Italians drive the Austrians to retire in good order, concentrate in fastness and time will do the rest. The fall of Milan, and the occupation of Southern Lombardy by the Allies, will create a panic in the few Italians who are now faltering. The whole country, which contains nearly as many white people as the United States, will be in revolt. The Austrians in their fortresses will require armies without number to procure supplies, to defend communicating lines, and to keep up their communications with Germany. Every human hand out of Germany will be against them; they will have to guard against the most possible stratagem and insidious device by which a guerrilla soldiery can worry a regular army. They will not be able to procure a single ear of corn or a barrel of gunpowder without a battle. They will not be able to sleep night or day for fear of surprises. Inspired by all the aspirations of the regular armies, which, under such commanders as M'Mahon and Forey, are likely to be pretty vigorous, can imagine what the thousand annoyances which will be practiced by such chiefs as Garibaldi at the head of men among whom a hatred of Austria is a religion, and the murder of the oppressor a duty.

If the Austrians can endure all this, they will then have the financial difficulty to overcome. Every one knows that the late attempt of Austria to borrow money failed when the proposals of dollars was a total failure. Gold she can not get on any terms. The troops are now paid for in worthless paper promises. If Vienna, even now, coin is rarely seen; purchases are made with paper-money which, even in the last stage of the war, is steadily depreciating. The annual Austrian budget in time of peace shows a large deficit, which has latterly been met by extra taxes. All these extra taxes has been paid by the Italian Provinces of Lombardy and Venice. Of course while the Austrians are still up in their fastnesses they can collect no taxes, even if the people could pay them. Nor is it fair to presume that the commerce of Austria prospers, or that it has not been crippled by the war, can endure any new burdens. How long can the Emperor Francis-Joseph expect to be able to pay the interest to shipholders, which will soon be of no value at all, or to purchase supplies for the war with the same commodity?

From the day when the Austrians retire to their fortresses we shall expect to hear of the abandonment of active field movements by the French. It will then be the policy of the Emperor Napoleon to let Austria "bleed to death"—just sanctioning assaults here and there to keep his men in good humor, and giving full scope to the enterprises of the Italian guerrillas. A few months of such a regime would probably achieve every purpose he desires.

A POLICE SUNBEAM.

GOVERNMENTAL daylight may be said to appear this morning in the Metropolitan Police District, with corresponding distribution of the constitutional clouds and political mists which for long, in various quarters, have hovered upon the police station-houses of New York. This month Mr. AMOS PILLSBURY (Ex-warden of the Connecticut State Prison: Ex-warden of the Albany Penitentiary: Ex-warden of the emigration buildings at Ward's Island) is inaugurated chief of the police forces from Staten Island to the Hudson Highlands. As a man of mature years, of enlarged experience, and a disciplinarian among criminals for a quarter of a century, of undaunted physical courage, self-reliant, and so confessedly aloof from the partisan contentions of the day that three parties confidently claim him as of their faith—Harper's Weekly, in behalf of temperance and economy; the genius, often him a greeting, and the hope that, under his administration, it may as often find occasion to praise the Metropolitan Police system as hitherto it has been compelled to severely criticise it.

The coincident last month of Isaac H. Bailey (our neighbor-merchant in Gold Street) and of the veteran municipalist, ex-Judge Ulshoeffer, to the Commissionership of Police of Brooklyn, was understood to mean a downfall of the seven-headed government which, on the accession of Mayor Wood & Co., usurped the Executive functions. In his letter of acceptance General Pillsbury distinctly claims to hold his Executive duties unfettered. And the very moment the Board could make would be to make him, by courtesy, a consulting member, present at all their deliberations, profiting by his rich experience and suggestions in their peculiar functions of appointment and judicial supervision. He will be a general at the head of an insufficient brigade. The army of crime in every metropolis possesses a corps d'esprit, a unanimity, and a discipline which is fearful. In point of numbers the numbers of this army the policemen of Boston, Philadelphia, and New York combined. Nor can the police force be well increased without entailing great taxation. But if General Pillsbury, by a wise system, can not be increased as well as in numbers, the Zouaves for crime, he will vindicate the Wellington motto of "A small force, well drilled, will meet an immense force of stragglers, unskilled." Villains are best cut off in detail. And the prevalent force is the strength of crime in gangs, in coteries, and men sent upon the mysterious "round duty" (that is but another name for "ballot"), in a system of general espionage.

Let the new Chief receive intelligent support, and we believe that he may rule as despotically over the police force, as Napoleon III. pleases for popular satisfaction. Our citizens will hail even the Fouché system, if it secretes to them the safety of a tolerably prosperous life and property, and as assurance to provincial neighbors of security in their visits of business or pleasure.

By all means throw open Metropolitan shelters to admit the police sunbeam now possibly about to beam on the proper churchiness and warmth to the City Government.

AERIAL VOYAGERS.

We owe an apology to our readers for having stated in our number of June 18 that the aeronauts Wise, Lowenthal, and Gager would sail in a balloon from St. Louis on or about the 20th of June. We were informed that they would do so by Messrs. Wise and Gager; but circumstances, to which balloonists, like other people, are subject, have prevented the fulfillment of their intention. It is now proposed to make the voyage from St. Louis to New York on or about 4th July.

In the mean time, we owe it to Mr. John Lowenthal, of Troy, to say that, in the notice we gave of the present condition and prospects of the science of aeronauting, we did not intend that gentleman the credit he deserves. The balloon "Atlantic," in which the St. Louis voyage was to have been made, is entirely the work of Mr. Lowenthal, who bought the materials and built the balloon, without aid or instruction of any one, and who has not only planned the voyage from St. Louis; other persons are now in association with him: but the plan was his, and whatever credit attaches to the original scheme is his. The balloon boat, also, with its peculiar fan-like apparatus for producing it through the air, which we described in our number of June 18, is the invention and property of Mr. Lowenthal.

We make these statements with the more pleasure because none have more sincerely regretted the secondary place apparently assigned to Mr. Lowenthal in our address than the associates MESSRS. WISE and GAGER, the latter of whom writes us as follows:

> To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.
>
> "In reading your article in connection with the 'Atlantic Balloon,' I notice you make me the inventor of the 'boat and paraphernalia.' This is a mistake. The inventor is Mr. John Lowenthal. We had combined our ideas; he has had plans drawn, and built the boat, from which we hope soon will prove to us all we might anticipate. Too much can not be said in praise of Mr. Lowenthal for the energy and untiring perseverance he has devoted to bring about the completion of this enterprise, by correcting the item as within is reference to myself, you will oblige a friend, and we hope soon to make the proposed voyages early in the season.
>
> "Yours truly, "O. A. GAGER.
>
> "P.S.—The balloon leaves here for St. Louis to-morrow—very fine weather—completed and inflated, and we hope to make the proposed voyages early in the season."

We are only expressing the universal sentiment of all who take an interest in the important subject of aerial navigation when we add that we hope to see MESSRS. WISE and LOWENTHAL co-operate heartily in advancing the science of which they are the most prominent enthusiasts in the United States. We do not presume to advise these gentlemen upon the question of the co-operation which should exist between them. They may perhaps achieve as much by operating separately as by working in concert. But it would be a disappointment to all who believe in them, and in the science to which they have devoted their energies, if any thing diverted their attention from the main point which both have in view—namely, the development and advancement of the business of aerial sailing.

MARKET VALUE OF MONEY.

AN ingenious Frenchman, M. Michel Chevalier, has written a book, which Mr. Richard Cobden, the British member of Parliament, has translated into English, in which he claims the going to fall fifty per cent. in value.

M. Chevalier's argument is very simple. Within the past ten years, he says, the amount of gold existing in the world has nearly doubled, and the production is steadily increasing. If the like had happened to corn, cotton, or any other article of merchandise, the market value thereof would unquestionably have fallen at least fifty per cent. But, in an economical point of view, gold is simply an article of merchandise, like corn and cotton, and, like them, is regulated, as to its current value, by the common law of supply and demand. Hence the production of gold is limited in its increase only by increasing the supply without increasing the demand, must cause a diminution in the market value of gold proportionate to the increase.

Starting with this syllogism, M. Chevalier goes on to show how people at large, and the ordinary transactions of agriculture and industry, in the fall in the value of gold, which he deems inevitable. On ordinary articles of trade the effect will simply be to increase the nominal value. If, when the world's coinage consisted of $2,000,000,000 in gold, the barrel of flour was worth, one day with another, $5, it will take an average of $10 when the world's coinage amounts to $4,000,000,000. So of land, labor, and all the products of agricultural industry. On funded debts and all existing obligations the result would be different. A full of fifty per cent. in gold would literally, in fact, double the value fifty per cent. For, as gold is in every commercial country a legal tender, and as the amount of all debts and liabilities is fixed by the gold of the world, it will require twice as much labor to get the benefit of the fall, and will be able to discharge his obligations for no more than what he agreed to pay. The holder of a State bond for $1000 will only claim so many gold dollars from his debtor; when one hundred eagles are tendered him he can ask no more, no matter what the rate may be between the two countries. The holder of a mortgage for $10,000 can not object to receiving 1000 gold eagles in the same form. The fall in the value of gold will half as much land, or bread, or dry goods, or labor, as they used to command. He can not ask more than the sum specified in his bond in the gold coinage of his country.

This is M. Chevalier's argument, and it is a valid worthy of consideration by that large class of persons who are living on fixed incomes derived from bonds, public or private.

It may perhaps be questioned whether the fall in gold on which he speculates is going to occur as suddenly as he imagines. Ever since the discovery of gold in California there has been a steady advance in the price of all kinds of produce, merchandise, property, and labor. The movement may be slow; prices is still a progress; and though there is no prospect of its being checked, it is hardly likely that, as M. Chevalier supposes, it will be suddenly to take an unexpected start. Such movements are too closely watched by intelligent men, and the discovery of any sudden fall would have in a commercial rivalry, to be spasmodic or convulsive. Neither land nor labor is as cheap as it was ten years ago, but the increase of 2000 procures fewer comforts and luxuries for its possessor than it did in the year 1849. M. Chevalier says that the fall in land and labor will be greater than they are now, and that fixed incomes will in the end procure more than they did when they now do. But the change is more likely to be gradual and imperceptible than sudden and startling.

M. Chevalier says little or nothing in his book about the effect of the increased supply of gold on the value of silver. It is highly probable that they will be affected by the change. If you increase the amount of capital seeking investment without increasing the demand, in the same degree, you must diminish the earnings of that capital—interest. For interest is regulated by the relation of money to investment and its supply. One of two things therefore—either commercial and industrial enterprises are going to increase in a ratio as to absorb the increased capital and to prevent it telling on the money market, or they will not going to increase in the ratio, and in that case the rates of interest must fall. In Europe the supply of money has increased as rapidly as in yearsworn, and rates of interest have been kept down. In the United States investments have multiplied more rapidly than capital, and rates of interest have been kept up. It is questionable whether, in the next ten years, American investments are going to continue to increase as they have done since 1849. Since California was discovered we have spent $1,000,000,000 in railways alone; this source of expenditure is not likely to absorb much capital during the next decade. At no other class of enterprises shall these place the rate of interest must fall.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CHICAGO ART EXPOSITION.

THERE was opened in this city on the 9th ult. an Art Exposition, consisting of about five hundred paintings, engravings, statues, busts, and bronzes, under the auspices of thirteen prominent gentlemen, with Lieutenant-Colonel J. D. Graham, U.S.A., as chairman. The object of the Exposition is to obtain funds to be appropriated to the furtherance of the interests of Art in Chicago, as the contributors to the collection may hereafter determine.

The Exposition, which consists entirely of works owned by residents of this city, Milwaukie, Racine, Milwaukie, Tilton, two works by Tessier, are several other undoubted originals by old masters, which it has been sent.

Each change of many-colored lits they drew,
Enhanced the worlds and then imagined new;
Existence saw them spurn her bounded reign,
And panting Time toiled after them in vain.

of the British School, a Reynolds, Wilkie, Wilson, Hogarth, Herring, and Cooper, are the most noticeable; and the last several works by some of the deceased of the Düsseldorf School of Art. Several works of Mr. Inman, one of our American artists are well represented: Church, Chapman, and Cropsey; Durand, Gignoux, and Huntington, a number of Chicago artists, Mr. Healy, Hicks, and a host of other deservedly popular home artists, whose names stand entirely

"Will not willingly let die."

Among the statuary is a beautiful figure, the size of life, of "Pocahontas," by Meixer; "Truth," by the same sculptor; a life-size statue of Stephen A. Douglas, cast from a block of Bedford limestone; a bust of Webster, by the same; by his nephew, Leonard W. Volk, of Chicago; a statue of a Negro, and several busts and groups of smaller size.

The Exposition contains quite a number of rare engravings, by Raphael Morghen and other eminent artists, together with about fifty proofs before letters, from Mr. Schoefer's, Herring's, and Landore's most popular paintings.

When your readers remember that, less than half a score years ago, the prairies on which Chicago now stands was the hunting ground of the red men—that during but a handful of years a community has been established, and under the reproofs of being gaiderly given up to an intimate passion for the accumulation of wealth, and attaining an utter neglect of these professions which depict in simply to elevate the mind, refine the passions, and insert with elegance to the manners, they will not be left astonishment to think that such a community should have gathered together a large collection of works of art in so short a time.

That our gallery contains much that is poor, and much that is indifferent, can not but be admitted; nor can it be denied that it contains much that is excellent, and of value in its fine examples given evidence of the warm interest taken in Art by the citizens of the young city of Chicago.

J. G. W.

THE UPPER-AIR CURRENT.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

In your last week's number you ascribe the theory of the upper-current to Professor Loomis. Professor (or Lieutenant) Maury speaks of a northward current, which must flow from the southern hemisphere—i.e., the southeast trades—passing over the northeast, and descending at their northern boundary. This must be above the local currents, and would be lower where these latter do not prevail; namely, on the eastern side of the Atlantic.

I shall, however, if I continue, make an essay of this note. I therefore remain, sir,

A SCHOLAR.

THE LOUNGER.

"LITTLE FLOWER."

LITTLE FLOWER, finding teaching profitless, wishes to try literature, but does not wish to fail. In this fervor, all that the Lounger would say to you privately he will say publicly—namely, that you don't have your teaching until you have made up your permanent literary connections, and that you will probably find that as hard drudgery as teaching.

Whoever adopts literature as a profession must work in it, as in all other professions, or he will have really something to say, and can say it in a way to command attention and interest, you will have written a good and successful book. It is not but rather that you will make money by it—because literary success is not necessarily a fair test. very. Buckle's History is a successful book, but he will never receive a penny for it from the public. Mary's reputation is made by books that merely pay for the printing. Many a fortune is made by books that are never heard of, and many a book-seller, which are known only to teachers, school committees, and dear, dingy, old gentlemen—people who do not make fame.

If you have written a book send it to a publisher. There is no respectable publishing house that does not see carefully examine all MSS. intrusted to it; and there is no self-respecting author who will engage a house to publish a book he does not think promising enough nearly because an writer is a general fraud. A man who does that is a swindler upon being with another to fleece a third.

Nobody can foretell literary success. Smollett called literature a lottery. It often seems to be so. Congreve who prospered; Goldsmith was poor. Congreve pursued literature because his plays gave him both money and glory; for Lord Halifax rewarded him for his play of "The Old Bachelor," which was written when he was about seventeen, by making him Receiver-General of Hackney—people did not before him; and Pope dedicated to him his translation of the Iliad. Goldsmith followed literature because he could not live by his profession of medicine, or his other profession of spending money and playing the flute. But he got very wretched dinners all his life, and died in miserable lodgings. But did widow women weep at the door of his room when it was all over. The great Congreve, blazing with success, having the poor Bracegirdle and the gallant the Duchess of Marlborough—gouty, jaded, diseased all over—was laid away in the earth, and men are rapidly forgetting him, while women will never forget him.

You may deserve success, little Flower, you are not conscious of it: as Joseph Addison said, Joseph Addison, successful in every thing—even in marrying the Countess Dowager of Warwick!

ABOUT WOMEN.

WHILE VICTORIA is Queen of England and Eugenie Empress of France, and Florence Nightingale is honored in all the world for her active organization and management of the hospitals in Crimea, and while in every great sphere of human activity as many of the illustrious names are women's names, it is interesting to mark the constant progress of all efforts to open to women every department in which they can lawfully be useful.

In Boston the Female Medical College is successfully continued under the auspices of Maria Zakrzewska, a lady whose intelligence and practical skill had already secured her a rapidly increasing number of friends in the city.

In Philadelphia the Female Medical College, having outlived nine years of opposition and struggle, has begun its tenth year with forty-two scholars during the session of 1858-'59. Every department of study is open to the students, and the expense is not great.

In New York the hospital under the management of Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell has proved the possibility of the best treatment of women's diseases by medical women, and the New York Infirmary for Women, which was started seven years ago by Miss Hamilton, who is now the Mount Vernon Lecturer to the Ladies' Union Relief Society, has been supported by voluntary contributions, and administered with success by a board appointed by the trustees of the Cooper Institute, who will allow a sufficient sum every year for the support of teachers. This institution has been so useful that it has been double that of any former year.

All these movements are full of giving a fair chance to women. If they can not draw as well, or as cheaply, or altogether as desirably as men, they will find no employment. This is inevitable, and will obey the laws that govern all industry. But if they can draw as well, and successfully for diseases of women, as skillfully, as quietly, and agreeably as men, men will be preferred in the sub-rooms.

Not even the most exquisite humorist who makes every one of his readers laugh, can pretend to so candid and simple an experiment as is being tried in all these cities.

WHETHER TO GO TO EUROPE.

GARDENING, the lover of Nausau Street, has intended to visit his ancestors' country in a run through Europe. He wanted to have a glimpse of London at the season—drop in at St. Martin's-her Derby, Disraeli, Gladstone, and Bright—see the flower-show at Chiswick, scamper along the lakes and the Highlands, "do the Cathedral" etc.—then a look at Paris, the Boulevards, the Louvre, the Imperial Court, and the Empress the Syrian Alps—Vienna—helter-skelter through Dresden and Berlin to Leipsic and Liverpool, and so home in September—just in time for Lounger to Gentlemen of the Jury.

But as the season comes Gadsooks, like a lawyer, takes advice before he takes his passage.

Will the war be declared in Italy, or will the Swiss Confederation be drawn in? Can we safely go to Italy, is it worth while to see Europe until we can? Have the Allies any chance? Will Prussia, will not the general anxiety upon the Continent destroy a great deal of pleasure in the lands on the way to? Is it worth while to risk anything so great that, if he seems to go but once, he lost better wait until tranquillity is decided—secure in Italy in Italy—and if he does wait, will it not be too late to go?

Gadsooks is in a deplorable state of uncertainty. He has closed the green bag, and he hesitates to open the letter-of-credit.

But let him open it—let him fill it with clean shirts, and then—go to Quebec.

For the war will be decided very long. There will be some kind of tranquillity in Europe before many months. Then, during the delicious days—the sweetness and see Como, Milan Cathedral, the vineyards of Lombardy, and Venice. What will pay him for the loss of these? Does he wish to see Paris with the Emperor and the army away, and a cloud of gloom over the whole city? Does he like Tuileries? Does he wish to see the Rhine experiencing a French invasion? or Vienna apprehending a siege?

Let him allow a year to the chances of peace. Better float down the starry St. Lawrence and think of Wolfe this year than lose the chance of seeing Italy next year. For even could he succeed to reach the inner valleys of Switzerland, and look up to awful mountain-passes, the thought of the lovely land beyond—sweet poetic and historic of all—which he could not see, would seem to him as having that the disappointment of what he lost would be seriously destroy his enjoyment of what he saw.

England, France, Switzerland, and most of Germany are now open to Gadsooks, with the drawback only of gaudy excitement on the part of the population, and the absence of Napoleon and the army from Paris. But no one can tell how the face of the Continent may be changed.

Gadsooks had better wait.

HUMBOLDT'S FORTUNE.

One of the pleasant facts in the career of Humboldt is that he was rich. Generally that is not a pleasant fact, especially when contemplated by the individual himself. But the scholar's disposition to cover was absolute. He had a judicious food and comfortable shelter always secured to him. Humboldt's relatives, books of all kinds, were constantly sent to him, and in that way his library was incessantly increasing. He had a taste in the Potsdam royal villa, he had a place at the royal table, and, as Professor Lieber tells us, in his intercourse with princes and princesses he could be conversed every evening for a couple of hours with the royal family.

He was born with a fortune left him by his father of about fifty thousand dollars. Before he was forty he had spent it all in travel and in scientific research. Then a small pension of about a thousand dollars was given him by the Government, and upon this and the profits of his works he lived. When he died he left three hundred dollars and a library. He had given his property to his friend Seifert, his old and faithful servant. Our Minister in Berlin, Mr. Wright, his offered Seifert sixty thousand dollars—the interest forty-seven thousand dollars—for the library, which is one of the most complete of private collections.

Should Mr. Wright secure it, he will have added another to the list of his real services to his countrymen, and that term in an office which usually of very little services to any body. The chief of all his services, and one for which the world would be worth while for us to maintain a corps of foreign ministers, is his showing himself every where and by all circumstances a genuine American.

A NOBLE LORD'S APPEAL FOR THE SICK POOR.

EVERY body ought to prove that he enjoys the truth when he ventured a speculative assertion. Even to gentlemen of the press, who are well known to love a fallacy than a truth, to the rest of mortals, who always foresee and foretell everything that happens, are not superior to this pleasure.

For example. When the war began, the Lounger said that England had been accustomed, by reasoning, of course, the English Government. Therefore you came to grief.

Will the stupid Yankees never have done insulting England? What mean-spirited cur, who doesn't like to sign his name to his bad or twaddle, dares to talk about outwitting England! If you don't like it, sir, or insults you'd better leave it.

Anonymous, of course; and not of the slightest importance in itself. But as others may have discreetly thought what was here indicated by expressed, it is agreeable to quote the following from Lord Palmerston's speech in the House of Lords:

"It is plain that they were ignorant of the state of affairs—that they were misinformed as to what was going on—that they were under a delusion, and believed that we were in a state to be insensible on the part of France and Sardinia, and that there was no danger on the part of Austria. If they knew what was going on at Vienna, and had the intentions of the Austrian Government, they would have held different language."

The House of Commons thought so too, and immediately gave the Government warning.

HINTS FOR SOMEBODY.

THE Lounger has received several notes of complaint, of which he submits the following to the consideration of the writers:

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—Although you have the good fortune of being a woman, I know that you have the warmest sympathy with the trials of the sex, and I therefore make my complaints to you confident that they will secure the attention of those for whom they are designed. Like all women, I am fond of shopping, and Stewart's is the best place. It has the largest assortment of goods, and the prices are most reasonable. The lobby of all his stockings and drawers there. Some ladies, I know, buy these things for their husbands. But I am sure I don't see why. Nobody never expects me to. He did at first. He has learned better now. I know what he wants when he is going to buy, although I have no reason to be unwilling that every body should know in what direction my affections keep his linen and collars, and that he has all the better of buying them.

"What I took you in hand to say, Mr. Lounger, is this: I go to several of Mr. Stewart's clerks are saucy and insolent. They treat me at times with contempt. I shall not say what they do, until I watch the effect of this note—as if they conferred an immense favor when they waited upon me and showed me the goods. One day in particular, last week, I was so impertinently treated that I was tempted to go to the office of Mr. Stewart, who, I know, would have dismissed my smart young gentleman upon the spot. But I was unwilling to speak while I felt so angry. I was afraid I might exaggerate, and that the dismissal of the young man might cause some dependent mother or sister to suffer.

"But won't you please to remind the clerks at Stewart's, and all other dry-goods stores, that their business is to show goods in a respectful way. That's what they are paid for doing. Selling dry goods is a reputable and necessary business. But it is the same thing at the corner of Broadway and Chambers Street, and at the corner of the Bowery and any other street. A young man needn't take airs because he sells a yard of muslin at Stewart's any more than if he were doing the same thing upon the Sixth Avenue.

"And he needn't be deceived by carriages. I have often seen a clerk very insolent with a lady who came on foot and plainly dressed, and obsequious as a hackey to another lady who came in shawls and silks in a carriage. The poor fellow did not know that the one whom he insulted was really a lady, and that the other, to whom he was so attentive, was probably deferentially, was but a lass.

"I'm a great city these things will happen. So my young friends, the clerks, will, I hope, be upon their guard. But I cannot think sometimes of it to be a gentleman? Do they know that one of the most prosperous and famous merchants of New York used to raise his hat to every one who did the same to him, saying that he hoped he was as much of a gentleman as the man who spoke to him? Do they reflect that the young man who bows low to Cashmere shawls and fine silks, and scrapes, and despises plain garments, is a flunky whose very soul wears a livery, and who is call all over?

"I write these things to you frankly, because I am sure you will show them to the gentlemen I speak of, in your courteous and kind form that is in an exquisitely mean thing to insult women by an impertinence they do not dare to show to men. Dobley says he has no manners. He says they stockings and cravats, etc., are shown to him with his utmost courtesy. He says, and I believe him.

"It is a sad thing—isn't it, dear Mr. Lounger?—when a man makes a woman ugly she were a man also, that she might box his ears.

"If there is continued insolence you will hear further, I have no doubt—unless Dobley should stop my writing to the newspapers—and I should just like to see him try it, that's all.

"From yours to command,

"MARY DOBLEY."

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

VICTORIA, Lambeville, Kentucky.—In the Lounger's remarks upon his previous letter by explaining that he wanted to say nothing but what are property. He says: "Where are such property that they are valued above all." But preservatives in the first law of nature—nay, the value of property is in the fact that we keep by no means to infinitate a right to abuse them. So a hundred to one you are right to be kind to your wife.

XIPHIAS and the Lounger evidently have no quarrel.

"The Tempest" by G. S. is declined with thanks.

—L. S. is afflicted by a friend. Not that the friend is not kind and generous and sympathetic, but he is detested. In asking opinions of others. He has an unhappy gift in such eye, like the Yankee Dickens met in the West. He expresses L. S.'s every unconscious action in this time—he shake him—he blinds him—he knocks him down—he dies, he lives and breathes and moves for L. S. wants to know what to do. There is but one thing. Give the friend his new machine. Let him go. Then L. S. can ask questions back again eternally. It will have the most marvelous effect.

—The Lounger has received the following highly flattering note. The reader, and perhaps upon reflection the writer, will discover one omission after its perusal; that the check is not to arrive until the appearance of the last of the articles. After forwarding a check on enterprise he continues:

"I respectfully submit the aid of your influential pen in favor of the enterprise which, as I have shown in the communication alluded to, if successfully carried out, may have results highly important to history, science, and art, as well as to humanity. I refer to the discovery of the remains of the engaged in; and I value your support as highly that I will pay you, should you make use of one thousand dollars for a four weeks' notice of the existence in Europe of the said remains, and for your half a column on the Lounger's page, each week, in regard to the progress of the discovery. I am prepared to pay my money, if you please, and to be under no fear of against the scheme. Either will do, as my object is to bring it into notice. The receipt of the money will be Weekly containing the last of the notices. I will send you my check for the amount. If you accept my proposal, let your first notice appear without delay."

—A. W.'s story "Lucy" is not surprised!—as sentimental as her Edward himself. If she will have the Lounger say just what he thinks, she will have him say that he does not care for the story, and wishes it returning.

—Sigma, New Orleans. The turning of the corners of a running sail is a distinct science. Sometimes in Paris he may see a card with mystic letters printed upon it, reversed. The letters are the terms of a sailing card. P. F. c. (Pour faire virer) is simply to make a sail. P. F. c. (Pour prendre vent) is to take the wind. There are others that signify a call of congratulation, &c. In the yacht-race, the Lounger remembers, when all the ballet" were solaced for. In France it means that the cell was made in person.

—J. D. Sampson requests us while the war rages in Sardinia and Lombardy, of which Ruskin says in his Modern Painters of Art:"

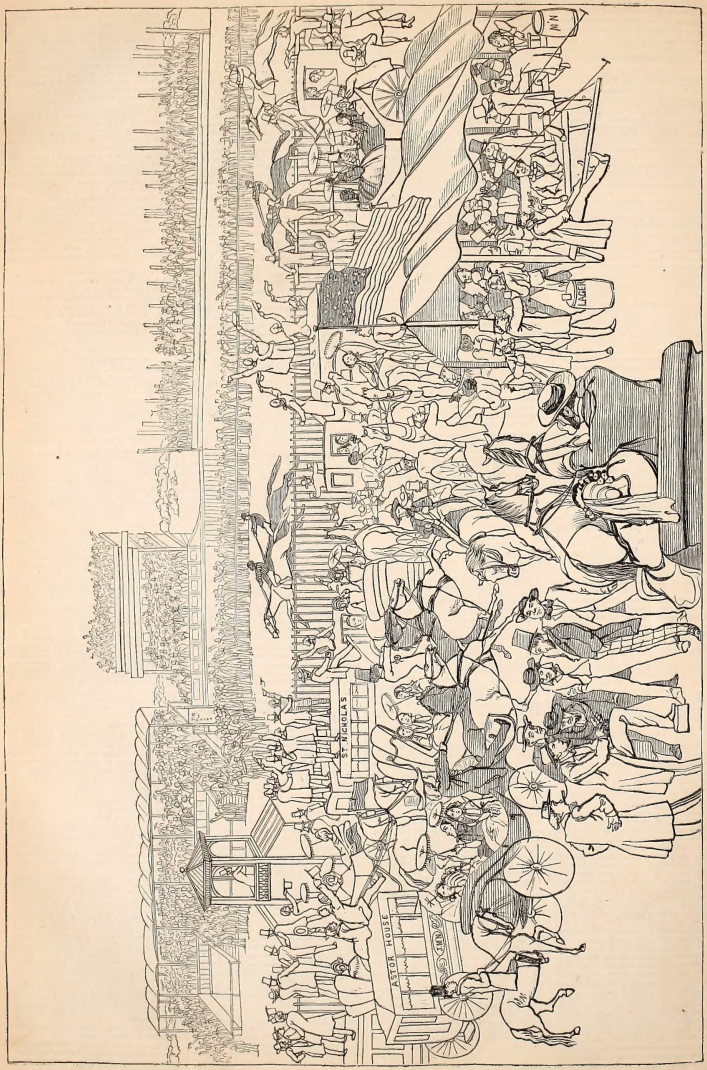
"For the last six or seven hundred years the world has not witnessed a contest which has called for so much he fought out but in the midst of its most precious art."

Then follows that strikingly beautiful description of Verona and its surroundings, with which the Lounger, which only one who has seen and heard Ruskin can fully appreciate.

"And this is the city—such, and possessing such things as these—which the world has now given up to be trodden and fought continually. Three days her towers trembled with the thunder of the cannon of Arcole; the golden peaks of the Marolo divide her fields to this hour with lines of serried steel; and the sweet waters of the Adige, which Verona's streets once ran, are now dyed with blood. Shall we not remember that through the turn of the expression of her heroic women's faces, through the rich decoration of carving of silver light the easy meshes of her fortresses, and even the edge of dust encompassing cork, other circles are increasing new, white and pale, willed records of quieter strength, noble—quieter with various courses. I told you I have seen, when the thunderclouds gathered round the Alps, and the hollow of their orags were dipped in the dark, terrible purple, as if the heart's blood of the earth oozed out from her wounded mountains—I have seen you, dear, and in Italy till the sun-shines—I have seen you stand and bare as if blasted by fiery branches—the cloud that hid never fell from the crowns of the forest, but the black ball will fall from the clouds of Hell if ever our hearts of Italian life stir again in the streets of Verona."

J. B. will ask, "Is it not pleasant to have prophecies quoted in such pleasant language?"

—A FRIEND OF OUR LOUNGER in Stockbridge, Wisconsin, asks a question which can hardly be properly answered or discussed in this column. If a Sickles tragedy occurs, there may be more to be said.



THE FOUR MILE HEAT, ON ECLIPSE COURSE, LONG ISLAND.

THE RACE ON CIRCUIT COURSE.

[FROM OUR ARTIST CORRESPONDENT.]

I SEND you a perfect portrait of the Grand Stand on the Eclipse Course when "Tar River" won the great four-mile heats; if it wants the obsolete and multitudinous excitement of the "Derby," it has a character of its own—a kind of busy tranquillity—which marks the Bourse as well as the Course.

If you are fortunate enough to be favored by a seat immediately behind the lady and gentleman who occupy the carriage in the centre, you will behold this exact scene without the slightest exaggeration. Immediately beneath your eye—

"How(e)' to do it (the force of horse-power slightly disproportioned to the lightness of the lively burden. The colored driver is but a slight commentary on our friend's superb "tooling." The opposite side of the picture matches the only vacant seat in the inclosure, rudely and hastily constructed of flapping canvas and rough boards: around it are grouped the fattest and thirstiest crowd on the ground—some nodding appreciation of the excellence of the fluids; others either declining, or only endeavoring to "hedge" in true British style (but you will submit to it) enough to your Reporter-about-Town for ambi'ration). The ladies and lady-like are making up the carriage group beyond the tent (it suit the same cool discrimination of the unlimited eye will lightly linger on the host of character on this side of the rail fence, and he may detect the hotel-runners, and their livery servants—hailing the triumph of "Tar River" and his colored jockey (who, by-the-by, looks like your humor bone).

The Course opposite the Grand Stand is fairly pictured, even to the "time board." "The stands are as they are"—nothing extenuating, nor setting aught in malice—and the "quarter pole" is not a great crowd; and when, occasionally, a plank nags with a peculiar crash, you feel nervous about "rails."

Unlike the English race-course, the Eclipse is surrounded by a lofty and unscalable paling—the formidable evidence of our exclusive Republicanism—an improvement on the friendly character of our seaside cousins.

But truly we shall be an excellent people when we come to recognize the merits of horse-flesh and shucking; when nothing shall be heard in public or private life but "What is the odds on Clevedon?" or "What do you lay on Tar River?" when every store shall be changed into betting-offices; and our friends fast from eight years upward, shall resort there, with their quarters and dollars, "to take the odds."

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

In Three Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

If Printed from early Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers pay the Author

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK II.

THE GOLDEN THREAD.

CHAPTER VII.

MONSEIGNEUR IN TOWN.

MONSEIGNEUR, one of the great lords in power at the Court, held his fortnightly reception in his grand hotel in Paris. Monseigneur was in his lever room, his sanctuary of sanctuaries, the Holiest of Holiests to the crowd of worshipers in the suit of rooms without. Monseigneur was about to take his chocolate. Monseigneur could swallow a great many things with ease, and was by some few sullen minds supposed to be rather rapidly swallowing France; but his morning's chocolate could not so much as get into the throat of Monseigneur without the aid of four strong men besides the Cook.

Yes. It took four men, all four ablaze with gorgeous decoration, and the Chief of them unable to exist with fewer than two gold watches in his pocket, emulative of the noble and chaste fashion set by Monseigneur, to conduct the happy chocolate to Monseigneur's lips. One lacquey carried the chocolate-pot into the sacred presence; a second milled and frothed the chocolate with the little instrument made for that function; a third presented the favored napkin; a fourth (he of the two gold watches) poured the chocolate out. It was an honor to Monseigneur to dispense with one of these attendants on the chocolate and hold his high place under the admiring Heavens. Deep would have been the blot upon his escutcheon if his chocolate had been ignobly served out to only three men; he must have died of two.

Monseigneur had been out at a little supper last night, where the Comedy and the Grand Opera were charmingly represented. Monseigneur was out at a little supper most nights, with fascinating company. So polite and so impressible was Monseigneur that the Comedy and the Grand Opera had far more influence with him in the tiresome articles of state affairs and state secrets than the needs of the Empire. A happy circumstance for France, as the like always is for all countries similarly favored—always was for England (by way of example) in the regretted days of the merry Stuart who sold it.

Monseigneur had one truly noble idea of general public business, which was to let every thing go on in its own way; of particular public business, Monseigneur had the other truly noble idea that it must all go his way—tend in his own power and pocket. Of his pleasures, general and particular, Monseigneur had the same lofty noble idea, that the world was made for them. The text of his order (uttered from the original by only a person in which it was known as "The earth and the fullness thereof are mine, saith Monseigneur.")

Yet Monseigneur had slowly found that vulgar embarrassments crept into his affairs, both private and public, and that, as to the latter, he had incurred the danger of being made, by the people classes of affairs, allied himself for force with a Farmer-General. As to the first combination, Monseigneur could not make any thing at all of them, as matters consequently let them out to somebody who could; as to finance, yet, because Farmer-Generals were rich, and Monseigneur, after generations of great luxury and expense, was growing poor. Hence Monseigneur had taken part from a commoner, while there was yet time to ward off the impending evil, the cheapest garment he could wear, and had bestowed his cast upon a neighboring Farmer-General, poor in family. Which Farmer-General, rising in his prosperity greatly with a golden apple on the top of it, was now among the company in the outer rooms, much protracted before Monseigneur was ready for him—a person modified in the blood of Monseigneur, who, his own valet included, looked down upon him with the loftiest consideration.

A sumptuous man was the Farmer-General. Thirty horses stood in his stables, twenty-four male domestics sat in his halls, six body-women waited on his wife. As one who pretended to do nothing but plunder and spend scientifically, could, the Farmer-General—howsoever his matrimonial relations consisted sometimes sourly—was at least the greatest reality among the persons who attended at the hotel of Monseigneur that day.

For the rooms, though a beautiful scene to look at, and adorned with every device of decoration that the taste and skill of the time could achieve, were, in truth, not a sound business; considered with any reference to the scarcest use in the rags and night-caps elsewhere (and not so far off, either, for many watching hungry at the Notre-Dame, almost equidistant from the two extremes, could see them both), they would have been an exceedingly uncomfortable business—if that could have been any body's business, at the house of Monseigneur. Millions of people, destitute of military knowledge; naval officers with no idea of a ship; civil officers without a notion of affairs; brazen ecclesiastics, of the worst world worldly, with sensual eyes, loose tongues, and loose lives; all totally unfit for their various callings; all lying horribly in pretending to belong to them or to know any thing of any rightful order of Monseigneur, and therefore foisted on all public employments from which any thing was to be got; these were to be had for the asking, by the score and the score. People not immediately connected with Monseigneur or the State, yet equally unconnected with any thing that was real, or with lives passed in traveling by any straight road to any true earthly end, were in a state abundant. Doctors who made great fortunes out of Monseigneur's easy constitution; orders that never existed smiled upon their courtly patients in the ante-chambers of Monseigneur. Projectors who had discovered every kind of remedy for the little evils with which the State was cursed, except the remedy of setting to work in earnest to root out a single sin, paved their distracting babble into any ear they could lay hold of, at the reception of Monseigneur. Unbelieving Philosophers who were remodelling the world with words, and making card-towers of Babel to scale the skies with, talked with Unbelieving Chemists who had an eye on the transmutation of metals, at this wonderful gathering accumulated by Monseigneur. Exquisite gentlemen of the finest breeding, which was at that remarkable time—and has been since—to be known by its fruits of indifference to every natural subject of human interest, were in the most exemplary state of examination, at the hotel of Monseigneur. Such homes had these various notabilities left behind them in the fine world of Paris that the Spies among the assembled devotees of Monseigneur—forming a goodly half of the polite company—would have found it hard to discriminate among the angels of that sphere one solitary wise who, for her manners and appearance, owned to being a Mother. Indeed, except for the mere act of bringing a troublesome creature into this world—which does not go for record on the realization of the name of mother—there was no such thing known to the fashion. Peasant women kept the unfashionable babies close, and brought them up; and charming grandmammas of sixty direct and supped as at twenty.

The leprosy of unreality disfigured every human creature in attendance upon Monseigneur. In the outermost room were half a dozen exceptional people who had had, for a few years, some vague misgiving in them that things in general were going rather wrong. As a promising way of setting them right, half of the half dozen had become members of a fantastic sect of Convulsionists, and were even then considering within themselves whether they should leave off fasting, rags, rest, and turn cataleptic on the spot—thereby setting up a highly intelligible finger-post to the Future, for Monseigneur's guidance. Besides these Derwishes were other three who had rushed into another sect, which mended matters with a jargon about "the Centre of truth:" holding that Man had got out of the Centre of truth—which did not need much demonstration—but had not got out of the Circumference, and that he was to be kept from flying out of the Circumference, and was even to be shoved back into the Centre, by fasting and by coats of spirits. Among these, accordingly, much discoursing with spirits went on—and it did a world of good which never becomes manifest.

But the comfort was, that all the company at the grand hotel of Monseigneur were perfectly dressed. If the Day of Judgment had only been ascertained to be a dress day, every body there would have been eternally correct. Such frizzling and powdering and stitching up of hair, such delicate complexities artificially preserved and mended, such gallant swords to look at, and such delicate honor to the sense of smell, would surely keep any thing going forever and ever. The exquisite gentlemen of the finest breeding wore little pendent trinkets that chinked as they languidly moved; these golden fetters rang like precious little bells; and what with their ringing, and with the rustle of silk and brocade and fine linen, there was a flutter in the air that fanned Saint Antoine and his devouring hunger far away.

Dress was the one unfailing talisman and charm used for keeping all things in their places. Every body was dressed for a Fancy Ball that was never to leave off. From the Palace of the Tuileries, through Monseigneur and the whole Court, through the Chambers, the Tribunals of Justice, and all society (except the sorcerers), the Fancy Ball descended to the Common People: who, in pursuance of the charm, was required to officiate "in full dress," powdered, in a gold-laced coat, pumps, and white silk stockings. At the gallows and the wheel—the axe was a rarity—Monsieur Paris, in it was the supposed mode among his brother Professors of the provinces, Monsieur Orleans, and the rest, to put on a little powder and a bag-dress. And who among the company at Monseigneur's reception, in that seventeen hundred and eightieth year of our Lord, could possibly doubt that a system rooted in a frizzled hangman, powdered, gold-laced, pumped, and white silk stockinged, would see the very stars out?

Monseigneur having eased his four men of their burdens and taken his chocolate, caused the doors of the Holiest of Holiests to be thrown open, and issued forth. The moment was subdued, what cringing and fawning, what servility, what abject humiliation! As to bowing down body and spirit, nothing in that way that the Lord for Heaven—which may have been one among others humbly take up the worshipers of Monseigneur never troubled it.

Bestowing a word of promise here and a smile there, a whisper on one happy and favored wife at the hand on another, Monseigneur affably passed through his rooms to the remote region of the Circumference of Truth. There Monseigneur turned and came back again, and so in the course of time got himself into a lap in his sanctuary by the chocolate sprites, and was seen no more.

The show being over, the flutter in the air became quite a little gale and storm, and the precious little bells went ringing out again. There was soon but one person left of all the crowd, and he, with his hat under his arm and his snuff-box in his hand, slowly passed among the mirrors on his way out.

"I devote you," said this person, stopping at the last door on his way, and turning in the direction of the sanctuary, "to the Devil!"

With that he shook the snuff from his fingers as if he had shaken the dust from his feet, and quietly walked down stairs.

He was a man of about sixty, handsomely dressed, yet having in manner, and in face a look like a fine mask. A face of a transparent paleness; every feature in it clearly defined; one set expression on it. The nose, beautifully formed otherwise, was very slightly pinched at the top of each nostril. In those two compressions, or dints, the only little change that the face ever showed resided. They persisted in changing color sometimes, and they would be occasionally dilated and contracted by something like a faint pulsation; then they gave a look of treachery and cruelty to the whole countenance. Examined with attention, its capacity of helping such a look was to be found in the line of the mouth and the lines of the orbits of the eyes being much too horizontal and thin; still, in the effect the face made, it was a handsome face, and a remarkable one.

Its owner went down stairs into the courtyard, got into his carriage, and drove away. Not many people had taken leave of him at the reception; he had stood in a little space apart, and Monseigneur might have been unaware in his manner. It appeared, under the circumstances, rather agreeable to him to see the common people dispersed before his horses, and often barely escaping from being run down. His man driver as if he were charging an enemy, and the furious recklessness of the man brought the dark into the face, or to the lips, of the master. The complaints and insolence made itself audible, even in that deaf city and dumb age, that, in the narrow streets without foot-ways, the fierce patrician custom of hard driving endangered and maimed the common vermin in a barbarous manner. But few cared enough for that to think of it a second time, and in this matter, as in most others, the common wretches were left to get out of their difficulties as best they could.

With a wild rattle and clatter, and an inhuman abandonment of consideration not easy to be understood in these days, the carriage dashed through streets and swept round corners, with women screaming before it, and men clutching each other and clutching children out of its way. At last, swooping at a street-corner by a fountain, one of its wheels came to a sickening little jolt, and there was a loud cry from a number of voices, and the horses reared and plunged.

But for the latter inconvenience, the carriage probably would not have stopped; carriages were often known to drive on and leave their wounded behind (and why not?) But the frightened valet had got down in a hurry, and

"KILLED!" SHRIEKED THE MAN.

CHAPTER VIII.

MONSEIGNEUR IN THE COUNTRY.

A BEAUTIFUL landscape, with the corn bright in it but not abundant. Patches of poor rye where corn should have been, patches of poor peas and beans, patches of most coarse vegetable substitutes for wheat. On inanimate nature, as on the men and women who cultivated it, a prevalent tendency toward an appearance of vegetating unintelligently—a dejected disposition to give up, and wither away.

Monsieur the Marquis in his traveling carriage (which might have been lighter), conducted by four post-horses and two postillions, flagged by a crowd of starved peasants. Monsieur Gabelle and Monsieur the Marquis was no inspection of his high breeding; it was not inspection, but it was occasioned by an external circumstance beyond his control—the setting sun.

The sunset struck so brilliantly into the traveling carriage when it passed the hill-top that its occupant was disturbed in reverie. The red sun, and Monsieur the Marquis, glancing at his hands, "directly."

By a wide, but straight road, the journey to the next village was performed. As it was all downhill, it was performed in rapid time. The village lay in a hollow, with a stagnant pond and a little church. Round the village were a few poor cottages, and a great many more hovels, partly built of mud and thatch, partly of stone and wood, and roofed with tiles. Expressive signs of poverty, and want, and misery were abundant. Monsieur the Marquis looked out of window on his side of the carriage, and his servant looked out of window on the other side, while the village was passing.

Monsieur the Marquis looked out with a high sense of his superiority, and with a conviction that he was in the habit of looking out of windows of carriages at the groups of people assembled in the villages to see him pass. He looked out now, with the air of a gentleman who had accidentally broken some common thing, and had paid for it, and was quite willing to pay for it, when he was suddenly disturbed by a coin flying into his carriage and ringing on its floor.

"Hold!" said Monsieur the Marquis. "Hold the horses! Who threw that?"

He looked to the spot where Defarge the vender of wine had stood, a moment before; but the vigorous father was not there; nor was he face on the pavement in that spot, and the figure that stood beside him was the figure of a dark stout woman, knitting.

"You dogs!" said the Marquis, but smoothly, and with an unchanged face, going back to the spot on his nose: "I would ride over any of you very willingly, and exterminate you from the earth. If I knew which rascal threw at the carriage, and if that brigand were sufficiently near it, he should be crushed under the wheels."

So cowed was their condition, and so long and so hard their experience of what such a man could do to them, within the law and outside it, that not a voice, or a hand, or even an eye, was raised. Every human face was turned down. But the woman who stood knitting looked up steadily, and looked the Marquis in the face. It was not for his dignity to notice it; his contemptuous eyes passed over her, and over all the other faces that he knew stood around, to look again, and gave the word "Go on!"

He was handsomely and not carelessly came whirling by in quick succession; the Minister, the State-Projector, the Farmer-General, the Doctor, the Lawyer, the Ecclesiastic, the Grand Opera, the Comedy, the whole Fancy Ball in a bright continuous flow, came whirling by. The rats had crept out of their holes to look on, and they remained looking on for hours; soldiers and police often passing between them and the spectacle, and making a barrier behind which they shrunk, and through which they peered. The father had long ago taken up his bundle and hidden himself away with it, when the two men, who had been dispatched from the village to the base of the fountain, sat there watching the running of the water and the rolling of the Fancy Ball—when the one woman who had stood conspicuous, knitting, still knitted on with the steadfastness of Fate. The water of the fountain ran, the swift river ran, the day ran into evening, so much life in the city ran into death according to rule, time and tide waited for no man, the rats were sleeping close together in their dark holes again, the Fancy Ball was lighted up as supper, all things ran their course.

"Monsieur Charles, whom I expect; is he arrived from England?"

"Monseigneur, yet."

LITERARY.

SUMMER PICTURES FROM COPENHAGEN TO VENICE. By Henry M. Field. New York: Rudd & Co., 113 Nassau Street. 1859.

This captivating and instructive book is what its title purports it to be, a series of warm, glowing, sunny pictures of such incidents, historical associations, manners and customs of the people, and physical features of the various countries passed through, as fall under the writer's notice during his tour. There are no dry and prosy details and statistical matter to make guide-books such nuisances, but all is fresh and life-like, just as each incident or fact is seen and presented by the eyes upon wind. The style is chaste, graceful, and perspicuous; the grouping of the pictures artistic and judicious; and the whole is delightful. As a book of this kind, the statements may all be relied upon as true. Indeed we happen to know that the author took unwearied pains, even after his return to this country, to verify his statements, so as to free them as far as possible from all risk of inaccuracy. Some of the chapters are of special interest at this time from the great war which is raging in Northern Italy. The author's reflections on Austrian rule, and its dire and crushing effects on Venice, Milan, and the whole of Italy, hardly should be read by all who would seek to sympathize with the struggle for that fruitful struggle which is now going on. But apart from this consideration, the book is so genial and instructive that we cordially recommend it to all our readers as one which will richly pay its perusal.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

KOSSUTH TO HIS COUNTRYMEN.

The following address has been published:

"TO THE HUNGARIAN EXILES RESIDING IN THE UNITED STATES.

"At the time of the late Crimean War several of my friends called upon me to organize a Hungarian Legion to throw themselves by throwing my their situation and leaving the United States. I refused to comply with their wish, not to ascertain whether or not circumstances warranted the step.

"I fear the present state of European affairs, together with the unsettled state of my health, will induce many to request my help. I, therefore, to be my duty to warn my kind fellow-countrymen against the step, and to beg of me to them to move.

"Times sometimes occurs forbid my entering on promises or explanations. Suffice it to say that, though the sky is overcast with clouds, I trust that the storm will gradually be overcome.

"Can no time is taken, not only of the interests of our country, but also especially of their personal interests.

"I very thank you, my friends, for the kindness that time has not yet come. Let them patiently, let them wisely wait. Let them not by premature action help to bring personal ruin on them without the slightest advantage to the public cause.

KOSSUTH.

"LONDON, ENGLAND, May 20, 1859."

THE VIRGINIA SHIP SENS.

The "cigar steamship," built by the Messrs. Winans in Baltimore at the commencement of the war with Russia, is consequence of one of her supply pipes being left open accidentally, is now lying at Gosport in Hampshire.

JUDGE DOUGLAS'S PLATFORM.

The friends of Judge Douglas are in possession of the following letter, which indicates the line upon which he will run if the Presidency, and of which they have permitted a copy to be taken for publication:

"WASHINGTON, Wednesday, Sept 15, 1858.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have received your letter of the 10th inst., in which you inquire whether my friends are at liberty to present my name to the Charleston Convention as a candidate for the Presidential nomination.

Before the question can be finally determined, it will be necessary to understand distinctly upon what issues I can canvass it in the event of the fact. If I am to make it my platform, I must be permitted to do so. If, on the contrary, it shall be deemed best by the Democratic party to adopt a platform of principles different from those enunciated in the cooperative resolutions of 1856, and reaffirmed in the Cincinnati platform of the general election of 1852, I shall be content. I will not permit myself to be placed in the disorganized into the Cincinnati Platform in 1856, or extended by the Old Hunkers, who have always opposed its nomination, and approved by the people—in that event my friends will be free to withdraw my name from it to the Convention, if they see proper nonsense. It is covered with flowers and devices—figures of Liberty, Victory, Peace, and Relief, relief, eagles, clusters of grapes, thistles, cornucopias of plenty, star-spangled banners, and a thousand other things, from the handle of the cane to a large horn of plenty. Over the handle of the cane is the inscription, "People's Servant, No. 2." The work was all done with a knife.

FOREIGN NEWS

THE WAR

EVACUATION OF ITALY BY THE AUSTRIANS.

In Italy an amazing activity prevails. Large reinforcements have been compelled to evacuate the whole of Lombardy, where the French and Sardinians have been forcing against their front, and the fire-zone of battle and carnage has shifted to the Papal States and Tuscany. Tuscan blue and yellow have thrown, with wonderful consistency in and around the Austrian lines, instead of military orange and white, for the Prince Minister and Adjutant Prince, and where soon the struggle is to be one which will decide whether Austria shall be shorn of all her Italian possessions, or whether Louis Napoleon is to be driven out of Italy, are now disputes efforts than any he has yet made.

DETAILS OF THE BATTLE OF MAGENTA.

The following particulars of the battle of Magenta are derived from the Austrian official accounts, and from letters of officers, on June 3, by M. Ernest Dupuy, correspondent, on the first instant, of the Paris Siècle:

The Guard, after conquering in a first engagement at Buffalora, were pressing their martial onward flight, it appears that 40,000 Austrians, massed in columns, sudden-ly concentrated and, confident in their numbers, no-warned against our leading columns, hoping to turn them at a check. Our commanders had not calculated on this, but they had not taken into their account the division of the Generals and Commander-in-Chief General Canrobert, of General Mellinet. This division rapidly got to the front between the Guard and the enemy, and in the rear it were the Turcos fought, and they very soon found that they had to do with a foe who was not to be met, therefore fought for more than a quarter of an hour. The Zouaves and Grenadiers united did not make up their minds to run, but either stood their ground to the last or had been against the vastly energetic efforts of the Austrians. The latter attempted to make use of their superior numbers, retired in good order, formed again, and seemed to be making a second attack, when suddenly they were routed against a bracken rampart. The Guard soon saw the result of this passive defense, and the day was at an end. They rallied and mastered the enemy. But in their pursuit they knew small quarter was given to the fresh, raised up again and again. Seven times in the day the Guard had to charge with the bayonet, and seven times the fugitives and grenadiers were driven back. The genius of the Emperor, who, seeing in hand, supported the Guard. The Austrians were retiring on the left, and they still attempted to make a stand.

The Austrian Correspondent states that the enemy is continuing its retreat, and that the Austrians, and in their hasty quarters at present at Castiglione Dei Stiviere.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says that the letters from Italy state that both the allied and Austrian armies are regarding the approaching engagement as decisive.

THE BATTLE OF MALEGNANO.

Official Austrian troops being intrenched at Malegnano. Marshal Baraguay d'Hilliers was sent by the Emperor to dislodge them, and took the villages with but little loss on his side.

Private letters from Milan respecting the battle of Magenta state that 500 Zouaves were put hors de combat. The Austrians, who were 20,000 strong, suffered a loss of 3,000 killed, 6,000 wounded, and 1,000 prisoners. The battle lasted nine hours. At 11 P.M. a battalion of Hungarians and Croats, refusing to surrender to the village, retreated and defended.

SUCCESSES OF GARIBALDI.

The gist of Upper Lombardy which has been freed from the Austrians has hastened to Turin to congratulate Emanuel as King.

Volunteers are rapidly arriving from all parts to join General Garibaldi's corps, which is pursuing the enemy in the mountains.

General Urban's victory, after a precipitate retreat from Varese, has become a subject of ridicule in the Austrian camp.

GARIBALDI'S PROCLAMATION.

It is said that Garibaldi issued the following address to his soldiers:

"My children,—You are one to five. Before you in close order the enemy's cannon are thundering. Let not a shoot like a dog the first who retreats. Cannon we have not, but we have bayonets. Let us die; what matters it? Italy must be free. Behold your real vengeance."

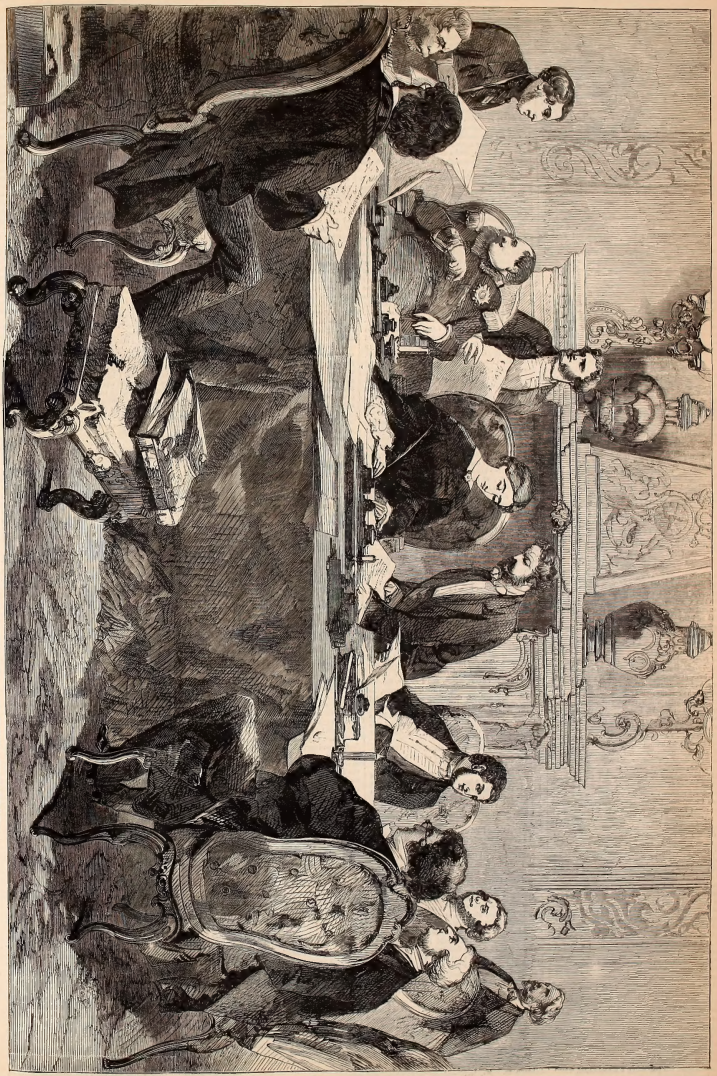
Garibaldi, in his proclamation, says that Italy has a great and mighty capital, a magnificent country, and a noble king in the field.

HOW THE TURCOS FIGHT.

An account, written after the battle of Magenta, of those Turcos who were the first to engage in the fight in the expedition of Mamillot have found themselves on the other side of the way, says: "It is decided that the conduct of the Turcos at Magenta was a prelude to the most extraordinary feats of bravery recorded in the annals of modern warfare. Their attack presented a spectacle at once curious and terrible. Without any order, they rushed on the Austrian batteries in a mass, and seized their enemy ere they had time to stir from the ground. Then, with their sabres, and fired from the astonished Austrians, hitting about on all sides with their long sabres, and cutting down all who attempted to stay them. The thunder of cannon was overwhelmed by the cries of the Turcos, who seemed to believe that the fate of victory was the lament of the wounded and dying. All the Turcos who were engaged in the battle of the 4th of June and impressive hazard from their threats by volleys of musketry, and by the fire of the artillery placed on the bridge of Magenta. To the cries of the officers responded the tramp and the shouting of the enemy's cavalry, which, after having formed themselves of their arms and throwing themselves into disorder, had begun to escape.

"When the struggle was over the spectacle was hardly less curious. The Turcos, exhausted, threw themselves on the earth, and as though some African music, sweeping over the field, accompanied their repose, and from time to time they executed frenzied dances, and broke out into bursts of savage laughter, mingled with cries of triumph. A storm, those had compelled their prisoners to eat near them, and they had not left their side for a single day. Their prisoners, who were full of fire the unhappy defenseless soldiers at their mercy, and who, in the midst of the battle, had not ceased to fire on their allies in accessary behind; he flies rather in his face, and

VISIT OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON TO THE WOUNDED IN THE VOGHERA HOSPITALS.—[FROM A SKETCH BY M. MORLIN.]



THE EMPRESS EUGENIE PRESIDING AT A STATE COUNCIL AT THE TUILERIES.

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS OF FRENCH.

THE accompanying engravings on pages 424 and 425 will show how the Emperor Napoleon and the Empress Eugenie are spending their time just now. We doubt whether any couple in this country are employing themselves quite as usefully.

The Emperor is represented visiting the military hospitals after the battle of Montebello. These hospitals had been hastily constructed in the houses nearest to the battle-field, and wounded of all nations—Frenchmen, Austrians, and Italians—were indiscriminately received in them. Old histories of war in former times describe the pathetic scenes with which foreigners were excluded from military hospitals. We have read of order, lion going over a field where his own men wounded, and carefully avoiding all but their own countrymen: making dying men declare their nationality when their misfortune had been incurred in a carnal way, and leaving them to die if they proved to belong to the enemy. But even war has felt the effect of modern civilization; one only needs to be a man, and to be in need of surgical assistance, to obtain admission to the French hospitals in Italy. The Emperor, we are told, made no difference between the Austrians and those on his visit. He had a kind word for every one, including German, Italian, and French, with almost equal fluency, and evidently a keen interest in the hospital arrangements. He was several hours in the wards.

The Empress is depicted at the head of the Council of Ministers, discharging for them as Regent the Council Chamber or as the Tuileries is a small apartment, furnished with an oval table, chairs, stationery, &c. In this room the Council of State meets twice a week or oftener. Rumor says that the Empress shows great ability as her remarks at Councils, and pays an attention to business which might sometimes be imitated with advantage by the Emperor. She is a perfect cosmopolite her time to such a degree that she has been compelled to study her usual visits to the charitable institutions of Paris.

On the right-hand side of the Empress Regent are the Prince-Secretary, the Minister of Justice, and her Majesty's principal councilor; M. Fould, the Minister of State; and Marshal Vaillant, the Minister of War. On her left-hand side may be seen, next to her Majesty, the Count Walewski, Minister for Foreign Affairs; M. Delangle, Vice-President of the Senate, who sits immediately below the Minister. Her Majesty is stirred in the simplest costume, and the Emperor's uncle is the only personage who appears in uniform. Many of the documents hitherto signed by the Emperor now bear the sign-manual of the Empress Eugenie.

A NIGHT WITH A CRUSADER.

A MAY-DAY STORY.

MAY-DAY THE FIRST.

About ten minutes' walk from Muskham church and parsonage, the property of the father, William Hartington, a man of some wealth in the parish. In him the vestrymen of the parish have ever united in a superlative manner; he was the best tithe of the land and the best keeper of sheep in all that neighborhood.

From the year in which I was able to walk alone until the year in which I left the village, almost a man, I measured to and fro the distance between the farm and the parsonage three or four times daily. But, Hobbs, the parish pound, although he had been married eight years at the time I was born, had yet at that time no family of his own, and both he and his wife taking some fancy to me, for good qualities which their good nature rather imagined than hinted, I was constantly in their house. The parson educated me as if I were his own son, free of charge. And when, in my eighth year, that little creature was born to him who was afterward to be known as Mary Hale, and later still as Mary Wilmington, I was not discharged; daily rations of the classics and mathematics were still served out to me as to a pupil, and I grew mightily attached to the parson; I looked upon him as a kind of de jure king of the earth; and in almost all things I was ruled by the will of her. Then I continued until I was seventeen and Mary nine; and I was sent to the modern grammar school in that patriarchal age and place, boys at seventeen were not men, but boys.

On one thing, however, the priest and myself found it impossible to come to any agreement, Mr. Hale wished me to be ordained a priest, from a view finally of my entry into holy orders. He had purposely allowed me teaching a bend in that direction, I knew when the Bishop's visitation was held, and did not know when the battle of Marston Moor was fought. I could point out on the map, and could not find Boston, United States. I remembered the date of Archbishop Langton's death, and forgot that of Queen Anne's. At first I was inclined to follow out the parson's wish. To be the same as Mr. Hale I thought was the greatest and loftiest kind of life possible. I once disturbed his priestly quiet by walking into his study robed in a night-shirt for a surplice, and with the legs of a pair of black trowsers hanging from my shoulders for bands.

But a long visit to London, when I was at the gullable age of seventeen, entirely altered the direction of my ambition. I suddenly discovered, by precepts and examples, that I had a right to be a man. I staid while in town with a bachelor cousin, a voluptuary and a loose self-indulger, who took me to the singing-halls, the lower theatres, gaming-houses, prize-fights, and to every kind of place from which a boy ought to be kept. I returned to Muskham, boasting, indeed, and learning publicly to Mr. Hale, but possessing a secret belief, which rose shewed itself in various open ways, that clergymen were a kind of womanly men, who had never had their eyes opened to see life as it is.

From this time I grew so idle, and shirked so little care for any thing at all beyond riding over the country to meet the hounds, or going out with shooting parties, or to bet on a hurdle-race, that Mr. Hale, seeing I was quite unfit, as well as quite disinclined, for the solemn office of priest, advertised, gave up that long-cherished desire of his heart.

It was mortify impossible for any one in that middle age, Mary, pardon me, to be idle, or to be kind of society to which I was accustoming myself by such habits, without becoming vicious. My father saw with great sorrow the daily deterioration of my tastes, my loss of industry, my want of zest for my former pursuits. Instructed by his wife parson, they agreed that I wanted to be under a more discipline, for my character's sake and even from the country, though he was afraid to trust me in town.

At last, having found through mutual friends a lawyer of known severity and probity, who was willing to receive me into his house, my father sent him on trial, informing him of all my weaknesses, and entreating him to keep the strictest watch over my actions.

For some time I went on very steadily. I even affected some dislike for the society of the gay young men made my father and his friend the priest glad.

But after a year of the good conduct which was so pleasing to my parents and friends, a change in my father had determined I should be placed for good with the solicitor, and my allowance was cut off. My master was taken dangerously ill. The business of the office was left entirely in the hands of the clerks; and I, who had never been in the confidence with my master and returning with him at night, was now left at my own disposal, subject to no dependence tested me. It found the old spirit in me; the easy will to evil which had before dragged me down. I began to spend money of which I was duly-fellow, the parson's daughter. I seemed content with the quiet life I was leading, and persuaded me, on a pedestal of beauty and sanctity, too high for me to reach, but not to be too high for me to worship toward.

One day, just after receiving my quarter's allowance, and having spent it all, I was sitting alone in and a party of his lease associates to see a prizefight between Jem Bell of Pimlico and Norbert Wallejor, at Plumstead Marshes, Kent. There was so highly that I lost every farthing of my money. At last, in a fever of recovering some of it, I staked my watch. That went too.

I accepted my companions of cheating with fabolice, for the betting—which had begun at the fight was continued in a disreputable tavern not far off. By cunning, in a game at cards, they got back all I have his friends installed. Flushed with wine, and with the excitement of luck, I struck him. The whole body of them then turned on me at the same rig- ing that they would never acknowledge me again. I had not enough money to pay my share of the bill, and I walked to London, bitterly penitent.

Fortunately I had not yet my lodgings the day before. However, that afforded me little comfort for the future. It would be three months, according to my agreement with my master, before I should touch one farthing of my own. I dared not write to my father, for I dared not to go to him. I felt that I deserved his rejection, and I almost desired (a hard and untrue thought) that, if I went, he would refuse me. In the misery all, I dreaded seeing my little play-fellow, Mary.

I had not written to her by my master, ill as he was, and, confessing all, she had written to me in distinction. I met the physician at the door, just stepping into his carriage.

"How is Mr. Wilson?" I asked.

He only called a quarter of an hour ago, answered he.

My whole heart sunk within me. It turned from the house and walked away in the direction of "Now I am in that condition," thought I, "in which men become capable of any crime." And I wondered, at that moment, if I should ever look from grade to grade until I became a thief, a prisoner, a convict.

The first thing I did was to sell all my best clothes, and I dressed myself in the worst-out ones which I was about to give away. I then left my lodgings for a fortnight, all the while looking out for work. But I had no character. I could get no man to help, direction, or testimonial. At the end of the time I found myself in one of the worst lodgings, and, in every thing but begging, a beggar.

Only one of two courses was now left open to me. I must go home, and tell my father all, or end it to be? I had almost lost all sense that I was a responsible being. The misfortunes had made me feel myself a thing. I would not kill myself, not choose, but that I would let circumstances choose for me. In this mood I encountered the recruiting sergeant. I went up to him confidently, and accosted him as an old friend, as he stared at me a moment of two in silence, and then shook me off rather roughly. "Well, then, come with me, my man."

I was just enough myself to perceive that the sergeant, when I felt a strong hand grip me by the shoulder. I turned round angrily. There stood Parson Hole, an expression on his face, half of sorrow, half of indignation. It seemed as if another hand gripped still more tightly my heart at that vision. I suppose I fainted, for the next thing I remember was finding myself in a cab with the priest, stopping at the door of a hotel.

There is no need for me to write all that passed between us. Mr. Hale knew me to be his all faith in me. He did not wonder; my conscience acquitted him, and was ready to acquit any one who might make the same charge. Years fell of hot and wise lessons, which he had, as it were, thrown away upon me, tore up before my memory accusing me.

After he had told me of his loss of faith in me, he said no more. I longed for blame and anger; that quietness was a more dreadful condemnation than the most bitter anathema we could use. He took me with him to the railway in silence; he insisted, for the sake of my own self-respect, on letter. He handed me a bag of biscuits without a word. I envied the gentleman on the opposite seat, I envied the boy, I envied the very dog which I envied every one to whom he said only a syllable. Once, indeed, I tried to arouse a sympathy and ask after Mr. Hale and Mary, but I found myself now full of shame to take their names in my lips.

At last I fought sleep. Every one around me I felt that the priest was looking at me, for I heard a suppressed cough, and a rustling of paper, close to me to the heart. My hearing of these signs of pain was only stopped by my falling asleep really.

It had never entered into my active nature to were going. I took it for granted that we were on the way to London, being night-coaching, and from the window of the carriage informed me, which was covered with the condensed breath of the passengers. It was with a mingled and startling surprise, therefore, that on awaking suddenly I found myself in a strange, old-fashioned room, and from the window, I beheld the great sea stretched out by the bedside, and sparkling and leaping under the light of the full moon.

"Where am I going, Sir?" said I, half in terror, to the priest, who was now lying at full length on the carriage-seat.

"To Ostend," answered he, sprawling up and rubbing his eyes, for I had shaken him out of his sleep.

Then I thought I must be dreaming. I went over in a moment of time all the events of the last day or two, the struggle, the betting, the death of my master, my beggary, my enlistment of yesterday afternoon. I only wondered which was the last of these events. Each seemed to me as real as the event in the series of my dream. I was called to by the priest's voice.

"Your father," said he, "has heard of Mr. Wilson's death. A friend, who has been staying with him, has written to me, and I have received also a letter in Mexico, with a good salary. Your father wishes you to go. On condition of your liking it He knows nothing of your sin. I have told him I have learned from your fellow-clerks, and from the man you struck down. Such confessions in their light as you are must be treated as if they were not. The lying sinners against will must be treated as if they had none. I have therefore brought you to Plymouth without consulting your wishes in the matter. Your father, when he is out of your frightful course, will be glad to know that you are gone to Mexico for two years."

I shall never forget the rest of that night. It was the 30th of April. We spent it in the sun, in the open air. We were like two children, as I did, and I rose up from my knees with some of the feeling of a child, when my mother has kissed it and put into the town, and the priest bought my outfit.

At five in the afternoon the ship sailed. I had taken leave of Mr. Hole an hour before. It is the last of May, two years hence, William, God grant that you may not have forgotten me!" said he. And at sunset on May-day I saw, through my tears, the last of the cliffs of England.

MAY-DAY THE SECOND.

I spent the next 1st of May in the Republic of Mexico. At sunset we knew that we were in the feast of Saints Philip and James, a great feast in Spanish America. I remembered that it is not Saint James the national saint, and Philip is not name of her kings?

By that day I had improved in my intentions. But, as an unverifiable confidence, I had retrograded in my vices. One principle of action was unchanged in me, and the loose, idle, thoughtless manner of the race I was dwelling amidst was the worst example in the world for a youth to carry-my strong purposes. It is true that I attended to my religious duties more thoroughly. But business was perpetually interrupted by feasts and gala-days. I had lost all my old boyish love for reading and study, and wandered eagerly in the habits and usages of the natives.

On the morning of May-day I was gambling in the morning, at a bull-fight in the afternoon, at the opera in the evening, and gambling again at night.

MAY-DAY THE THIRD.

Has it ever struck you, my dear reader, that there is something special and singular in the love of women for plants? When you were a lad, or a lass, was it the gardener or the nurse-maid who used to terrify you, from twilight to bedtime, with his dire warnings of the wickedness of boys? Weak is logic as in nerve, they never asked themselves if it were possible for bobbins and invisible creatures to smell the flowers, or to be seen. She was frightened your grandmothers, in their crinoline-cradles, at the gnat, gnome, goblin, haunted castles, or church-yards at midnight, "making night hideous," and they, poor girls! too fearful to put out their heads to look at the cliffs. Who does the same disservice for your sweet-hearts and your sisters? Mrs. Creeve.

Very shocked would Parson Hole have been if he had known that his daughter Mary believed in the vision of ghosts; for although the parson was called a "Puseyite" throughout the rural deanery, and, gossip said, had a little shrine in his study with lights burning before them day and night, there was nothing the good father more hated and dreaded than superstition. Indeed, his sermons were full of warnings against it—a point which made Mr. Judge, the Minister of Muskham, assert he was to be the more suspected: "for," said he, "I always suspects a man to be a doing of that which he most talks against."

But young maidens have other teachers besides their fathers. One of these is delightful, because the earliest, of the teachers of little men and women is the nurse. When the young soul is soft, plastic, and supple as the young body, it is as ready moulded into the form of right shapes. Descartes tells us that, all his life long, he had a perfect affection for every squinting person he met; he revolved so much into the nature of the strange obliquity; and he found it in this, that the maiden-aunt who nursed him squinted.

Mary Hole had a like impression of the perfection of her own nurse's. With a most full fifth she believed on that nurse's word. She was nurse of Bogie, Waw-head-and-bloody-bones, and many of the most horrible monstrosities. Indeed, from the time Mary was five years old until the time she left for school (at which place her faith was modified rather than destroyed), scarcely a night passed without a talk upon some circumstantially evidenced ghost-story. To many of these tales I was a fellow-listener, and a fellow-believer at them too.

I returned from Mexico the last week in April. I had a few days' business which detained me in London. On the 1st of May, however, I entered once again my native village. I had written my father about, he had gone to Ashby de la Zouch, to meet me at Muskham. Immediately on my arrival at the parsonage, and a note came for me, in Mr. Hale's handwriting, inviting me to make their house my home until my father arrived.

Accordingly, late in the afternoon, I set off for the parsonage. Yes! I thought, as I walked, my old house I was very miserable. I had a feeling that I had gone out at the door clean, but re-entered it stained. The great change in my moral condition made the spaces between seem like a lifetime. I felt, it were, as if I were two persons, each issue in the world to me. For to my love and admiration of the parson another kind of love had been silently adding itself. Mary Hole was then but a young girl in age; too young, possibly, to be regarded as a woman. But I was now a man, and her mother continuing so hopeless an invalid, she had become a companion to her and to her father, and was, as to household matters, both the deputy-wife and housekeeper.

Mary Hole was then pretty and quiet woman. Toward me her reserve seemed special. I took it for granted that it was. I put it down, not as shyness, but partly as indifference and partly as dislike for one who had proved himself such an ingrate and a profligate. I felt humiliated, and, with a certain rubbish, an action picked up from gamblers and sharpers, to be a prodigal was a sure passport to the love of women. I felt that I had lost the presence of this girl, but it was blotted out. I thought that I could recover it.

The parson, also, was very different to the genial, kindly father whose voice and look I often recalled as I lay sleepless in my lodgings at night, and heard the tremendous rush and beat of the sea against the cliffs. He was cold, and stiff, and divided by nothing but a few inches of wood and metal from thousands of miles of hungry, cold, and devouring water. He was, indeed, decidedly more polite than he used to be.

At seven o'clock I rode a-dance at Mrs. Hole, reclining, pale and weak, upon the sofa. Once her eyes met mine. I saw in them the saddest expression. It revealed to me the sorrow of the unhappy home; a piece of ill and inarticulate coloring thrust by some hasty hand into a perfect and glorious picture.

For I perceived that among themselves they were very happy enough. A new life had come into Mary's, was staying with them. A chatter, in which the parson's wife gave a feeble share, filled the two; and every now and then a burst of laughter broke out from it.

At seven o'clock Mr. Hole went out to say the even song in the church. None of them went with him. Mary was attending upon her mother, and his companion. He answered, "Very well, William;" nothing more. True, the distance from the parsonage to the church was but a few feet for my prolonged tale. Returning, he was just as curt. He had left the church door open, and stood alone, "Warmer than this in Mexico, William?" said he, as he let me in at the hall-door.

When we entered the room we found a panelled fire blazing, and the candles not yet lighted. Mrs. Hole was sitting, and the fireside by her armchair propped up with soft pillows. We found also going on between these three ladies, what, if the reader has not guessed, he must be dull indeed to have expected, namely, a talk about ghosts.

"Well, Aunt Mary," I said, when these gentlemen were afraid to stay in the church till it grew dark, "what awful night?"

Mary laughed. I felt so thankful for being coupled with Mr. Hole once more in words that seemed to suggest the following story.

To explain, however, the meaning of the question, I must take the reader back to Muskham church. And I must ask him to look upon the monument of Reginald de Muskham, an old crusader, who lies in an altar-tomb, cut in stone, in the sacrilice, Ivy, at full length, the peaceful-faced warrior, his hands clasped in prayer, his countenance directed toward heaven, his feet always expecting and waiting for the reappearance of the Son or Gon. A strange tradition concerning this figure had become current in Muskham village. The tradition was so ancient no one knew when, or from what cause, it took its rise. It was reported that on the eve of St. Philip and James, the thirtieth day of April, the effigy felt pulses of blood coursing through his marble veins, arose from his hard bed, and, walking up the aisle, knelt solemnly before the altar and remained there, at all in prayer, until cock-crow.

None of the villagers, strange to say, had ever soon this wonderful apparition. Perhaps, however, you will think it stronger when I tell you that some of the villagers, except two or three of the enlightened congregation of the Banters, presumed to doubt the truth of it; and only two or three, indeed, of these. "The true and healthy traditions of the Church," Parson Hale used to say, "they have grown up. This one unhealthy tradition, transferred perhaps from some heathen precursor, they are loth to part with. Our nature is essentially traditional."

"Do you, then, Miss Mary, still believe in that old story of ours?" said I.

"Miss Mary!" cried Mrs. Hole.

"Mary," said I, half-blushing, but pleased and smiled with the mother's kindness. I could say only, however, looking across at the parson to see if his face offered any encouragement to proceed from such a prodigal as myself. He was occupied at the sideboard in counting over a number of cards, and had not heard me.

"Well," said Mary, "of course I don't exactly believe it, you——"

"Exactly disbelieve it," put in her mother. "I believe though, William, that she inclines used to the belief. I know that I should do it myself."

I caught at these words. "If it is so, Mary," said, "I shall be glad to watch to-night in the church for the apparition; and to-morrow morning I will tell you whether I have seen it."

"You shall do nothing of the kind," said Mrs. Hale.

"Oh, let him!" cried the parson. "It will do the whole parish good."

The parish wife was an additional spur to me. I longed to feel that I was still in his favor; I longed to do something to win it back, or at least his back the sense of it.

So, after a great deal of talk, to which every one contributed their share, the matter was at last thus submitted,and it was agreed that, if I retained my purpose of so doing, I should go into the church at midnight. Which resolution being passed, we agreed to put off all further talk of the business until the time arrived for me to go. The rest of the evening was spent cheerily and pleasantly. I felt as if these dear hearts were really taking me forward me, and again passed over the catalogue of my sins.

At last, supper over, and pleasant time flying swiftly as usual, ten minutes to twelve came. "You must be in the church porch, remember, William," said the parson, "or the villagers will say that the ghostly knight had said his prayers and gone to bed again before the appointed time. It is quite a cold night, and he will not like keeping him out of bed."

"Father!" cried Mary, with a look which seemed to ask, "I say, a priest, and so irreverent!"

Mr. Hale laughed, and I heard the sound in the door. I wished them all a good-night, and started off, quite briskly, for one so unaccustomed, I had not got quite so far, however, as the garden gate, when I heard, calling after me, the voice which is the sweetest that ever I heard.

"Will—Mr. Witherington, I mean."

I turned gladly, and back. Mary was standing in the door-way alone.

"Mamma says you had much better not go," said she, "and I think so too."

"I refuse to draw back," said I; "how would the sons of Hawkshaw, for credulity renowned, and Bathham's dames——"

"Whose garments do any thing but sweep the ground," cried Mary; "if you will go, I am a Hector to this ghost Achilles, I hope it will not hurt you. In that case, mamma says you are to run this," and she handed me a little bottle. "You will be so cold in the church. And you may have to wait an hour or two before the ghostly knight rises," she added, shaking out the kind of mock-merry laugh.

"Don't be afraid," I answered, taking the bottle; "good-night!" And we shook hands, I fancying that I felt a most affectionate pair of fingers; but then, too, the cheeks passing from the face of the moon, the rays fell peculiarly upon the face and revealed an expression so tender and concerned that my heart leaped up inwardly. "Oh, I shall enjoy it!" I cried, "I will be sure of a novel adventure for me. I have spent a night alone in my free lessons in a Hebrew forest, but I have not spent one in a quiet English church. But I am afraid I shall see no ghost."

I have said already that the church was but a very short distance from the parsonage. So I was soon there. I unlocked the door, I passed through with the echo of my last words still ringing clearly in my ears.

But when I entered the gaunt cold church that echo was driven away by the awful and elaborate ringing vow of the church door, which the wind slammed to behind me with a determined and sudden force. There, on my right hand, by the figure of the crusader, placed there by the last seer in Sunday after Sunday, long years back when I was a little unstained child, I then did not see between them light and darkness, between sacred and solitude. It seemed to me as if, though the quiet figure was not moved, it had—I—he was thinking, and thinking too, of me in his tender mind. I almost thought, as I looked at him, that I could hear his think aloud thus—

"How have you come out of the living world? William Witherington, do you know that you have sold yourself in among the Dead? The dead beneath you; all these quiet people in their cold tombstones. All the monuments upon the walls, those masses of discolored marble and gilded brass, are truths or lies about the dead. What if to-night the whole multitude of the buried should come up to confirm or to contradict them? How ever stays all the night in dark churches? Who can tell what way pass within them when all the living are asleep?"

Immediately the echo of my own last word flashed upon the ears of my soul again: last word it said by another, and with a sort under-tone of satire in them: "I am afraid that I shall see no ghosts." And then I heard the muscovylade No, as if whispered by ten or twelve pair of communicating lips from pillar to pillar, and passing round the church. It had such a force over my spirit that I, in spite of resistance, felt my mouth pushed to take it up: and I said aloud and impetuously, again and again, "No, no, no! No, no, no, no!" And again the drop echo cast up to me from the pavement to the roof, and the echo of the roof from the pavement to walls I knew not where. Wild beasts, reptiles, the dicing horrors of the forest, I could fight with—I dared not fight with ghosts.

Every few minutes the church changed from excessively dark to excessively light, as the moon was cloudy, and the moon was at the full. I had taken up my station in the middle compartment of a play-ful freak with me, that I would sit in the sacristy instead of in the cold church, looking out every now and then at the moon. I felt, and could not see, the ghost kneeling at the altar. Now that I knew it was there, and alone in the church, I felt less brave and more believing. I felt really afraid of seeing him. All the taunts I had ever poured out concerning ghosts were now rushed in a vengeful and accusing manner upon me; and I began to feel how presumptuous a thing I ought to have been with them. "I will sit in the sacristy," said I to myself. "Perhaps I shall fall asleep there: for it will be like sleeping in my own room, and not to stay out here awake all night, and quite alone. I will sit in the sacristy, and look out every hour." I was still in the neighborhood of the as yet sleeping effigy. I confess that I did not like it; so I moved a little nearer to the sacristy door, and, once in, once went in; the church was suddenly filled with darkness; I standing in the door. The ghost-way way along, however, until, a moment after, I found myself fallen over the library-stool. Another moment, and I fell, thrown downward from the floor, and upward from the pavement of a hundred tombs, ruins and ruins of ruins. I sprung up and rushed hurriedly at the sacristy door. It was locked, and I had no key for it.

I was startled out of this state by what seemed to be the brilliant streaming of the moonlight, between my fingers, as I held my face in my hands, and caught sight, through the opposite window, of a black moonless sky, and heard the heavy beating of the windbells—it seemed to me, in long-shaped pauses. At the same time I saw my own figure, black and definite shape, upon the stone of the floor, and I felt rather than saw—I felt with cold awe and horror, that a white, powerful, unmistakable was looming at the door of the old church, at the end where the tomb of the knight stood.

I was utterly paralyzed and will-less. In spite of myself my head turned in the direction of the figure. "Oh, my God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me? A Sacrilege, silver! cold-shaped mass of light was moving, and moving up the aisle, and in the midst of it stood the figure of the Crusader! The witness of many generations indicated itself; the corpse of all my sins rushed in a vengeful swarm above all, the scene of my disbelieving scorn and pride. I tried to cry, but I was fixed to the stone. But a rigid stiffness in my legs prevented me; and as the figure moved with solemn slowness nearer and nearer to me, I sank down upon my knees round the church, clearer and more distinct than the loudest shout or scream could be, "Have mercy reverence to the dead!" and I was kept, perforce, standing.

The ghost he reached the foot of the chancel steps I perceived that his own feet did not touch the pavement. He stood by the altar-rail, and I heard him, as saw also, too plainly, that he was indeed no longer stone. Color—though a paler and more watery color than we are used to—was about his whole figure. His casque, which he held in his hand, had no plate to it with the exception of the visor-bars, and the rest of his armor, locked steel-color, brass-color, and red, seen through gaps or a mist. Paint was the flesh of him also with the rest of his cheeks. His eyes, too, were not piercing and brilliant like those I had seen in the church by day, but subdued, dusky, ineffable brown; it was hard to distinguish the eyebrow from the brow-shadow, or the outline of the nose in the nose.

I felt the air colder and colder as he neared me, and I could see the eyes of the dead. Most of all, his mouth fascinated and fixed them. I could look into his dreamy and indistinct eyes without dread, but I felt that I could never at the thought of those lips opening, at the thought of words coming from them. I could not seriously think. I was fixed, straight lines, and I looked with awe lest that face, so so firmly in the direction of the altar, should have to turn from it. He did not. And as he reached me he turned his head fully round. I looked to the altar-rail.

I could not endure that sight. I fell flat. Amidst the floating away of my senses I caught the words—

"William, William! Oh that you were a stock or a stone for the Jerusalem as I did for the Earthly!"

After that my senses were shut up; I neither heard nor saw any more. The next thing I remember was a shake of my right shoulder, a sensation of cramp in all my limbs, the rising sunlight pouring in from the altar-window, and the organist and Parson Hale standing beside me.

"My dear lad, have you been here all night?" asked the priest.

"Yes," I answered: "I think so."

"Have you seen the ghost?"

"Yes—at least no—yes. I don't know. I think I have."

"It is the Feast of Saint Philip and Saint James, and we are come in to the early Communion. Fortunate, too, it is for you. Any other day you would have been here until half past eight. Come, sit up; you are not half-awake yet."

Three months afterward, when I was just about to leave home for the university, I called at the parsonage to wish my betrothed and her family a farewell. I found the parson reading one of the treatises of William Law.

"Here is a sentence, William," said he, "which shall always be my last prayer."

He handed me over the book and I read: "Contentment to do even when very sudden and tumultuous, unexpectedly raised from variety of occasions. Thus, one by seeing only a withered tree, another by hearing the voice of the archangel, another by one by hearing of Heaven, another of Hell, may be summoned as it were united into penitence all on a sudden."

We then went on St. Paul, Raymond Lully, Ignatius Loyola, Colonel Gardiner, and others.

"Of the same kind, whether real or supposed, the visit of your ghost—"

"I'm sure it was real, pa," cried Mary.

"—Was," continued the priest, "the visit of a good messenger of God, since it appears to you the long-wanted word of God—the word that first really made your soul to tremble. And many were rendering to Right, which so many changes of fortune and scene had not yet wrought."

My future wife then true, is not complete unless it finishes in a wedding. I can only so far satisfy the readers who care to know the issue of my love, believe there will be one before eighteen hundred and fifty-nine is out.

THE COUNCILMAN'S BALLAD.

"Councilman Bullard was opposed to free hydrants. Ignatius Loyola, Colonel Gardiner, and others." "A fine rag-bag and bob-tail gathered."—Private Report of Common Council Proceedings, June 18, 1859.

"Councilman Bullard denounced the measure of free hydrants as a humbug, and the measure was lost."—Herald, June 21, 1859.

"Free hydrants will be nuisance,"
Cries aloud King Alcohol;
"Who hold his carnals subjects
Under sensual bond and thrall
In his many thousand grog-shops,
From Manhattanville to Wall!

What! free hydrants for the people?—
Give them water while there's rum
Kept and sold by velvet voters,
Manufacting city scum?—
Cheat the gin or lager cellars,
And the spirit-grubs bemush?

True, the workers in the city
Dash cool water freely up,
For aldermen swear by brandy
That elections may be won.
Keep free water from their decency—
The metropolis wants none.

What, when summer sans are searching,
Every laborer be athirst?
Was not Israel so at Marah
Ere the grateful fountain burst?
Let famishes perish their manners
Of the souls by brandy cursed!

Your rag and bob-tail children
Let their fathers choose to send
To the counters gemmed with bottles,
Where the drops of Satan wend;
Who can give more jovial welcome
Than the children's drunken friend?

No! let Croton roll all darkly
In pipes 'neath paving-stones;
Let the grog-shop be respected
When the dicering vagrant moans;
Let him drink the water freely
Who a household hydrant owns.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

CROP NEWS

We have rather good news of the wheat crop from Westmoreland County, Virginia. The wheat ear is said to be filling well, and would give good promise of an abundant harvest were it not for the attacks of insects. It is expected that there will at least be an average crop, in their opinion, unless rendered by particular localities. The farmers are busy cutting wheat.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Inquirer, who writes from Indianapolis, gives a glowing account of the crops, and says that the harvest will be the most abundant one that was ever much exaggerated. From all that can be learned from all parts of the State the prospects of good crops are most encouraging. Corn is said to look remarkably well. This is also true of wheat, where ears are full. The grain is still late the milk state; and there is every likelihood of an early harvest in Indiana. Fruit is expected to be at least an average crop.

Rats have been doing much injury in some places in the corn-fields of Illinois and elsewhere. The farmers attacked them with their dogs, and, to their great satisfaction, killed large numbers. Terriers, and especially (as sportsmen say) good killers, were in active demand. In Livingston County, on the farm of Dr. Ostrander, several wagonfuls of dead rats are said to have been taken from one field (we do not know how large a one), where arsenic was mixed with corn and scattered over it. Black squirrels do great injury sometimes in cornfields. Last year, when corn was in the ear, we saw the French Canadians in the neighborhood of Chatham, Canada West, chasing the black squirrels in the corn-fields. As they made to the fences, over which they ran to the woods, they were met by persons who had risen with the sun, and whose better long swift slight blows were sufficient to kill them, and who thus had an opportunity to sell their skins and eat their bodies.

We learn that in New Jersey wheat-bitterers, which are often a source of loss to the farmer interested in their growth, look fine and promise a large yield.

WEEDS.

W. B. writes:

"In all my rea ceipe there is not a word to be found, and simply because I attacked them in time. Between the rows I have used a horse-hoe and constantly hoed, and I am satisfied that I not only got rid of the weeds, but that much of the plant-food they would have drawn from the soil was appropriated by growing crops. Weeds are to be found almost every where. They are among the greatest pests of the farm, and I heartily wish that feeling of hate and revenge and enlightened experience would prompt farmers to practice more culture, and rid the soil of weeds. My remarks are in a great degree the result of articles on this subject which appeared in the Weekly Farmer. They were very excellent articles on the prevention of weeds and prompt action, and even now they may be read with profit. The great secret of the success of the farmer is work. What are the principal improvements made on this useful implement within the past ten years?"

The first alteration or improvement was to leave us its wing, so that a less amount of power would throw it, at the same time the small depth. Then a person who altered its construction believing that if the particles could be moved the smallest possible distance, and yet the soil was not pulverized as if they traveled all around the globe before they reached home, that it would be possible that when the soil is elevated through a slight distance only, and it has but a small fall, there is less abrasion of its particles. Consequently it is so. The next question arises: Will the greater abrasion compensate for the greater extra amount of labor required to work a subsoil plow having an elevated wing? The next alteration was to make the sole, which was slightly elevated in the centre, of lozenge shape. The sole and standard were attached to the beam by bolts, so that the former might at any time be taken from the beam and turned around, placing the hinderment point foremost—it was claimed that while the front part was doing its work the rear the other was being sharpened, for which reason this subsoil plow was called a "self-sharper." The standard in this case was usually one solid casting, but one called a "self lifter," or "lifting subsoil plow," is not made so, the sole being pointed at one end only.

TOBACCO.

In our remarks on this subject last week we had to leave out a great deal for want of space.

Experiments show that the same weed, manufactured known as the seed of the Seed Leaf Tobacco at Suffield, Connecticut, produces a cigar of the finest mercantile value in Florida, and, when grown on the eastern coast of Maryland, furnishes a light-colored fine-fine-like complexion of a still superior flavor. When grown on the northern shore of Lake Erie it will grow a much larger leaf capable of wrapping but two cigars. On the Island of St. Domingo the same weed grows that very large, fine-textured leaf known as the Porto au Plata. The same seed, in many of the German States, gives a tobacco in some respects very like Havanas, occasionally representing San Jago. Of this latter class millions of pounds are imported into the United States from Germany every year. A few years ago tobaccos could only be sold at high prices as cigar wrappers, when of a light color, but of late last fifteen years the fancy of smokers has gradually leaned toward the dark-colored cigars, the preference to the use of a variety of kinds of seed in the United States. The first year from new seed produces a smaller crop than afterward.

STRAWBERRIES.

At a late meeting of the American Institute, New York, the committee on fruits appointed to report on the best six varieties of straw berries for family use gave the following:

1. WILSON'S ALBANY.—Its good qualities are: productiveness, size, flesh and juice. Many persons consider it the best.

2. LONGWORTH'S PROLIFIC.—Fine flavor, large, early, and a good bearer; but soft, and consequently not a desirable crop only.

3. HOVEY'S SEEDLING.—Sweet flavor, rich, good size, and productive.

4. BURR'S NEW PINE.—Fine flavor, large and productive, but the berries are sometimes of deformed shape.

5. HOVEY'S SEEDLING.—Although not of a very high flavor this berry is a general favorite.

6. BURR'S NEW PINE.—Medium size, fine flavor, moderately productive; plants hardy and vigorous.

We should now like to see a list for field culture that have all the desirable qualities for market.

WHEAT WEEVILS.

W. C. writes:

"Inclosed I send you some insects which I found among my wheat in the granary. Can you tell me any thing about them? They have never seen them on wheat in the field.

We have never known any person who has seen them on wheat in the field. They are the true wheat weevil, known as the Curculio granarius of Linnæus. A little salt, shaken through the grain at the time of housing it, is a good safe-guard against them.

A TYROLESE RIFLEMAN.

THE accompanying illustration will enable our readers to carry about with them in their mind's eye a correct picture of that formidable personage of whom we are just now hearing so much—namely, the Rifleman of the Tyrol. At Montebello, it will be remembered, the disproportionate mortality among the French officers was ascribed to the wonderful skill of the Tyrolese riflemen who are serving in the Austrian army. They were equally terrible at Magenta.

These riflemen are recruited from the jägers, or chamois hunters of the Tyrol, and approach more nearly to the old Kentucky rifleman than any other body of men at the present day. They may almost be said to be born with rifles in their hands. From earliest youth the denizen of the Alpine range which divides Italy from Germany is trained to the use of the gun.

His first glory is a successful shot; his highest aim in life is the rank of first-class sharpshooter. Steadiness of hand, cool nerves, clear eyes, and long endurance — these are the qualities most highly prized by the Tyrolese, and, as a general rule, in them respect equals they are unsurpassed.

When the present Emperor of Austria undertook to reorganize his army after the insurrectionary movements of 1848 he paid especial attention to raising a corps of first-class riflemen. The natural recruiting-ground for such a corps was the Tyrol, and to the Tyrol, accordingly, his recruiting officers were dispatched with orders to spare neither expense nor trouble in securing every good shot that could be found. The result of this policy, pursued perseveringly for a series of years, has been the organization of a corps d'armée composed almost exclusively of Tyrolese sharp-shooters, and numbering over 30,000 men. These are the men who are doing such damage to the French.

They are not armed with the Minié, or any similar weapon. They use an old-fashioned rifle, heavy in metal and small in bore, with a small round ball. Their range is, therefore, less than that of the French sharpshooters, who are armed with the newly-invented weapons of death, and can "pot their man" at 1000 yards. But in actual warfare it is seldom necessary to fire at such great distances. Five hundred yards is a very long range when troops are engaged or preparing to engage, and at this distance the Tyrolese jäger can kill almost to a certainty.

A letter received in Marseilles from Valenza bears testimony to the admirable qualities of the Tyrolese riflemen. It is said that they harass the French videttes and outposts incessantly. Day and night, it is said, their shots are whizzing thro' the air. The ground on the other side of the Po affords them good cover, and they are ever on the watch. The other day General Renault went out to reconnoitre, attended by his aid-de-camp, and followed by a trumpeter a few paces behind. The General thought himself beyond range; but while he was looking about him a sharp "thug" was heard, and the poor trumpeter fell forward mortally wounded by a Tyrolese bullet in the back.

A TYROLESE RIFLEMAN.

The General, having discovered his error, withdrew, and gave up his reconnoissance for that day.

On another occasion, a soldier of the Nineteen Tyrol regiment went down to the bank of the Po to wash out a few things. While engaged in this peaceful occupation a bullet struck him in the chest and he fell into the water, whose tide bore his body to the Austrian side of the Po—a bloody tribute to the murderous accuracy of their fire. "At every instant," says the letter, "wounded men are being brought in by the ambulances."

The following is the official proclamation calling these riflemen to come to the aid of the Emperor in his present sore distress. The blasphemy of the allusion to God will command general attention. We shall see whether the countrymen of Hofer will be foolish enough to risk their lives in a contest for a monarch who has never shown them any other mark of his affection than by taxing them.

"TO MY FAITHFUL SUBJECTS OF THE TYROL:

"I call you to arms. I summon you to show anew to your contemporaries and to posterity your fidelity, your bravery, your piety, your religious enthusiasm.

"I call you to defend the most righteous cause for which sword was ever drawn.

"Take in your practiced hands the whole arm of your country. Form yourselves into corps of riflemen, and march to the frontier to meet the enemy. Let your fidelity and your resolution serve as a rampart against the same enemy who has so often paid with his blood the invasion of your mountains.

"It is to you that I confide the task of defending the frontiers of my dear country of the Tyrol against the enemy, who has made himself the ally of revolt against the legitimate dominion established by God.

"If the enemy should menace them you will make him feel that on those frontiers is a people who will know how, like their brethren, to combat and conquer for God and the country.—Given at my head-quarters, at VERONA, the 31st of June.

FRANCIS-JOSEPH."

But what is man? By his own act he had apparently complicated them inextricably.

"Business, of course, is the only career in this country, my son," said Boniface Newt. "What man want, and women too, is money. What is this city of New York? A combination of men and machines for making money. Every body respects a rich man. They may laugh at him behind his back. They may sneer at his ignorance and awkwardness, and all that sort of thing, but they respect his money. Now there's old Jacob Van Boozenberg. I say to you in strict confidence, my son, that there was never a greater ass than that man. He absolutely knows nothing at all. When he dies he will be no more missed in this world than an old dead stage-horse who is made into a manure heap. He is coarse and vulgar and mean. His daughter Kate married his clerk, young Witchet, why, if girls will run away, and all that sort of thing, they must take the consequences, you know. Of course they must. Where should we be if every rich merchant's daughters were at the mercy of his clerks? I'm sorry for all this. It's sad, you know. It's positively melancholy. It troubles me. Ah, yes, where was I? Oh, I was saying that money is the respectable thing. And mark, Abel, if this were the Millennium, things would be very different. But it isn't the Millennium. It's give one and take two, if you can get it. That's what it is here; and let him who wants to, kick against the pricks."

Abel hung his legs over the arm of the office-chair in the counting-room, and listened gravely to the paternal profusions. It occurred to him that it was not at all necessary for Abel Newt to adduce to words a principle whose practice he had witnessed all his life. But the performance appeared to comfort his parent as did not resist. He even tossed the ball of discourse back again, by saying:

"I don't suppose, Sir, that 'tis money or money that is worth having. It is only money as the representative of intelligence and refinement, of books, pictures, society—as a vast influence and means of charity; is it not, Sir?"

Upon which Mr. Abel Newt blew a prodigious cloud of smoke.

Mr. Boniface Newt responded, "Oh fiddle! that's all very fine. But my answer to that is Jacob Van Boozenberg."

To understand that answer, however, it was necessary to have seen the house and to have watched the daily life of that millionaire.

It is surely a grateful thing to reflect that he was of a species now extinct—that in his case money was the representative of mirrors and upholstery; of silver-plate, and gilding, and moulding; of a fine carriage and servants; of a front pew and large subscriptions to churches that published the names of the donors; and of enormous balls, to which all the men and a few brave women went, and laughed at him and his wife—all these things and of nothing else.

"What a nasty row and rumpus all this fighting for money is!" sighed Boniface Newt to his son Abel. "I wish I was rich, and I'd be out of it! Bless my soul! here comes Mr. Van Boozenberg! Abel, put your legs down! throw that cigar away!"

The great man came in. His clothes were snuffy and baggy — to was his face.

"Good mornin', Mr. Newt. Beautiful mornin'! I set to me this mornin', ma, sez I, I should like to go to the country to-day, sez I. Go 'long, pa!' sez she. Werry well, sez I, I'll go 'long if you'll go too. Ma she laughed; she know'd I wasn't in earnest; she know'd 'twasn't only a joke."

Mr. Van Boozenberg drew out a large red bandana handkerchief, and blew his nose as if it had been a trumpet sounding a charge.

Messrs. Newt & Son smiled sympathetically. The junior partner observed, cheerfully,

"Yes, Sir."

The millionaire stared at the young man.

"Ma's going to Saratogy," remarked Mr. Van Boozenberg. "She said she wanted to go. Werry well, sez I, ma, go."

Messrs. Newt & Son smiled deferentially, and hoped Mrs. Van B. would enjoy herself.

"No, I ain't no fear of that," replied the millionaire.

It occurred to Abel Newt that he meant to say that he had no fear she would not enjoy herself.

"Mr. Van Boozenberg," said Boniface Newt, half-hesitatingly, "you were very kind to undertake that little favor—I—I——"

"Oh! yes, I came in to say I done that as you wanted. It's all right."

"And, Mr. Van Boozenberg, I am pleased to introduce to you my son Abel, who has just entered the house."

Abel rose and bowed.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XXXV.

BONIFACE NEWT, SON, AND CO., DRY GOODS ON COMMISSION.

ABEL NEWT smoked a great many cigars to enable him to use his position clearly.

When he told his mother that he could not accompany her to the Springs because he was about entering his father's counting-room, it was not so much because he was enamored of business as that his future relations with Hope were entirely doubtful, and he did not wish to complicate them by exposing himself to the chances of Saratoga.

Tom Witchet—not a cent, you know, but five hundred dollars salary. Twas against the old man's will, and he shut his door and his purse and his heart. He turned Witchet away: told his daughter that she might lie in the bed she had made for herself; told Witchet that he was a rotten young swindler, and that, as he had married his daughter for her money, he'd be d—d if he wouldn't be up with him, and dance of a cent should they get from him. They live I don't know where, nor how. Some of her old friends send her money—actually give five-dollar bills to old Jacob Van Boozenberg's daughter, somewhere over by the North River. Every body knows it, you know; but, for all that, we have to make bows to old Van B. Don't we want accommodations? Look here, Abel; if Jacob were not worth a million of dollars he would be of less consequence than the old fellow who sells apples at the corner of his bank. But, as it is, he is a shrewd, sensible old fellow: rough in some of his ways—full of little prejudices—rather sharp; and as for Mrs. Tom

OUR NEW PARTNER.

"Have you been in the store?" asked the old gentleman.

"No, Sir, I've been at school."

"What! to school till now? Why, you must be twenty years old!" exclaimed Mr. Van Boozenberg in great surprise.

"Yes, Sir, in my twentieth year."

"Why, Mr. Nowt," said Mr. Van B., with the air of a man who is in entire perplexity, "what on earth has your boy been doing at school until now?"

"It was his grandfather's will, Sir," replied Boniface Newt.

"Well, well, a great pity! a weery great pity! Ma wanted one of our boys to go to college. Ma, see, I, what on earth should Corlear go to college for? To get learnin', pa, see ma. To get learnin'! see I. I'll get learnin' myself, see I, down to the store. Werry well, see ma. Werry well, see I, and so 'twas, and I thinks I done a good thing by him."

Mr. Van Boozenberg talked at much greater length of his general intercourse with ma. Mr. Boniface Newt regarded him more and more as an ass.

But the familiar style of the old gentleman's conversation began a corresponding familiarity upon the part of Mr. Newt. Mr. Van Boozenberg learned incidentally that Abel had never been in a business before. He observed with the odor of cigars in the counting-room—he remarked the extreme elegance of Abel's attire, and the influential tailor's bills. He learned that Mrs. Newt and the family were enjoying themselves at Saratoga. He derived from the conversation and his observation that there were very large family expenses to be met by Boniface Newt.

Meanwhile that gentleman had continually to other sides of his visitor from that he was on ass. He had confessed to Abel that the old man was shrewd. His shrewdness was a proverb. But he is a dull, ignorant, ungrammatical, and ridiculous old ass for all that, thought Boniface Newt; and the said ass sitting in Boniface Newt's counting-room, and amusing and fatiguing Messrs. Newt & Son with his sea Is, and see shes, and his ma, and his pa, was quickly making up his mind that the house of Newt & Son had received an accession of capital or strength by the entrance of the eldest Abel into a share of its active management, and that some slight whispers which he had heard remotely affecting the standing of the house must be remembered.

It is a singular fact that your old hands at their, however long the game may be, however much diversion there may be around the table, whatever even they themselves may drop in the way of joke or remark to some little girl or friendly lady, never for a solitary moment forget the game they are playing—never lose from mind the exact run of the cards—and rarely fail to know, so far as human fallibility may, precisely the cards in every player's hand. While bald-headed old Codger is thinking what a unaccompanied old Bodger in the red wig is—which, abstractly, may be a reflection foundful in the most perfect justice—red-wigged old Bodger has drawn bald-headed old Codger's very hard, and, by consequence, transfers the gold rughs into his own pocket.

Jacob Van Boozenberg, after some further family narrations, after more flourishes of the hundreds, and after nearly sawing asunder Mr. Abel Newt's youthful patience with his incessant see hes and see shes, said he believed he must be moving.

"A weery pretty store you have here, Mr. Newt. Find Pearl Street as good as Beaver?"

"Oh yes, Sir," replied Boniface Newt, bowing and rubbing his hands. "Call again, Sir, it's a rare pleasure to see you here, Mr. Van Boozenberg."

be driving donkeys with a chance of their presently driving you. But I give it up, I swear I give it up, as I've said before, and as Cressus, with an immense reputation for sagacity and all that kind of thing, has given Ammon, he comes here as you see and positively drives about his ma. If such men can get rich, I don't see why we can't."

Mr. Boniface Newt shook his foot pettishly.

"Father," said Abel.

"Well."

"Which is Uncle Lawrence, an ass, a bore, or a knave?"

Mr. Boniface Newt's foot stopped, and, after looking at his son for a few moments, he answered:

"Abel, your Uncle Lawrence is a singular man. He's a sort of exception to general rules. I don't understand him, and he doesn't help me to. When he was a boy he went to India and lived there several years. He came home once and staid a little while, and then went back again, although I believe he has not a relation of mystorious, I never could quite understand—though, of course, I believe there was some woman in it. Neither your mother nor I could ever find out much about it. By-and-by he came home again and has been here continually ever since. He's a bachelor, you know, and his business is different from mine, and he has many friends and tastes, so that I don't often see him except when he comes to the house, and that isn't very often.

"He's rich, isn't he?" asked Abel.

"Yes, he's very rich, and that's the curious thing," answered his father, "and he gives away a great deal of money in what seems to me a very foolish way. He's a leading member of the great American Shade Society, for instance, the society that is trying to prevent deforestation and favor the planting of shade-trees in all the cities and villages of the country. Then he goes to that little church in Columbia—I think it is, that the Unitarians have built, and he is altogether full of all sorts of new notions. I told him one day that I thought it was a wicked waste of money to put it into trees. 'Why,' said he, 'on your own principles you ought to allow that it would probably be better spent in the hands of the poor.' 'Poor, Uncle Peter or Boniface,' said he, 'who believes that men are essentially swamps, must necessarily hold that all kinds of benevolent human enterprise are simply societies for the propagation of asses. No, no, let's encourage the trees, and, who knows, perhaps some day we may plant out the people on the globe.' That's the way he runs on. He's a kind of dreamer—a very impracticable man. He pays lots of poor people's rents, and I try to show him that he is only encouraging idleness and crime. But I can't make him see it. He declares that, if a sewing girl can't make a decent living and has a helpless mother and three small sisters to support besides her own and feed and so on, it's not encouraging idleness to help her with the rent. I suppose it is hard sometimes with some of those people. But we're not to go by particular cases in those matters. You ought to go by the general rule, as I constantly tell him. Says he, 'Is it that smiling way of his which does put me almost beside myself sometimes? I'll be good to pay his grocer's rule and let people starve, and I'll go by particular cases and feed 'em.' Then it's so curious that he's so deuced rich, too. He's just as rich as if he were an old fleet like Van Boozenberg. He is the feminest, foggiest sort of world. I swear I don't see into it at all—I give it all up. I only know one thing; that is first in first win. And that's extremely sad, too, you know. Yes, very sad! Where was I? Ah, yes—that we are all in Saratoga."

Abel had relighted his cigar, after Mr. Van Boozenberg's departure, and filled the office with smoke until the atmosphere resembled the fog in which his father seemed to be floundering.

"Abel, merchants ought not to smoke cigars in their counting-rooms," said his father, in a half-gentle way.

"No, I suppose not," replied Abel, lightly, very ready to smoke other people. But tell me, father, do you know nothing about the woman that you say was mixed up with Uncle Lawrence's affairs?"

"Nothing at all."

"Not even her name?"

"Not a syllable."

"Pathos and mysterious," rejoined Abel; a case of unhappy love, I suppose."

"If it is so," said Mr. Newt, "your uncle Lawrence is the most miserable man I ever knew."

"Well, there's a difference among men, you know, father. Some wear their miseries like an order in their button-holes. Some do as the Indian boy did when the wolf bit him."

"How'd the Spartan boy do?" asked Mr. Newt.

"He covered it up, laughed, and dropped dead."

"Gracious!" said Mr. Boniface Newt.

"Or like Boccaccio's bail-pot," continued Abel, calmly pursuing forth smoke, while his befogged pupa inquired,

"What on earth do you mean by Boccaccio's bail-pot?"

"Why, a girl's lover had his head cut off, and she put it in some pot, and covered it up that way, and instead of laughing herself, set flowers to blooming over it."

"Goodness me, Abel, what are you talking about?"

"Oh Love, the canker-worm, Sir," replied Abel, imperturbable, and emitting smoke.

It was evidently not the busy season in the Dry-goods Commission House of Boniface Newt & Son.

Abel, with the philosophic father and contemplating son thus sat speculating and smoking. Mr. Jacob Van Boozenberg had returned to the bank. He was now on his little room and fell into conversation with several of his directors, who had called in to see the statement of the current condition of the bank, and to talk over frail commercial reputations. He did not mention to them any recent interview of his son, but when he went home to dinner he said:

"Mrs. Van Boozenberg, I have this werry pleasant weather and start for Saratogy as soon as you can. Mr. Boniface Newt tells me his wife and family is there, and you'll find them werry pleasant folks. I just want you to write me all the letters, Ma, see ma, see one of our directors to-day see to me, after board, see he, 'The Boniface Newts is a going it sky-dash up to Saratogy.' Boniface, see I, 'Why shouldn't they? I don't believe they be,' see I. See I, 'Why, I've been told they be,' see he. See he, 'see he. See I, 'Done.' So you see ma, if so be they be, werry well. A new shad for them folks, I believe,—only don't tell me all about it."

He was not reluctant to depart at the earliest possible moment. Her son Corlear, whose education had been intercepted by his father, was of opinion that he heard that the Newts were at Saratoga, that his health imperatively required Congress water. But papa had other views.

"Corlear, I wish you would make the acquaintance of young Mr. Newt. I dine to-day. He is a well-educated young man; I shall ask him for another next Sunday. Don't be out of the way."

Jacob Van Boozenberg having dined, arose from the table, seated himself in a spacious easy-chair, and drawing forth the enormous red bandana, flourished it over his head and face, and after a few muscular twitches, and a violent nodding of the head, which caused the drapery of the chair to quiver, finally propped the colored factory head against the back of the chair, and sank into a profound slumber.

THE SWEET RESTORER.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

"QUEEN AND HEROINE."

Hope Wayne kneeled on a cushion at the window-seat, and the loud jaut scattered the fragments of the drawing which Martin had given her. The night was soft and calm, and trees, not far away, entirely veiled her from observation.

She thought how different this window was from that other one at home, also kneeled at, where she was, and what a different girl it was she looked from it. She recalled that romantic, musing, solitary girl of Pinewood, who lived alone with a silent, grave old nurse, and the quiet years that passed there like the shadows and sunlight over the long vale. She remembered the dark, handsome face that seemed to belong to the passionate poems that girl had read, and the wild dreams she had dreamed in the still, old garden. In the hush of the summer twilight she heard again the rich voice that seemed to that other girl of Pinewood sweeter than the music of the verses, and felt the penetrating glance that had thrilled the heart of that girl until her red cheek was pale.

How well for that girl that the lips which made the verses had always whispered love. Because—because—

Hope turned herself from lightly leaning on the window-sill as the thought flashed in her mind, and stood erect, as if straightened by a sudden, sharp, almost imperceptible pain—because, had they done so, that other romantic, solitary girl at Pinewood—dear child! Hope's heart trembled for her—might have confessed that she loved!

How Wayne clenched her hands, and, all alone in her dim room, flushed, and then turned deadly pale, with a kind of cold splendor settled on her face, so that if Arthur Merlin could have seen her he would have called her Diana.

During the moment in which she thought these things, for it was scarcely more, the little white bits of paper floated and fell beneath her. She watched them as they disappeared, conscious of them, but not thinking of them. They looked like rose-leaves, they were so pure; and how silently they sank into the darkness!

And if she had confessed she loved, thought Hope, Hope could not help it; her mind was full of that one only, and her heart beat calmly under the pale splendor of her face—how would it be with that girl now? Might she not be standing in the twilight, watching her young hopes scattered like rose-leaves and disappearing in the dark?

She clasped her hands before her, and walked gently up and down the room. The full moon was rising, and the tender, tranquil light streamed through the trees into her chamber.

But, she thought, since she did not—since the young girl dreamed, perhaps only for a moment, perhaps as very vaguely of what might have been—she has given nothing, she has lost nothing. There was a pleasant joy which she remembers, far back in her childhood—oh! so pleasant! oh! so sunny, and flowery, and serene! A pleasant day, when something happened that never comes—that never can come—but once.

She stopped by the window, and looked out to see if she could yet discover any signs of the scattered paper. She strained her eyes down toward the ground. But it was entirely dark there. All the light was above—all the light was peaceful and melancholy, from the moon.

She laid her face in that moonlight upon the window-sill, and covered it with her hands. The low wind shook the leaves, and the trees waved softly as if they whispered to her. She heard them in her heart. She knew what they were saying. They sang to her of that other girl and her wishes, and struggles and prayers; and they recalled the lines that had sunk into the heart of that girl—the lines she had treasured in her perfumed secret cell—"And as you sit by the window shaded by the pine, listen to the resting, and let no one rouse you sometimes of what might have been."

Those came the brave, passionate, profuse weeping—the spring freshet of a woman's soul.

—She heard a low knock at the door. She removed her hands, and Fanny Newt entered. Hope sat down with her back to the window.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 430.

"I heard you come in," said Fanny, "and I did not hear you go out; so I knew you were still here. But I was afraid you would oversleep yourself, and miss the ball."

Hope replied that she had not been sleeping.

"Not sleeping, but sitting in the moonlight, all alone?" said Fanny. "How romantic!"

"Is it?"

"Yes, of course it is! Why, Mr. Dinks and I are romantic every evening. We like to come and sit in the moonlight, and listen to the music. What an agreeable fellow he is!" And Fanny tried to see Hope's face, which was entirely hidden.

"He is my cousin, you know," replied Hope.

"Oh yes, we all know that; and a dangerous relationship it is, too," said Fanny.

"How, dangerous?"

"Why, cousins are such privileged people. They have all the intimacy of brothers without the brotherly right of abusing us. In fact, a cousin is naturally half-way between a brother and a lover."

"Having neither brother nor lover," said Hope, quietly, "I stop half-way with the cousin in."

Fanny laughed her cold little laugh. "And you mean to go on the other half, I suppose?" said she.

"Why do you suppose so?" asked Hope.

"It is generally understood, I believe," said Fanny, "that Mr. Alfred Dinks will be added to the hymeneal alter his beautiful and accomplished cousin Miss Hope Wayne. At least, for further information inquire of Mrs. Madding Dinks." And Fanny laughed again.

"I was not aware of the honor that awaited me," replied Hope.

"Oh no! of course not. The family reasons, I suppose——"

"My mind is as much in the dark as my body," said Hope. "I really do not see the point of the joke."

"Still you don't seem very much surprised at it."

"Why should I be? I've not been very long at Saratoga, 'tis true, but it is quite necessary to plant a remark in the morning to reap a report in the evening. At ten o'clock in the morning ask in the Bowling Alley if your neighbor has observed that Edward has driven out Marie, and at five in the evening your partner at the ball will tell you they are engaged."

"Capital. 'Tis just so. They've had me engaged to I don't know how many times. I suppose they'll doom Alfred Dinks to me next. You won't be jealous, will you?"

"No," said Hope, "I'll congratulate him."

Fanny Nevt was wise, but simplicity is deeper than wisdom. She could not see Hope's face, for it was screened by her bonnet; but her voice betrayed nothing. Fanny, in fact, knew no more than when she came out. "Good-by, dear, à ce soir!" said she, as she sailed out of the room.

Hope lingered for some time at the window. Then she rang for candles, and sat down to write a letter.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the following curious advertisement and more curious information of the parties to it. He says: "I send you this advertisement twenty-one years ago this very day, and have kept it ever ever since.

"$97 REWARD.

"Stolen or Strayed from the Subscriber on tuesday Inlong last one Young bay either of an ordinary sqpuare with a Chein and dares pattiknow but either corty It may be posible that he took this at the slarme of the Bonit per If has in an worm Simms Every person that will bring him safe to me shall have the above Reward.

"June 30th, 1838."

"The above is a literal copy of the notice now in my possession, with the exception of the name of the subscriber who is at this time one of the richest and most esteemed farmers in our county. I have only to add that the horse referred to was a favorite saddle-horse of both himself and daughter, and delegate to Rhode Island Convention to formation of the Union.

"The 'dorty' boy advertised is now one of the 'upper ten-thou,' a gentleman of leisure living in the summer city, but spending his summers at Saratoga and other fashionable places of resort for the 'great and the rich,' and his wife one of Washington's."

Brandy is but four years old, but in a philosophical and childless way, the little fellow was much pestered by memories of the other night. He could get to sort of sleep. Every time he unscrewed his eyes attempting to open away, he looks out into the following soliloquy:

"Now, I wonder if I shall ever see anything more work for? There are pleasant things in this world to live for. I read inside them?" Then hiding his head upon his bread, he said, "Lord, the mosquitoes are biting me to-day real bad. Please don't make any more mosquitoes?" And he dropped off into what I know as a sound sleep to say Verily out of the mouths of babes shall we learn wisdom.

"My grandfather was for nine years a sheriff and jailer in the State of New York, and I have had a pretty large number of amusing anecdotes from his experience. Here is one. A notable thief of advanced years and numerous convictions was called upon to give evidence in a case of assault and battery. 'Now, prisoner, what have you to say to this charge, Johnson?' 'I believe I did.' 'Well, then, what have you to say in your defense?' 'Nothing in particular, only I believe I saw Smith strike Johnson.' My grandfather thought he would try. 'Jimmy,' said he, 'Jimmy, can you tell me how it was that you got off so easy?' 'Well, square fight and down, I believe I did it.'"

At a Bar supper in Milwaukie, Wisconsin, the following was among the regular toasts:

"The Press—Like a woman, it differed before which lies the most always, but in the end every man is compelled to say or swear that, after considering the question taken the body, and supplementary proceedings never fail to satisfy the judgment."

Mr. Cuttle having been successful in a million when General Bolivar was on the other side, asked the Count for news. General Bolivar was irritated by being beaten, opposed him vehemently, and said, in conclusion, he "hoped the general would not prove himself to be one of those bargain sharp morning prayer to 'Give us this day our daily bread'—with cents."

A YEAR AND SEVEN MARRIAGES.—Why is it better for a man to marry twice than once?—Because, having married a wife, and had a loss, he will marry one again!

TO LAURA.

DEAR LAURA! when you were a stirling young miss,
And I was your stylish swain,
Your smiles could exalt to the summit of bliss,
Your frowns could overwhelm me with pain:
You were dear to me then, love, but now you're my wife,
It is strange the fond fire has died out of life,
For when I am paying your bills every day,
You seem to get dearer and dearer!

"Gentlemen and ladies," said the showman, "here you have the magnificent painting of Daniel in the Lion's Den. Daniel can be easily distinguished from the lion by the superior intelligence of his countenance."

A DIFFICULT QUESTION.—How many rods will make one wise acre?

WE DON'T BELIEVE IT.—Last winter, it is said, a cow floated down the river on a pleasure cake, and caught such a cold that she has yielded nothing but ice cream ever since.

SINGULAR CONSEQUENCES OF FILIAL OBEDIENCE.—"How old are you, my dear?" was Jones to Brown's victory; replies Brown, "Twenty, and yet such a child! Why, I cannot leave off coats. A thai I never forget," replies Brown, "when I was ten years old, father patted me on the head, and said, 'Stop there!'—then he was away, and has not returned since. So I shall think it right in me to go on growing until he comes back."

COFFEE SUBSTITUTE SOAKS.—A certain official did not long since, in the pursuit of the advantageous, get into a position. The master of a merchant vessel, having need of his people about him, sent to him a bale of coffee. The servant placed it before his master. "What is this?" "A bale of coffee," which Captain A. asks your orders, sir." "Good," replied his master, "leave it here, and send the Captain in. that I never forget," replied the servant sagac." The Captain was not slow in dispatching some sugar to regale his coffee.

Justice consists in doing no injury to men; decency in giving them no offense.

Although men are accused of not knowing their weaknesses, yet, perhaps, no one knows their own strength.

IRRESISTIBLE.

She fled the new crazed
Which she so kindly made me;
Then smoothed with care my hair,
And bade me follow after pursuit:
What breathed my "gallop love,"
And said "it was so early!"
Which quite down she sheer
She cried, "Come home, dear, early!"

How happy then was I
With all I've described
I fortune could defy
While that I was admired!
We parted at the door,
Her last words I heard a sonnet!
"Don't forget—call once more,
And—a new spring bonnet!"

An Irish priest was traveling on a Friday from Enniskillen to Ballyshannon, at the latter town the coach passengers, only four in number, were to dine. At one end of this table was a joint of roast beef, and at the other a large fine fried sole. His reverence lodged himself as near to the latter as circumstances would fit. In fact over with one gentleman," when instantly a great fellow in the middle of the table across the table, and carrying the fish in two fresh half of it with the remark, "Bid me a bit of the fish, your reverence." "Is it to be bid but yourself?"

A young city swell, while waiting for the train at York, went into a tavern and cast about for some amusement. Looking around in the possession of the most money, he made the following offer: "I will drop money into a hat with my eyes shut in the room. The man who shall put the largest shall take the whole and treat the company." "I'll do it," said old farmer. The swell dropped in a shilling; the farmer followed with another. "Go on, and the swell dropping in another shilling, "I'll be d——d if the Yorkshireman; "take the whole and treat the company."

HOW TO LIVE.—He who can not live well to-day will not live well to-morrow. Time flies irrecoverably.

SUPERFICIAL KNOWLEDGE.—He that sips of many acts drinks of none.—Fuller.

A WORD TO HUSBANDS.—No money is better spent than what is laid out for domestic happiness. A man is pleased that his wife is dressed as well as other people, and the wife is pleased that this is so dressed. Johnson.

THE NEW SALUTE.

"Survey mankind from China to Peru,"
You'll scarcely find some form of "How d'ye do?"
Each land has its own fashion of address,
Have tongued but one, though 'twere but Dutch "Legate,"
Or Irish "Shillelagh," or Scotch "Lassie," cannot vow,
Or Hibernian "Erin go Bragh."

One of this Yankee land hath seen all creation,
Become acute to every form of salutation,
The last is still the worst, for what is duller
Than friends to ask, "How does your mercantile color?"
And this its answer, as they onward jog,
"I'll color pleasantly when I get my dog."

The individual who was accidentally injured by the discharge of his duty is still very low.

The moon seems the most unsteady of all celestial bodies, for it is continually changing its quarters.

GASTRONOMICAL.—An epicure once asserted that turkey required to make a meal of a chicken—himself and the chicken!

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRIDAY NIGHT, Saturday, June 25, 1859.

THE following letter from the General Merchandise at this port continue so large as to warrant some uneasiness, especially considering the unsettled state of Western country. Happily, the curtailment of the banks will prevent any unnecessary inflation from such a cause, and bring the country out of over-importation.

The whole aspect of the foreign trade has been checked for the present, and gold is accumulating here. The speed of the Persia, which arrived to-day, will bring out a million more specie by the steamer of the 30th, and the rate of exchange higher than they were last week. The Government will probably get $10,000,000 in money, which will be transferred again in the course of a fortnight. Exchange is dull at previous quotations.

Stocks continue very dull. There is no outside buying, and the business of the Board is confined to the Wall Street jobbers.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, June 25, 1859.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been very quiet for the principal kinds of breadstuffs, which have been freely offered at reduced prices. Cotton has been rather less attentive, and has favored buyers. Provisions have been less sought after. Hog Products have declined. Groceries have been in moderate request. Coffee, Sugar, and Molasses have been in better request, while Teas, Fish, Foreign Liquors, Fruit, Hides, Sole Leather, Naval Stores, Oils, Whisky, and Wool have been in less demand.——Hay, Hops, Seeds, and Tobacco have been pretty much as mentioned in our last report. Metals have been lightly dealt in.——The movements in Dry Goods have been limited. Really desirable styles, however, have been stiffly held. The week's imports of value of Foreign Dry Goods was $3,340,847, against $649,929 same week last year. Imports since January 1, $80,503,405, against $71,569,762 same time last year. The movements in other commodities have not been characterized by any remarkable changes.——We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Standard Super State Flour, per barrel	$5 75	@ 6 05
Extra State	6 10	@ 6 30
Superfine Western	5 60	@ 5 80
Extra Western	6 30	@ 6 60
Extra Michigan	6 85	@ 7 30
Superfine Genesee	7 40	@ 7 90
Superfine Fine Flour	4 90	@ 5 40
Extra City Brands	7 00	@ 7 50
White Michigan Wheat, per bushel	1 50	@ 1 70
Prime Genesee Wheat	1 65	@ 1 90
Red Western Wheat	1 40	@ 1 51
Mixed Western	1 40	@ 1 50
Choice Canada Spring	87	@ 1 05
Yellow Corn	0 70	@ 0 72
Rye	0 60	@ 0 62
Barley	0 60	@ 0 65
Western	0 40	@ 0 45
Canada Oats	0 45	@ 0 47
Southern Oats	41	@ 44
Mess Pork, per barrel, per prime	15 11	@ 15 12
New Mess Pork, per barrel	16 25
Old Prime	13 75
Country Mess Beef	9 00	@ 9 25
Hams, per pound	11	@ 11
Shoulders	6½	@ 6½
Lard	10	@ 10½
Fair to Prime State Butter, new	14	@ 16
Choice Do.	17	@ 18
Choice Do. do.	19	@ 20
Cheese, per 100 pounds	8 75	@ 9 00
Rio Coffee, per pound	10½	@ 11
New Orleans Sugar	5½	@ 7
Havana Sugar, Nos. 10 to 12, per gallon	6	@ 6
Hymen Teas, per pound	23	@ 35
Oolong Teas	25	@ 37
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	26	@ 27
Sugar Cane Do. do.	30	@ 32
Hay, Shipping lots, per 100 pounds	70	@ 80
Timothy Seed	2 50	@ 2 75
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds	2 85	@ 3 87
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	0 40	@ 0 41
Tar, per barrel	2 00	@ 2 50

The Low Freight Markets have been without any tendency for Boreas, the available supply of which, though not large, is sufficient for the demand. Coastwise Freights have been quiet, and Foreign unchanged. The subjoined Quotations were also in excess of the demand, and prices tended downward. The Arrivals of Wool Coastwise for the week were 1068, generally large, in good condition. Prices unchanged. Hops from Bremen and Antwerp, to-day, 6,841; the supply equal to the demand, except for good Spring Lambs, for which there was a good inquiry.——Boring, receipts for week, 6215 ; demand shrinking and prices declining. The Freight Averages at the Produce Market Exchange each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending June 18.	Week ending June 25.
Beeves	1,277	1,277
Cows and Calves	1,100	1,100
Veal Calves	1,170	1,069
Sheep and Lambs	7,000	6,841
Swine	7,186	6,215

The Cattle Markets according to the arrival of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Beeves, 1st qlty Beeves, per pound	$ 71 @	$ 111
Fair to very good Hitch Cows, per head	35 00 @	60 00
Veal Calves, per pound	5 @	6½
Sheep and Lambs, per head	3 00 @	6 50
Do. per pound	5 @	6½
Dressed	7½ @	8
Dressed Veal	8 @	9
Dressed Hogs, cash	6 @	7 75

The Country Produce Markets have been very well supplied with most Fruit and Vegetables, the quality of which has been good.——Stocks of Poultry and Game have been limited, yet the inquiry has been pretty full.

Eggs have advanced slightly, but have not been in sufficient supply.

WHOLESALE PRICES ADJUSTED BY PRODUCERS AT WASH-INGTON MARKET.

Strawberries, per 100 baskets	$1 50	@ 5 00
Cherries, per pound	12	@ 20
Gooseberries, per quart	1 25	@ 2 00
Raspberries, per 100 baskets	12 50	@ 15 00
Blackberries, per quart	10	@ 12
Huckleberries, per quart	11	@ 12
Peaches, per bushel	1 50	@ 2 00
Apples, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Potatoes, old, per barrel	1 00	@ 2 50
Potatoes, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Onions, new, per 100 bunches	2 75	@ 3 00
Onions, old, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Turnips, per basket	1 00	@ 1 25
Beets, per 100 bunches	37	@ 50
Beets, per dozen bunches	50	@ 75
Carrots, per bushel	50	@ 75
Carrots, per dozen bunches	37½	@ 50
Cabbage, per 100 heads	2 00	@ 3 00
Cauliflower, per dozen heads	1 00	@ 1 50
Green Beans, per barrel	2 00	@ 4 00
Green Peas, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Cucumbers, per 100	2 00	@ 2 00
Tomatoes, per bushel	1 75	@ 2 00
Cauliflowers, per 100	1 50	@ 2 00
Squashes, per 100 heads	50	@ 75
Squashes, per basket	75	@ 87
Egg Plants, per dozen	50	@ 75
Eggs, N. Y. and N. J., per dozen	16	@ 18
Eggs, Southern	14	@ 15
Geese, Spring, each	1 00	@ 1 25
Turkeys, per pound	12	@ 15
Ducks, per pair, Spring	1 00	@ 1 25
Pigeons, per dozen	1 37	@ 1 50
Wild Pigeons	25	@ 37

ADVERTISEMENTS.

!!! Death to all Vermin !!!

—IT IS TRULY WONDERFUL WITH WHAT CERTAINTY Rats, Roaches, Mice, Moles, Ground Mice, Bedbugs, Ants, Flies, Mosquitoes, Insects, Crickets on Animals, in short every species of Vermin, are utterly destroyed

BY

"Costar's" Rat, Roach, &c., Exterminator.
"Costar's" Bed-Bug Exterminator.
"Costar's" Electric Powder, for Insects, &c.

THE

(only infallible remedies known.)

Principal Depot 419 Broadway, New York.
All Wholesale Druggists in New York are Agents.
Wholesale Agents in all the large cities.
Druggists and Dealers every where sell them.
18,000 Boxes sold per week in N. Y. alone.

!!! BEWARE!!! of spurious imitations. Examine every Box, Bottle, or Flask, and take nothing but "Costar's."

For $1.00 Boxes can be sent by mail, sufficient to destroy the Vermin on any premises.

For $5.00 Sample Packages (1 doz.) by Express to any address.

For Agencies, send for Circular, Terms, &c.

The Oriental Fruit Paste, or Aromatic Jelly of Figs and Senna,

Combines all the laxative properties of pure extract of Senna, in a delicious aqua-cented paste. In the safest and most agreeable remedy for Constipation of the Bowels and all irregularities caused by neglect of nature, and is the most pleasant to take. Sold by all Druggists.

J. W. HORCORES & CO., 99 Wholesale Agents,
21 Fulton Street, N. Y.

VALUABLE PREPARATION FOR THE HAIR.

We presume that any commendation of Downer's Cocoaine is superfluous, as it speaks for itself. As a toilet article, it has ever obtained so wide spread and so enviable a reputation, that it is now a household term, so has this compound of Cocoa-Nut Oil and other delightful articles. The proprietors have hundreds of letters in their scrap-book testifying to the efficacy of this preparation, but the well known reputation of the proprietors is sufficient guaranty of its quality.—Boston Atlas & Bee.

EASTMANS'

White Mountain Guide-Book.

Ross & Tousey, Wholesale Agents, N. Y.

The Best is always Cheapest.

ROTHE'S

New and Improved Hair Dye.

From the recipe of a celebrated German Chemist, gives a natural color, is perfectly safe and always gives entire satisfaction. Ample testimonials, and pamphlets free on application. Sold by druggists of this City and others. Warranted the best Hair Dye in the market. Office 50 Ann Street.

J. W. HORCROSS & CO., 99 Fulton Street, N. Y.

JULES HAUEL'S BAU ATHENIENNE,

Or, the most renovating, cooling and beautifying cosmetic, as well as beautifying properties; it not only prevents the hair from falling or turning gray, but will cause a new growth, restore it to its original life-color, and give it that luxuriant appearance so much to be desired. Sold by all Druggists, and by Jules Hauel & Co., No. 16 Chambers Street, Philadelphia.

Designed for the use of the Metropolitan Professions and the Fanciful, possessing the choicest and purest properties which belong to an Old and Pure Gin. Put up in quart bottles, and sold by all genuine Druggists.

A. M. BININGER & CO.,
(Established in 1778.) SOLE PROPRIETORS,
No. 523 Broadway, N. Y.

COZZENS'

West Point Hotel

NOW OPEN.

LA TOURETTE HOUSE,

Berger Place, Paterson, N. J.

Wesley W. Ellis late of the Lafarge House, Prop'tor.

This fashionable Summer Hotel is beautifully situated on the banks of the Erie Canal, opposite Staten Island. Excellent Bathing, Boating, Fishing, and Driving in the immediate vicinity. Gentlemen with their families visiting New York, will find this House as convenient as a hotel in town, as it takes no longer time quite often and by Steamboat to reach it, than to go from South Ferry to Union Square.

TRENTON FALLS.

This most picturesque of the WATER FALLS OF AMERICA can now be reached at a small expense from Utica by Railroad.

N. B.—Three trains a day.

LAKE HOPATCONG HOUSE AT LAKE HOPATCONG, NOW OPEN.

Gentlemen with their families, and single gentlemen can make arrangements for Summer Board at reasonable rates. The House is one of the most comfortable and GOOD FISHING, and that it has recently been put in perfection; also, GOOD BATHING. It is to-one-half hours' ride from New York, by Morris and Essex Railroad to Drakeville station, where stages will be in waiting to convey passengers to the House, a distance of three miles. Post Office address—Drakeville, Morris county, N. J.

H. D. DAVIS.

CONGRESS HALL,

Saratoga Springs.

This well-kept and fashionable HOTEL IS NOW OPEN for the Season. Apartments can be engaged by addressing the Proprietors.

HAYHORN & McMICHAEL.

Long Branch, N. J.

Howland's Hotel,

is

Now Open for the Season.

CHARLES ISLAND HOUSE

Milford, Conn.,

NOW OPEN.

W. H. BURROUGHS, PROPRIETOR,

Late Proprietor of the Irving and Astor Houses

New York City.

The Knight's Soliloquy.

TRANSLATED FROM THE SPANISH OF PEDRO DE CASTRO Y ANAYA.

"I would not change my faith in them
For all the world holds!"—
'Twas thus, with an enthusiast's valor,
The young Orlando cried.

You think he spoke of ladies' fair,
Whom he'd been trying while—
But he spoke, sir, of these talisman rare,
That matchless Extract are!

For cheapness, durability,
For texture, taste, and style,
Compare their power with other goods
And at the difference smile!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

The New Books.

MICHELET'S GREAT WORK, LOVE (L'AMOUR), translated from the French. Price $1.00.
DR. PALMER'S NEW BOOK, THE NEW and THE OLD. Illustrated. Price $1.25.
Mr. Brace's BOOK, A BACHELOR'S STORY. A delightful Summer Volume. Price $1.00.
Mr. Budens's Spicy Work, THE VAGABOND. Sketches of Society. &c. Price $1.00.
Any book sent by mail, POST-PAID, on receipt of price, by RUFUS DAWES, Publisher,
No. 129 Nassau St., New York.

Ladies', Children's, and Infants' Summer Clothing, at

GENIN'S BAZAAR.

CHILDREN'S BLOUSES,
MARSEILLES BAGLANS,
LADIES' PRETTY FRILLED MUSLIN ROBES,
RICH EMBROIDERED LAWN ROBES,
LADIES' BATHING DRESSES,
MISSES' MUSLIN DRESSES,
BOYS' MARSEILLES PANTS,
LADIES' and INFANTS' SUMMER CLOTHING.

Dress-making in all its branches, in greater variety than can be found elsewhere in the City.

GENIN'S BAZAAR, 513 Broadway.

Masser's 5 Minute

ICE CREAM FREEZERS,

As Improved for 1859.

With Stamped Iron Covers and Bottoms—Tinned.

The only Freezer known which is constructed on true scientific principles.

The Cheapest, Best, and most Economical, requiring no ice and less than any other, being at the same time the most durable in structure, and most certain in its operations.

Sole Agents for the United States,

E. KETCHAM & CO.,

Manufacturers of Japanned and Furnished Tin Ware, 189 Pearl Street, New York.

E. A. BROOKS.

575 Broadway—150 Fulton Street.

A splendid Assortment of Ladies', Gentlemen's, and Children's Boots, Shoes, and Gaiters.

FINKLE & LYON'S

SEWING MACHINES,

for Family Use, Tailoring Purposes, Saddlery, &c. Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other machine in market, or money refunded. Agents wanted.

503 BROADWAY,

Next to the St. Nicholas Hotel.

Curtis' Cure for Baldness.

This remedy is reliable; contains no oil, lead, or sulphur; it has been tested in Boston, Providence, and the Eastern States. J. M. CURTIS, Proprietor, Providence, and by E. M. Dolge, 121 Bowery; J. & J. Cod-dington, 756 Broadway; W. H. Lewis, 507 Greenwich street; John Jones, 122 Houston Street, New York; Mrs. Hayes, 274 Atlantic street, Brooklyn & Co., Brooklyn; P. Schuyler, Jersey City; L. T. Mercer, Newark.

BARNES'S FARE, Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row, And all Druggists. General Agents.

Smith & Wesson's Seven-Shooter.

J. W. STORRS, Agent.

121 Chambers Street, N. Y.

THIS PISTOL is the lightest one in the world that has force; weight only ten ounces; is loaded quicker than other pistols are capped; is sure fire under all circumstances. No liability to miss fire, or stop ammunition by allowing it to remain loaded any length of time. It is so simple in its construction that it is not liable to get out of order. Is perfectly safe to carry. The cylinder holds seven cartridges, and no other metallic guards.

Torrey's New 4 Minute Freezers!!!

These highly popular machines are offered to the public with the fullest assurance of their being not only the cheapest, but the simplest and quickest Freezers in use,—producing cream of that smooth and light consistency heretofore only to be obtained of the best confectioners.

They can be had of the house-furnishing dealers, and hard-ware stores generally, at the following prices:

2 quarts..... $2 50 | 6 quarts..... $5 00
3 quarts..... 3 00 | 14 quarts..... 7 50
4 quarts..... 4 00 | 20 quarts..... 10 00

And at wholesale of the manufacturer,

E. P. TORREY, No. 9 Platt Street,
New York.

$32 50 5000 AGENTS WANTED—To sell a new invention. Three hours made over $32 profit on one,—better than all other similar agencies. Send four stamps and get full particulars, &c., to
EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

$32 50 ASHLAND INST. and PER QUARTER } Mountains, Baltimore, Students received any time. Address the Principal, REV. D. F. JOY, A.M., Ashland, N. Y., or D. C. HUBBARD, Esq., 50 Broadway.

Inventors, look to your Interests!!

HOW TO GET A PATENT, OR THE INVENTOR'S INSTRUCTOR. New edition. Sent by Return Post, for 6 cents, or two three cent stamps. By O. WILLIAMS AND WILSON, 363 Broadway, New York.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.
DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.
DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.

The Remedy of the Times.
The Remedy of the Age.
The Remedy of the Day.

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma,
Bronchitis, Whooping Cough, Croup,
Inflammation of the Throat, Lungs, and Chest,
Influenza and Consumption, are all cured by this incomparable remedy.

Beware of Counterfeits, and purchase only that having the written signature of "I. BUTTS, M. D." in blue, on the printed one of the Proprietors, SETH W. FOWLE & CO., 18 Tremont Row, Boston, on the outside wrapper.

BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.
BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.
BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.

Sold everywhere.

Oratorios, Complete, at 75 cents Each.

New and Elegant Octavo edition of Handel's Oratorio, "THE MESSIAH," print of the Sacred Scriptures, only $1 25. Also, Haydn's "CREATION" at the same very low price.

Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

TIFFANY & CO., Importers & Manufacturers, No. 550 Broadway, New York, and Nos. 15 and 16 Rue Richelieu, No. 79, Paris,

DIAMONDS, AND OTHER PRECIOUS STONES.
FINE JEWELLERY. WATCHES.
SILVER WARE, PLATED WARE, TABLE CUTLERY.
CLOCKS, BRONZES, FANCY ARTICLES.
DRESSING CASES, WORK-BOXES, JEWEL-BOXES, DESKS, &c.

And many other Articles of Art and Luxury.

The only Agents in the United States for the sale of Chas. Frodsham's Watches, whose superiority over any other market known is universally and unequivocally established.

Every article is marked in plain figures the Lowest Price at which it will be sold.

We employ no Runners, and arrange an invitation to inspect our Stock, assuring all that a call will incur not the least obligation to purchase.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

New Styles.
From $50 to $125.

SINGER'S FAMILY MACHINE, the price of which is only $50, is a light and elegantly decorated Machine, capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

SINGER'S STANDARD MACHINES for manufacturing purposes are well known to be without an equal, wherever they have been introduced. Much has recently been published in regard to various stitches made by Sewing Machines. Singer's Machines make the only stitch ever invented, and do it in the best style. A great discount is made to tailors.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

Something New.

Agents wanted, to go into a New and Honorable Business, which will pay from $15 to $20 weekly.

No Humbug.

Satisfaction guaranteed. Send stamp for particulars, which are free.

S. M. MYRICK & CO., Lynn Mass.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency opposite Patent Office. Solicitors of Patents Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

PESSE & LUBIN'S, PERFUMERY, from every flower that breathes a fragrance.

SWEET SCENTS THE FLOWER OF THE DAY KISS-ME-QUICK FRANGIPANNI

And a Thousand others

Sold by all Druggists in every city.

Wholesale Agents

J. PHILLIPS, 87 Pearl St. New York.

FIREWORKS.

Hadfield's Firework Agency.

Removed from the Old Stand, corner of Spruce and William, to

No. 24 John Street,

Between Broadway and Nassau Streets.

Pellits and Family Exhibitions furnished.

All works warranted.

GEORGE FAIRBAIRN, Agent.

PROTESTANT FRENCH INSTITUTE for YOUNG GENTLEMEN, in New York, No. 46 East 14th Street, near Madison Park. Boarding and Day School, CLASSICAL and COMMERCIAL. This institution will be re-opened on the 15th of September. It presents a thorough course of instruction in all its branches, including the Spanish and German languages. The French is the language of the school. Comfortable arrangements for a limited number of pupils. Physicians, with testimonials, the names of his pupils and of their parents to whom he has given advice, &c., in hand.

Prof. ELIE CHARLIER, Director.

References: Paris, Rev. Dr. F. Monod.
Geneva, Rev. Dr. Merle d'Aubigné.
Washington, Hon. Theodore Cuyler, Secretary of State.
Boston, Prof. A. Agassiz.
Princeton, Prof. A. Guyot.
New York, Rev. King, President of Columbia College.
Rev. Dr. L. Ferris, Chancellor of the N. Y. University.
Rev. Dr. J. Hall.
Rev. Dr. E. Hawks.

Excelsior Fireworks.

Funston & Scofield,

General Agents,

62 John Street.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET "PAID FOR IT."—Take an Agency for our Publications. The terms are the best ever known. Send stamp for circular. EVERY FAMILY will be glad to obtain some of them. For particulars address, TUTTLE, MOREHOUSE & TAYLOR, No. 285 Broadway, New York.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

in Guano. The Subscriber has leased Duck Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable Guano Deposit ever discovered. It is now for sale in bulk and retail at less than two thirds the prices of Peruvian. Apply to the Agent and editor C. S. MACKAY, at the American Guano Co., 61 William Street, New York.

EMPLOYMENT

For 100 More ENERGETIC YOUNG MEN,

Who are willing to work with their heads or their hands, to sell a USEFUL HISTORICAL WORK, which is universally admired, and which sells at sight. Address, with stamp, enclosed to their address, A. M. MILLER, Box 1143, New York City. Also, a few Canvassers wanted.

Charles Grobe's New Method

FOR THE

PIANO FORTE.

Mr. Grobe is so well known, that any remarks as to his qualifications would be superfluous. Suffice it to say, that his New and Improved Method is one of the elementary teaching superior to any other. It is easily understood by the pupil, and leads to a thorough and ripe experience of the subject. It is divested of every particle of dryness and complicated, nothing buried. The first lessons are full, pleasant, and graded scales to the desired end. The dryness so often complained of in works of instruction is altogether avoided, and the Professors believe it to be the most simple, clear, progressive, and thorough system of instruction extant. The work contains ten engraved figures, illustrating the different positions of the hands and fingers. It is entirely new and unusually beautiful and distinct. The paper is white and strong, and the binding handsome. Price $3 00; in Cloth, $3 50. Copies sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price. Liberal terms to the trade. A discount allowed to Teachers and Schools.

FIRTH, POND & CO., 547 Broadway, New York.

LEA & WALKER, Philadelphia.

LECTURES FOR 1859—60.—TO MANAGERS OF YOUNG MEN'S ASSOCIATIONS, LYCEUMS, &c. &c.

As the Subscriber is desirous of soon making his arrangements for the season, he would be obliged by his having the next Autumn and Winter season, 1859-60, he respectfully requests the Committees to address him as soon as may be convenient.

PARK BENJAMIN, 74 West 17th Street, New York. June 15, 1859.

Lord Brad's Worcestershire Sauce.

Is the First Condiment in the World for all purposes.

ASK FOR, and HAVE ONLY LORD BRAD'S.

Last at every Hotel, and sold by all Grocers and Italian Warehousemen.

Wholesale and for Exportation, by

JONATHAN JONES & CO.,
46 Broad Street, New York.

Sold Retail by the Grocer and Fruit House. Half Pints, 50 cents per bottle; Pints, 50 cents per bottle.

To Teachers.

My Correspondents are requested to address me, hereafter, at the "Care of HARPER & BROTHERS, New York City." School Catalogues and Circulars, Notices of Schools, Applications for Schools, &c., are solicited.

MARCUS WILLSON.

LLOYD'S CHART OF THE WAR IN EUROPE.

Finely colored, with separate DIAGRAMS of NAPOLEON III. and his GENERALS, EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA, KING OF SARDINIA, TWO LARGE MAPS, THE EUROPEAN BATTLE-FIELDS, NAMES, AGES, &c., of EUROPEAN SOVEREIGNS, and a Complete Table of Distances. Mounted for sale, pleases all. Specimens mailed, post-paid, for 25 cents.

H. H. LLOYD & Co. No. 548 Broadway, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,

NATURE'S TRUE RESTORATIVE.

We take much pleasure in reminding our numerous friends that at this season of the year, when sudden and great changes of climate are to be met with, purification, and prolific in the development of disease, that they should always be careful to procure the only genuine SARSAPARILLA, which purifies the blood, expels humors, and vitality, and all cutaneous and eruptive diseases. Prepared by

A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 141 William St.

Dr. S. P. Townsend's Sarsaparilla.

ONLY SARSAPARILLA which will effectually eradicate disease from the system, restore a healthy action to the system, cleanse the stomach, regulate the bowels,

AND PURIFY THE BLOOD.

Be very careful to purchase only which has

DR. "JAMES R. CHILTON'S"

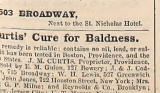
Certificate on the outside wrapper of each bottle.

Principal Depôt 289 Broadway, New York.

361 BROADWAY 539

BRIDAL SUITE.

Tucker's Heaven, Jewellers, and Miscellaneous House. Are all reliable.



THIS NEW AND ELEGANT ESTABLISHMENT is delicately dedicated to

Mountain COFFEES,

For sale by COUMAS & CO. 277 Broadway, Corner of Murray Street.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 99 to 99 pages—and the price has been one hundred more reading than any other in the country.

A Splendid Number.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR JULY.

Unquestionably it is the best sustained work of the kind in the language; that is to say, in the world. The Monthly Record comes from the Editor's Table even above price. The present number is equal to any yet issued, and that is saying much. Its variety and adaptability to the wants of the general reader deserve and secure success.—Albany Evening Journal.

We must refer to terms of eulogy in the high tone and varied excellence of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, a Journal with a monthly circulation of 150,000 copies, and whose pages are to be found some of the choicest light literature of the day. Every number of the work has an evidence of the American people, and the popularity it has acquired is the best proof. Number completes the 144 pages of instructive matter, appropriately illustrated with 99 engravings, and is a most valuable work.—Boston Courier.

We have received more pleasure from this work than with the best features of the daily journal. It has great power in the creation of a healthful taste, and is a most potent incentive.—Thomas's Guide to American Literature, London, 1859.

The moral tone of this magazine, its soundness on religious and on social questions, its delicacy, its discriminating the great influence of a popular periodical upon the character of society, and more particularly upon the feelings and plastic mind of youth, have discharged their high duty in a manner which has secured the confidence of the fatherly and tutor. Nothing immoral, nothing indelicate, nothing that can bring a blush to the cheek of modesty, will ever be found in its pages, and such conduct has a claim to appear in Harper.—Baltimore American.

The following is the table of contents of this monthly publication that gives us profound satisfaction. It is not necessary to say that the oldest paper, both in point of excellence and even merit.—Nashville Christian Advocate.

We confess ourselves surprised anew every month with the abundance and variety of entertaining matter which it contains. It probably is one of the literary marvels of the age.—Boston Advertiser.

An excellent and interesting information, entertaining literature, innocent gratification, and refined inspiration, are always to be comprehended in a like number of popular periodicals.—Boston Post.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE is emphatically, the American periodical. Sound in religious principle, correct in politics, elegant in taste, varied in matter, overwhelming in cheapness, and the most widely circulated. It is a sturdy common sense, it has no rival. Nor will it have one.—New Orleans Christian Advocate.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year..... $3 00
Two Copies for One Year..... 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year each..... 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, One Year..... 5 00

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" is one cent a No. when paid quarterly in advance. The Postage is Thirty cents per Quarter.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER,

AT THE BEST RATES.

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S NEW STORY, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," splendidly illustrated by Mr. Marcus Stone, appears in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" of May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

GOV. WILLIAM CURTIS NOYES'S Illustrated Civil Service Lectures, delivered before the Harper Brothers, are commenced in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for April 9.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks..... $1 00
One Copy for One Year..... 2 50
One Copy for Two Years..... 4 00
Five Copies for One Year..... 10 00
Twelve Copies for One Year..... 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year..... 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty-five Subscribers.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING—Fifty Cents a Line.

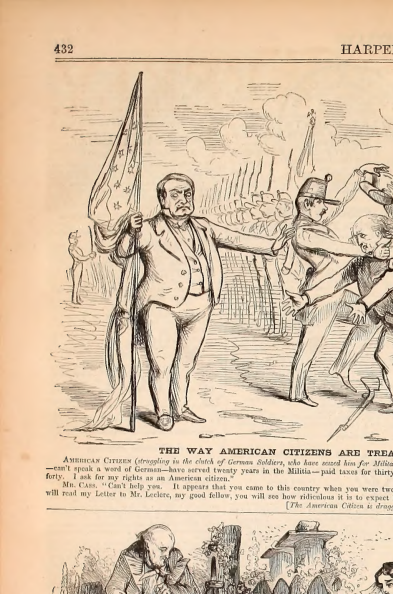
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to advertise for three months or longer.

Advertisements appearing in the City of New York wishing "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, and printed on their names and numbers, with the subscription money, to the Office, will please say so.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.



THE WAY AMERICAN CITIZENS ARE TREATED ABROAD.

AMERICAN CITIZEN (struggling in the clutch of German Soldiery, who have seized him for Military Service). "Help! help! I'm an American citizen —can't speak a word of German—have served twenty years in the Militia—paid taxes for thirty years—and done my duty: to the United States for forty. I ask for my rights as an American citizen."

MR. CASS. "Can't help you. It appears that you came to this country when you were two months old, having been born in Austria. If you will read my Letter to Mr. Leclerc, my good fellow, you will see how ridiculous it is to expect help from me!"

[The American Citizen is dragged off to serve in the Austrian Army against Italy.]

THE FOURTH JULY.

YOUNG AMERICA. "Now, Sissy, I'm Napoleon, and my dog Growler's Austria. Look out, Growler! Fire!"

DELANO
Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Co.
Incorporated Jan. 1859.—Capital $125,000

MANUFACTURERS OF ALL KINDS OF
Life-Preserving Garments
FOR ORDINARY WEAR,
Safety Bathing Dresses,
Children's Swimming Jackets, &c. &c.

OFFICE and SALESROOM, 256 BROADWAY, (Opposite City Hall) NEW YORK.

DR. J. D. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

With such universal distress and suffering as saddens the female life, a really good Medicine must be their best friend. The numerous cases of Irregularities, Obstructions, Discharges, Ulcerations, Falling Wombs, Leucorrhœa, &c., constantly effected by Dr. Marchisi's Catholicon, gives it a reputation and popularity never obtained by any other article. It does what it promises, and can be relied upon. When every thing has been tried, the Catholicon should be resorted to, even after years of fruitless search, the Catholicon has restored health to the patient and gladness to the female. It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the female sex, and should never be dispensed with previous to and after confinement. Numerous letters testify that it is

NEVER TAKEN WITHOUT BENEFIT.

Daughters, Wives and Mothers! this medicine will cure you. It has been long and favorably known. As an evidence of its efficacy, the money will be refunded where results are not as indicated. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered at the counter gratis. Do not confound Dr. Marchisi with any other name. It can be had in most every town. If not found, it can be sent by express. Price $1 per bottle, or 4 bottles for $5. Notice Removal. Address,

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,
15 and 16 PARK ROW, N. Y.

GIFTS.
SPLENDID GIFTS
TO
Purchasers of Books,
THE ORIGINAL
AND
THE ONLY
Gift Book Enterprize
Established in 1854.
HEAD QUARTERS
FOR THE
UNITED STATES
AT THE
PUBLISHING HOUSE
OF
G. G. EVANS,
439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE.

Since I originated the Gift Book Enterprize, I have repeatedly called the attention of the public to my large stock and liberal offers, to which they have always warmly responded. I can now, with more satisfaction than ever, call attention to my largely increased inducements to purchasers. Being very favorably engaged in publishing, I exchange my own publications for those of other houses, and am enabled to procure all my books at the original cost of making, and thus can and do supply the majority of the other houses engaged in the Gift Book Trade, with their books, cheaper than they can procure them from other publishers. I can also, by my facilities, supply Jewelry, Watches and Jewelry, at the very lowest rates than they can buy them from the manufacturers.

Having such an advantage in buying, I can insure my customers better Gifts with their Books than any other house, and can give my Agents a larger remuneration. A valuable Gift will be delivered with each Book at the time of sale. Gifts worth $500 at the lowest wholesale prices, will be impartially distributed with every $1,000 worth of Books sold.

Send for a Catalogue, which will be mailed free to any address, containing the most valuable Selection of Standard productions in Literature, Philosophy, History, Biography, Travels, Poetry, Sermons, and all the favorite works of Fiction and Romance, and every other department of Literature. Also, Bibles, Prayer Books, &c. Send for it, for if you don't wish to purchase a Book, you will obtain a very valuable Book for reference, as it contains all the desirable books in print, and will suit you nothing.

Particular attention is requested to the List of my Publications, which will be found in the latter part of my Classified Catalogue. It contains a large number of discovery popular works, by various authors, among which are all of T. S. Arthur's best works, well known as a moral, instructive and pleasing author, interesting Biographies, Travels, &c.

CLASSIFICATION OF BOOKS.

AGRICULTURAL.—This department embraces all standard works upon general Agriculture, Cotton Planting, Flowers, Gardening, Farm Implements, Horses, Sheep, Cattle, Bees, &c., &c.

ALBUMS.—Ladies's great variety; Floral, Cap Quarto, Royal Cap, Demy Quarto, Autograph, &c.

ANNUALS.—A large and elegant assortment.

BIBLES.—An splendid assortment of Pocket, Pew and Family Bibles, in every style, from $1 to $50.

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.—A complete assortment, in every form and at all prices.

HYMN BOOKS.—As used by the different denominations.

BIOGRAPHICAL.—Works of Irving, Headley, Wyeth, Sparks, Bancroft, and every other standard Author.

BOTANICAL.—By Comstock, Grey, Lincoln, Darlington, &c.

COOKERY.—Receipt and Cook Books, by Mrs. Hale, Leslie, Widdifield, McKenzie, &c.

GERMAN.—Standard German Literature.

DICTIONARIES.—Webster's, English, French, German, Spanish, Latin, Greek, Italian, &c.

CYCLOPEDIAS.—All the standard authors.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—The latest and most approved School and other Geographies, Maps, and Teachers' Guides.

GEOLOGY.—The works of Hugh Miller, Harris, Hitchcock, Agassiz, Silliman, &c.

HISTORICAL.—By Prescott, Irving, Bancroft, Robertson, Hume, Gibbon, Lingard, Sparks, and others.

HUMOROUS.—Embracing a World of Fun.

JUVENILE.—Every description of Illustrated Books for Children.

LAW AND MEDICINE.—The Standard Works of those professions.

MECHANICAL AND SCIENTIFIC.—The most approved works on Mechanics, Architecture, and the latest Sciences.

POETRY.—English and American. Octavo and Library editions of the Standard Poets: Pocket and Cabinet editions, plain and illustrated, bound in every style to suit the taste of purchasers.

WORKS OF FICTION.—By Scott, Irving, Cooper, Dickens, and all the approved writers.

SCHOOL AND CLASSICAL.

TRAVELS AND ADVENTURES.

GAMES, SPORTS AND PASTIMES.

RELIGIOUS, BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

MUSICAL AND GLEE BOOKS.

ODD FELLOWSHIP AND FREE MASONRY.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Our Miscellaneous Department embraces every thing not included in the above classifications, of an interesting or instructive character, that is in print.

The Gifts consist of Gold and Silver Watches, Gold Chains, Ladies' splendid black and gold Jet Dress Pins, Porte Fleur Fleurs, Silver plated Wares, early Sets of Cameos, Mosaic, Florentine, Pearl, Opal, Turquoise, and Lava Jewelry, Gold Lockets, Pencils and Pens, Ladies' Neck and Chatelaine Chains, Gentlemen Studs and Sleeve Buttons, Pocket Knives, Portemonaies, and a thousand varieties of Gifts of use and value.

Agents Wanted Everywhere.

To Agents I can give more liberal inducements than can be offered by any other house. In addition to larger remuneration, it is much easier to get subscribers for my enterprize than for any other.

The peculiar advantages are—

A Larger Stock and more facilities to selling.

A Better Assortment and Quality of Gifts.

A more Liberal and Judicious Distribution in Filling Orders.

By selling as Agents for me,

Persons wishing a valuable Library can procure it gratis.

Those seeking an easy method of earning a lively bonâ can find it. Any one desiring a good Watch can obtain it.

For full particulars send for a Catalogue.

My large capital, together with my long experience in the business and consequent familiarity with all its details, gives me an almost incalculable advantage over all other parties.

All I ask is a trial. Send me an order, and you will be convinced that there is no exaggeration.

DO NOT FORGET TO SEND FOR A CATALOGUE.

Persons visiting the city, are requested to call and examine for themselves.

G. G. EVANS'
HEAD-QUARTERS,
439 CHESTNUT STREET,
Philadelphia, Pa.

BRANCH STORE, 45 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.

Special Notice to Book Buyers.

As there are parties of doubtful responsibility advertising Gift concerns, and some are making many large promises, under fictitious names, without the intention of fulfilling them, buying, through the piratical system of my enterprize, to deceive and plunder the public, I strict caution purchasers to be on their guard against them. And if any are deceived and cheated by them, they should not be so unjust as to condemn me and my Gift Book Trade, as they are base imitators of an enterprize that has cost me an immense amount of time and money to place in the position which it now occupies, commanding an extensive and increasing trade, approved and endorsed, with the most entire confidence and satisfaction, by the leading Publishing Houses in the Union, whose letters of approval and endorsement are in my possession, and will be produced and shown at any time with the greatest pleasure.

G. G. EVANS.

ARTHUR'S
PATENT SELF-SEALING
Fruit Cans & Jars,

"These celebrated Cans and Jars" are the editor of the Lady's Book, "the fruit introduced, and, by all odds, the best, are decidedly coming into general use. Thousands of housekeepers, who have formerly used preserved fruit by other Cans and Jars, and who lost more or less of their fruit in consequence, are glad to learn that they have found a perfect article.

They are made of Tin, Glass, and Earthenware.

ARTHUR, EVANS & GILROY,
Manufacturers under the Patent,
Nos. 319 and 319 ½ Arch St., Philadelphia.

Also, manufacturers under the Patent, for the United States, of the celebrated "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE & TEA-POTS.

BOOKS! BOOKS!

BLAKEMAN & MASON,
420 Broadway, Cor. Spring St.,
New York,
PUBLISHERS AND BOOKSELLERS,
Solicit the attention of BOOK-BUYERS to their large and well-selected Stock in every department of LITERATURE,
THEOLOGY, HISTORY, POETRY,
SCHOOL AND CLASSICAL TEXT-BOOKS,
NEW PUBLICATIONS, &c.

All of which will be sold at the lowest possible terms.

Special discounts made to clergymen, and other profitable customers.

Orders for any books published in the United States will be supplied at short notice.

Address, { BLAKEMAN & MASON, New York.
or, { DUTTON BLAKEMAN, Esq. } ALBERT MASON, M.D.
SHERROD, BLAKEMAN & CO.

THE AMERICAN FREEMASON'S
New Monthly Magazine, edited by ALBERT MACKEY, M.D., and other prominent Masonic writers. For sale by all Booksellers and Masonic Depots. The Trade supplied by
HENDRICKSON, BLAKE & LONG,
21 and 23 Ann Street, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 132.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The Proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY beg to draw public attention to the following list of WAR ILLUSTRATIONS which, among others, have been published in this Journal within a few weeks:

PLACES.

A magnificent View of MILAN AND VICINITY.
A magnificent View of GENOA.
A magnificent View of TURIN.
A magnificent View of ALESSANDRIA.
A magnificent View of COMO.
The BRIDGE across the TICINO at Buffalora.
PLACE D'ARMES at Milan.
A MAP of the Theatre of the War.
Another MAP, containing more Names, and a clearer Picture of Northern Italy than any other Map in existence.

PORTRAITS.

The Emperor NAPOLEON III. and his Generals—to wit, Prince NAPOLEON, BARAGUAY D'HILLIERS, MACMAHON, CANROBERT, RANDON, MAGNAN, CASTELLANE, MALAKOFF, and NIEL.
The Emperor FRANCIS-JOSEPH and his Generals—to wit, Generals HESS, BENEDEK, etc., etc.
King VICTOR EMANUEL.
General GYULAI.
GARIBALDI.
Count CAVOUR.
Cardinal ANTONELLI.
KING OF NAPLES.
A TYROLESE RIFLEMAN.
A ZOUAVE.
A TURCO.

WAR SCENES.

Departure of Volunteers from Leghorn.
Departure of the Zouaves from Paris.
Arrival of the French in Piedmont.
March of the French through Alessandria.
Austrian Officers at a Café in Milan.
Austrian Exactions at Vercelli.
Bartholinian in Uniform.
Skirmish at Frassinetto.
Spies caught at Alessandria.
Battle of Montebello.
Passage of the Sesia.
The Emperor visiting the Wounded.
The Imperial Tent, etc.
Charge of the Zouaves.

The above list is the best possible evidence of the intention and capacity of the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY to provide their subscribers with a fully illustrated history of the times in which we live.

NEW YORK, 1st July, 1859.

FIRE IN THE FOURTH.

FROM OUR FRENCH CONTRIBUTOR.

MONSIEUR THE EDITOR,—I have assist at one of the very striking spectacles of your city—I mean an incendiary scene. I dispatch myself to recount to you the details and the emotions which arose in my bosom at the sight.

I was promenade in Broadway with the lovely Thérèse—whom, in the language of one of your own poets, "to know it is love"—and I flatter myself that we was much regard by the fashionables of your city, as much for the chic of my attire, which was fresh from Rue Richelieu, as for the tout ensemble of our aspect. Thérèse wore a robe a quille, bleu changeant; her chapeau was bleu du ciel, avec perles in clusters. Her bottines (ah! Monsieur the Editor, why shall you not reform the boots of your women? Your journals boast themselves much on the progress of your civilization; but your women wear boots of brown paper, without substance and without shape. You are barbarians as to your female feet, Monsieur) were black, small, lovely, seductive, upsetting, with substantial soles, and mounting the ankle modestly. Altogether she was mos perfectly; and the young Ry-gobblers stare most grossly at her; of which I, knowing her constancy, can afford to mock myself.

Presently we hear a cry—"O-o-o-o-o-oh!" Then come "A-a-a-a-a-h!" Then "A-a-a-a-a-a!" We stop ourselves, and remain at the listening. Then a bell ring, once, twice, thrice, four times. Somebody says it is a fire. Thérèse seize herself of my arm and cry: "My God! we are lost!"

"Reassure thyself!" I reply; "we shall perish together." And, by way of precaution, I to her slip the arm round the waist, and plant myself in a firm attitude.

"Fire! fire!" shout a vile boy, as he run past us. Thérèse palpitates; I feel it.

A scoutee in a red shirt, the face of him redder than the shirt, rush past and roar, "Come on, you beggar!"

The mustard mounts me to the nose, and I say to him:

"Beggar yourself, polisson!"

Then to Thérèse:

"Angel, glory and danger call. I must leave thee. I shall never be said that where an American would go a Frenchman shall fear to follow. If I see thee never more, remember Eugène."

She scream and she sob. But a true man of heart knows to steel himself against such appeals. I plant a warm kiss on her forehead, and I launch myself.

"O-o-o-o-oh! a-a-a-a-ah!" The noise come nearer and nearer, and now I see a regiment of pompiers (pumpers I suppose you call them) roaring and racing down the street drawing a fire-engine. In front of them there run a man with a trumpet, who roar twice, five time, ten time as loud as the others. When I see them, the ardor seizes me, and I roar too. I cry: "Vive la République! A bas les tyrans! Courage, comrades!"

I was cry these manly words when a gross brute strike me on the inside of the leg, and I fall. I lift myself incessantly and seek my outrager. He had fly, the cowardly villain; but the pumpers run upon me; and the commander he put the trumpet to my ear, and he roar,

"Dear a hand, old cock!"

I was just going to say I was no cock, but an ex-militaire, when I find myself environed by pumpers, all running; and to save myself from being overrun and crushed to death I seize the rope and run with the engine. It was very agreeable at first; but after a few minutes I begin to lose breath, and I say, "Easy, my friends, easy!"

"Go ahead!" growl a red shirt in the behind of me.

"Sit up, Johnny Crapaud!" say another shirt.

"Hit him a lick on the nob!" cry another shirt.

"Kick him in the shins!" grunt another.

Justly indignant at this profanation of hospitality to a foreigner, I begin to say,

"Which of you will fight yourself with me with a pistol—"

But just then the capitaine of the engine, a brutal fellow, with superhuman strength, seize me by the collar, lap me seven or eight times, with the force of a giant, with his trumpet on the head and back, and shout, "Go ahead, or I'll spill your brains!"

Then I see that, by your laws, if a man don't run with an engine his life is forfeit to the State; so I say to myself, "Thérèse, remember Eugène!" and on I go, ready to die.

Now we are on the fire. 'Tis a tavern kept by Misteen O'Flarherty, and it burn very picturesque. The mistress herself she stand on the street with her nine babies, and she cry, "Och hone! Holy Vargin! let the whisky go, but save the Madairy!"

I was much astonish that I was left alona with the engine. All the red shirts would disappear, and should not come back. A till man he come to me, and he say,

"Work away, boys!"

I try to work the engine, but can not; and I shout, "My capitaine, where are the pumpers?"

"Pumpers!" say a rude boy; "they're gone to save the Malakoff. Didn't you hear the woman call them? Say you will, Lucy!"

FIRE IN THE FOURTH.

Two small boys and one man came to help me; then two more men with fire-irons; and we were pretty well. It was very fatiguing and very hot; but I think of Therese and of glory, and I work on. Presently I ask my handkerchief to wipe my brow. It is gone—not the brow, but the handkerchief. I am much astonish, and I wonder who was the thief. I look for my watch. Gone, too! My purse. Gone, too!

"Mordie, I'm robbed myself," who has violate my person and carry off my properties?"

"Down with her, boys!" the capitaine cries himself, looking at me.

At this horid speech my senses overcome me. Even Therese—even help with my mind. Even glory cease to charm when it appear that I am to be rob, to be violate in my properties, and to have to be trample to death—for that was what the execrable capitaine mean when he cry, "Down with her!" So I let the engine rest where it is, rush mush! nosediver, I run faster as my locomotive—with the fearful cry in my ear, "Down with her!" until I reach my lodgings in Franklin Street, and stuff myself into my bed, all panting and choking.

As soon as my voice return I send for a little refreshment, and the good Madame Brown me confection for me a small brandy punch, a little glass of absinthe, a cocktail, and two lovely coblblers. As soon as I shall have consume these quantity of refreshments I mean to me that I have done wrong to return home without avenging myself on the brutal violence of my properties, and I will go to pursue them without delay. But Providence protected them. The loud-hearted Madame Brown, Mrs. Brown, seeing my purpors in the manly face of me, treacherously concealed my pantaloons and my boots, and of course I could not pursue my vengeance upon the pumpers in my absence. So once more I lay myself down on my bed and dream—oh! fearful dreams—of being a burning tavern, with myriads of drunken pumpers drinking Mordie's wine by me; of Madame Brown's waiters battering the head of me with Satanic rebuff treasure; of one horrid red shirt monster which I was afire, and ramming the nozzle of the hose down my throat to extinguish the conflagration; of Therese, who would not save me upper garret of the burning building, which was me; and of the terrible horror which made to shriek me, that I am sain, my garret being so hot—oh! Monsieur, what terrible dreams.

In verity I will tell you one thing, Monsieur the Editor; when you want an account of a fire more times, you shall get some one else to write it for you as your humble servant,

EUGENE GROGNIOUS.

Summer Resorts.

CONTENTS' Hotel, West Point, N. Y.
La Vonnoh House, Pequannock, N. J.
Trenton Falls Hotel, Trenton Falls, N. Y.
Hopkinton Hotel, Lake Hopkinton, N. Y.
Congress Hall, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.
Howland's Hotel, Long Branch, N. J.
Charles Island House, Milford, Conn.
White Sulphur Springs, Bedminster, Co., O.
International Hotel, Niagara Falls.
Schuyler Hotel, Schuyler, Mass.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1859.

THE RIGHTS OF NATURALIZED CITIZENS.

THE discussion on the right of naturalized citizens to the protection of the Government grows in importance. When Mr. Clay published his Lecture letter, and that journal pointed out its fallacy, there was, apparently, no other press in the country which bought the question worth examining. The views set forth in those columns seem, however, to have made impression enough at Washington to induce Mr. Cass to "explain" his Leclere letter by another letter to Mr. Hofer, and to inspire the communications to ourselves published in our issue of June 25. We have, in addition, that number, to reaffirm our ground, and to point out what appears to be the error of all the letters of prince. Since then the subject has been passed in review by most of the leading journals. Among others, The Times has discussed by the New York Herald, Times, Tribune, Journal of Commerce, Evening Post, and Express; by leading journals at Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Cincinnati, etc.; by all the German papers throughout the country; and at a very elaborate leader in the Presidential organ at Washington—The Union.

If the public and the Government come to a wrong conclusion on the point at issue it will not be for want of a thorough canvass of their bearings.

With the exception of occasional paragraphs in some of the country papers, and a very able article in the Evening Post of June 28, we have seen no newspaper article which takes the broad, manly ground that naturalized citizens are citizens in fact as well as in name, and that it is a fraud to serve them of their rights under which they bargained for when they forswore their original allegiance and swore allegiance to the United States.

The line of argument adopted by nearly all the journals we have named is identical with that of Mr. Cass. They say: 1. that the United States are bound to respect the municipal regulations of foreign countries; 2. that where those municipal regulations require citizens of foreign countries the obligation to perform military service, a naturalization here can not relieve the obligation; and 3. that, though naturalized citizens can not be claimed by their original sovereigns so long as they remain in this country, if they return to their old homes they become liable to all the obligations which may have existed against them at the time of their expatriation. Some of the journals before us indulge in a little light pleasantry about the American lamb, from poor Mary's little, being needlessly dragged by rhetorical politicians into the controversy; and one journal, quoting rather too copiously Webster's unfinished history of Mr. Hildreth's History, leans to the Federalist opinion that foreign-born citizens are "renegades and traitors" and entitled to protection at all. But the substance of the argument in support of Mr. Cass is contained in the above propositions.

We have no hesitation in denying their soundness. They are specious paradoxes, calculated to deceive a very elect but of few.

In plain English, their meaning is, that naturalization is null and void in the case of a person born where, at the time of the naturalization, his original sovereign asserted claims. Mr. Cass and his friends entertain with us commonly fine distinctions of prince; Mr. Leclere, it seems, is a citizen here, but not a citizen when he goes to France. Mr. Hofer was an American citizen in Turkey, but a foreigner when he lands at Bremen. These refinements are too nice for practical consideration. Law and common sense say that, if a man be an American citizen any where, he is one every where. Our courts respect the laws of nature, or geographical limitations, or liable to be affected by climate; it does not suit away under a few degrees more or less of Reaumur or caloric into under a less clear sky than our own. Mr. Cass's idea of citizenship places it on a par with a fair dinner—it is good only while in a change of air, and leave no trace behind. As there is no warrant for classing it among those maladies which, on the contrary, the law declares can see that citizenship is a quality which can only be lost by due form of law; we repeat that the position assumed by Mr. Cass and his defenders is that a naturalized citizen who owed any duties to his sovereign prior to his naturalization is a citizen at all. Let us see why he is not.

That the United States are bound to respect the municipal laws of foreign countries may be true as a general principle; but it is quite plain that it is when these municipal regulations conflict with the laws of the United States. The first law which we are bound to obey is the law of the land. When Mr. Cass will explain the vision of the Constitution, declares that by the observance of certain formalities and the fulfillment of certain conditions, foreigners generally may become citizens of the United States. It does not say one word about prior obligations of such foreign-born persons. There is no limiting or qualifying the citizenship to which, on the conditions specified, they shall be entitled. Not a syllable about any reservation or limitation of such citizenship in the event of the persons so made citizens traveling into foreign countries. The law of the land simply says that they shall become citizens. As that law stands, therefore, any attempt of a foreign country to enforce its own municipal laws against a person made a United States citizen under it, involves a direct conflict between such municipal law and the law of the United States. To pretend that when such a conflict arises it is to be expected that United States government and the American people by a mere act of foreign law, and against their own law, can abjure by their own laws the duties they owe to their own law; if it be bad or inconvenient, they may repeal it. But so long as it exists they can not evade it, or refuse to be overruled even by foreign laws without disgrace.

But it is in fact unreasonable and impracticable to expect the United States to allow any interference in this matter of the municipal laws of foreign powers, and of the obligations they impose on their subjects, which may have arisen in the Revolution to the present day the right of expatriation has been fully recognized by the United States: it was made a leading war cry of the Revolutionary war, and again throughout the war of 1812; and necessarily so, for it is the corner-stone of the American system. That system rests, in a measure, on a denial of the obligations and privileges of birth, and an assertion of the rights and obligations of adoption. In a pure democracy, as manhood is in the case of native-born persons the only qualification essential to the exercise of political rights, so the only requisite that can consistently be exacted of adopted citizens for naturalization is manhood. To depart from that principle, and to enter into an inquisitorial research as to birth and foreign relations, is to destroy not only to the letter of the law, but likewise to the spirit of our institutions. We do not desire to speak with disrespect of foreign laws; they are entitled to the same respect which we claim for our own; but we say that having deliberately adopted manhood as the sole qualification required of candidates for political rights in this country, we can not now admit that foreign laws render other qualifications necessary.

To do so, in fact, would render our courts mere instruments of foreign Powers. Suppose, for instance, that the Cass doctrine were to prevail: that the naturalization laws were altered to suit it; and that henceforth, before a foreign-born person could become an American citizen, he were bound to establish that he owed nothing to his original sovereign—into what a maze of difficulties would our courts be plunged! Frauds and perjury would follow in the train of their people; the American Judge would be bound to satisfy himself that such service had been performed if it had not; he would, of course, refuse the certificate, and thus become a recruiting agent for Louis Napoleon. Great Britain holds the doctrine of personal allegiance; no British subject could ever be naturalized, for his obligations to his native country are only with his death. Russia claims the right of expatriation—even for a time; no Russian, therefore, could ever become a citizen. And not only would it be the duty of the American Court to ascertain and execute the existing laws of all those foreign Powers, but our future laws made by foreign Sovereigns would be equally entitled to attention. Any petty German principality, by an ordinance, render it impossible for any of its subjects to obtain a naturalization here. That the princes of Germany would do so, can not be doubted, for emigration to the United States is ruining them, and nothing would check emigration to this country so rapidly as a denial of political rights to foreign-born residents.

We have entered into these considerations solely out of respect for the opinions of those for with us and sustain Mr. Cass. In point of fact, is it of no sort of consequence to our naturalized citizens of foreign nations to know whether it be the office of our Courts to execute them. All that the Government has to do is to take the oath of a man, and confer on him the franchise. The law declares that foreign-born persons shall, on certain conditions, become citizens. If those conditions are complied with, the law makes no question; becomes citizens, and are entitled to the protection of the laws. Any attempt to prevention; and a hundred letters from Mr. Cass, and a hundred newspaper articles, couldn't invalidate their citizenship, or relieve the United States from the duty of protecting them abroad as well as at home. The only thing which it is in Mr. Cass's power to do in the matter, is to check the fulfillment of that duty, and to assist refuge in a quibble for his pusillanimous course. This seems to be the Secretary's intention.

We have given up this question without personal feeling; we are not likely to be accused of political partisanship. We feel, therefore, that we may say that Mr. Cass will speedily discover that his Leclere and Hofer letters are the greatest blunder of his political life. They will be remembered against him. Questions come up on the occurrence of some isolated outrage upon an obscure citizen, public sentiment might have compelled the Secretary for declaring to involve the country in the miseries of war on his account. But to anticipate such an event, and with a reckless stroke of the pen to disinherit those the entire naturalized population of the country, was singularly indiscreet in a veteran like Mr. Cass—how indiscreet he will probably discover at the next elections.

LAGER BEER.

SOME statistical returns which we have seen contain startling evidence of the progress of lager beer drinking in this country. Our German friends seem to have imbued with their American people with their love for lager; where, a few years ago, guileless grain only swelled the demand, lager drays laden with kegs are now found insufficient. What are we to say of the future rejoice or the lamentation of

The teetotalers have, of course, no mercy for lager. Water is their specific; every thing below water is pernicious. We have not undertaken in this hot weather to controvert the ponderous arguments by which they prove that water is the cure of all human ills, and that wine are fools and villains not to be satisfied with it.

At the same time, a man may, perhaps, be permitted to think that there are many other kinds of evil, and that—assuming lager beer drinking to be wrong—it is less so than getting drunk on whisky and brandy. The existence of a highly respectable court has settled the point that lager does not intoxicate; and that where lager is drunk there is less drunk. Lager, and which, as statistics show, is fast superseding spirituous liquors as the common stimulant of ourselves, has some terrible enemies to set against the mischief which teetotalers will probably assure us it is working in our midst.

A very ingenious gentleman, who combines the professions of medicine and journalism, once created quite a stir by proclaiming lager to be a slow poison. Scientific inquiry goes to prove that the opinion did more credit to his coloring than to his analytical skill. Good lager beer is pronounced by the faculty to be a mild tonic, calculated, on the average, to be more beneficial than obnoxious to the system.

We have likewise been told that a steady course of lager beer drinking stupefies the faculties. The chief evidence which has been adduced in support of this opinion is the alleged slowness and stupidity of the Bavarians, great lager drinkers. But if the Bavarians are slow and stupid—which they and their friends by no means admit—can nothing account for the fact but lager beer? Has not their climate something to do with it? Are they slower than the Sandians, with their cocoa-nuts, than the Crosts, who seldom get any thing to drink? And how about the English, who drink as much malt fat intoxicating liquor as the Bavarians do, such? Of course, it can hardly be expected that the worthy gentleman who takes twenty-six mugs of lager beer before breakfast in the presence of an admiring crowd, can be particularly bright in the afternoon; but where the consumption is moderate, stupefaction appears to proceed so slowly as not to be discernible.

THE FUTURE OF ITALY.

NAPOLEON'S Milan Proclamation, which we publish elsewhere, will satisfy all who believe in his word that he does not desire to annex any of Italy to France. If he did so, in the face of the pledges, and the treaties of all Europe, the combination against him, which would drive him to a new St. Helena. It is safe, therefore, even for those who do not trust his assurances, to believe that in this instance he dare not violate them. As he says himself, the spirit of the age guarantees Italy against French domination.

What, then, is to become of Italy, after the Austrians have left the country?

There are at the present time, besides a number of small states and principalities, five governments in Italy of nearly two generations the Lombardo-Venetian States, the Duchy of Tuscany, the States of the Church, and the Kingdom of Naples. For nearly two generations the last four have been practically subject to Austria. Her expulsion will necessitate some remodeling of the Italian map, and of the form of its rule.

The ardent Roman patriots of 1848 would be satisfied with nothing short of Italian unity. They wished a Roman republic, stretching from the Alps to Sicily. Charles Albert, too, desired Italian unity; but the form in which he wished to realize the idea was a kingdom of United Kingdom of Italy, with himself as dynastic sovereign. On the other hand, Naples objected very decidedly to be swallowed up in either of its ambitious neighbors of the north; and Venice, with the democrat Manin at its head, steadily refused to have any thing to do with Charles Albert. In Tuscans, though sympathizers with the movement for unity, had scruples about abdicating their separate nationality.

When the fighting is over, these controversies will revive with consolidated force. They will not be settled without trouble. If the dream of the patriots of 1848 is to be realized, and all Italy become one governed somehow, what is to be the form of that government—republican or monarchical? Can Napoleon establish a transalpine republic, or will the Italian democrats crown a king? Again, how are the local jealousies, which centuries of separate national existence have bred in the minds of Romans, Piedmontese, Milanese, Tuscans, Neapolitans, to be overcome? Will not any attempt to set aside the claims of sovereigns, or others, lead to outbreaks? And lastly, what is to become of the Pope? Is it possible to establish a safe and stable government in Italy so long as he is armed with temporal power? Is it possible to maintain his Headship of the Church without guaranteeing him some temporal sovereignty?

These problems are not easy of solution. Napoleon may find when he has driven out the Austrians that the hardest part of his task is yet to come.

THE UNFULFILLED PROPHECIES.

We publish elsewhere a very curious and instructive article on Unfulfilled Prophecy. If Dr. Murray Paine is right, the wisdom ridicule on the peculiar field of our religious contemporaries; the general conclusion which stands out is the subject of unfulfilled prophecy, and the high reputation of Dr. Paine, will probably be a sufficient excuse for our having, on this occasion, run into this theme opinions among learned and devout Christians are known to be much divided; it can only be expected that Dr. Paine's views will command the universal assent of his audience; all, however, will bear witness to the candid and comprehensiveness with which he handles his topic.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GENERAL JACKSON AND MRS. EATON.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

WASHINGTON, June 28, 1859.

In your Weekly of the 25th instant I observe an article headed "Mrs. Eaton and General Jackson," of which the following is an extract, viz.:

"Through her influence (and her husband's admitted abilities) General Eaton was appointed to a live in the Cabinet, and the lady became soon quite a sort of semi-official lady of the White House. Her influence finally became supreme, and of course created a host of enemies. The old General became her partisan, and he went so far as to make a very "party" measure! But Mrs. Eaton should receive the most marked attention from all who came to the White House, and more especially from those who were dependent upon him for official favor. In general thing, the wives of the members of the Cabinet, who were jealous of Mrs. Eaton, left Mrs. Eaton with attention, performed their allotted task with apparent sincerity at least; but Mrs. Calhoun would not and did not conform to the usage, and from this little incident arose circumstances which finally brought about the Calhoun feud, drove Mr. Calhoun into the opposition, and absolutely changed the character of the Democratic party."

This article does General Jackson great injustice, and is in error in many particulars, viz.:

1. It was the personal friendship between General Jackson and Major Eaton which secured to the latter a place in the Cabinet.

2. Mrs. Eaton never had any position in the White House. The lady of the President was Mrs. Donaldson, wife of Major Donaldson, the President's private secretary.

3. General Jackson never required as a "party measure" or otherwise, that any one should pay marked attention," or any attention to Mrs. Eaton. Neither the lady of his own house nor one of the ladies of the Cabinet offered her any attention, save, over visited her. It is true that the General, believing that the tales circulated about Mrs. Eaton were utterly false, and knowing that the feeling induced among his advisers by family alienations would be totally fatal to the success of his public measures; but in no instance did he require that any one, not even his private secretary nor the ladies of his own household, pay marked attention to Mrs. Eaton or pay her any attention.

4. General Jackson was not active in the belief of this family difficulty was fostered by political agitators, for the purpose of breaking up a cabinet which were not sufficiently subservient to their views upon the succession. But the breach between him and Mr. Calhoun was the result entirely of these petty feuds, and would doubtless have occurred had Mrs. Eaton never existed. It grew out of a course of events that began as early as 1818, but not fully developed until 1831.

The letter of Mr. Webb in our article concludes is believed to have no relation to Mr. Eaton, though it was this foundation, that when a lad which we originally received from the lady his family, he promptly loosened one with the tongs from the thread of the thimble, and sent it to the physician. Such is my recollection of an incident mentioned at the time as illustrating the promptitude of General Jackson in the execution of his purposes. The inaccuracies of your article are doubtless attributable to imperfect reports by newspaper representatives during General Jackson's administration, and I doubt not you will be as desirous as I am that justice shall be done to his memory by their correction.

With high respect,

AMOS KENDALL.

THE LOUNGER.

THE DAY WE CELEBRATE.

NATURE always sympathizes with the fervors of our patriotism. If our fathers had declared their independence in mid-winter, we should never have warmed ourselves to the proper pitch upon the anniversary? In fact, it is almost impossible to imagine the Fourth of July falling in any season but the summer. How natural it is there! How quietly it comes there and how it lingers!

There are not means as hints for the orators who are to-day passing through the agonies of history where our fathers were in the thick of it. And yet if some glowing Demosthenes or Cicero of three thousand years ago should arise, we should have to add to those most polished and eloquent sentences which he has already produced, only—as Providence is kind—has also committed, the Lounger would humbly suggest an allusion to Mesmer,—a long and elaborate one, in which he should tell us that in order to draw and brandish the very knife to which he alludes, it was necessary to put the orator rejoices to remind his perspiring fellow-countrymen that on precisely such a day as that in which they were—and the orator pauses—upon that day, glittering, shadeless plain of New Jersey, the slowly dying sun sought, in vain, to shine, grandsons of '76, from the bodies of those unflinching men, on that burning day, rolled rivers of blood—even as on the battle-fields of '76—the bodies of their descendants. Yes, yes, from the very bodies! And, indeed, the orator may point to the Sunday breakfast, roll rivers of a—something which, as a classic orator, I forbear to name.

Does not the speaker see that they clearly have come to the experience of his hearers? Would it not, perhaps, say the orator, remember the day, six in a pew, sweltering—if he could use such a word—with sympathy?

And one other thing, not at all in the idle vein of other thing he him not forget to say, which should send a thrill of fire through the heart of every orator. Remember that on this very day, somewhere upon the hot plain of Northern Italy, brave men and true, with as deep, and more precious a love of country as say we know, are standing against a steadier despotism than any we have conceived. In that lovely land, garlanded from Genoa to Venice—from the Alps to the Apennines with flowers and foliage and swinging vines, and of heroic memories, heroes are rising to rescue their homes and their hearts from the yoke of the Austrians of Monmouth and Trenton, of Saratoga and Valley Springs, of Bunker Hill and Long Island, the spoil of another land and another century alone.

Today we honor the one in the same—a human freedom—of justice, of civilization, of all good arts and sciences and letters, let us not forget the other. Let the Italians know that, on the day of jubilee for our own baptism of Liberty, we were mindful of those upon whom the sacred drops even now descend. The thought will be as good to them as many subscriptions. It will touch their hearts. It will strengthen their hands.

A FOURTH OF JULY ORATION.

From the Boston Evening Journal.

THE day was ushered in by a salute of thirteen guns, and ringing of bells. At 10 o'clock a procession was formed, under the command of Col. "Freedom Fulfillers," with Major Abijah W. Binney as chief marshal. The church was crowded by the fairest part of the population, dangling, whispering, and waving their fans. The thermometer was 97° at the window in the gallery. After the Sunday-school children had sung a hymn and had a few addresses and the organ had played a voluntary, and the village glee-club had sung a patriotic ode, and the Reverend Timothy G. Nasmyth had read the Declaration of Independence, and the glee-club had sung another song, and Enos H. Blakey, Esq., had read the Declaration of Independence, and Philbrown Endway Mullinex, of the bi-monthly "Voice of the Hills," had read an original ode, and Master Tullidy, of the High School, had recited Smalley's Ode to Independence, the orator of the day arose, and, after looking at the assembled his hand through his hair, sucked a lemon, and said:

FELLOW-CITIZENS,—I begin by thanking Heaven for a timely topic. I shall continue by discussing it. Fellow-citizens, Have the citizens of this country equal rights?

The Publone, several other newspapers, and General Cass, say that they have.

There three represent all the parties in the country. There are three editors of all parties who deny the equality of the citizens. The President of the United States is of the same opinion. Fellow-citizens, it is a sad thing to find a political truth so far from the people. The people are unpolitical, and will not forget that in earlier days the President was a Democrat. Let us look briefly at the facts.

Let us look briefly at this great question.

The very fundamental principle of the American Government is that all men are born equal. It says in the Constitution which organizes that government there is no privilege of birth possessing the citizens, namely, that no foreign-born citizen shall be elected President. By implication, therefore, the very oldest native Americans are disfranchised them as entirely equal. It seems to specify this particular case, because it was considered that all the citizens stood upon the same ground, and therefore any one native, native or foreign, might be elected to the President. Such was the general, undoubtedly, and the single exception was made. That other exceptions of this nature they would have been indicated.

But how stands the fact? The Government existed at all only in virtue of the assertion of the right of men to choose their own government. Of our own number we relinquished allegiance to Great Britain and elected a new one, and we virtually proclaimed the right of every man to the the same thing.

Despotism contemplates a man as a born subject of a selected family, and its only formation or continuation he has no voice. The American principle has it that every man is free, and declares the absolute political freedom of every man. All right, that is, to choose under what government he will live, and his fellow-men have no right to set up a government.

And on what ground shall a man's right of choice of the country in which he will live be denied?

He is born, for instance, in Austria, but at years of discretion he loathes the Austrian tyranny and prefers to live in the United States, where he may also develop his manhood, but which has invited him and all men to come, promising to make them citizens, and to protect them in the enjoyment of equality of delay, a share in the Government.

But Austria interposes and claims his service on the ground that he was born in Austria, and has lived to an age of discretion during which he has had the opportunity to emigrate. And because he has incurred a debt which he can only discharge by personal presence. He is free, fellow-citizens,—England—or whatever the country may be—does not recognize the right of expatriation.

The man's right is a moral right.

"I believe, with Austria, that every man is born political slave, and that the fact that born in Austria was no choice of mine, and it is something I shall always deplore. You spak of debt—but I long as I have lived in Austria I have had a service that I did not perform—so long as I lived in the United States in many ways—another, as full set-off to the protection that you gave me. The account between us was quits at every moment, and when I came to claim the protection of your laws; and your claim upon me to reimburse them was invalid at the same moment. I can now a citizen of the United States. How can I serve two masters? If you and the United States demand my services, I am a mercenary and adoptive country to allow me to fight against it? Am I to be liable to be called upon at the time? Am I to be liable to be guilty of two simultaneous treasons? one as a citizen of the United States in refusing to serve Austria—another, as an Austrian native in arms against the Emperor? The thing is ridiculous. Either I am a citizen of the United States, with the sole disability of ineligibility to the Presidency, but in all other respects entitled to all that Mr. Buchanan or General Cass are entitled to, or I am in the absurd position of being constitutionally competent to the office of the United States without redress under its laws for the most grievous wrong that a citizen suffers, for the most grievous wrong that a citizen suffers, his country the compulsion to bear arms against his country.

"If the United States does not mean to protect me in my most essential rights as a citizen, why does it permit me to be a citizen at all? What a farce and stultification! How can a democratic Government justify make malignant and invidious distinctions among the citizens?"

The letter of the Secretary of State does not allude even remotely to these questions. It merely says that some foreign governments claim perpetual allegiance—and insinuates that we can not make laws for them.

But the proposition is no more than any other assumption which conflicts with ours: and if Austria and Russia insist that every man leaves his office and deity, who should be found within her dominions, on the first of August, should bear arms for her in Italy—and we have no complaint that our laws for Austria if we insisted upon the protection of the citizens of the United States who might be seized under such a law?

If it be urged that international law has settled such a point as this, the reply is very clear that the point of the last defense of naturalized citizens is not settled by international law, nor are despotisms likely to settle it as we wish. We are, therefore, advised the defense and protection of our citizens, what other Governments are pleased to acknowledge it?

The United States of America are quite as competent to declare that every man shall elect his allegiance, and every country in the world is to assert the contrary. Every country has its own policy and policy urges it to that course. It will not be to the first shock of feudal injustice to the world down, and it will be by no means the last. By the Constitution of our Government, and under the Constitution of the United States, a citizen can but be could not be elected President, Albert Gallatin, or it a citizen elected with him to the rank of the earth the same inviolability as George Washington. All men in this country are equal citizens in the eyes of the intention of our Government. If they are born elsewhere, that Government has contemplated that we acquire a superior preference, and then calls them her children. If she will not protect them, she has no disabled law self, she has betrayed them, and she has prepared her own destruction.

Three cheers, then, for the American flag, which was meant to protect every where the American citizen!

AFTER US, THE DELUGE.

As the Italian war begins in earnest, and attention Austria results from the Ticino across the Adda to the Mincio, the question arises in the world declares with expressive silence against the despotic rule of Austria in Italy, and with the same voice against the barbarous custom of that vast and monstrous empire, the tutelary genius of its rulers, whenever withdraws from the scene, the spectacle becomes mysteriously dramatic—hi famous words of eleven years ago are recalled—"After us, the deluge!" Metternich said of himself, "and is not this "the Deluge?"

Metternich is a venerable old man, old, a Prince, and a famous statesman. Metternich was alive Austria, deadly and despotic Austria, body and soul, crushing, miserable Austria the enemy of human progress and of mankind—Austria which has for its head and symbol the heart-blood of Italy. This Austria was Metternich.

Of all men of the last century he was the one who has produced the most suffering among men. He was the soul of all that remorseless policy which crushed Europe in the interests of Austria. Oh! the midnight arrests, the dungeons, the tortures, the broken hearts, the crazed brains, the ruined lives, the despair of wives and mothers, cried out, that cry out against this man. To prevent Austria's growth was the single object of western despotisms—he insist upon the predominance of family, of the best men and women by millions go to the dogs—to propose nothing that could make one heart smile, or one hopeful heart glow—to keep the nations and to the dance of whole nations rising to seize their own—this was the sole business of Austria for half a century.

And no other man of modern times—no man since the older Italian tyrants, and occasional ones, has done so deeply detested. The one word that all Italy hated was Metternich. And in that Italy of supine passion and many-colored and dramatic characterization, "The Italian in England," Robert Browning expresses it in a line—

"However, if I figured to myself
Real wishes on myself—say, Three—
I know at once what one should be:
I would grasp Metternich until
I felt his ear vanish in my fist
In blood through these two hands."

He died quietly in his bed, full of years and honors. Twenty years ago he was driven from the street in Vienna. He was seventy-four, and walked with a quick step and erect figure, dressed plainly in black, with his hands clasped behind to the chin. Every body knew who it was, and many raised their hats to the old man who had been the most powerful man in the world. He was not insulted. He was not even molested. He was not even reviled. He was not even hissed. He was not even hooted. He was not even pelted. He was not even insulted by the English spirit. A few years restored him to Austria, and Austria to her old empire.

He has ended now, and those courses are ending. The map of Europe, it is difficult to doubt, will be reconstructed. "Italy is a mere geographical expression," said Metternich. To our children, please Heaven! Metternich's Austria will be a mere historical name.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—VICO, Elmira. Sop-sage cheese is so called from a corruption of the name of a little village in Germany, Schab-ziegen, where it is made. You will find in any good German dictionary the word Schabziegenkase, a kind of cheese. Ziger is a provincial word meaning whey.

—ILLIBERALITAR, Providence, Rhode Island, is reminded by Mr. Bindley's communication, two weeks since, of an indistinct upon which he solicits an opinion. There was to be a lecture at eight o'clock. He went before seven, and got a good seat. At twenty minutes before eight the hall was crowded to the stairs and entries. Between eight and nine one-and-twenty persons were eight a female (to you object to the word?) worked her way from the front seats down the aisle, and finally up the aisle; remarking, as she passed your servant, that some fellow-citizens, ourfellowcitizens, and rudeness, to have gallantry enough to give her a seat. I did not rise; but frowning, as I did, that I came early, and paid for admission, and that in lecture-rooms and rudeness are not the same word.—First cover, first served."

The Lounger has always expressed the same opinion upon this point. He can only say that he should not wish to sit next to a child or any other person annoyed, unless under extraordinary circumstances, as where he is ill, or he immediately attendance upon ladies, and even then it would be disagreeable to remain sitting. Of course a woman or a gentleman in such circumstances is not a lady. But we are bound to be gentlemen always, while women are always ladies or not.

—E. B., Washington city. Your verses are not good.

—THEATRES, New York. The Lounger would advise you to go to the Winter Mistakes by Boucicault, Green, New Hampshire, and Lake Winnipiseogee, not forgetting Centre-table, and Lake Winnipiseogee, and to go out of the face to the Notch. In returning, he would advise Bethlehem, Littleton, in the valley of the Connecticut. The expenses of traveling by the railway conveyances, and would probably not exceed twenty dollars a week. If you can do it for seven less, of course; but a day's railroading will cost you about five dollars.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, July 2, 1859.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets opened quietly and steadily for the principal kinds of Breadstuffs, but closed the close the demand for Flour, Corn, and Oats improved, and prices were fully maintained, and in some instances higher. Wheat, Rye, and Barley were partially neglected, and tended downward. Cotton has been in limited request at higher rates. Provisions have been more freely offered, and prices have declined. Groceries, Tropical produce Teas, Coffees, and Tobacco, have been less active. Coffee has ruled firm and steady. Hay has been in good demand, and has been in good request at improved prices. Hops, Seeds, Oils, Spirits, Naval Stores, Metals, Oils, Tallow, Seeds, Tobacco, and Wool have been rather slightly dealt in. Coal has been in fair demand. The Lumber... The movements in other commodities have not been important. The following quotations will show the trend a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Standard Sugar State Flour, per barrel	$5 05	@ $5 20
Extra State	5 25	@ 5 30
Superfine Western	5 00	@ 5 00
Superfine Western Ohio	5 00	@ 5 00
Superfine Southern	5 05	@ 5 10
Extra Southern	5 25	@ 5 30
Superfine Rye Flour	4 00	@ 4 15
Fine Western	4 00	@ 4 00
White Michigan Wheat, per bushel	1 45	@ 1 70
White Southern	1 45	@ 1 70
Red Western Wheat	1 37½	@ 1 55
Milwaukee Club	1 30	@ 1 33
Chicago Spring	85	@ 1 05
Rye	65	@ 70
Barley	65	@ 70
Western Corn	47	@ 48
State Oats	42	@ 45
Canada and Pennsylvania Oats	40	@ 42
Southern Oats	39	@ 42
Canada Peas, per bushel	90	@ 90
New Mess Pork, per barrel	16 00	@ 16 12½
Prime Pork	12 75	@ 13 00
Country Mess Beef	8 00	@ 8 00
Extra, per pound	7½	@ 8
Shoulders	6½	@ 6½
Hams, per pound	11	@ 11
Fair to Extra Butter	14	@ 16
Ohio Butter, new	11	@ 15
Cheese, new	7	@ 8
Rice, per 100 pounds	4 00	@ 5 00
Rio Coffee, per pound	11	@ 11½
New Orleans Sugar	6½	@ 7
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	30	@ 32
Hyson Teas, per pound	28	@ 45
Young Hyson Teas	28	@ 45
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	25	@ 26
Tallow, per pound	9½	@ 10
Clear Shipping Hay, per 100 pounds	75	@ 80
Timothy Seed	1 60	@ 1 65
Crude Petroleum, per 100 pounds	2 25	@ 2 50
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	44	@ 45
Tar, per barrel	2 25	@ 2 50

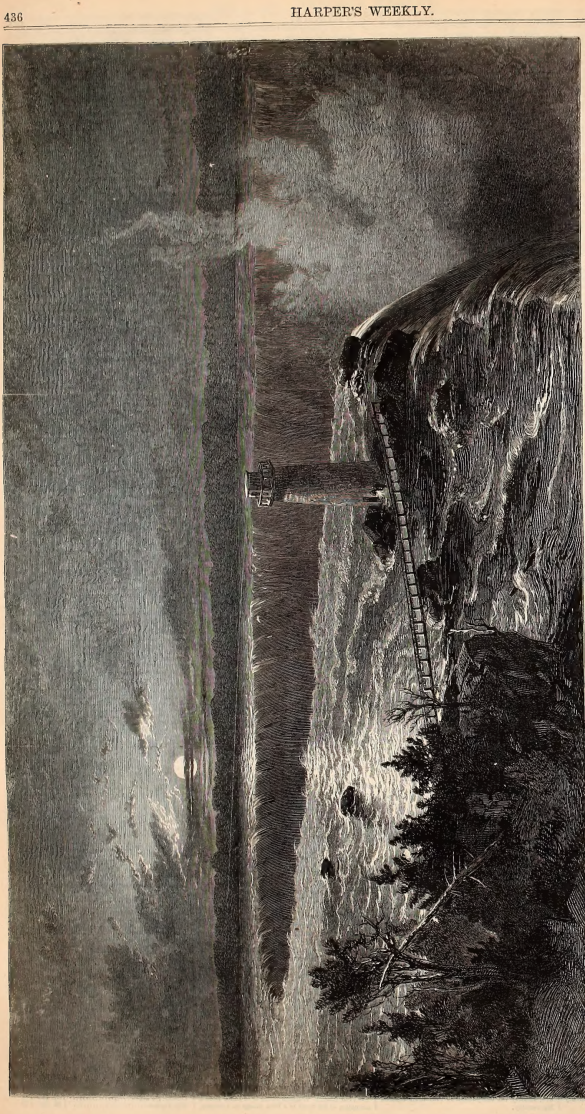
The range of prices according to the actual sales of the Week at the Principal Produce Markets in Chicago was as follows:

Ordinary to fair dry Flour, per barrel $ 6 @ $ 11
Fair to very good Ohio Corn, per bushel 30 @ 38
Fair to very good Oats 30 @ 38
Sharp and Lambs, per head 2 25 @ 6 00
Hogs, per pound 5 @ 6
Live Swine 6½ @ 6½
Dressed " 7 @ 7½
Roasting Pigs, each 75 @ 1 75

The Country Produce Markets have been more active, with ample supplies of most kinds at prices which have improved slightly.

WHOLESALE TRADE CURRENT OF PROVINCIAL AT VARIOUS POINTS IN MARKET.

Cherries, per pound	$ 3	@ $ 7
Gooseberries, per bushel	1 50	@ 2 00
Raspberries, per 100 bushels	4 50	@ 10 00
Currants, per pound	6	@ 8
Whortleberries, per quart	9	@ 12
Peaches, per bushel	1 00	@ 2 00
Apples, per barrel	3 00	@ 5 00
Potatoes, old, per barrel	2 00	@ 2 50
Potatoes, new, Southern	3 00	@ 4 00
Onions	2 75	@ 3 00
Onions, new, per 100 bunches	1 50	@ 2 00
Turnips, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Beets, per bushel	50	@ 75
Beets, per dozen bunches	50	@ 75
Carrots, per bushel	75	@ 1 00
Carrots, new, per dozen bunches	37½	@ 43
Cabbage, new, per 100	4 00	@ 6 00
Garlic, per 100 bunches	5 00	@ 6 00
Green Beans, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Green Peas, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Cucumbers, per dozen	12½	@ 25
Tomatoes, per dozen	12½	@ 25
Squashes, per 100	75	@ 1 00
Radishes, per 100 bunches	50	@ 75
Spinach, per bushel	75	@ 87
Rhubarb, per 100 bunches	1 00	@ 1 25
Eggs, N. Y., and N. J., per dozen	17	@ 18
Chickens, per pair	37	@ 50
Geese, Spring, each	1 00	@ 1 25
Turkeys, per pound	12	@ 14
Ducks, per pair	1 25	@ 1 50
Pigeons, per dozen	1 25	@ 1 87
Wild Pigeons	75	@ 1 00



GIGNOUX'S NIAGARA.—THE PROPERTY OF HON. AUGUST BELMONT.

NIAGARA FALLS.

We have the pleasure of laying before our readers an engraving of M. Gignoux's Niagara, one of the noblest works of American art. It will be remembered that M. Gignoux executed, some eighteen months ago, a painting of Niagara, which was exhibited together with a painting on the same subject by Mr. Church. Both became the property of a firm of print-sellers. Mr. August Belmont, the well-known banker and millionaire, who expressed to purchase M. Gignoux's picture, was so much disappointed at losing it that he gave the artist a commission to execute a new Niagara for him. The result of that order is the admirable work which we now engrave. Rumor asserts that the price paid to the painter was as worthy of the artist as of the wealthy patron of art whose gallery of paintings is becoming so famous.

M. Gignoux has painted Niagara by moonlight, the point of view being from Goat Island, and the main scene the Horseshoe Fall. Words fail to describe the beauty of the original work. It is one of those delicious scenes on which the eye can feast for hours together. One almost fancies, in gazing into the soft summer night-air which envelops the scene, that the ear hears the roar of the cataract as the eye sees the floating moonbeams which dance over the broad rushing stream.

We shall not be expected to attempt any word-picture of a scene to which nothing but the brush or the pencil can do justice. Those who are not satisfied with M. Gignoux's picture, and who want to know more about Niagara, must go and see it for themselves. Thousands have been grand doings there of late.

On Thursday, 30th, M. Blondin is to cross Niagara River locked in Fall on a tight rope. We shall probably be able to give a description of the feat in another part of this paper. Such exploits have been a theme of much discussion of late. Ever since Sam Patch's leap the first aim of aspiring acrobats has been to couple their name with that of Niagara; and many a time the public have been summoned at the Falls to witness some desperate feat which has never been performed. The last Niagara hoax was an announcement that a famous acrobat would cross the river above the Fall on stilts. The joke was even carried so far as to assert substantially that the feat had been performed in the presence of thirty people; time, place, circumstance, and incidents—all were elaborately related. The people at the Falls were a good deal taken aback at first when they read the story.

We must hope that M. Blondin's operations will be more real.

WHY MOURN?

BY C. H. WEBB.

The golden grain
Is ripened but to death;
And Summer's leaves
Must fall with Autumn's breath.

For all things die:
Behold! the marble urn
That shrines our dust
Shall crumble in its turn.

We mourn the Young;
They perish as the flowers,
Whose petals scarce
Have kissed Life's rosy hours.

We mourn the Old,
Who vanish from our sight
As Summer days
That fade in lengthened light.

A selfish grief:
They fall not as the leaves,
But ripened grain,
And angels bind the sheaves.

An aged friend,
Whose years were as a crown,
But yester-night
Unto the grave went down.

As sinks the sun,
Low-curtained in the West,
Its journey done:
So went he to his rest.

No warring strife;
And when had ceased his breath,
It was not Life—
You scarce could call it Death.

A soft-sealed smile
Fell like a sunbeam's play,
As though the soul
At parting kissed its clay.

The lines that Time
Upon the brow had traced,
Death's gentle hand
With kindly touch effaced.

So calm—so still
The peace that veiled the dead:
Were Death not mute,
Those parted lips had said:

O ye that mourn,
A selfish grief ye give:
Restrain your tears
To pour for those that live!

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

In Three Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

IF Printed from early Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Harper & Brothers pay the author

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK II.

THE GOLDEN THREAD.

CHAPTER IX.

THE GORGON'S HEAD.

It was a heavy mass of building, that mansion of Monsieur the Marquis, with a large stone court-yard before it, and two great portes-cochères. A stony business altogether, with heavy stone balustrades, and stone figures and stone flowers, and stone faces of men, and stone heads of lions, in all directions. As if the Gorgon's head had surveyed it, when it was finished, two centuries ago.

Up the broad flight of shallow steps, Monsieur the Marquis, Bandbox preceded, went from his carriage, sufficiently disturbing the darkness to elicit a loud remonstrance from an owl in the roof of the great pile of stable-building away among the trees. All else was so quiet that the flambeau carried up the steps, and the other flambeau held at the great door, burned as if they were in a close room of state, instead of being in the open night-air. After some delay, the owl's voice there was none, save the falling of a fountain into its stone basin: for it was one of those dark nights that hold their breath by the hour together, and then heave a long, low sigh, and hold their breath again.

The great door clanged behind him, and Monsieur the Marquis crossed a hall, grim with certain old boar spears, swords, and knives of the chase; grimmer with certain heavy riding-rods and whips, of which many a peasant, gone to his benefactor, Death, had felt the weight when his lord was angry.

Avoiding the larger rooms, which were dark and made fast for the night, Monsieur the Marquis, with his flambeau-bearer going before him, went up the staircase to a door in a corridor. This throws open and admitted him to his own private apartment of three rooms—his bedchamber and two others. High, vaulted rooms, with cool, unexpected floors, great depth to the hearths for the burning of wood in winter time, and all luxuries befitting the state of a marquis in a luxurious age and country. Other rooms in the last Louis but one, of the line that was never to break—the supercilious Louis was prosperous in their rich furniture; but it was diversified by many objects that were illustrations of old pages in the history of France.

A supper-table was laid for two, in the third of the rooms—a round room, in one of the four fire-extinguisher-topped towers. A small, lofty room, with its window wide open, and the wooden jalousie-blinds closed, so that the air was only showed in slight horizontal lines of black, alternating with their broad lines of stone color.

"My nephew," said the Marquis, glancing at the supper preparation, "they said he was not arrived."

Nor was he; but he had been expected with Monsieur.

"Ah! It is not probable he will arrive to-night; nevertheless, leave the table as it is. I shall be ready in a quarter of an hour."

In a quarter of an hour Monsieur was ready, and sat down alone to his sumptuous and choice supper. His chair was opposite to the window, and he had taken his soup, and was raising his glass of Bordeaux to his lips, when he put it down.

"What is that?" he calmly asked, looking with attention at the horizontal lines of black and stone color.

"Monseigneur? That?"

"Outside the blinds. Open the blinds."

It was done.

"Well?"

"Monseigneur, it is nothing. The trees and the night are all that are here."

The servant who spoke had thrown the blinds wide, had looked out into the vacant darkness, and stood, with that blank behind him, looking round for Monseigneur's order.

"Good," said the imperturbable master. "Close them again."

That was done too, and the Marquis went on with his supper. He was half-way through it when he again stopped with his glass in his hand, hearing the sound of wheels. It came on briskly, and stopped at the front of the chateau.

"Ask who is arrived."

It was the nephew of Monseigneur. He had been some few days upon the road. Monseigneur, early in the afternoon, he had diminished the distance considerably, but not so rapidly as to come up with Monseigneur on the road. He had heard of Monseigneur, at the posting-houses, as being left behind.

He was to be told (said Monseigneur) that supper awaited him and them, and that he was to be expected to come to it. In a little while he came. He had been known in England as Charles Darnay.

Monseigneur received him in a courtly manner, but they did not shake hands.

"You left Paris yesterday, Sir?" he said to Monseigneur, as he took his seat at table.

"Yesterday. And you?"

"I come direct."

"From London?"

"Yes."

"You have been a long time coming," said the Marquis, with a smile.

"On the contrary, I come direct."

"Pardon me! I mean, not a long time on the journey; a long time intending the journey."

"I have been detained by"—the nephew stopped a moment in his answer—"various business."

"Without doubt," said the polished uncle.

So long a pause was passed over after word passed between them. When coffee had been served, and they were alone together, the nephew, looking from the uncle and master to the eyes of the face that was like a fine mask, opened a conversation.

"I have come back, Sir, as you anticipate, pursuing the object that took me away. It cannot be one great and unexpected pity; but it is a sacred object, and if it had carried me to Death I hope I should have ventured me."

"Not to death," said the uncle; "it is not necessary to say, to death."

"I said purposely," returned the nephew, "whether, if it had carried me to the utmost brink of death, I hope I should have ventured me."

The deepened marks in the nose, and the heightening of the fine straight lines in the cruel face, looked almost as to say, that the uncle made a graceful gesture of protest, which was in the world-wide form of good breeding that it was not reassuring.

"Indeed, Sir," pursued the nephew, "for any thing I know, it may be expressly awaked to give a more suspicious appearance to the unsuspicious appearances that surrounded me."

"No, no, no," said the uncle, pleasantly.

"But however that may be," resumed the nephew, glancing at him with deep distrust, "I know that your diplomacy would stop me by any means, and would know no scruple as to means."

"My friend, I told you so," said the uncle, with a fine pathetion in the two marks. "Do me the favor to recall that I told you so, long ago."

"I recall it."

"Thank you," said the Marquis—very sweetly indeed.

His tone lingered in the air, almost like the tone of a musical instrument.

"In effect, Sir," pursued the nephew, "I believe it to be at once your bad fortune, and my good fortune, that has kept me out of a prison in France here."

"I do not quite understand," returned the uncle, sipping his coffee. "Dare I ask you to explain?"

"I believe that if you were not in disgrace with the court, and had been overshadowed by that cloud for years past, a letter de cachet would have sent me to some fortress indefinitely."

"It is possible," said the uncle, with great calmness. "For the honor of the family, I could even resolve to incommode you to that extent. May exercise me?"

"I perceive that, happily for me, the Reception of the day before yesterday was, as usual, cold one," observed the nephew.

"I would not say happily, my friend," returned the uncle, with refined politeness; "I would not be sure of that. A good opportunity for consideration, surrounded by the advantages of solitude, might influence your destiny to far greater advantage than you influence it for yourself. But it is useless to discuss the question. I am, as you say, at a disadvantage. These little instruments of correction, those gentle aids to the power and honor of families, these slight favors that might to incommode you, are only to be obtained now by interest and importunity. They are sought by so many, and they are granted (comparatively) to so few! It used not to be so, in France in all such things is changed for the worse. Our not remote ancestors held the right of life and death over the surrounding vulgar. From this room many such doors have been taken out to be hanged; in the next room (my bedroom), one fine day, to one knowledge, was pointed on the spot for professing some dissolent delicacy respecting his daughter—his daughter! We have lost many privileges; a new philosophy has become the mode; and the assertion of our station, in these days, might (I do not go so far as to say would, but might) cause us real inconvenience. All very bad, very bad!"

The Marquis took a gentle little pinch of snuff, and shook his head, as elegantly dependent as he could becomingly be, of a country still containing himself, that great means of regeneration.

"We have so asserted our station, both in the old time and in the modern time also," said the nephew, gloomily, "that I believe our name to be more detested than any name in France."

"Let us hope so," said the uncle. "Detestation of the high is the involuntary homage of the low."

"There is not," pursued the nephew in his former tone, "a face I can look at, in all this country round about us, which looks at me with any deference on it but the dark deference of fear and slavery."

"A compliment," said the Marquis, "to the grandeur of the family, merited by the manner in which the family has sustained its grandeur. Hah!" And he took another gentle little pinch of snuff, and lightly crossed his legs.

But when his nephew, leaning an elbow on the table, covered his eyes thoughtfully and deservedly with his hand, the fine mask looked at him sideways with a stronger concentration of keenness, closeness, and dislike, than was comportable with its wearer's assumption of indifference.

"Repression is the only lasting philosophy. The dark deference of fear and slavery, my friend," observed the Marquis, "will keep the dogs obedient to the whip, as long as this roof," looking up to it, "shets out the sky."

That might be so long as the Marquis supposed. If a picture of the chateau as it was to be a very few years hence, and of fifty like it as they too were to be a very few years hence, could have been shown to him that night, he might have been at a loss to claim his own from the ghastly, fire-charred, plunder-wrecked ruins. As for the roof he vaunted, he might have found that shutting out the sky in a new way—to wit, freely, from the eyes of the bodies into which its lead was fired, out of the barrels of a hundred thousand muskets.

"Repression," said the Marquis, "I will preserve the honor and repose of the family, if you will not. But you must be fatigued. Shall we terminate our conference for the night?"

"A moment more."

"As how, if you please."

"Sir," said the nephew, "we have done wrong, and are paying the fruits of wrong."

"We have done wrong?" repeated the Marquis, with an inquiring smile, and delicately pointing, first to his nephew, then to himself.

"Our family; our honorable family, whose honor is of as much account to both of us, in such different ways. Even in my father's time we did a world of wrong, injuring every human creature who came between us and our pleasure, whatever it was. Why need I speak of my father's time when it is equally yours? Can I separate my father's twin-brother, joint inheritor, and next successor, from himself?"

"Death has done that," said the Marquis.

"THIS, FROM JACQUES."

"And has left me," answered the nephew, "bound to a system that is frightful to me, responsible for it, but powerless in it; seeking to execute the last request of my dear mother's lips, and obey the last look of my dear mother's eyes, which implored me to have mercy and to redress; and tortured by seeking assistance and power in vain."

"Seeking them from me, my nephew," said the Marquis, touching him on the breast with his forefinger—they were now standing by the hearth—"you will forever seek them in vain, be assured."

Every fine straight line in the clear whiteness of his face was cruelly, craftily, and closely compressed, while he stood looking calmly at his nephew, with his snuff-box in his hand. Once again he touched him on the breast, as though his finger were the fine point of a small sword, with which, in delicate finesse, he ran him through the body, and said,

"My friend, I will die, perpetuating the system under which I have lived."

When he had said it, he took a communing pinch of snuff, and put his box in his pocket.

"Better to be a rational creature," he added then, after ringing a small bell on the table, "and accept your natural destiny. But you are lost, Monsieur Charles, I see."

"This property and France are lost to me," said the nephew, sadly; "I renounce them."

"Are they both yours to renounce? France may be, but is the property? It is worth mentioning; but, is it yet?"

He had no intention, in the words I used, to claim it yet. If it passed to me from you, to-morrow—"

"Which I have the vanity to hope is not probable."

"—or twenty years hence—"

"You do me too much honor," said the Marquis; "still, I prefer that supposition."

"—I would abandon it, and live otherwise and elsewhere. It is little to relinquish. What is it but the wretchedness of misery and ruin?"

"Hah!" said the Marquis, glancing round the luxurious room.

"To the eye it is fair enough, here; but seen in its integrity, under the sky and by the daylight, it is a crumbling tower of waste, mismanagement, extortion, debt, mortgage, oppression, hunger, nakedness, and suffering."

"Hah!" said the Marquis again, in a well-satisfied manner.

"If a work becomes mine it shall be put into some hands better qualified to free it slowly (if such a thing is possible) from the weight that drags it down, so that the miserable people who are not brave it, and who have been long wrong to the last extremity of endurance, may, in another generation, suffer less; but it is not for me, or mine, to do it. I am resolved on all this land."

"And you?" said the uncle. "Forgive my curiosity; do you, under your new philosophy, graciously instead to live?"

"I intend to, to live, what others of my countrymen, even with nobility at their backs, may have to do some day—work."

"In England, for example?"

"Yes. The family honor, Sir, is safe from me in that country. The family name can suffer from me in no other, for I bear it in no other."

The ringing of the bell had caused the adjoining bedchamber to be lighted. It now shone brightly through the door of communication. The Marquis looked that way, and listened for the retreating step of his valet.

"England is very attractive to you, seeing how indifferently you have prospered there," he observed then, turning his calm face to his nephew with a smile.

"I have already said, that for my prospects there, I am sensible I may be indebted to you, Sir. For the rest, it is my Refuge."

"They say, those beautiful English, that it is the Refuge of many. You know a compatriot who has found a Refuge there? A Doctor?"

"Yes."

"With a daughter?"

"Yes."

"Yes," said the Marquis. "You are fatigued. Good-night!"

As he bent his head in his most courtly manner there was a secrecy in his smiling face, and he conveyed an air of mystery to those words, which struck the eyes and ears of his nephew forcibly. At the same time, the thin straight lines of the setting of the eyes, and the thin straight lips, and the markings in the nose, carved with a sarcasm that looked handsomely diabolic.

"Yes," repeated the Marquis. "A Doctor with a daughter. Yes. So commendable a new philosophy! You are fatigued. Good-night!"

It would have been of as much avail to interrogate any stone face outside the chateau as to interrogate that face of his. He looked at him, in vain, in passing on to the door.

"Good-night!" said the uncle. "I look to the pleasure of seeing you again in the morning. Good repose! Light Monsieur my nephew to his chamber, there!—And here Monsieur my nephew in his bed, if you will be so polite as to himself, before he rang his little bell again, and summoned his valet to his own bedroom.

The valet came and gone, Monsieur the Marquis walked to and fro in his loose dressing-robe, to preserve himself gently from chill, but, still night. Rustling about the room, his softly-slippered feet making no noise on the floor, he moved like a refined animal, looked like some enchanted marquis of the impenetrably wicked old time, who should presently change into tiger form was either just going off or just coming on.

He moved from end to end of his voluptuous bedroom, looking again at the scraps of the day's journey that some onlooker into the secret of the slow toil up the hill at sunset, the setting sun, the descent, the mill, the prison on the crag, the time of ringing in the hollow, the peasants at the fountain, and the mender of roads with his blue cap lying out in the light from over the carriage. That fountain suggested the Paris fountain, the little basin bring on the step, the women bending over it, and the tall man with his arms up, crying, "Dead!"

"I am used to it," said Monsieur the Marquis, "and may go to bed."

So, leaving one night light burning on the large hearth, he let his thin gauze curtains fall around him, and heard the night break its silence with a sigh as he composed himself to sleep.

The stone faces on the outer walls stared blindly at the black night for three heavy hours; for three heavy hours the horses in the stables rattled their chains, the dogs howled, the owl made a noise with very little resemblance in it to the noise conventionally assigned to him by owl-boys-poets. But it is the obstinate custom of such creatures hardly ever to say what it set down for them.

For three heavy hours the stone faces of the chateau, like human, stared blindly at the night. Dead darkness lay on all the landscape, dead darkness added its own bulk to the heaping dust on all the roads. The burning sun had got to the pass that its little heaps of poor grass were undistinguishable from the sandy and the figure on the Cross might have come down, for any thing that could be seen of it. In the village, horses and beasts of prey were still. Dreaming, perhaps, of banquets, as the starved usually are, but of one and two at most. In the slave and the yoked ox may, its lean inhabitants slept soundly, and were fed and freed.

The fountain in the village flowed unseen and unheard, and the fountain at the chateau dropped unseen and unheard—both inaudible, but for the minutes that were falling from the spring of Time—through three dark hours. Then the gray water of both began to be ghostly in the light, and the eyes of the stone faces of the chateau were opened.

Lighter and lighter, until at last the sun touched the tops of the still trees, and poured its radiance over the hill. In the glow the water of the chateau fountain seemed to turn to blood, and the stone faces crimsoned. The carol of the birds was loud and high, and on the weathercock on the point of the highest of the bedchamber of Monsieur the Marquis one little bird sang its sweetest song with all its might. At the signal, the chateau awoke, and began to stare amazed, and, with open mouth and dropped under-lip looked at nothing in particular.

Now the sun was full up, and movement began in the village. Casement windows opened, early doors stood open, figures, angular figures, forth shivering—chilled, as yet, by the new event as it began—began the rotation that would toil of the day among the village population. Some to the fountain; some to the fields; men and women; the dog to the heels of both; the women there, to see to the poor live-stock, and lead the lean cow to the bull; the men, to be found by the roadside. In the church and at the Cross, a kneeling figure or two; attendant on the latter prayers, the lord over, tying for a breakfast among the weeds at its feet.

The chateau awoke later, as became its quality, but awoke gradually and surely. First, the lonely boar-spears and knives of the chase had been reckoned at all odd; then, had gleamed trenchant in the morning sunshine; now, doors and windows were opened, horses were in the stables looked round over their shoulders at the light and freshness pouring in at door-ways, leaves sparkled and rustled at iron-grated windows, dogs pulled hard at their chains, and rearers impatient to be loosed.

All these trivial incidents belonged to the routine of life and the return of morning. Surely not so the ringing of the great bell of the chateau, nor the running up and down the stairs, nor the hurried figure on the terrace, nor the booting and tramping here and there and every where, nor the quick saddling of horses and riding away?

What winds conveyed this hurry to the principal mender of roads, already at work on the hill-top beyond the village, with his day's dinner (not much to carry) lying in a bundle that it was worth no crow's while to peck at, in a heap of stones? Had the birds, carrying some grains of it as a distance, dropped seed on the road, as they sow chance seeds? Whether or no, the mender of roads ran, on the sultry morning, as if for his life, down the hill, knocked at the door, and never stopped till he got to the fountain.

All the people of the village were at the fountain, standing about in their depressed manner, and whispering low, but showing no other spirit than one grim curiosity and surprise. The leg sore, hastily brought in and tethered to any post that would hold them, were not fastened idly on, or lying down chewing the cud or nothing particularly respecting their entertainment, but were left free to the interrupted saunter. Some of the people of the chateau, and some of the people of the posting-house, and some of the local authorities, were armed more or less, and were crowded on the other side of the little stream in a responsible way, that was highly fraught with nothing. Already the mender of roads had penetrated pretty far into the set of the fountain, secular friends, and was smiting himself in the breast with his blue cap. All the people had fasted, and what portended the swift hoisting-up of Monsieur Gabelle behind a servant on horseback, and the conveying away at full gallop of Gabelle (double-laden though the horse was) at a smart pace, like a new version of the German ballad of Leonora?

It portended that there was one stone face too many at the chateau.

The Gorgon had surveyed the building again in the night, and had added the one stone face wanting—the stone face for which it had waited through about two hundred years.

It lay back on the pillow of Monsieur the Marquis. It was like a fine mask, suddenly carved, exactly over the terrified face. Only marble could have done it, and marble only could have stopped the heart of the stone figure attached to it was a knife. Round its hilt was a frill of fine lace, on which a smear of blood.

"Drive him fast to his tomb. This, from JACQUES."

LITERARY.

TICKNOR & FIELDS have added to the blue and gold series three works which we have but space to name. OWEN MEREDITH'S BEAUCHAMP'S CAREER is a novel of the day, and we shall refer to it next, and we rejoice in this complete collection of them. MRS. JAMESON'S SISTERS AND SISTERS are last, and a delightful little summer book they make. Our readers in the country who desire to possess, in a single volume, a delightful collection, some of the most excellent works of prose and poetry that have not found a shelf or a table, at 88, a heap condensed by the use of quickthrivy which saves labor, saves pain, and is economical, will find $10—I adhere to my settled conviction that, next to strength and good digestion, and a clear conscience, sometimes the quickest way to obtain gold is to make it—what a glorious library or storehouse they will make nearer fairy by striking to his own business than by any other way. Let the reader who has a library, or is having failed in some other pursuit, calculate on receiving his library by gold-digging, and see how much he will be likely to rise to the end of his days.

LOG OF THE "ARGO."

The steamship Argo, of the Galway line, which left this port for Galway at 11 o'clock A. M. on Tuesday, having on board 1,000 tons of coal, ran on a rock on Tuesday evening about noon in a dense fog, and sunk in about half an hour. All the passengers and crew were saved, but the vessel is reported a total loss, and it is thought that the cargo will prove a total loss. The following telegram was transmitted to the Herald:

ST. JOHN, N. F., June 17, 1859.

The Argo, at Trepassy Bay, on the 14th inst., struck last night. A great portion of the luggage and cargo is in sweet water. Every assistance was rendered by the fishermen in the vicinity. The passengers and crew are safe; a tug-boat has gone to the result of said misunderstanding, and there is nothing more to be apprehended. There are two hundred passengers, nearly one hundred women, and seven young children. The vessel is a total wreck, and was insured. The cargo is also insured. A great many are left destitute. The crew and other passengers will be sent home. The vessel is fortunately very prompt. Four favorite women were put on board the new Argo, when we were last on board the ship. Miss Heywood, the vocalist, has lost every thing, and is left destitute. Miss Heywood, the vocalist, has lost every thing, and is left destitute. Miss Heywood, the vocalist, has lost every thing, and is left destitute.

The Argo, at Trepassy Bay, on the 14th inst., struck last night. A great portion of the luggage and cargo is in sweet water. Every assistance was rendered by the fishermen in the vicinity. The passengers and crew are safe; a tug-boat has gone to the result of said misunderstanding, and there is nothing more to be apprehended. There are two hundred passengers, nearly one hundred women, and seven young children. The vessel is a total wreck, and was insured. The cargo is also insured. A great many are left destitute. The crew and other passengers will be sent home. The vessel is fortunately very prompt. Four favorite women were put on board the new Argo, when we were last on board the ship. Miss Heywood, the vocalist, has lost every thing, and is left destitute. Miss Heywood, the vocalist, has lost every thing, and is left destitute. Miss Heywood, the vocalist, has lost every thing, and is left destitute.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.

We read in the Herald: "Madison and Fifth streets were in a state of excitement yesterday, and a crowd would permit yesterday morning, in consequence of the marriage of Miss Mary Stewart, daughter of the late and county of New York, to Miss Fannie Anderson, daughter of Mr. Anderson, of Virginia, a gentleman well with the Letitias, Gilseys, and Lillietbals in the various trade of the metropolis. The Stewarts, for years in fact, industry, and perseverance, accumulated a pretty large fortune, and have always been known as a family of something magnificent. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Dr. Tyng, at St. George's Church, in Fifth street, and the bride was given away by her father. The church was entirely filled, and among the noticeable were Governor Morgan and staff, Mayor Wood and staff, and a crowd of politicians, more or less distinguished, who had come out of curiosity to see the fun. The bride, groom, and one of the groomsmen, Mr. John W. Forney, of Washington, left for Saratoga immediately after the ceremony, to be present at the Democratic State Convention, where, it is said, they will be joined by Governor Auchmuty, at the residence of Mr. Anderson, in Madison square, where a grand reception will be held this evening, and many thousand invitations were issued. The presents are said to be very numerous and costly, including a diamond necklace, presented by Mr. Anderson to his wife with the utmost exquisitely; the bride was charmingly dressed, and received the congratulations. As we have stated above, the Democratic Convention at Saratoga will be graced by the most exquisite certain that he deserves it. He will take a room at the Clarendon Hotel, and will be found in the bar-room, the bench of the saunters will be occupied entirely by Mr. J. Craig Duncan, Mr. Anderson's confidential secretary, who holds him a perfect terror to evil-doers.

THE PRESIDENT'S HOME TOUR.

The following important letter has been addressed to the President:

"As several papers have published notices of the intended omission of Cincinnati from your tour, and the presents and other Western States, you will doubtless be the means of saving the people of Ohio from the loss of time, and sixpence or thirpence their money, by publishing the fact that the Cincinnati Board of Trade have got a footing in the affair. The first specimen of the Board's attention next week, will be a proposition to cut down, shorten, and, if possible, wholly worthless the enjoyment of the visit. Then will follow the bill for the same. It is demanded is quite limited.

"I am, Sir, overwhelmed with letters from Western friends on this subject, and I find that many of them are not at all quite recently that they were digging now, but that it was what had been the Board of Trade.

Yours, respectfully,

"SCRUTELLIUS BROTHERS & CO.

"NEW YORK, June 23, 1859."

A YOUNG LADY KILLED BY LIGHTNING.

The New Albany (Indiana) Ledger of July 1 says: "At eight o'clock on Wednesday morning a young lady named Miss Mary Ann Hamilton, living in Floyd County, about ten miles from that city, to the right of the Ivy Bluff, was instantly killed by lightning. She was sitting in the house at the time of the fatal stroke by the side of a window, and the lightning struck the house, and struck her on the left side of the head, burning her dress to ashes, and passing through the house, and out at the back door. She was found in her chair, dead, and the house was on fire. Death followed instantaneously.

BLUE-FISH AND SWORD-FISH.

A correspondent of the Boston Journal writes: "The 'blue-fish' season has just commenced, and Eggbert and Nantucket are already in possession of them. It is a very exciting amusement. The blue-fish, as you are aware, is a voracious fish, and sometimes runs for fifteen pounds each. It is caught by trolling, with a line about 150 feet long, to which a spoon-hook is caught with the naked hook, having for bait a piece of pork-rind. The boat is rowed at a rapid rate, and the fish, seeing the spoon, dart at it, and are hooked as through the water, and seizes it without eating by the entire mouth, and is hooked in the upper jaw, and, before he is fairly aware of it, finds himself a prisoner beyond his depth of water.

"There is something very remarkable and peculiar about the sword-fish. He is a fish of the most destructive feeding-ground, in the summer season, spears the whales and other large fish. Occasionally, apparently, some hundred years ago, they were very common in the mouths of the Connecticut and Hudson, and rarely disappeared, and were unknown for many years, or for some reason, they have now returned to their old haunts. Last week, in the harbor of Eggbert, in the habitants of a famous fish, called the 'blue-fish,' which were pursuing a school of small fish, and came close enough to the shore to see the sword-fish, and in a moment, with the rapidity of a flash of lightning, he struck ain was remanded to prison as a confederate in the transaction. Hughes was also reconnitted for trial on the charge. The statement of this girl undoubtedly explains the manner in which burglars usually operate, and it is believed by the police that most of them are in league with servant girls.

THE MARKET VALUE OF KISSES.

An Indiana lawyer writes to the Savannah Gazette: "In your issue of June 18 I noticed a communication from a portion of the history of a judicial proceeding in the State of Georgia, the value of a kiss in damages at forty dollars. In the part of Hoosierdom the north of this community the value of kisses is fixed by law by custom, judicially, or otherwise. Some twelve months since I defended a gentleman charged with having committed an assault and battery on the body of one Mrs. ——, of this place. The testimony for the prosecuting witness, was that the defendant kissed his client without her consent, and that she had not at all lured him in his undertaking. The fine and costs amounted to fifty dollars. Had the defendant been successful in his enterprise, I have no doubt the damages would be more value than forty dollars in 'Old Rigley,' and we may look at this time for the widow's precedent in South-ern Indiana."

A BEAR FIGHT.

The Piscataquis Observer says: "A subscriber, writing to us from North Dover, Me., says that last week he saw that rare thing on the farm of Colonel Thomas Fowler, on the 16th inst. One of Mr. Fowler's men was in the cow house, which were about one hundred rods from the house, and in the edge of the woods when he saw a bear and her two cubs; he hallooed to his elder brother, some 14 years of age, to come to him with a pistol; he brought one of Hannibal's ten-inch pistols, as the other he had just loaded with powder only. John took the pistol, fired the pistol at the bear's head, and she then gave up a yell to her young ones, and they all three started to come down and give battle. The boys then ran to the house, got their guns and took for the boys. John got the gun first and after her got wounded and shot the head until he bent it badly, and the dog made such inroads upon her that she gave up the fight, and she was forced to give battle to him—the dog—which took a like boys to get rid of the bear. She then left the two cubs, and went home with one live one to their mother doing this spring's work. The dog received the honor of victory as General Scott or Taylor in the Mexican War."

PERSONAL.

Governor Banks, of Massachusetts, visited West Point on Saturday, and was politely received by the Professors of the Military School. Ex-governor Cassidy of Louisiana became the guest of Lieutenant General Scott. He was also entertained by Professor Church. Governor Banks unsuccessfully for Congress in Mr. Hankin's district, and Mr. Cassidy, of California, opposed Mr. Weller, who carried at the residence of the junior gentleman over Sunday, and returned to the city. Governor Cassidy will become the guest of the two Governors of the Alms-house. Governor Banks will be the guest of Mr. Hankin, who is a steadfast friend to the Republicans of the old Bay State.

The Honorable Stephen A. Douglas has arrived at Nashville, and takes rooms at the Maxwell House.

Senator Benjamin, of Louisiana, is on his way to this city, to visit Dr. Gwynn, of No. 80 Fifth Street, for advice about until the meeting of Congress.

The Church of the Epiphany, in Philadelphia, have extended a call to the Rev. Henry A. Wise, son of General Wise, of Virginia. It is known that Governor Wise will probably accept. Although but recently admitted, Mr. Wise ought to be a popular preacher, as he is eloquent and fervent and speaks without notes.

The Rev. Mr. ——, an eccentric preacher in Michigan, was holding forth one Sunday in the pulpit, when a woman arose to go out, when the preacher said: "Your room, if you please, sir." "Sir!" said the woman, "I guess you say ma'am!" The sinner stopped and reflected a moment, and replied, sweetly, "Well, I guess I'll remain where I went on."

The colonel of Plumer, the Boston convict, are about to appeal to a writ of error from the decision of the court of criminality in making up the record. It is questionable whether a writ of error will take from the decision of the Supreme Court in a capital case. The Rev. A. B. Fuller, of Boston, preached a sermon against gambling on Sunday, in the course of which he made a strong appeal in behalf of Plumer. Petitions for his pardon are in circulation in Massachusetts, and are receiving many signatures. It is reported that the prisoner's health is not his real name, and that he is a near relative of a distinguished United States minister.

Mr. Nicholas Longworth, the veteran vine-grower in Cincinnati, recently published an address to participate in a railroad opening celebration, in the following cut out terms:

DEAR SIR,—Young Jerusalem are fond of traveling on railroads where no one is made. I therefore decline the kind and accept the invitation to visit Chicago. The shall be happy to meet you there, and to see you at the grand feast of tasting and discussing the wine.

Yours respectfully, N. LONGWORTH.

A long passenger factor on the Lake Mr. Charles, the editor of the Chicago Press and Tribune, who has spoken disrespectfully of his wine-cellar.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR.

PASSAGE OF THE ADDA BY THE FRENCH.

The London Daily News publishes the following account, dated, Paris, June 14:

On the 13th the Emperor removed his head-quarters to Gorgonzola. In the afternoon his Majesty personally reconnoitred the position of the Austrians on the line of the Adda. The operation, which presented serious difficulties, was perfectly effected. As soon as it was known that the enemy occupied the army began its movement, which was to be carried out secretly. Under cover of the night the soldiers took again become free, and the troops are to high spirits."

EVACUATION OF CENTRAL ITALY BY THE AUSTRIANS.

The Patrie says that the Austrians have completely evacuated the States of the Church, including Ancona and Ferrara. The same paper also states that the people of Parma have seized their Government and driven out the Ministry. M. Brenier leaves on 14th for Naples, as Envoy-Minister of France at the Court of the King of the Two Sicilies.

Piacenza, Ancona, and Bologna have been evacuated. The Austrians destroyed the fortifications of Piacenza before they left it.

The Austrian Correspondence of the 12th contains the following:

Placenza has been evacuated by our troops; the walls and citadel have been blown up. The garrison was embarked on the joining the body of the army.

The war-steamer Cardenas arrived on the 12th instant at Kiel, from Ancona, bringing the news that the Austrians had evacuated that town.

POSITION OF THE HOSTILE ARMIES.

By our latest accounts we hear that the allied army passed the Serio on the 13th, marching toward that of Oglio. Their advanced guard was at Cocaglio.

The head-quarters of the King of Sardinia were at Palazzuolo.

Garibaldi was at Brescia on the 13th. Urbano's corps quitted Cocaglio on the 13th, and appeared to be retiring to Antinori.

The Nord says a second series of operations by the Allies will be simultaneously commenced by sea and land. The allied troops are all to be put in movement to the right bank of the Po, and the Austrians will be attacked in their position on the Mincio. Passages to support the right wing of the French army.

The Austrian Marshal Count Schlick has arrived, and he was concentrating his forces in order to attack the allies on the right bank of the Oglio, and it was believed in Paris that a decisive battle would be fought in the course of a week.

GARIBALDI'S MOVEMENTS.

The division of General Urbano, since sustained a fight at Castiendeo with Garibaldi's bands, which, although commanded by Colonel Medici, was under Garibaldi, was repulsed by the Austrians.

Garibaldi is represented as becoming daily more formidable. It was threatening the Southern Tyrol, and was in full march to assuage the Austrian troops in Austrian rule.

Garibaldi, when at Milan, had interviews with the Emperor and King of Sardinia.

THE SPIRIT OF INVENTIONS.

The following proclamations have been issued by the Emperor of the French:

"TO THE PEOPLE OF ITALY.

"The fortune of war bringing me into the capital of Lombardy, I come to meet Italy's wishes.

"Your intelligent patriotism has understood that I resolved to support my ally, the Sardinian King; the plebiscite has responded to my loyalty and my hopes.

"Your free echo are mixed have tried to lessen the sympathies which unite us. Some men have gone so far as to say that I only made war for personal ambition or to overthrow the Austrian power. Those who speak thus do not understand the epoch they live in, I am not of their number.

"In a sound state of public opinion, at this time of day, such reproaches would be impossible; they would exert then by barren conquests. I seek with pride that which will be the glory of my reign, the liberty of a great Italian land to-day.

"Your welcome has proved that you fully understand my intentions. I have not come amongst you to impose upon sovereign, or to impose on you my will. My army is not an army of conquest; it is an army of liberation. In burning with the sacred fire of patriotism, be soldiers to-day, to become yourselves citizens to-morrow.

"HEAD-QUARTERS, MILAN, June 8, 1859." "NAPOLEON.

THE ARMY OF ITALY.

"PROCLAMATION TO THE ARMY OF ITALY.

"SOLDIERS!—One month ago, relying confidently on reckless invasion of Piedmont by the Austrian troops had crossed the Ticino, and were marching on Turin. Sardinia called on me to come to her assistance. I hastened under our Alliss to defend; by small fractions beyond the Alps, and by sea, our army was assembled, and prepared for the struggle.

"The enemy, however, knew the energy of the nation and your own courage have supplied all deficiencies. France and Italy will be grateful to you for this. Your task is not, and in one sentiment she but shows the might of her resources and the vitality of her institutions. The operations commenced two days ago, and the Piedmontese army has already gained a glorious victory.

"The allied army has been successful in four engagements, and in the battles of Montebello, Palestro, Turbigo, and Magenta, has taken 80 guns, killed or wounded 20,000 men hors de combat, taken 12 guns, 5 colors, and made 6,000 prisoners. It is now about to give battle in store for us, more obstacles to overcome.

"I rely upon the valor, discipline, and endurance of the army of Italy! Prove itself worthy of its brothers-in-arms.

"HEAD-QUARTERS, MILAN, June 8, 1859." "NAPOLEON.

GARIBALDI'S PROCLAMATION.

By way of contrast with the above is the proclamation issued by Garibaldi to the inhabitants of Como:

"INHABITANTS OF COMO!—A new enemy to the market are called on to join the Christian banner. No one would be so base as to remain deaf to the sacred call. It is a war; no one will be obliged to quit their country and their hearths. The war will be carried on in the hearts and hearts of the people. Let the Austrians be driven when you speak of your hatred for Austria. To arms, then, Italians! Let us show that we are worthy of the generation which will have accomplished the work of Italian independence!" "GARIBALDI."

THE BATTLE OF MAGENTA.

Mr. Russell, the famous war correspondent of the London Times, has published a graphic account of the battle of Magenta, from which we make a few extracts:

"The Austrians, who had been retreating back the river's banks, had left behind them a force to hold the bank and fight with rifle and bayonet. Except on the road, there was no convenient place for the passage of troops. The French had some rocket batteries, however, with which they played powerfully on the enemy, and it was in such a fight that the superiority of the rifle showed itself over the usual musket with the Austrian battalions opposed. Beaten this, the defenders of the position kept as much as possible in close line, so that a number of their adversaries told upon them. You never saw such a regular display of courage as that of the Austrians. Even the Austrians defended inch by inch, but failed to take advantage of the ground. They fought in the open, and were shot down in the open. Their line was maintained with blood, and speaking of the obstinate resistance which was made, I cannot say that the Austrians have been removed and the dead mostly buried. Of course, the wounded were carried off, but there are still many tragedies of woes and misery most thin have been left behind.

THE ASSAULT ON THE VILLAGE.

"It was a very fine, and, I should say, a very strong village. Here every house had become a castle, held by a desperate garrison. Each had been loopholed and fortified, and after the enemy had been driven out of the streets they had retired into the houses, and there continued the fight. Some of the houses were of two stories high, and from the windows of the upper rooms they poured a destructive fire upon the assailants. The French had to force their way into the houses, and to fight their way from room to room. Some of the houses were set on fire, and the wounded who were in them were burned to death. Others were blown up with gunpowder. The fighting was terrible. The Austrians defended themselves with the greatest obstinacy, and the

OUR MAP OF NORTHERN ITALY.

We publish this week, at very great expense, the best Map of Northern Italy which we have seen. It is the work of John Dower, Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society of England, and contains every town, village, fort, river, stream, ridge of mountains, railway, and high road within the limits of Lombardy and the greater part of the Province of Venetia. With the aid of this Map the reader will be able to trace the course of the hostile armies from the passage of the Ticino by the Austrians to the present moment, and to follow the comintants until the plains of Northern Italy have ceased to be the theatre of the war.

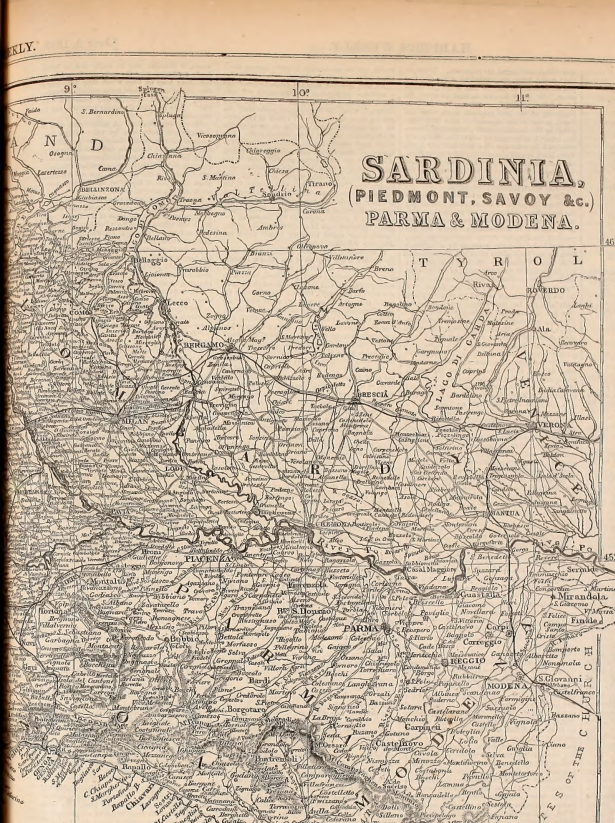
The student will thus detect without difficulty the points at which the three divisions of Gyulai's army invaded the Kingdom of Sardinia—Arona, on Lake Maggiore, in the north, and, further south, the bridge of Buffalora, and the ford of Abbiate Grasso. Following the invaders in their brief but destructive operations in Piedmont, he will find in large characters the places they successively occupied—Novara, Vercelli, Casale, Robbio, Vigevano, Gravellone, etc. Every one of these places has been the scene of some conflict or act of brigandage which has been related in the papers. Turning then to the west, the student will discover Mount Cenis, over which the Zouaves and other French troops crossed to defend Turin; and on the south Genoa, where Napoleon landed the bulk of his army. North of Genoa, and connected with it by railway, stands the fortress of Alessandria, of which we lately published an admirable view; it was here that Napoleon matured his daring plan for the passage of the Ticino. We are now in the midst of battle-fields. Only three or four miles distant is the memorable plain of Marengo, the sight of which roused the soldiers of the present empire to emulate the deeds of the men of the first. A few miles south of Casale is Frassinetto, the scene of the first skirmish in this war. North of this, and five miles southeast of Vercelli, stands Palestro, where King Victor Emanuel attacked the Austrians with such chivalrous daring that even the Zouaves brought him to be more careful. Further south, on the Po, about four miles east of Voghera, is Montebello, the scene of the first great battle of the war, which we have illustrated in recent numbers. Moving north again, the student will be able to appreciate the extraordinary boldness of Napoleon's flank march. On 31st May, General Gyulai's head-quarters were at Garlasco, in Piedmont; and while strong corps defended the road of the Duchies toward Pavia and Piacenza—on which side the Austrians were persuaded that the attack would be made—the powerful armies held Mortara, Robbio, and the neighboring villages. In the face of these troops, amounting to nearly 200,000 men, Napoleon sent Canrobert and Niel round to the north; they occupied Vercelli and Novara, and thus compelled Gyulai to remove his head-quarters to Abbiate Grasso. The Emperor himself followed with the bulk of the army, and, without losing an hour, crossed the Ticino at Turbigo and Buffalora. The battle of Magenta followed, and, after his defeat, the Austrian commander removed his head-quarters to Binasco, and subsequently to Belgiojoso. After the entry of the French into Milan, the battle of Melegnano, in which Baraguay D'Hilliers redeemed his character, followed in order; and again the Autrians fell back on the line of the Adda. At our latest accounts, which are to 11th June, the Austrians had left Pavia, Pizzeuzo, and Lodi, had abandoned the defense of the line of the Adda (which the French were crossing), and were falling back on the Mincio. All these places will be found on the accompanying Map.

The admirers of Garibaldi, the patriot chief, will likewise be able to trace his wonderful successes on our Map. The whole mountain range, on the slopes of which he is operating, is faithfully depicted; the reader can follow him to Como, the scene of his first victory, up the slope to Bellagio, toward the Spligen, and down again to Lecco and Bergamo, which he now occupies. With equal ease the student can find the strong places which the Austrians have just evacuated in the Papal States, and the points from which Prince Napoleon is operating in Tuscany. In a word, with this Map the history of the war becomes simple and clear; without it, all is confusion and mystery.

It remains to say something about those portions of the war which are destined to come into note hereafter.

At our latest accounts the Austrians were in full retreat toward what has been called their great Quadrangle. This quadrangle consists of a square space of country inclosed at the four corners by four fortresses—Peschiera and Verona on the north, and Mantua and Legnago on the south. All four are naturally very strong places, and all have been strengthened to the utmost by art. Without them the rivers Adige and Mincio would constitute a very fair defense for the country inclosed by them; with the forts the site is strong indeed. Let us examine the place in detail

Mantua is the most important place in the quadrangle, and is probably the strongest place in Italy. It stands in the midst of swamps and floods, which, in summer time, breed fevers of a very dangerous character, and afford a good protection against a besieging army. Such is the insalubrity of the place that the Austrian commanders have always objected to sending crack regiments there. For centuries it has been a place of arms. It was a noble city in the Middle Ages, and though frequently the scene of heroic combats, was rarely taken. Its lords strengthened it to their utmost; its fortifications were again improved by the Austrians before the attack by Bernadotte; the French added something; and of late years the Austrian engineers have exhausted ingenuity to render the place impregnable. The roads to the city through the swamps are so laid down that they can be overflowed and [illegible] inched in a few hours by the people in favor of [illegible] gather. Consequently, [illegible] Jews. [illegible] streets. [illegible] There is [illegible] even of Mantua [illegible] Fever. However, [illegible] French, [illegible] Austrians.



SARDINIA,
(PIEDMONT, SAVOY &c.)
PARMA & MODENA.
T R O L
Vercelli
Novara
Milan
Lodi
Pavia
Como
Lecco
Bergamo
Brescia
Verona
Mantua
Peschiera
Piacenza
Parma
Reggio
Modena
Massa
Carrara
Lucca
Pietrasanta
Camajore
Serravalle
Mirandola
Finale
Borgotaro
Castelnovo
Sarzana
Spezzia
Caprera
Bastia
Corsica
Leghorn
Florence
Pisa
Siena
Sienna
Orbitello
Porto Ferraio
Elba
Piombino
Volterra
Pontremoli
Fivizzano
Castiglione
Guastalla
Novellara
Correggio
Scandiano
Sassuolo
Castelfranco
Nonantola
Carpi
Rubiera
Montecchio
Canossa
Tassarolo
Gavi
Voltaggio
Ovada
Acqui
Alessandria
Tortona
Novi
Serravalle
Arquata
Gavi
Ronco

JULIA IN HEAVEN.

BY GEORGE W. CHAPMAN.

Fan up in the misty Andes' side,
Away from the summer's sultry glow,
A calm and sequestered vale lies hid,
Where the violets bloom by the melting snow.
Deep cleft in the heavy mountain's breast,
And studded aloft in its mighty arms,
That vale is a scene of peaceful rest,
Secure from the fierce and the active storms.
No winters their blights to its verdure bring,
And it smiles in the bloom of eternal spring.

The winding path to this vernal retreat
Is barred by stern crags and shelving rocks,
Inaccessible save to the shepherd's feet
And his timid and half-clothed flocks.
And hither in summer the Indian comes
From the arid plain and the withered grove;
He takes to his arms the tender lambs
And places them high on the cliffs above,
And the bleating mothers will follow the cries,
Low soon and beckon the mothers on.

I know that the Shepherd has taken our child
And has lifted her tenderly up on high!
That she breathes, where the zephyrs are soft and mild,
Of the fragrance of ever-new fruit known in the sky:
I see not the angelic throng,
For the gushing tears will not be dried,
I can not hear the seraphic song,
For my poor heart's throbbings will not be still:
But a fondly fancies I see and hear,
And I know that my Julia is beckoning to me.

"SIGNS OF THE TIMES."

BY MARTYN PAINE, M.D., LL.D.

"Ye can discern the face of the sky, but can ye not discern the signs of the times?"—Matthew, xvi. 3.

"Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred threescore and six."—Revelation, xiii. 18.

"None of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand."—Daniel, xii. 10. Referring to the following quotation.

THE passing events of a few late years have directed the attention of many readers to the prophecies that remain to be fulfilled; and although I have been long inclined to think that their consummation is at hand, I do not intend to raise any alarm in the community. It is true that, were these events shall be accomplished in kind will look on with great consternation, especially that portion which has been more addicted to the unbridled indulgence of flesh. But I am apt to believe that this is the worst that can befall them, and that they will not be surprised into a more lively appreciation of the divine origin of the Bible, and of a divine interposition in the affairs of the human race, with their power will cease to be a mere matter of form. Moreover, not only the people but the Jews will have a timely and solemnity of this new proclamation, for both of them will be equally included in the summons. I will not, on the contrary, think it any more likely to be "a new light," not even an interpreter of prophecy, but simply a reasonable one, by whom all the "signs of the times" were totally against the conclusions at which they arrived in relation to those unfulfilled prophecies about which any man may venture to think of speculating. The main bulk of these interpreters are Sir Isaac Newton and Bishop Newton; and, as I have intimated, they are also the more ancient and important by the absence of all signs to guide them, and from having published their opinions exclusively of Revelation, yet conceding that these prophecies can not be thoroughly understood until they are thoroughly fulfilled.

It may be next said that there remain four unfulfilled prophecies about which we have a right to speculate, and whose fulfillment, according to the foregoing interpreters, will occur in the following order: First, the overthrow of the Mohammedan power; second, of the Papal power; third, the universal diffusion of Christianity; fourth, the conversion and restoration of the Jews. Now the time of the fulfillment of these events must be necessarily determined if the period could be fixed from which began the 1260 days of St. John, and the "time, times, and a half," each of John and Daniel, which equally mean 1260 years, since it is not doubted by our authorities that the fall of the Ottoman and Papal powers will be nearly simultaneous, and as the expiration of the 1260 years, and the final doom of Rome, event will happen at intervals of about 35 years afterward. It may be also premised that we are said by these interpreters to be living under the "sixth trumpet," the end of which will be the total fall of the Ottoman power, and the end of the "second woe," when the "third woe cometh quickly," consisting of the "seventh [and last] trumpet," which includes the "seven vials." The trumpet is properly the termination of the 1260 years, and presumes the final doom of Rome, when its power will be trodden without the city, and blood come out of the wine-press, even unto the horses' bridles, by the space of one thousand six hundred furlongs" (Revelation, xiv. 20); which has been ascertained to be the exact distance from the walls of Rome to the River Po and the North Sea, always the extent of the Roman States. The "seven vials of wrath" will be "poured out" in quick succession.

Now the point of difficulty is in ascertaining when the supremacy of the Pope was fully established, as here begins the reckoning of the 1260 years. Bishop Newton thinks it "appears to be most probable that it is to be dated from the year 727," though inclined, also, to the opinion that it may be the year 606, when the tyrant Phocas, by virtue of a grant of the Pope, established his supremacy, and especially, also, on account of the remarkable coincidence that it was in this year that Mohammed forged his imposture. These periods would bring the fulfillment of the first two prophecies either to the year 1866 or 1987, or thereabout. Sir Isaac Newton inclines to about the latter date, or that the year 755 may have been the beginning of the 1260 prophetic days, when the Papal power is also supposed to have been completed by the accession of the exarchate of Ravenna; while it is thought by others that the power was not fully confirmed till a little later, for as yet Rome itself was governed by a prefect of the Pope, but was brought under the Papal yoke by Charles the Great. This event certainly completed the supremacy of the Church, which was the critical period at which the 1260 years began.

The reader will see that all the premises relative to the period so important for ascertaining the beginning fulfillment of the prophecies which lie in the future, which alone I am now desired to speculate. If Mohammed's forgery and the grant by the Emperor Phocas determine the time, we may look out, at any moment, for a hurricane from the last blast of the seventh and the beginning of the eighth trumpet. We may soon expect, say, to witness, in the overturning of the Ottoman and Roman empires, something like the voice which "answered Job out of the whirlwind, saying, who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?" Or, should the latest date be the true one, the most that can be anticipated of the foregoing events will be a mighty storm increasing in significance till the grand denouement takes place about the beginning of the year 2000.

Other and late interpreters, who have been guided by the "signs of the times," have neglected the study of the events, and, therefore, among other fallacies, it was imagined that Napoleon I. was fighting in July the great battle of the year, but has not been considered that the universal upheaval of Christianity is to succeed that event with, in a few years, and there is no room for it "to consummation so devoutly to be wished." There must be, then, a still-coming and overwhelming to this occult subject until there shall appear simultaneously a combination of "signs" indicative of the near approach of the world-changing event, the conversion and restoration of the Jews, which is necessary to precede the millennium, and the antecedent prophecies; who, however, may be seen to be, by their isolated position, in constant readiness for their restoration to Judea. The next year approach, for the prophetic war in Italy is to be abrupt, and although the present appearances favor among the heathen nations within thirty-five years after.

Hitherto, therefore, the requisite combination of "signs" has not existed; but let us see if there be not a combination of them at this time to justify an opinion that the present war in Italy is the war of Revelation. It is scarcely doubtful that Christ and Antichrist have overspread China, Japan, etc., within a brief period—certainly within half a century. Each nation of the Greek empire and the Papal and Ottoman powers must have fallen, and the great battle have come off in Italy. The latter "signs" are equally as important; and any day may bring us intelligence of a fatal revolution in the East, especially as the Jews are to be stimulated by the Italian commotions, and may be promoted by Russia and France. It is also worthy of remark that it is only in Italy that the name of the Powers which had sustained the Roman Church might be found in combination (Rev. xvii. xvii. 16, etc.); and Bishop Newton observes that, "As the kings of France have coordinated greatly to the Roman interest, it is not improbable that that, some true or other, they may also be the principal instruments in the hands of God in the great work" that the machinery of war and the present attitude of Italy are all that are necessary for the verification of the prophecy, and that the Jews be made to point to be considered, for the purpose of identity, as the "kings of the east" mentioned as the foes of Turkey with the first in the series of the unfulfilled prophecies, relative to the present condition of Christianity. In this view, events are overspread the earth? If so, then bloody conflicts must immediately ensue; and the overthrow of the Pope and Sultan, unless the prophecies are misapprehended. What, then, are the "signs" relative to the prosperity condition of Christianity? On the first place, the Scriptures are translated into more than 200 languages, and this is being rapidly spread. Next, China and Japan are unreservedly opened to its propagation; and nearly the same may be affirmed of the whole heathen world. The other incidental movements may be taken into the account, such as the sending out of the Apocryphal Bible for them and the sword for Antichrist); the general co-operation of the secular press in disseminating Christianity; even the late publication of this article in Harper's Weekly; the unusual and unprecedented spirit of the Christian system; the rapidly-increasing co-operation of Christians for the dissemination of the Bible; the "running to and fro" of "many throughout the edge" [Dan. xii. 4]; the identification of the Bible with civilization; the "flying of the eagles," and the probability that this language—the only "flying" which the spoken-world can be carried over the earth, thereby fulfilling Zephaniah's prophecy, which relates to the subjects before us, that "from the rivers of Ethiopia my suppliants, even the daughters of my dispersed, shall bring me an offering" [Zeph. iii. 9]; the increase of benevolence and of the humanity of penal laws; the independence of private judgment, the miseries of established institutions, and the increasing tyranny over private opinion in all countries where governments are despotic, thus leading to revolutions; the rapid extension and independence of the periodical press; the democratic character of the laws and institutions in the United States and Great Britain, as forming the ground-work of that universal liberty which must prevail when mankind shall generally embrace the precepts of Christianity; the intimate, and, in many instances, friendly relations which the human Church has formed with despotic governments, and the intolerance of both; besides many other analogous considerations.

All this, however, does not prove by itself that a universal propagation of Christianity will take place, especially within an early day; but other things, to which the foregoing are preliminary, do. Among these other things are events as unexpected, and apparently providential, as the admission of Christianity into the entire heathen world. One of the most essential is the certain and rapid extension of commerce, and the increasing mixing up of nations; and these events are made sure by the publications of late so far as relates to the vast amount of the wonderful discoveries of gold and of coal; the settlement of the Pacific coast, of Australia, of the Sandwich Isles, the colonization of Africa; the steam system; the electric telegraph; the expressage system, and the construction of the great continental rapid multiplication, in the future, of civilized Protestant man in all quarters of the globe, and the consequent tributary supplies which the foregoing will readily suggest.

In the concluding article, which has been hastily written at the request of the Editor, I regret that it may be useful to state, in regard to Daniel's Book of Revelation, which, in connection with its correspondences with Daniel, engages so much of the world's attention, that I have no Hebrew numerals of it—" I do not find any other book of the New Testament so strongly attested and consumed. All seem to consider the Apocalypse, which was flourished soon after St. John, and a disciple of his contemporary, "the prophetic" time as the Hebrew must be either Greek or Hebrew, ascertained that Lateinos, a name of the Roman kingdom, contains the numbers 30—1—50—5—10—100—1—70—200—1—10, N.—50, O.—70, P.—200=665. Subsequently the word Latinos, the Hebrew name for the Roman beast, or Roman kingdom, was found to also contain the same number: thus, "—200, L.—30, A.—1, T.—100, I.

sunk down under the burden of his life's failure, and could think of no deliverance.

But to such a man in such a strait it was impossible that death should come, or that he should find it. Who called his life a failure? Failure it might be, but who dared to name it so? Failure! when he felt in him the nerve, the energy, the courage of ten. Failure! when there were still battles to be fought, and laurels to be won. Failure! when his wife trusted in his integrity? Failure! when in her girlish sport she would call their boy "General," and now on his own knee, almost when she was a Captain's wife, before she was the sure chance of promotion.

Look at it. He had not money hours to deliberate. What if he had been successful in making a substitution? Would not the money be all spent, and he shrunk from going back to the old set, from looking at the old familiar faces, from hearing and seeing? Is it not the common, the easy way to turned his eyes? Do you not understand? There were some there whom he loved. Possibly they knew not his disgrace—though very sure he was they knew of his proposition. No sure he was they knew of his proposition. No sure but that his wife had received the letter—the letter that he should dispatch the hireling—and the trusting—those who had wished him God speed, and though in this time of confused thinking this thought was not uppermost in his brain, it was present in his heart—waiting to be recognized and to overwhelm him.

And then, what if he had deserted, or put an end to all by some desperate action? Because, though feeling himself afflicted, and smarting, and deeply feeling himself afflicted, and smarting, and self-cursed with idleness, he knew it from the man's testimony was rendered and recorded. To satisfy himself he must see and witness the completion of achievement. Brilliant exploits are not always heroic: there was genuine heroism in the soldier as now made. He knew it was that stood not on ready foundation.

So he said to himself in the gray twilight of that dismal morning, when his eyes, unclosed through all the night, saw the preparations being made for departure.

"I must go back to Fort Invincible. I must bear that too. For the sake of my wife and child he could endure more than this. Rachel married an honorable soldier, and why for shall never be ashamed to bear his father's name."

The 30th Regiment marched into Fort Invincible on the first day of May, to the great relief of the inhabitants of that lonely and desolate place, with waving banner, cannon-roar and shouting, broke on the quiet of the town. The public sense of security, greatly disturbed all the winter through, that the night and asleep now without fear and trembling—so light reflected on the faces as found their life's business in these occupations.

Seriously, in the new development of foreign affairs, Fort Invincible was looked upon as of importance—a position to be guarded. Its reinforcement was found to be necessary, and therefore accordingly, on the first day of May, the 30th Regiment was landed on the shore and marched to its new quarters.

Among the soldiers was the private, John Lattimer, by no means a soldier of the most martial or forbidden. These rocks had been the play-ground of his youth—he had grown up with visions of war and glory for his country, and had dreamed of forgiven fort walls—had played soldier till he became one, living means like. He had worked at the gunsmith shop of Louis Stormuld, gunsmith, who gave the tall his bread and the shelter of a roof, and intended to teach him the craft. But the call of arms and the forge—in me of the arms fashioned thereon—John Lattimer pursued the first, and had become broke the heart of old Louis, as well as his own heart, when, the deed of enlistment done, the troops were ordered immediately to a foreign land.

As tenderly as ever mother loved her son, Louis loved the lad whom he had reared, and his sorrow was sure the boy had been conscious since he could remember, but of the man's love he had no conception till he saw him with grief, and wrapped up like a woman distressed, to know that his boy had passed from his care to the hard, perilous life of a soldier.

Louis had spoken some harsh words on one occasion—and accused the boy of ingratitude, and prophesied that he who had served a benefactor so falsely would not be true to a stranger—and that he very soon he ceased to talk in this strain; he loved the lad too well; and, seeing the hard path he had chosen, he was anxious to assist in rising him as soon as he might, by generous wishes, and promises of aid, and hopeful prophecy. And having come to such speech—having controlled himself so far as to abide from his heart to speak thus—it was not possible that raging Lattimer should accept any other love without remorse for the pain he had occasioned the honest old man. So, when the news came of the fall, from a foreign land, he sent home to Louis the report of an action in which his name was conspicuous for valiant conduct.

Then, for years, he had continued to gladden the heart of Stormuld by his deeds. The old man had his captaincy he would fain have gone home, only to look into the eyes of Louis and show him his sword. But years passed on, and they had not met since first they parted.

And now they were to look upon each other! And specially, and only, because he feared to meet the disappointment and the grief of a man whom he had injured. Lattimer dreaded the voyage that he would not lose an hour, after the ship's arrival at Fort Invincible, before he sought his friend and made known to him the sad fulfillment of his first prophecy.

Louis' shop, he recollected, used to stand back of the hospital. It was quite conspicuously located with reference to other shops upon the street. There he found it—the same little stone building, with the old sign over the door—an armorer's shop of old time, that when John Lattimer looked at it he rubbed his eyes, and could not easily believe that what he saw was real.

He had no time to lose in making this visit—must return at once to head-quarters. He had only come to show his old benefactor that he was not ashamed to stand before him; to ask if he could have aid of him. He should not be gone five minutes, he assured his wife. So he walked up to the shop-door, opened it, and entered as one who came in haste on some important business.

Louis Stormuld was there alone, working at his grindstone, even as on the day when Lattimer stood there for the last time, and they talked with tremulous voices of their simple affairs—affairs that were less about to plunge. Little Stormuld looked, to Lattimer, at least half a century older than he looked on their day of parting.

And the soldier standing there—the mighty man of war—was awed by the spell of Louis Williams for his veritable inches, and his unquestionable muscle, and his hair flaming fiery red, as then, and quick as those of a detective—John Lattimer was changed so much, by exposure and by age, that Louis looked at him, saw him to be a soldier, and wondered what he wanted; and as the soldier did not speak immediately, he asked,

"Well, Sir, can I serve you?"

"Yes, that you can," said Lattimer, quickly. "Then, perhaps, your memory would serve me. Don't you know me, Louis?"

"No," said Stormuld, looking at the stranger doubtfully. He repeated the word with more decision.

"You—don't know me?"

Louis surveyed him again from head to foot, then, with a look of recognition, and a sad and wistful gaze of the old man, and recollected how much separated them—more than fifteen years, more than size and strength, more than years. The quick eyes of the old man saw those tears. He laid his hand on the soldier's shoulder.

"There's only one I can think of," said he. "It isn't John—it can't be Captain Lattimer!"

He spoke with confusion. This man was a fool soldier, but John Lattimer was a captain.

"Yes, I have got that rank. But why? I have been taken for Captain Lattimer before now."

More in doubt than before, Louis looked at the man. Some relation—some kinsman. And yet—no—certainly this was not Captain Lattimer. Still the longer he remained there the greater was the confusion. At length he broke out, flinging his old arms up in amazement, crying, breathlessly,

"Then, if you're not Captain Lattimer, I'm glad to see you are no captain, I should think. Come here in my arms, you rascal, you! Don't you know me, one?"

"A pretty one!" said John, with a feeble smile; and he shook his head. "You are right," he continued, "I am no captain, Stormuld."

"Then all I have to say," said Louis, with glistening eyes and faltering voice; and in his hard old hands he took those of the soldier, and held them, "Any way, I owned long ago I was a fool to stand in the boy's way; and I'm glad you were too good for him, any how. Let's tell your papers! I know all about it! But you'll have to fight those battles over again, my lad, for substitution the next moment—then you did not hear of my last battle, Sir?"

"Yes, I know," answered the gunsmith, doubtfully; and he named those fields whereon this man had won his fame.

"No, no, the last." There was an instant's struggle, then the veteran's voice rose in a shout of pride, which nearly split a stirred the hearer as a thunderous sound. "Louis, when a man advances and kneel in the trench, was he got a bullet in him? What do you think, man? My chances are not as good as they were when I stood here fifteen years ago!"

"Sit down, sit down," said old Louis, very much disconcerted—and he got a chair for him.

"No, no," replied Lattimer; and with a sweep of his arm he seemed to clear away all false pity, and sternest scorn.

"Did you think of me, Stormuld, when you heard the news of the war's landing aske?

"I haven't heard the sound of a gun in fifteen years, night or morning, but I've thought of you," said Louis.

"Then, though you heard I was promoted you did not hear that I was dead?"

Louis wiped the perspiration from his forehead, and hardly dared to ask, "You were landing aske?"

"I was at the rest, John? Tell me, by Mars!

"I'm in the ranks again."

"No, Sir!"

"Could I shoot myself to prove I was no coward—I had to live. So I enlisted again after I lost my sword and commission. Yes, to fight out the fight just where I disgraced my name, by fatherly love where it was dearest. Louis, I'll shoot it! Did you take me for poltroon, Louis Stormuld?"

"No! I never considered you that. You have branded you so on your forehead! Coward! John Lattimer a coward! My John? my boy?"

John Lattimer turned for breath, as if in the agony of one who has barely escaped drowning.

"I could carry the brand silently, said he at length, "since you and my wife believe in me! I have not lived out my life yet. Yes, Louis, I have been a coward—but I am now with Rachel. I've got one more battle to fight yet. Come, father, I want you to see me in my new rank. She didn't know you were a grandfather."

With a smile on their grave faces the strong veteran and the old walked, like lovers, to the barracks.

The arrival of the regiment was calculated well, in time. That very night of warriors marched up Fort Invincible a band of warriors marched up from a distant landing, hoping to surprise the garrison, by which they had been anticipated.

But the sentinel on guard that night was one to whom surprise was impossible—John Lattimer, no other. To him, by no mere chance, but by most merciful allotment, the lives of the garrison were that night entrusted, and the Angel of his presence saved them.

He sounded the alarm! it was as the cry of an ancient one. He, as if clad in armor, or bearing a charmed life, met the foemen at the head of invincibles—Captains. "Do your duty!" was the command; the soldiers heard. Coming from him, those words had a terrible sound. The men sprung from their sleep. In that moment of confusion and danger, when there was no time for organization, and every man-at-arms would alone save the occasion, it was John Lattimer who acted. He raged like fire—he overwhelmed like flood—he stood like rock. He commanded, encouraged, cheered on the men.

But at daybreak his form was not to be seen among the soldiers; his voice was no longer heard. It shall be said that the dead of night had hidden the mists of morning scatter. He cometh who shall illuminate the world.

But the day-spark is rising also; his sun, who lies under the gaze of Rachel and old Stormuld, shall soon be seen to shine around his sterling body—for in this awful conflict, of all wounds won his are most glorious.

Soon shall they know.

Then shall the old man lay a sword in his right hand; the young wife shall unfold the regalia; and descendants of the boy who nestles in Rachel's arms shall read how, on this day, a laurel wreath was twined around the gory locks of Lattimer.

Brave, blue-eyed woman, grieve not for those wounds! Stormuld has washed his blame out in history. And call him by what heroic names you will, this old man, Louis, his heart has won them all; this soldier has vindicated fame.

TOBACCO AND I.

I cry it up! It is no use!—
Tobacco, you and I must quit!
Why should I stuff me, like a goose,
And be forever on the spit?

My end (eschewed) may "go to grass;"
I need no end; I'm not a cow!
It doesn't—Melinda says—
This quid that brings no FAIR pro quo.

My pipe, that seem'd a pipe of peace,
In pieces lies: no more "divine."
I've no Bocarme tendencies:
And the "Cut Plug" is in this nicotine.

With "cloud-compelling Jove"—ai wits,
In "Cuban stock" no more I trust;
For if I fume "somebody" frets,
And this Fille-baster is not "bass'd!"

Why should I smoke? why light the Fen Collet that kindles countless woes?
Why "suppress" my "cigar?" "cheer,"
Or make an ash-hole of my nose?

It dulls the sense, defiles the breath,
Depraves the taste, depletes the purse;
Poisons the very air with death,
And makes an everlasting "curse."

So, ladies, you who're "up to snuff,"
Look cheerless for your fellow-puffers;
You'll ne'er make of this piece of stuff
The worse half of a pair of snuffers.

And "pents"—if you're some city "Brick,"
To you I've just this word to say:
There are leaf-tobacco shops in Broadway!
Don't—don't PUMIGATE BROADWAY.

HOUSATONIC VALLEY, 1859. P.

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

GREEN PEASE AND PEA-BUGS.

At this season of the year, when city people are eating almost every thing green (except window-blinds), it may be no harm to say a few words about green pease and the insects that infest them—not wishing that any one should eat more pease or more bugs, but simply to tell the facts.

There is an insect known to naturalists as the Bruchus Pisi (Linnæus), which is a native of Europe, but naturalized, as the pea-bug, but to many who swallow countless numbers of its kind it is entirely unknown.

A correspondent (W. B., Connecticut) writes us:

"I find insects in the grub state in my pease. I send you some unripened peas in a glass vessel, sealed, and would be obliged to you for information about it."

We find, on examination, that they are the notorious pea-bugs in the larva or grub state, and which will come forth from the pea in the ripe or perfect state next spring. When full grown, each the insect is a little more than a fifth of an inch long. There is a white spot on the thorax, and the wing-cases, which do not entirely cover the abdomen, have a similar white spot on each. The antennæ are short, and saw-toothed on the outer side. On the hinder part of the insect is a white spot like the letter T. The ravages of this insect are, some years, very great on garden and field pease. Fortunately they seldom injure the germ of the pea, so that boggy peas may be used as seed, but they do not produce as well as perfect seed. The insects seem to be limited in the time for depositing their eggs. After the pea vines have flowered, and the pods begin to form, the insects puncture the pods and deposit their eggs; this they generally do in the night, or in cloudy weather. After the eggs are hatched and the grubs pass into the pease, where they feed and undergo their changes, they come forth fully developed beetles in spring. At the pease, before sowing time, are thrown into hot water for a minute or two, the insects will be killed.

Kalm, the Swedish traveler, who visited this country in 1748, to make botanical researches, took home with him some pease; but on his arrival he found them infested with pea-bugs, which caused great alarm, and he was told that the insects were also a native land. It would have been well for America and others been so careful as he was, through whom insects have been brought to this country that are now the cause of much injury to the growing crops.

The Patent Office Report says:

"This insect, though common in all the other States, is more or less unknown in the northern New England States, to its not being able to withstand the severity of a Canadian winter. Its introduction into Canada and Maine are generally brought from Canada to the United States for seed."

These facts are no longer true of Canada. The little depredators spoken of did not confine themselves wholly to the eastern part of United States, for when the writer visited Upper Canada last year there were found over a pea-field in Hallowell County that was not swarming with them, and there were other counties too of which it was a fair representation.

WHEAT ON HEAD-LANDS.

W. G., Welland County, Canada West, writes:

"Why is wheat on head-lands generally so much better than that grown in other parts of the field?"

In some cases wheat on other parts of the field may be the best; but when that grown on headlands is of remarkable quality we say that the result be owing mainly to the following facts, under the head-lands are generally the richest:

1. In plowing toward the head-lands the mouldboard of the plow carries soil near to the fence, and consequently there is always a greater body of surface-soil than in most other parts of the field, in which the depth of plowing is not so much as yard.

2. Snow remains on head-lands, because of the protection of fences, for a greater length of time and in greater quantities than in most other parts of the field. Consequently the soil is moistened more gradually. Most wheat-growers must have seen that new lands or fields are less liable to be blown off, and especially if there be a night's frost, and the succeeding day was warm to cause sudden thawing, and the wind was in the direction what is known as a "burned" appearance. The principle in this case appears to be that well known to every market-gardener in the case of cold frame plants—namely, that sudden thawing should not be permitted to occur for either the hardier or tenderer plants do not receive injury from being frozen, a sudden change of temperature is to be carefully avoided.

3. Animals are frequently permitted to rest at the head-lands of fields, in order to helping himself to a drink, and their droppings enrich the soil.

4. Animals in turning at head-lands, portions of the food are scattered.

5. Sometimes the "lands" are plowed out quite close to the fence, and when the head-land is plowed, a part of it is often plowed a second time—namely, when it comes next to the "dead-furrow," or "lands."

There are other minor causes why the head-lands should produce the best wheat, but too numerous to be treated here; all of which, in addition to the above, show that we have the largest harvest when the soil is in best condition, both as regards the substances that make the plant and the fine tilth which enables the plant to make use of them.

WHEAT.—METEOROLOGICAL INFLUENCES.

It is a generally-admitted fact in England that wheat can not be successfully cultivated as a height of 1,000 feet above the sea level, but in the south of France it may be grown at an elevation of 1,950 feet. This is attributed to difference of temperature.

It is also well understood that the moisture of the atmosphere influences the composition of wheat; for in moist climates, such as that of Ireland, it will contain a larger percentage of gluten.

Now, for the reason that a great amount of fertilizing material is taken from the atmosphere during a rainy season, and under favorable circumstances, by means of this water from the soil to the plant, that the necessity of a thorough pulverization of the soil becomes self-evident, so that plants may be benefited to the fullest extent by the substances in the earth. If proper underdrains are in soils that need them, all excess of moisture will pass away, thus permitting the free circulation of air to exercise its beneficial effects, both in increasing the fertility of the soil and producing the wheat plant to withstand the various diseases to which it is liable.

In which the percentage of gluten is invariably greater in warm climates than in cold ones.

THE DIFFERENCE.

BY C. H. WEBB.

The fairies fill their tiny cups
With drops of diamond dew;
The fay-man from his clubs sups,
And laughs the long night through.

We brush God's gentle dews away,
To brim our hearts with tears;
We vail the sun, and, waiting day,
Thus count our nights by years.

THE CHARGE OF THE ZOUAVES AT THE BATTLE OF PALESTRO.

THE CHARGE OF THE ZOUAVES AT PALESTRO.

We give herewith an engraving of the Zouaves' charge at Palestro—up a hill, in the teeth of the Austrian batteries. A correspondent of the London Times thus describes the affair:

"By a dexterous Austrian movement the Piedmontese were fairly outflanked, and much surprise and not a little indignation was felt among the Piedmontese officers that the French division immediately behind them remained motionless, without even making a demonstration to stop the advance of the Austrians. The King tried a desperate effort; he sent an aid-de-camp to the General commanding, General Trochu, and ordered him to send a brigade to drive the Austrians out of Scavarda. The General replied that he had orders to protect the passage of the bridge for the French troops on the other side of the Sesia, and that he could take no share in the action without the Emperor's express orders. At this moment the fighting had been going on for five hours; the men began to show some signs of discouragement. The Colonel of the 3d Regiment of Zouaves, whose regiment had been drawn up along the river side, exclaimed, 'Mais ces malheureux vont être obligés,' and sending an orderly to the Emperor for permission to attack, without waiting for a reply, dashed across the Sesia, and moved up to Borgo Vercelli. The men rushed along with that electric step and disregard of strictly regular formation that characterizes them. On they rushed, regardless of bogs, rice-grounds, bullets, and grape-shot. They were only brought up by a rivulet, which had been used to form a mill. There is no bridge, but two narrow planks without a hand-rail, like the scene in 'Sonnambula,' at her Majesty's. The Austrians, seeing the advance of this reinforcement, which threatened their flank, had placed five guns in battery on the top of the opposite bank, which is rather steep. The Zouaves swarmed over the bridge and rushed across the river, the water of which was lashed into spray by the incessant shower of grape. They rushed up the steep embankment like tigers; men tumbling down here and there and rolling down into the water below. There was a last discharge from the guns when at a distance of some twelve yards. The Zouaves leveled their bayonets, and closed up for their final dash. The men fell by dozens, but with a loud yell the assailants rushed forward, and the battery was cleared."

IO TRIOMPHE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

A STATESMAN—AND WOMAN.

MEANWHILE MRS. Dinks and Alfred sat together in her room in the same twilight, but with a little end of candle burning on the bureau.

"Alfred, my dear, I see that Bowdoin Beacon drives on your cousin Hope a good deal."

Mrs. Dinks arranged her cap-ribbon as if she were at present mainly interested in that question of her dress.

"Yes, a good deal," replied Mr. Alfred, in an uncertain tone, for he always felt uncomfortably at the prospect of a conversation with his mother, which usually acted upon him like an artesian well upon the earth, bringing forth the most precious results, for the purposes of the operator, from the most unpromising soil.

"I am surprised he should do so," continued Mrs. Dinks, with extraordinary languor, as if she should undoubtedly fall fast asleep before the present wearisome conversation terminated.

"Why shouldn't he drive her out, if he wants to?" inquired Alfred.

"Now, Alfred, be careful. Don't expose yourself even to me. It is too hot to be so excessively absurd. I suppose there is some sort of honor left among young men still, isn't there?"

And the languid mamma performed a very well executed yawn.

"Honor? I suppose there is. What do you mean?" replied Alfred.

Mamma yawned again.

"How drowsy one does feel here! I am so sleepy! What was I saying? Oh, I remember. Perhaps, however, Mr. Beacon doesn't know. That is probably the reason. He doesn't know. Well, in that case it is not so extraordinary. But I should think he must have seen—or inferred—or heard. A man may be very stupid But he has no right to be so stupid as that. How many glasses do you drink at the spring in the morning, Alfred? Not more than six at the outside, I hope. Well, I believe I'll take a little nap."

She played with her cap string, somehow as if she were an angler playing a fish. There is capital trouting at Saratoga—or was, thirty years ago. You may see to this day a good many fish that were caught there, and which are now kept at inn and bait. Some of them are a little stale for fastidious tastes. In fact only those which have been kept in ice are well preserved.

Alfred bit again.

"I wish you wouldn't talk in such a puzzling kind of way, mother. What do you mean about his knowing and hearing and inferring?"

"Come, come, Alfred, you are getting too cunning. Why, you sly dog, do you think you can impose upon me with an air of ignorance because I am so sleepy? Heigh-ho."

Another sarcastic yawn. Sportsmen are surely the best sport in the world.

"Now, Alfred," continued his mother, "are you so silly as to suppose for one moment that Bowdoin Beacon has not seen the whole thing and known it from the beginning?"

"Why," exclaimed Alfred in alarm, "do you?"

"Of course. He has eyes and ears, I suppose, and every body understood it."

"Did they?" asked the wretched Alfred, not in the least comprehending whether he and his mother were talking of the same thing.

"Of course. Every body knew it must be so,

and agreed that it was highly proper—in fact, the only thing."

"Oh, certainly. Clearly the only thing," replied Alfred, fairly wandering in doubt.

"And therefore I say it is not quite honorable in Beacon to drive her out in such a marked manner. And I should as well say at once that I think you had better settle the thing immediately. The world understands it already, so it will be a mere private understanding among ourselves, much more agreeable for all parties. Perhaps this evening even, hey, Alfred?"

Mrs. Dinks adjusted herself upon the sofa in a sort of final manner, as if the affair were now satisfactorily arranged.

To what and upon the good Alfred rent Boots — he said, What did it avail that he had no better across country with young Lord Tuntiry at a meeting of the Melmoth hounds, in Northamptonshire, and had lost money to Viscount Tattersalls at the Derby? tales with which the Trimountain billiard rooms in his native city were familiar, and which shall a man gain though he bring home that high European habit of claret for breakfast, so admirably adapted to the customs of American life, and though he play the best game of billiards at the Trimountain rooms, if he lose his wits when a woman asks a question?

"It's no use talking that way, mother; it's all done."

Mrs. Dinks was sleepy no longer. She bounced like an India rubber ball from the pillows were left to shift for themselves. She turned and clasped Alfred in her arms.

"My blessed son!"

Then followed a moment of silent rapture, during which the mamma ate her

Presently she rose and went to a bureau and unlocked a drawer with a key that she carried in her pocket. Taking out an ebony box like a casket she unlocked that in turn, and then lifted from it a morocco case, evidently a miniature. She returned to her chair and seated herself again, swaying her body gently to and fro as if confirming some difficult resolution, but with the same inscrutable expression upon her face. Still holding the case in her hands unopened, she murmured—

"I want a sober mind,
A self-governing will,
That tramples down and casts behind
The baits of pleasing ill."

She repeated the whole hymn several times, as if it was a kind of spell or incantation, and while she was yet saying it she opened the miniature.

The western light streamed over the likeness of a man of a gallant, graceful air, in whom the lines of youth were not yet burned out, and in whose presence there might be some peculiar fascination. The hair was rather long and fair—the features were handsomely moulded, but were a slightly jaded expression, which often seems to a woman an air of melancholy, and which a man would have recognized at once as the result of dissipation. There was a singular cast in the eye, and a blend of hefty, irresistible command in the whole aspect which appeared to be quite at war with an assumption of sense and real superiority. In fact it was the likeness of what is technically called a man of the world, whose frank insolence and symmetry of feature pass for manly beauty and composure.

The miniature was in the face of a gold locket, on the back of which there was a curl of the same fair hair. It was so fresh and glossy that it might have been cut off the day before. But the quaintness of the setting and the costume of the portrait proved that it had been taken many years previous, and that in the order of nature the original was probably dead.

As Mrs. Simcoe held the miniature in both hands and looked at it, her body still rocked over it, and her lips still murmured.

Then rocking and murmuring stopped together, and she seemed like one listening to music or the ringing of distant bells.

And as she sat perfectly still in the golden September sunlight, it was as if a veil were drawn into her soul; so that a softer light streamed into her eyes, and her countenance seemed to lose a face melted as by some internal warmth, and a tender repentance somehow blossomed out upon her cheeks and lips. The expression became sadness, and heavy tears dropped from her eyes upon the locket which she still looked at.

Then, with the old hardness stealing into her face again, she rose calmly, carrying the miniature in her hand, and went out of the room and down the stairs into the library, which was opposite the parlor in which Abel Sparrow had seen the picture of old Grandpa Burt at the age of ten, holding a hoop and hook.

There were book-shelves upon every side but one—stately ranges of well-ordered books in substantial old calf and gilt English bindings, and so carefully placed upon the shelves, in such methodical distribution of shapes and sizes, that the whole room had an air of unpretending propriety utterly foreign to a library. It seemed like the most solid aristocratic arrangement of books—much too fine to permit the existence of interest in any thing they contained—much too high-bred to be of the slightest use in imparting information. Glass doors were carefully closed over them, and locked, so that the books were bestirred respectablities laid away in shrines. And the same solemn order extended to the library table, which was covered in the middle of the room, with a large, solemn family Bible pressed by its weight flat on the table, and smaller books, like satellites, precisely upon the centre and precisely on one side an empty glass inkstand, innocent of a drop or a stain of any kind, with a pen carefully mended and evidently unused, every week, and a pen company pen-wiper which was as unsullied as might be expected of a wiper which had only wiped that pen which was never dipped into that inkstand which had been always empty. The inkstand was supported on the one side by the Bible by an equally immaculate ivory paper-knife.

The large leather library chairs were arranged in precisely the proper angle at the corners of the table, and the smaller chairs against the windows two by two, like timid little Sunday-school children waiting to be called to recitation. All was cold and clean and locked up—except a portrait that hung against the wall, and before which Mrs. Simcoe stood with the Bible by an equally immaculate ivory paper-knife.

The large leather library chairs were arranged in precisely the proper angle at the corners of the table, and the smaller chairs against the windows two by two, like timid little Sunday-school children waiting to be called to recitation. All was cold and clean and locked up—except a portrait that hung against the wall, and before which Mrs. Simcoe stood with the Bible holding the miniature in her hand.

It was the portrait of a young girl, whose rich, delicate loveliness, full of tender but tremulous character, seemed to be a kind of foreshadowing of Rose Wayne. The same cast of deep, soft darkness, that held the spectator with a dreamy fascination, the same sweetness were exquisitely moulded, and suffused with an airy, pinkish grace that was not light and headless, but thoughtful, so that the whole made almost a pathetic appeal against the inevitable proofs of life.

As Mrs. Simcoe stood looking at it and at the miniature she held, the sadness which had followed the sweetness died away, and her face resumed the old rigid inscrutability. She held the miniature straight before her and directly under the portrait; and, as she looked, the apparent pride of the one and the tremulous earnestness of the other indescribably blended into an expression which had been long familiar to her, for it was the face of Hope Wayne.

While she thus stood, unconscious of the time that passed, the sun had set, and the room was darkening. Suddenly she heard a sound close at her side, and started. Her hand instinctively closed over the miniature and concealed it.

There stood a man kindly regarding her. He was not an old man, but there was a touch of quaintness in his appearance. He did not speak when she saw him, and for several minutes they stood silent together. Then their eyes rose simultaneously to the picture, met again, and Mrs. Simcoe, putting out her hand, said, in a low voice:

"Lawrence Newt!"

It was an old friend. He shook her hand warmly, and made little remarks, while she seemed to be studying into his face, as if she were looking for something that she did not find there.

Every body did the same. Every body looked into Lawrence Newt's face to discover what he was thinking of, and nobody ever saw. Mrs. Simcoe remembered a time when it was different.

"It is more than twenty years since I saw you, Hare I grown very old?" asked he.

"No, not old. I see the boy I remember, but your face is not so clear as it used to be."

Lawrence Newt laughed.

"You compliment me without knowing it. My face is the result of the last of the most precious secrets; would you have the lid transparent?" Why, I am a merchant. Suppose every body took in through my face and out what I really think of the merchandise I am selling! What kind of profit do you think I should make? No, no, we want no tell-tale faces in Seth Street."

He said this in a tone that corresponded with the expression which baffled Mrs. Simcoe, and perplexed the spectator. His face was full and rosy, and his eyes were bright and clear. A porcupine hides his flesh in bristling quills, but a magnolia, when its leaves are all out cone, folds its heart in and in with overlying tissues of creamy richness and fragrance. Never is rose so calm, it is only secret.

"I suppose you are twenty years wiser than you were," said Mrs. Simcoe.

"What is wisdom?" asked Lawrence Newt.

"To grow old," replied Mrs. Simcoe.

"That I have discovered," he said.

"And have you given it?"

"I hope so."

"Yes, but haven't you the assurance?" asked she, curiously.

"I hope so," responded Lawrence Newt in the same blank tone.

"But assurance is a gift," continued she.

"A gift of what?"

"Of Heaven," replied Mrs. Simcoe.

"Ah! well, I have that," said the other, quietly, as his eye rested upon the portrait.

There was moisture in the eyes of both.

"Her daughter is very like her," he said, pleasantly; and the two stood together silently for some time.

"Not entirely," replied Mrs. Simcoe, as if to assert some other resemblance.

"Perhaps not, but I never saw her father."

As Lawrence Newt said this, Mrs. Simcoe raised her hand, opened it, and held the miniature before his eyes. He took it and gazed closely at it.

"And this is Colonel Wayne," said he, slowly. "This is the man whose name was a terror in heart and murdered a woman."

A mingled expression of pain, indignation, passionate regret, and resignation suddenly glittered on the face of Mrs. Simcoe.

"Mr. Newt!" said she, hurriedly, in a thick voice, "let us at least respect the dead!"

Lawrence Newt, still holding the miniature in his hand, looked surprised and searchingly at his companion, and his eyes grew into his eyes.

"Could I speak of her otherwise?"

The sudden change in Mrs. Simcoe's expression conveyed her thought to him before her words:

"No, no! not of her, but—"

She stopped as if wrestling with a fierce inward agony. The veins on her forehead were swollen, and her eyes flashed with singular light. It was not clear whether she was trying to say something, to conceal something, or simply to restore her self-control. But at this strange spectacle, and Lawrence Newt felt as if he must nail his eyes, as if he had no right to look upon the face of such a woman.

"But—" said he, mechanically, as if by repetition he could find a word to help her in her struggle.

His zeal, however, seemed to have him in the darkening twilight, rose, and, turning his back, crept down into him, and quivering and glowing in his heart, and he, with his eyes still leaning forward and reaching toward him, she took the miniature from Lawrence Newt, closed her hand over it, and turned away from him

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.

The important qualities of a perfect hair-dressing seem to have been successfully combined in Burnett's Cocoaine, the active principle of which is Cocoa-Nut Oil, by merits have been successfully tested with an unanimous and satisfactory result. Those who value a beautiful head of hair will do well to use this elegant preparation. Aside from its acknowledged superiority, it is claimed there is a saving of fifty per cent. in favor of this over other compounds. See publications being sufficient to last for days.—Providence Post.

COZZENS'

West Point Hotel

is

NOW OPEN.

LA TOURETTE HOUSE,

RICHMOND TERR., HOBOKEN, N. J.

Today W. Hill date of the Lafayette House, Proprietor.

This fashionable Summer Resort is beautifully situated on the banks of the Kill von Kull, opposite Staten Island. Excellent Bathing, Boating, Fishing, and Driving in the immediate vicinity. Gentlemen with their families visiting New York, will find this House a convenient and quiet retreat, as it takes no longer time only 30 minutes by Steamboat to reach it, than to go from South Ferry to Union Square.

LAKE HOPATCONG HOUSE, AT LAKE HOPATCONG, NOW OPEN.

Gentlemen with their families, or single gentlemen, can make arrangements for Board at reasonable rates. Prices. Parties wishing that rare amusement, viz: "GOOD FISHING," can enjoy the best facilities and in perfection; also, GOOD BATHING. It is two-and-a-half hours ride from New York, and the Cars are conveniently located to Dockerville. Horses and Carriages will be in waiting to convey passengers to the House, a distance of five miles. Post Office address—Dockerville, Morris county, N. J. J. H. DAVIS.

CONGRESS HALL,

Saratoga Springs.

This well-kept and fashionable HOTEL IS NOW OPEN for the Season. Apartments can be engaged by addressing the Proprietors.

HATHORN & McMICHAEL.

Long Branch, N. J.

Howland's Hotel,

is

Now Open for the Season.

CHARLES ISLAND HOUSE,

Milford, Conn.,

NOW OPEN.

W. H. RUDROUGH, PROPRIETOR,

Late Proprietor of the Pierrepont and La Farge Houses New York City.

Ohio White Sulphur Springs,

OPEN TO VISITORS SEEKING HEALTH OR PLEASURE, FROM JUNE 1st TO OCTOBER 1st.

ACCOMMODATIONS for OVER 500 VISITORS.

The Ohio White Sulphur Springs are situated in Delaware County, 15 miles North of Columbus, the Capital of Ohio on the Scioto River.

The medicinal qualities of these Springs are unsurpassed by them of any other Mineral Waters in the United States.

For Room or other information, address

ANDREW WILSON, Jr.,

White Sulphur Springs, Ohio.

INTERNATIONAL HOTEL,

NIAGARA FALLS.

ROBERT S. COLEMAN, late of the firm of COLEMAN & STETSON, of the Astor House, and more recently engaged in the St. Nicholas, New York, begs, in connection with his son, FREDERICK W. COLEMAN, to spread the above-named Hotel, which, having been enlarged and greatly improved, renders it very desirable to visitors at this grandest of watering places.

THE

NAHANT HOTEL

is now open!!

Only fifty minutes' ride, in a splendid steamer, from the City of Boston. Magnificent accommodations for

ONE THOUSAND GUESTS,

At very reasonable rates. Second to no Summer Resort in the world.

THOS. RAND & SONS, Proprietors.

EASTMAN'S

White Mountain Guide-Book.

Ross & Tousey, Wholesale Agents, N. Y.

Charles Grobe's New Method

FOR THE

PIANO FORTE.

Mr. Grobe is so well known, that any remarks as to his qualifications would be superfluous. Suffice it to say, that he has produced in his New Method a work for elementary teaching, superior to any other. It is evidently the Book for the People, and as the result of the vast experience of Mr. Grobe, it is entitled to the name of Pupil. Nothing is neglected, nothing hurried. The pupil is led by easy, pleasant steps, from the first to the closing page. The division of long pieces into short works of instruction is altogether avoided, and the Pupil, before it is to be the most simple, clear, progressive, and judicious system of instruction extant. The finest exercises on engraved figures, illustrating the different positions of the hands and fingers. The type is very and uniformly beautiful and distinct. The paper is white and thick, and the binding handsome. Price $1 00, in Cloth, and the Complete Course may be had, post-paid, on receipt of the above price. The trade supplied.

Published by the Proprietor,

FIRTH, POND & CO., 547 Broadway, New York.

LEE & WALKER, Philadelphia.

WEED'S PATENT

DOUBLE THREAD

Sewing

Machines

Make the Lock Stitch.

An entirely new style, made on the principle of Weed's patent, and the simplest Machine ever invented, is offered for $50. Price of the old styles from $80 to $150.

WHITNEY & LEVY,

417 Broadway.

Agents wanted.

FOR THE COMPLEXION.—Of all the Compounds we have yet seen proposed as a cosmetic for the skin, there is none that has a higher reputation, or can that is so popular with the ladies, as the far-famed Kalliston. It will, with a few applications, remove tan, freckles, sunburn, and all unsightliness of the skin. It is universally used for these purposes, and ladies who apply it can exercise in the open air as freely as they please, and experience no inconvenience from such exposure. Prepared by Joseph Burnett & Co. are the proprietors.—Boston Transcript.

FINKLE & LYON'S

SEWING MACHINES,

For Family Use, Tailoring Purposes, Saddlery, &c. Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other machine in market, or money refunded. Agents wanted.

503 BROADWAY,

Next to the St. Nicholas Hotel.

$32 50 PER QUARTER. } ASHLAND INST. and MUSICAL ACADEMY, Lessrs. Boudinots, Bordentown, New Jersey. Circulars forwarded on application. Rev. H. LILL, REV. J. FOX, A.M., Ashland, N. Y., or D. G. HUBBARD, Esq., 59 Broadway.

RIMMEL'S TOILET VINEGAR is superior for aspect to Eau de Cologne as a lotion for the Toilet or Bath, a refreshing Perfume and a powerful Disinfectant.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

PROTESTANT FRENCH INSTITUTE.—The YOUNG GENTLEMEN'S NORMAL INSTITUTE, No. 48 East 24th Street, near Madison Park. Boarding and Day School, Primary and Academic Classes. This Institution will be reopened on the 15th of September. It presents a thorough course of instruction in all its branches, including the Spanish and German languages. The French is the language of the school. Comfortable arrangements for a limited number of pupils. Prospectus, with references, on names of the children and of their parents during the past years, &c., to be had. ELIE CHARLIER, Director.

References: Paris, Rev. Dr. F. Monod.

Washington Heights, Rev. Marie d'Aubigné.

Boston, Prof. Louis Cazenove, Secretary of State.

Boston, Prof. Agassiz.

Princeton, Prof. A. Guyot.

New York, C. King, President of Columbia College.

Rev. Dr. J. Knox, Chancellor of the N. Y. University.

Rev. Dr. S. H. Tyng.

Rev. Dr. Adams.

MOSQUITOES.—An Antidote for the poison of mosquitoes, bees, wasps, and other annoying insects, has been found in Ammonia, combined, prepared by Messrs. Joseph Burnett and Co. This preparation removes the particular property, which instantly neutralizes the poison, and allays the inflammation caused by the bites and stings of insects.—Boston Journal.

LECTURES FOR 1859—60.—TO LAY MEMBERS OF YOUNG MEN'S ASSOCIATIONS, INSTITUTES, LYCEUMS, &c.:

As the Subscriber is about making his arrangements for Lectures to be delivered by him during the next Autumn and Winter months, 1859-60, he respectfully requests the Committees to address him as soon as may be convenient.

PARK BENJAMIN, 24 West 17th Street, New York. June 16, 1859.

Lord Lord's Worcestershire Sauce.

Is the TRUE Worcestershire Sauce. Is excellent for all purposes.

ASK FOR, and HAVE ONLY LORD LORD'S.

Sold by Grocers and Dealers, and by all Grocers and Fruit Dealers.

Wholesale and for Exportation, by

JONATHAN JONES & CO.,

40 Broad Street, New York.

Sold Retail by the Grocers and Fruit Houses. Half Pints, 20 cents; Pints, 35 cents; Quarts, 60 cents per bottle.

RIMMEL'S BOUQUET — ALL THE YEAR ROUND, and WOOD VIOLET, are the leading Perfumes of the Day.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

Cure Dyspepsia, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Indigestion. Cure Heart Burn, Heart Burn, Acidity, Acidity. Cure Flatulency, Flatulency, Nausea, Nausea. Cure Liver Complaint, Liver Complaint, Debility. Cure Fever and Ague, Fever and Ague, Consumption. Cure Headache, Costiveness, Piles, Nervousness. Cure Flatulency, Neuralgia, Female Complaints.

These Bitters are well known to be the most remarkable and efficient yet discovered for the absolute and rapid cure of the above diseases, and it is altogether unnecessary to enlarge upon its merits.

S. W. FOWLE & CO., Proprietors, Boston.

Sold by all Druggists.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS.

361 BROADWAY 539

THOMAS, DEHAS & SMITH,

Tucker's Flowers, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items, Are all reliable.

ELLIOT & PAITEN—Examine Inventions and procure American and Foreign Patents. Patent Agency opposite the Entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

The Cavalier to Laura.

A SONG OF THE KINGDOM OF NEW JERSEY.

Fut on your bonnet, Laura,
The day is fine, and we
Will journey into Jersey—
That strange and far countree.

We'll hear the raging ocean
To Hoboken's sunny bowers,
And in the Elysian fields
We'll pelt peace crosses of flowers.

Come forth—come forth, my Laura,
I pant before your gate;
Why loo the hours and hours that ne'er
For man were known to wait!

Put on your bonnet, Laura,
The fiend is calculating!
And the clothes you made me buy from Surett
Are every-where outdated.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
JOSEPH SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK.

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the

Goods in Plain Figures.

BEAUTY.—The perfection of beauty, even in the most beautiful woman, is gained at her toilet. There the use of BURNETT'S KALLISTON is indispensable: it retains all unsightly objects, such as tan, freckles, and pimples, and gives the complexion a clear and blooming appearance. Prepared by Joseph Burnett & Co., Bostbn. Boston Traveller.

THIS SUPERIOR Strong-bodied delicately-flavored

Mountain JOFFRE

For sale by

J. DOWLING,

No. 5 Beaver Street.

Café de Costa Rica

C&C

Ladies', Children's, and Infants' Summer Clothing, at

GENIN'S BAZAAR.

CHILDREN'S BLOUSES,
MARSEILLES BAJAMAS,
LADIES' EMBROIDERED MUSLIN ROBES,
RICH EMBROIDERED LAWN ROBES,
LADIES' BATHING DRESSES,
MISSES' MUSLIN DRESSES,
BOYS' MUSLIN SUITS AND PANTS,
LADIES' and INFANTS' SUMMER CLOTHING.

Dress-making in all its branches, in greater variety than can be found elsewhere in the City.

GENIN'S BAZAAR, 513 Broadway.

RIMMEL'S ROSE-LEAF POWDER A delicate pink rose hue to the skin, and renders it soft and beautiful.

Sold by all the Trade.

E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

This compound will be found a great promoter of health, when taken in the spring, to expel the foul humors which float in the blood at that season of the year. By the timely expulsion of them many rankling disorders are nipped in the bud. Multitudes can, by the aid of this remedy, spare themselves from the endurance of foul eruptions and ulcerous sores, through which the system will try to rid itself of corruptions, if not assisted to do this through the natural channels of the body by an alterative medicine. Cleanse out the vitiated blood whenever you find its impurities bursting through the skin in pimples, eruptions, or sores; cleanse it when you find it is obstructed and sluggish in the veins; cleanse it whenever it is foul, and your feelings will tell you when. Even where no particular disorder is felt, people enjoy better health, and live longer, for cleansing the blood. Keep the blood healthy, and all is well; but with the blood foul, there can be no health in any part of the body. Sooner or later something must go wrong, and the great machinery of life is disordered or deranged.

SCROFULA AND SCROFULOUS COMPLAINTS, ERUPTIONS AND ERUPTIVE DISEASES, ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, TUMORS, BOILS, ERYSIPELAS, SORE EYES, ST. ANTHONY'S FIRE, AND INDEED THE WHOLE CLASS of complaints arising from IMPURITY OF THE BLOOD.

In order to secure their complete eradication from the system, the remedy should be judiciously taken according to directions on the bottle. Prepared by

DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass.

Price $5 per Bottle; Six Bottles for $5.

Sold by all Druggists every where.

TIFFANY & CO,

Importers & Manufacturers,

No. 550 Broadway, New York, and

Rue Richelieu, No, 79, Paris,

DIAMONDS, AND OTHER PRECIOUS STONES.

FINE JEWELRY. WATCHES.

SILVER WARE, PLATED WARE, TABLE CUTLERY.

CLOCKS, BRONZES, ARTISTIC GAS FIXTURES.

DESKS, DRESSING-CASES, WORK BOXES, TRAVELLING-BAGS, FANS, RICH PORTFOLIOS.

And many other articles of Ornament and Luxury.

The only establishment in New York for the sale of CHAS. FREDERICK WORTH'S Paris Fabrics, imported over any other house in this country. Each piece is scrupulously established.

Every article is marked in plain figures, at the Lowest Price at which it will be sold.

We cordially extend to strangers an invitation to inspect our stock, assuring all that a call will incur not the least obligation to purchase.

TREMBLES.—Of all the effects that exposure of the skin to the sun or sun produces, the most disagreeable is entitled Freckles or Sun Burn. If spots of the nature of the parts exposed, it is called tan; if scattered at intervals, freckles. The finest skins are most subject to them. The Kalliston, prepared by Joseph Burnett & Co., Boston, contains a peculiar creative property which will remove them. Its operation is mild, but it is the most effectual and perfectly harmless, stays all tendency to inflammation, and renders the complexion clear and beautiful.—Boston Herald.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

Franklin Square, New York,

Publish this Day:

I.

WALTER THORNBURY, M. A. Pilot at the Fair. By the Author of "Alton Locke" and "Ailie." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

II.

THE COMPLETION OF

MISS STRICKLAND'S QUEENS OF SCOTLAND.

Lives of the Queens of Scotland and English Princesses connected with the Royal Succession of Great Britain. By AGNES STRICKLAND. Vol. VIII, completing the Work. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Sets in Muslin, $8 00; Half Calf, $14 50.

III.

FOWLER'S ELEMENTARY GRAMMAR. Elementary Grammar, Composition and Syntax. Abridged from the Octavo Edition of the "English Language in its Elements and Forms." Designed for Common Use in Common Schools. By WILLIAM C. FOWLER, late Professor of Rhetoric in Amherst College. 12mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

IV.

ANTHON'S CICERO DE OFFICIIS. M. T. Ciceronis de Officiis Libri Tres. With Marginal Analysis and an English Commentary. Edited for the Syllabus of Examinations, and for the Use of Schools and Colleges. By CHARLES ANTHON, LL.D., Professor of Greek in Columbia College. 12mo, Sheep extra, 75 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above Works by mail, postage paid, free of any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of the Money.

IMPURITIES OF THE BLOOD, SCROFULA, DISEASES OF MERCURY, SALT RHEUM, chronically and permanently cured by the use of

DR. JAMES R. CHILTON'S CHEMICAL OIL OF SARSAPARILLA,

An extraordinary remedy, and is the only preparation that can be relied on to perform a cure. Try it, and

DR. JAMES R. CHILTON,

Wholesale and Retail Depot, 312 BROADWAY, N. Y.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains 144 Pages of Reading—and there is no one half-more reading than any other in the country.

A Splendid Number.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR JULY.

Unquestionably it has the most sustained work of the kind in the language; that is to say, in the world. The splendid reading matter given in the Editor's Table are above price. The present number is equal to any yet issued. It is impossible to conceive how it can increase in prosperity to the work.—N. Y. Christian Advocate and Journal.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, in its typography, embellishments, and literary contents, is delightful, and is conducted with sympathy and humor, and guided all the time by a strong common sense. It is a model. For will it have soon. We rejoice in its prosperity.—New Orleans Christian Advocate.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY Subscribers.

The Postage on HARPER'S and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS FAMILY PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER. $2 50 A YEAR.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S New Serial, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," Splendidly Illustrated by MCLEAN, was commenced in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for MAY 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

The Pictorial Illustrations of "HARPER'S WEEKLY" are unsurpassed in the world.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year $1 00
Two Copies for One Year 1 50
Three Copies for One Year 2 00
Five Copies for One Year 2 50
Twelve Copies for One Year 5 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 10 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING—Fifty Cents a Line.

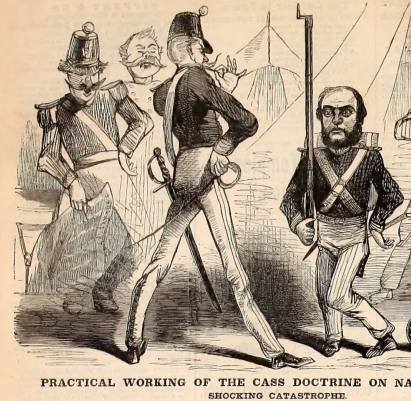
A liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

Postage upon HARPER'S WEEKLY in New York exciting "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" at all distances, will please send their names to the Office where they receive their paper, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,

Franklin Square, New York.



PRACTICAL WORKING OF THE CASS DOCTRINE ON NATURALIZATION.

SHOCKING CATASTROPHE.

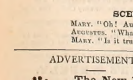
Intelligence reaches us, at the moment of going to press, to the effect that that distinguished patriot, the Hon. A-GUST B-LMONT, late U. S. Minister to the Hague, having imprudently ventured on a tour through Germany, was seized by the soldiery of his native town for military service, and is now engaged as above depicted. Mr. B-lmont, of course, appealed for protection to our Government; but Mr. Cass simply sent his friend his letters to Leclerc and Hofer, and abandoned him to his fate.

SCENE—A THUNDERSTORM.

MARY. "Oh! Augusta, I want to ask you something—so much."
AUGUSTUS. "What is it, dear?"
MARY. "Is it true that—that—that hoops attract the lightning?"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The New Books.
MICHELET'S GREAT WORK.
LOVE (L'AMOUR), translated from the French. Price $1 00.
DR. PALMER'S New Book, THE NEW and THE OLD. Illustrated. Price $1 25.
Mr. Bonner's Book, A BACHELOR'S STORY. A delightful Summer Volume. Price $1 00.
Mr. Badman's Spicy Work, THE VAGABOND. Sketches of Society, &c. Price $1 00.
Any book sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price, by ROUD & CARLETON, Publishers, 130 Grand Street, New York.



E. A. BROOKS,
575 Broadway & 150 Fulton Street.
A splendid Assortment of Ladies', Gentlemen's, and Children's Boots, Shoes and Gaiters.

THE AMERICAN FREEMASON'S
New Monthly Magazine, edited by ALBERT G. MACKEY, M.D., and other prominent Masonic writers. For sale by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. The Trade supplied by HENDRICKSON, BLAKE & LONG 21 and 23 Ann Street, New York.

Designed for the use of the Medical Profession and the Family, possessing those intrinsic medicinal properties which belong to an Old and Pure Gin. Put up in quart bottles, and sold by all prominent Druggists.
A. M. BININGER & CO.
(Established A. D. 1778.) SOLE PROPRIETORS,
No. 128 Broadway, N. Y.

DELANO
Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

Vest not inflated. Vest inflated.

Incorporated Jan. 1859.
Capital $125 000
MANUFACTURERS OF ALL KINDS OF
Life-Preserving Garments
FOR ORDINARY WEAR,
Safety Bathing Dresses, Children's Swimming Jackets, &c. &c.
OFFICE and SALESROOM, 286 BROADWAY, (Opposite City Hall) NEW YORK.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.
With such universal disease and suffering as address the female life, a really good Medicine must be their best friend. The numerous cases of Irregularities, Retentions, Discharges, Ulcerations, Falling Wombs, Leucorrhœa, &c., constantly effected by Dr. Marchisi's Catholicon, gives it a reputation and popularity never obtained by any other article. It does what it promises, and can be relied upon. When every thing has been tried, the best physicians consulted, years spent in anguish, and fortunes wasted, this Catholicon has restored health to the patient and gladness to the female. It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the female sex, and should be used by females at the approach to and after confinement. Physicians before testify that it is

NEVER TAKEN WITHOUT BENEFIT.

Daughters, Wives and Mothers! this medicine will cure you. It has been long and favorably known. As an evidence of its efficacy, the money will be refunded where results are not as indicated. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered at the counter of any agent. Do not confound Dr. Marchisi with any other name. It can be had in most every town. If not found, it can be sent by express. Price $2 per bottle, or 5 bottles for $5. Noted Preserved. Address
BARNES & PARK, General Agents,
13 and 15 PARK ROW, N. Y.

Curtis' Cure for Baldness.
This remedy is reliable; contains no oil, lead, or saltpetre; it has been tested in Boston, Providence, and the Eastern States. J. M. CURTIS, Proprietor, Providence, R. I. Sold by R. H. Macy & Co., 204 and 206 Washington, 115 Broadway; W. H. Lewis, 577 Greenwich Street; John Jones, 725 Houston Street, New York; Mrs. Hayes; G. P. Miles; and Reynolds & Co., Brooklyn; F. Sellier, Jersey City; U. T. Mercer, Newark.
BARNES & PARK, Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row,
And all Druggists. General Agents.

Something New!!!
A Gift Enterprise conducted upon a Liberal and Impartial Plan!!!!!!

The most Liberal, Punctual, and Reliable
GIFT BOOK ENTERPRISE
IN EXISTENCE.
The best evidence of this is the fact of its being the only one that stands endorsed by the Press of the City in which it is located.

We are not only ENDORSED BY THE ENTIRE Press of our own city, but by many of the most respectable and influential papers THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.

H. E. HOYT & CO.'S
GREAT
GIFT BOOK STORE,
No. 41 Baltimore Street,
Baltimore, Md.
Headquarters for Southern and Western Orders.
WRITE FOR A CATALOGUE FOR 1859,
IT CONTAINS THE
LARGEST LIST of Useful, Ornamental and Valuable Gifts ever Published!
GREATER INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS than ever before offered by any other establishment in the United States.
A Gift worth from Fifty Cents to
One Hundred Dollars
ACCOMPANIES EVERY BOOK.
Postmasters, Country Merchants, Booksellers, Librarians of Universities, Academies, Private and Circulating Libraries, Schools,
And all others whose business will enable them, are respectfully solicited to BECOME OUR AGENTS.
Catalogues giving full particulars mailed free to any address.

WHAT THE PRESS SAY.
They have a magnificent assortment of Books; and have prepared themselves with innumerable elegant Gifts to be distributed among their "troupe of friends and customers."—Boston Post.
Not only may a selection be made of any choice work, but with the publication it now is become an article of Jewelry, which in many cases proves quite valuable.—Balt. Daily Exchange.
They make no promises that are not performed strictly, by which means they have acquired a justly-enviable reputation; have indeed the entire confidence of not only our citizens, but the country abroad.—Sunday Times.
A young lady acquaintance of ours purchased, for $1, a Book at this establishment, a few days since, and received a double-cased Gold Watch, valued at one hundred dollars.—Balt. Clipper.
The success which attends the Gift Book House of Messrs. H. E. HOYT & Co. has no precedents in the annals of Gift Enterprise.—Republican and Argus.
Call and see them, and our word for it, you will not regret your visit.—Dispatch, Balt.
The inducements to the Southern and Western people to make their purchases from Messrs. Hoyt & Co. are such, greater value can be offered by any house of the kind in the country, as their location is nearer to the Southern point is less, and the immense order business done by this firm is a guarantee of their fulfilment of all promises.—Penny Journal.
It is, in a moral, getting books for nothing and being paid to take them away.—Examiner.
All orders will be promptly and impartially filled, and forwarded within one day after being received. The Gifts, in all cases, will accompany the Books, with a written certificate of the person sending the order.
Remember, no Gifts distributed of less value than 50 cents, or more than $100 00.
Address H. E. HOYT & CO.,
No. 41 Baltimore Street, Baltimore, Md.

$18 A WEEK $18
We want a few men in every State to act as our agents for an article of real worth. It is costly sold in every store and to every family.
We have seen who are making from 2 to 5 Dollars a day profit. This is none of those recipes or humbug articles with which the country is flooded, but is something of actual utility, and all that is required is sell it, is to show it.—Any one sending us 15 Cents will receive a sample by mail, postage paid, worth that amount, and all necessary information. Address
VAN DEUSEN BROTHERS,
Kingston, Ulster Co., N. Y.

PRINCE IMPERIAL
CHAMPAGNE,
FROM
DE VENOGE & CO., EPERNAY, FRANCE,
THIS IS A PERFECTLY PURE AND DELICATE WINE from the Celebrated Vineyards of DE VENOGE & CO., whose estate lays in the CENTRE OF THE FAVORITE CHAMPAGNE DISTRICT OF FRANCE. It has hitherto been confined to the best tables of England and the Continent, and has only recently been introduced into this country, where its rare quality, combined with the moderate price at which it is offered, is already achieving a success and popularity unprecedented in the annals of the wine trade.
Sold in this city by H. A. KOY, 52d Street; J. S. T. STRANAHAN & Co., 21 Park Row, corner of Broadway; 2 Twenty-fifth Street; Howell & Co., 693 Broadway; Macy & Co., 319 Sixth Avenue, and by all the leading dealers throughout the country.
E. V. HAUGHWOUT, Sole Importer,
Corner of Broadway and Broome Street.

100 Comic Songs.
Music and Words, including the best and most popular Humorous Songs in the English language. Price 50 cents.
Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 133.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MARSHAL MACMAHON, DUKE OF MAGENTA.

We are glad to be able to lay before our readers a faithful portrait of the new Duke of Magenta, the hero of the recent battle at Magenta, from a photograph taken at Paris by Meyer and Pierron.

Marshal MacMahon is a Frenchman whose ancestors followed James the Second from Ireland nearly two centuries ago, and settled in France. As the histories of the period make no mention of any one of the name among James's followers, it is likely that the original Irishman occupied an humble position in the suite of the runaway Stuart. His descendants have uniformly distinguished themselves as soldiers. The father of the present Duke was a brave officer, and wore the title of Count, which his son born till he won the higher rank of Duke.

Marie-Edme-Patrick-Maurice MacMahon was born at Sully Castle, in France, on 13th June, 1808, and is, consequently, at the present time, fifty-one years old. He became a soldier in early youth, and served in all the French campaigns in Algeria. At Constantine he was wounded; and his bravery and military skill won for him the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel at the age of thirty-four. On one occasion he was selected by the French General to convey dispatches to head-quarters through a country which was known to be in the possession of the Arabs. He was offered an escort of cavalry, which he refused, stating that it was either too much or too little; he set out alone. He was soon discovered by the Arabs, who gave chase. On three sides he saw their fleet horses rapidly gaining on him. In front was a deep and precipitous ravine. Without a moment's hesitation he spurred his horse at the ravine, and leaped into it. His horse was of course killed by the fall; the rider luckily escaped, and had the satisfaction of seeing his pursuers gazing blankly at him from the heights from which he had leaped. His mission was successfully discharged; promotion followed; and very shortly afterward he obtained the government of a province in Algeria.

When the Crimean war began, MacMahon was appointed to the command of a brigade, and was subsequently placed at the head of a division. He fought gallantly at Alma and Inkermann, and at the final assault on the Malakoff he had the honor of being chosen to lead the attack on that terrible height. How well he did his work, and how thoroughly vindicated his reputation for military genius, the freshly-written history of the war is there to prove. He, if any man, was the hero of the Malakoff.

At the close of the war he was rewarded by the usual honors and dignities, and became a Senator of France. In the Senate, he attracted general attention by opposing the repressive measures which were proposed after the February attempt on the Emperor's life. His voice was the only one that was raised in favor of liberty. For this, it was supposed that he had fallen into disgrace at the Court. But when the Italian war broke out he was appointed to as high a command as any of the more subservient generals. The Emperor saw through him, and liked him.

It is not necessary to repeat in this place the story of his deeds at Magenta. But for him, it is highly probable that the Imperial Guard would have perished on that terrible day. His timely appearance on the scene of action, and the irresistible ardor of his onslaught on the Austrians turned

MARSHAL MACMAHON.—[From a Photograph by Meyer & Pierron.]

SCENE ON THE MORNING AFTER THE LATE TERRIBLE ACCIDENT ON THE MICHIGAN SOUTHERN RAILROAD.—[From a Sketch by Mr. O. F. Brown.]—See next Page.

the tide of victory: Magenta was won, and Milan was evacuated in hot haste.

As an officer, Marshal MacMahon is remarkable for the care he takes of his men. No general in the French army is so popular among the rank and file as MacMahon. Their petty comforts, their tents, their food, their refreshment, their clothing, are all matters of the greatest concern to him. "No one imagines," he is reported to have said, "how vitally important it is in time of war to let soldiers have their rest at the right hour."

Marshal MacMahon married some years since a daughter of the Duke of Castrice, an old and popular French nobleman. His wife is highly esteemed at Court, where she is reported to be a woman of very sincere and heroic feelings. When the news of the battle of Magenta arrived she and other ladies were with the Empress at the Palace. The telegram was handed to Eugenia. She began trumblingly to read the cipher in which it was written. "Its first word," — a great battle"—were uttered aloud, and the emotion they caused among the ladies present, many of whom had husbands in the army, was so great that they almost swooned, and fainted, and the Empress herself was so affected as to be unable to proceed with the reading. All the while the ladies present the only one who preserved presence of mind was Madame MacMahon, whose reading words and kindly offices soon restored the Empress to herself, and enabled her to read the remainder of the dispatch.

ACCIDENT ON THE MICHIGAN SOUTHERN RAILROAD.

We give on the preceding page, from a sketch kindly furnished to us by Mr. O. F. Brown, an engraving of the terrible accident which occurred on the Michigan Southern and Northern Indiana Railroad, at South Bend, Indiana, on June 8th.

The Chicago Tribune thus describes the tragedy:

"The place where the tragedy occurred which has carried such deep sorrow into the hearts of many, is situated midway between the villages of South Bend and Mishawaka, and about two miles from each station. There is a ravine some thirty feet deep from the surface of the track, and scarcely due to one hundred feet wide. Under the track was a culvert, about nine feet by seven. The water passing through it is generally quite low at this season, not sufficient to fill the culvert half full. During the three months which preceded on Monday night the passage through the culvert became interrupted, and the water on the south or upper side suddenly raised to the height of fifteen to twenty feet, or within five or eight feet of the surface of the track. The track resting on a sandy foundation, the action of the water soon began to undermine, and probably before the train reached the fatal spot the track had given way, and the water, and the train took the terrible plunge into the abyss below, almost completely filling it to the south-eastern corner. The scene which followed is out of our power to describe, but those who were present on the occasion say that it was an event which no man should be called upon to witness but once in a lifetime. The shrieks and cries of the ravine being shirked by woods and the high banks, it was impossible to distinguish objects, and they were rendered by those who escaped death or secure injury could only be by the sense of the groans of the wounded. Fires was the concussion, and so terrible the scenes of the wounded and dying, that the secret thought was at first hardly heard at Mishawaka, a distance of two full miles. When those who attended the scene of the accident, a large number of whom were in the streets they having been called up by a fire in the village, they immediately started en masse for the scene of the disaster, and the news and every thing that would probably be needed to relieve the wounded.

STATEMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. George Bliss, President of the Road, who was on the train at the time, thus describes the disaster:

"On the night of the 8th inst. a very severe rain storm, of several hours' duration, accumulated a large body of water in the usually a dry gorge in summer, midway between South Bend and Mishawaka, and carried away a stone arch culvert of nine feet span, with an embankment of about thirty feet high, on the night of said 8th ultimo. The night was very dark and the train, came on as usual at about the latter hour, consisting of the baggage car, an emigrant passenger car, one second-class car, and four first-class cars, and the last car of which was a sleeping car—all laterally well filled—and every berth in the sleeping car occupied with a considerable number of women and children. The whole train plunged into the gorge. The baggage car, emigrant car, and second car fell nearly upon the engine and tender, which were partly upon and partly under the water, and the first sleeping car, now from three to six or eight feet deep, the forefront three of the sleeping cars next following, the rear remain, and not on top of each other, but partially on their sides, and consequently crushed. The passengers in the fall inside of the others, right side up, entering a little, in three or four feet of water. It was consequently very little injured—the lamp in the room not being even broken. None of the passengers in this car were seriously injured. There was found in the water in the bottom. The passengers from it were got on shore very well. From the other cars many got on top of the train, and were assisted to the shore, where bonfires were built. Passengers were dressed in the neighboring farm houses, each about two miles distant, and many soon arrived at the scene of the accident.

"As to the cause of the accident, so far as I can learn, it was entirely accidental and unavoidable. Nobody there was little or no water passing through the culvert. The rain for many hours was most probable. The culvert was examined at ten o'clock, and it readily passed all the water. The track rested on a thick stratum of sand, and the whole line during the storm, and all was safe. The track master was on the engine on his way home and was killed. It was an old rule of the road that the section men shall not desert and pass over the road during a storm and examine all the bridges and culverts at any hour of the night, and the division superintendent pursued this order within the last two or three years.

"By noon the next day after the accident there was as little water in the bed that a person could easily step over it."

STATEMENT OF THE CONDUCTOR.

"I was seated in the fore-part of the first passenger car at about twelve o'clock, on Monday night, when suddenly I heard a crashing in the car, as if the cars were breaking and shaking, then I felt the car we was plunging, when I got upon my feet to see what was the matter, and I tried to reach the door of the car, but not being able, as I felt my foothold slipping from beneath me, I soon succeeded climbing to the roof, and succeeded in getting a hold. The roof was much broken away by this time, and I got through it to the top, where I kept hold until I looked below. I then commenced climbing up, and reached the bank. I saw a number of others clambering up out of the cars, and there were several persons assisting the persons who had been injured. I saw some laborers, whom I ordered to light bonfires on the bank, and down the road. Of the speed of the train I took no particular notice. I do not think it was running at full speed, as we had just passed over a big bridge, where we usually slacken up. I think the train was going about 25 mile.

"I should judge there were some one hundred and fifty persons in the train—I could not tell as I had not taken up my checks of the second-class (or emigrant) car, or the first-class passengers. There were about fifty persons got on the forement of the emigrant cars, from Aurora, Illinois, and about the same from New Albany, Indiana. The emigrant cars were all smashed up. When I looked below the bridge was very deep, and the water was running heavy. I was confused—I wanted to reach the passengers out of the wreck, which I succeeded in as I supposed, for it, but when I looked the crack, I had not counted right. I never counted the passengers before; it was what I call a dry run, and the culvert was of stone, and was built on a good solid sand bed. The stone of the catchpike is, as near as I can judge, about halfway between South Bend and Mishawaka. This (Tuesday) morning I crossed the same spot where last night I had the accident, and could not discover any trace or sign of any fuss. I know nothing further of the cause of the accident than the carrying away of the culvert, and I was riding on the platform of the first platform rear car, when the plunking and cracking commenced."

STATEMENT OF A PASSENGER.

Mr. Brott, a passenger, says: "I was a passenger on the 8 p.m. train of the Southern Michigan Road. I, with my wife and children, occupied the first passenger car, forward one of the first-class cars. There were three cars in front of the sleeping car, and one in the rear. I had sent the middle of the car. At the time of the accident I was not asleep, but sitting in the car. I got up and exchanged seats with my wife. I heard a heavy crash, and felt the car rising and falling as near as I can say for a tremendous leap or plunge. It was but an instant that I felt this motion, and then I felt that the first the occupants of the car were pitched about much. I was thrown out of my seat, over one or two seats in front of me. But when the cars struck all the front part of it was all crushed in, carrying my seat with it, and some of those occupying that end of the car must have been totally crushed, as I heard their cries for help in the water. Those of us who could kicked to get out. The lights were extinguished, and the night was cloudy and dark. I got out window in the rear end of the car and on its side. My wife escaped, she hardly knows how. The water at the time was very deep, and I had to swim. In the horror of the scene through which he had passed seemed to have partially paralyzed his faculties. He looked at the affair like an almost-minded man speaking of some disinterested matter.

THE AGONY AT CHICAGO.

A Chicago paper, describing the scenes when the first intelligence of the disaster reached that place, says:

"Husbands whose wives and children had left them in the morning in the fullness of health and vigor, messengers from wives who sat, with trembling hearts and pallid lips, at their homes, and anxious merchants and general freight officer during all the after-part of the day. In the latter is the most intense anxiety and suspense, and the communications between it and the station nearest the scene of the accident, Mishawaka, were hampered by slanders, fail of dreadful meaning. We saw many turn away from the bulletin-board, after reading it with sickly hope and joy, and others struck with heavy despair. One gentleman in this city had sent his wife, by the cars, and sister eastward on the fatal night. He was an early inquirer. The engraving operator deputized a messenger of inquiry, and he stood by the instrument. It was a long time before the reply to a question. At last he said that he had put his family in the train, and that he expected to expect the worst, became the destruction of life in that accident. He left the telegraph office in an open jeef, and the worst of agony stood like rain-drops on his face. He was not seen again that day. And his last wife was going only so far as Kalamazoo. He was told to the Kalamazoo, and there was no information, and that his precious ones could not be involved in this catastrophe. At all the depots, and at the office, the most anxious followed like a waterfall, and the happy and thankful were overwhelmed with joy. One man took his picked up and laid out in the cars, with sheets covering their forms. No one could venture to look upon the dead, or even out of the water. She was, of course, dead when found of that family. The mother was killed, a daughter is missing, and another boy is wounded, but not seriously. He is in the same room with his wretched brother, while he saw another of the young ones, six years old, dead, having had his face completely cut off. The bodies of the females were not much mutilated. By the dress of these dead and wounded, Mr. Exeter judges them to have been mostly second-class passengers.

SCENES AND INCIDENTS.

"Mr. Rice and Mr. Osgood (the conductor) seemed crazy. He ran to South Bend and to Mishawaka, and then returned—a distance of eight miles—without his hat. He took charge of him, and brought him to the city at 5½ o'clock yesterday.

"One woman, who was on the train with her husband and five children, was widely absent all night seeking her family, but without success, until morning, when she found them all alive. She was sent to a farm-house a few yards off, where, after sitting a few minutes, the whole family fell under and expired.

"Mr. Bliss says that a gentleman, with his wife and two children, left here in the train on a pleasure trip to the East. But in the accident the parties became separated. The husband found one of his young sons dead in the water. Search for the others he found his wife and child were also saved.

"A lady who was carried down in the cars was rescued by catching hold of a limb, says at least a dozen human bodies, some alive and calling for assistance, and some still and lifeless, passed by her in the stream."

Many affecting incidents are made on the morning after the accident, shows how rapidly the water in the torrent subsided. Up to the present time the number of killed is twenty-four. Twenty-five. The exact number of wounded has not been ascertained.

Summer Resorts.

Corning Hotel, West Point, N. Y.
La Touretta House, Cragsmoor Point, N. Y.
Hopatcong House, Lake Hopatcong, N. J.
Congress Hall, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.
Howland's Hotel, Long Branch, N. J.
White Sulphur Springs Company, Co., O.
International Hotel, Niagara Falls.
Trenton Falls Hotel, Trenton Falls, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1859.

ANOTHER WORD ON THE NATURALIZATION QUESTION.

AN admirer of Mr. Cass's views on the Naturalization Question takes us to task for what he calls "the unreasonableness of our protensions." A naturalized citizen, says he, forjoys the fullest citizenship in this country, and should therefore be willing to pay for that which gave him birth. It is, he asks, so great a hardship to be shut out from one little spot of earth, when he has the whole country to call his own, that one exception? Is there not a species of mischievous perversity in naturalized citizens of Prussian birth, who, when travelling in Europe, when they might take the air in England, or France, or Spain, or the East Indies, or the Fiord Islands, prefer Prussia?

This friend of the Secretary of State has evidently never heard of a verse which most schoolboys know by heart. It begins thus:

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said"

"I'll be a citizen of Prussia!"

We will not undertake to discuss whether the sentiment which the poet rightly assumes to exist in all human hearts is as perverse and con wholly forgot or become indifferent to the place where he first saw the light, and where his kindred and friends reside.

Mr. Cass and his friends will find, if they inquire, that every man in the country, however his interests may have estranged him from his birth-place, looks forward to visit the old familiar spot once more. The more distant the old home, the more ardent the desire to revisit it again. Neither space nor time weaken, nothing but death destroys, the fond old memory, and set at rest the yearning desire to behold once more one's childhood, and gaze on the old landmarks of the fireside. In comparison with that beloved spot all the rest of the world is a dull blank. Young men love to travel for the sake of seeing strange sights, new places; and when man matures, the only place on earth which he longs to see before he dies is his old home.

It is the fact that this is true of nearly the only one from which Mr. Cass desires to shut out the naturalized citizens of the United States.

The Secretary may rest assured that in a case if every applicant for naturalization were told on appearing before the Court to be admitted only upon the hard the condition of a citizenship was that he should never revisit his birthplace, there would be an end of the business of naturalization. The only persons left to call him who have it in charge would be gone. There is not a hod-carrier or a starving German laborer who would willingly, for sound, or even for American citizenship, to deliberately renounce the natural and cheering hope that some day, in prosperous circumstances, he might revisit the land which he left to seek his fortune. This may be called a perverse feeling. If so, it is part of the original bitter perversity of every human heart. And, for our part, we should be very sorry to think that any men were being raised to the dignity of American citizenship who had so little of common humanity in their composition as to be wholly free from such perversity.

We are glad, but not surprised, to see that the shameful measure of the Cass policy on this question is arousing the indignation of statesmen of all parties. Among the Democrats, Senator Douglas, of Illinois, and Governor Wise, of Virginia, take open ground against the desertion of naturalized citizens. Governor Banks, of Massachusetts, and, we believe, Governor Chase, of Ohio, are equally decided on the same side. Even the Know-Nothings are ashamed of the Cass method of cheating foreigners: Mr. Botts, of Virginia, has written several letters denouncing it; and a letter of Mr. Everett's has also appeared in the papers, taking the manly ground that once a citizen, a man is a citizen always and everywhere. We do not carry the feelings with which the Secretary of State must perceive that men of all parties to the question. Even the Herald ventures to protest against the quibbling paradoxes under cover of which he is betraying the honor of the country.

"WOODMAN, SPARE THAT TREE!"

In the State of Massachusetts there is a law which forbids the murder of small birds. Sports. men may shoot quail, but must not kill larks, lows, and all varieties of the feathered creation which are not suited for the table, are protected by formal statute. This law, which commends itself to general approval on the ground of its humanity, was not, however, adopted on that account. Many years ago, the people of Massachusetts noticed that their trees were being destroyed by worms; and, on examination, they discovered that the insect most of the worm was was exactly proportionate to the destruction of small birds. Hence the enactment. To remove the evil they struck at its root, and condemned small birds sacred from shot. They have their reward. Every year we see how the worm tribe, which is the common food of birds, have been gradually diminishing in the State, and trees have flourished with increased vigor. But for this law many parts of Massachusetts would now have been treeless, and droughts would have scorched up the land with fearful excessive.

This law for the protection of small birds should be adopted by every State in the Union. Rooks and swallows have their important place in the economy of the world; they should be protected in its discharge. If they are not, the day will come when we shall bitterly deplore it.

Trees, too, demand more general attention than they have hitherto received. Nothing has been treated in a more barbarous way. Here we protect trees from worms, so trees protect fields from drought by providing the air with moisture. In many parts of the country the forests are cut down to feed the ever-consuming maw. For a few cents of wood they will cut down a grove which fertilizes hundreds of acres. The picturesqueness of the beauty of the noble elms, maples, oaks, and hemlocks, which would grow every where, if we would let them grow; is not thought for a day, so it would be vain to plead for the picturesque. But every farmer can appreciate the economical value of cutting off the trees that the county contained no other fuel than wood, necessity might compel people to destroy the value of their land by cutting down trees when coal is too cold is so abundant and so cheap, as it is throughout the Northern States, there is no excuse for such folly.

We have heard of a German law which compels every man to plant a certain number of trees on the highway before he can marry. This is an old, but by no means a bad law. If some of our Northern Legislatures would enact something similar, they would do much to produce such wood-pile, and how many bounteous rains have been prevented by the sacrifice of trees, we believe, established that coal is cheaper for railroad purposes than wood; there would, therefore, be no injustice in compelling each railroad to adopt at least a certain number of coal-burning locomotives.

THE GREAT WEST INDIAN PROBLEM.

A VERY remarkable series of letters is now appearing in the New York Times, on the subject of the British West India Islands. It is understood that they are written by one of the Times staff, Mr. Sewell, who has spent several months in the West Indies, and has enjoyed unusual facilities for obtaining correct information with regard to the present condition and prospects of the British possessions in that part of the world. The letters present the subject of emancipation in a new point of view, and are very suggestive.

According to Mr. Sewell, the whites and the colored people of the British West India Islands live in a perpetual state of unconcealed hostility toward each other. By the Act of Emancipation the colored population have acquired equal political rights with the whites. Black men are members of Assembly in Jamaica, and fill political offices of grave responsibility in that and other islands. There is at lease one black judge on the bench, and at the municipal elections "gentlemen of color" are superior. The day is close at hand, in fact, when the political control of the islands—so far as that is abandoned to the people by the Government of the mother country—will reside exclusively with the blacks.

On the other hand, the whites retaliate by refusing to associate with persons of color. The sentiment which, in part of the world, prevents amalgamation between the races flourishes with peculiar intensity in the British West Indies. White residents of Jamaica and Barbadoes not only refuse to know persons of color, but carry their dislike so far as to repudiate acquaintance with strangers who, ignorant of the peculiar opinions of the islanders, incautiously exchange civilities with planters or others in whose veins a stain of black blood flows. Barbadoes it is fatal to a traveler's reputation to visit at the house of a colored person, or to walk in the street, or have any social intercourse of any kind with him or his family.

The undisguised and haughty contempt of the whites for their colored fellow-citizens naturally begets in the latter a feeling of bitter hatred, which bursts forth at every opportunity. Within a few months it has manifested itself in the shape of riots in Jamaica, in Barbadoes, and in Trinidad. In the two former islands the whites openly confess that their lives would not be safe were the British troops removed, and it is evident from the letters before us that this opinion, startling as it seems, is shared by their author. He and others seem to look for a ward to the speedy outbreak of a war of races in the British West Indies, and to the ultimate expulsion, if not extermination, of the whites.

It is well that the subject should receive due consideration here. The working of emancipation in Jamaica has been a staple topic with our politicians for years; but in fact we know very little about it, nor is it at all certain that the measure has yet wrought out its most natural consequences. Whether whites and blacks can live together on terms of equality, in a community in which the latter considerably outnumber the former, is a problem yet unsolved.

Half the wars which blot the page of history have arisen from causes of this kind. The Saxon incursions of strife to assimilate Normans and Saxons, Moors and Spaniards, Chinese and Tartars. The latter are not considered as amalgamating with the natives of Algiers; the English have made no progress toward peaceable fusion with the natives of Hindostan; the French of Lower Canada, who were conquered one hundred years ago, are as French as ever; in this country, where the white man and the Indian have come into contact, the latter has perished outright. The future history of the British West Indies will furnish the philosopher new data on this vitally important subject.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

WASHINGTON CITY, June, 1859.

PERCEIVING that you take a most courageous and, permit me to add, a most laudable interest in the various efforts in progress to solve the problem of aerial navigation, I have only to state, in a matter of public importance, that the Balloon inventor of a system by which the buoyant power is now employed, aided by propelling power, will, in I, of course, include, when writing to test, completely revolutionize our present railway system, transporting goods and freights generally, almost to much less expense and risk, and with vastly greater speed. In fact, I propose to construct the Parish Balloon of a one-half the ordinary size, and, in less than a third of the time now deemed necessary for a voyage to Europe. When I shall have been finished, passengers and freight may be transported from New York to San Francisco in three days, and there will be established no more embankment on the whole line.

This scheme was conceived many years ago, before the plan you hinted at some weeks since had been heard of, and the projection of the same need the absence of any means have been the only impediments to its realization up to this day. The steamboat and the locomotive had each an infantile and neglect for half a century; now, they govern the world. Nor is the time distant when the aerial navigation shall play its part in the modern drama of Empire.

In addition to the above, I am, as I believe, the discoverer of an element, or rather a combination of elements, that will place the fleets and armies of the world at the mercy of the nation possessing the secret. It shall never be used but in the defense of a well-defended and unmistakable purpose of Liberty—such as the assault and invasion of our country by a despotic alliance, or an armed attempt to keep us in the American Union.

When this terrible agency shall have been brought to bear, any military force opposed to the purposes and artillery of any description of MYSELF will be able to live ten minutes in the fold against it, and it is presumable that such vessels constructed of or plated with iron that will be surest to meet destruction within its range, which far surpasses the limit of the Armstrong gun and the gun Napoleon. Schastopol, Cherbourg, Cronstadt, would no longer be defensible with artillery or firearms when attacked by the American "———."

I am engaged in another and equally important, yet in no hurry about these things, for they are forcing facts; I am not seeking a puff or even mention; but, as a member of the Press at large, I furnish simply an item of news, with the assurance that, if you desire further particulars, they are, within a certain limit, freely at your disposal.

I am, very respectfully,

Your most obedient servant,

WM. J. ROSE,

Department of State.

THE LOUNGER.

LOVE.

DR. PALMER has edited a felicitous and racy translation of Michelet's "L'Amour." His labors have been chiefly those of gratifying the natural curiosity which attends such a book from such a man. A celebrated French scholar, historian, and professor—a man of singular purity of tastes and life, and entirely secluded in his habits, Michelet, brought unwillingly in contact with the inflammable youth of France, beloved and honored by them, has always sought to use his great influence to some good purpose; and in accordance with the suggestions of his experience, has published this remarkable book.

Of the purity of intention and the skill of execution there can be no question. It is idle to talk about the morality of such a work unless the discussion of the subject at all in it is forbidden. Michelet has always commanded by a state of society in which, under a highly polished veneer of politeness, the most shocking immorality prevailed for women. They keep shop, indeed; they keep accounts; they are at the head of many extensive establishments; there is a degree of practical tact that they are capable of every kind of duty—but the word L'Amour is never spoken except in a certain position. Both sexes suffer incalculably from this view—as they do wherever it prevails. Michelet has written his book to combat this opinion.

It is a kind of appeal to manly honor. Love, he says, is the law of a man's life. It is made for and by love. In that passion nature hides its most vital purposes. Hence from the very beginning, even before the child becomes sufficiently from the physical conditions which Nature has provided to shape and develop the complicated mass of its intentions. The moment they love—they yield. They live in the life of their lover. They suffer and die with their lover. They live the vitions and the sacrifices of the one passion for which they are created. Now, this book, which has become upon the mind of the reader, Michelet deals very plainly with facts, recalls himself of all the circumstances, and, with the calmness his consultant speculations a scientific basis. The result is a book of singular purity, in which the whole is invested with the sacred mystery of suffering, in which he does not shun. The sacrifice of woman to the passion of man, not consecrated by pain. The young man is surprised, startled, amazed, by the revelations, and resolves that he will guard from or make, which has been concealed in medical and surgical works and nomenclature; he resolves that he will not be ignorant of what is utterly devoted and unselfish, partner of his life shall be honored and cherished as the mother of his children.

This is the point at which the author aims, and this he undoubtedly accomplishes. The book will make many a man's home what it never thought before. It will make him look upon marriage with a graver eyes.

And yet in his eagerness to reach this result, Michelet betrays how deeply he is touched and blinded by the subject. He paints the ideal French Woman, in his picture, is a pale, enervated, feeble creature of the home. She is all love—all devotion. She is the denizen of a hospital ward, not the cheerful, vigorous, executive head of a home and family. She is a sensitive plant, which the touch of a finger, the gardener is to watch and pray, lest, at any and every moment, it should wither and die. Now, this is, oddly enough, the woman of the French novel and the French salon: at once morbid and artificial. Michelet, in his magnificent generosity, would suppose that this model wife has an irresistible influence to tone, and refine, and purify mankind, and he, therefore, should so wall her in with the insuperable sweetness of his caressing, that she should be safe from every breath that stirs the lover's arms.

But these things which belong to France, to Paris, and to the Frenchman Michelet, do not affect the substance of his work. It is not necessary to answer every letter of his picture of woman, in the order of nature, she is consecrated by pain and suffering to a suffering which necessarily arises from the deepest feeling of which she is capable. That is the true moral of Michelet's book. And it is a moral as a man as well worthy our attention as that of any other nation. He will "Wilhelm Meister," or "Wuthering Heights," or any Englishtory of Dickens or Thackeray, who would inform us that Love has yet learned the lesson. And are we so very different from our cousins?

THE LAST OF THE QUARANTINE.

It is ten months since the Quarantine buildings were burned upon Staten Island. Then began the outbreak of horror all over the land. Five hundred black cats, it is said, were immediately murdered with each other in declaring that the very flames of Quarantine, in their mad fanaticism and their inhuman rage, had been consumed of an outrage so revolting to every natural emotion of the heart. Seven hundred black cats, at the very least! In vain the accused pleaded that the orators didn't know what they were talking about. In vain they asked for a moment's silence to state their side. In vain they showed low, and reason, and right. No, no, Sirs, you are assassins, incendiaries. One thousand of the very blackest cats that were ever seen!

It is ten months ago, and the Quarantine has been removed from Staten Island.

We remember with pleasure that this paper expressed but one opinion of the trouble of the last days of January. It was, in substance, that the Quarantine was a nuisance that, by the law of this State, could be properly abated in the manner adopted. Against exposure and danger to the sick every precaution was taken, and although the conduct of the Quarantine authorities paralyzed human efforts, yet they were themselves forced by alloor that nobody had suffered in consequence.

The other view was that the Quarantine, under the circumstances, was one of those wrongs which the forms of law or its inevitable technically delayed action of the law, an orderly and intelligent people would naturally remove, appealing for the reason and common sense of mankind for their justification, and in no manner endangering the public peace and safety.

The action of ten months has justified all this. The Quarantine, as a public danger and a public evil, and temporarily removed, has been so satisfactorily shown, even to the most prejudiced, that not a single person has ventured to say that Quarantines are silent. The epithet of "Sapsy" was enthusiastically applied by the islanders, who interpreted a vigorous little paper under that title until the removal was accomplished, when, the occasion having passed, it took the less emphatic title of the Richmond County Gazette. The thousand black cats have vanished and disappeared, and those even that somebody said he thought he heard somebody else say that an old woman had somewhere seen in a dream that a black mouse's tail was to be wrinkled into its hole.

Every body is probably satisfied with the result. Even the worthy Mayor, who wished to punish the refractory islanders by a few more years of exile, would be glad to welcome them back. He did not prove to be the better horse. The enterprising mosquitoes who did their best to drive away Sopsys went to the dogs if they could only get their oranges at cheaper rate, now previous, probably, that they can get them somewhere else cheaply without incurring humanity and decency. And even the mourning Quarantine Doctors, who complained for 11 real in misrepresentation of the acts and opinions of the islanders, undoubtedly see that the State of New York has not intended to do so, has no right to deprive any of its citizens of life, liberty, or property, without due course of law.

THE OLD ENGLISH COMEDY.

"DEAR DR. SPRING:—I have always liked to see a good old English comedy. It is a traditional pleasure. Charles Lamb liked it: Leigh Hunt liked it: Gulian Verplanck liked it: and all of it more unctuously then any American living. I am glad to see that Wallack's is now announced to go to hear 'Don Giovanni;' and the other evening I saw the 'Rivals' as well played as it can be.

"Of the 'Rivals,' I took my earliest impressions. Agnes and Laura, and shall I confess to you that I thought the latter looked very well? Mrs. Malaprop's volition is a very pretty theatre. It is cool and airy, and there is an entrance full of green plants and shrubs. Here were pleasant scenes. The audience had evidently come to hear and enjoy, and listened intently and with appreciation; and you know Mrs. Vernon's Mrs. Malaprop, Blake's Sir Anthony, Brougham's Sir Lucius, Walcot's Bob Acres, Lester's Captain Absolute, and Hilliard's Fag. A night of such actors may be called the happy days of the theatre.

"And yet I wished my grand-daughters were not there. The play is a series of clever things. There is nothing behind it. It is one of Ellis's Island Lotion volley. And everybody, except Falkland and Julia, is a fool, and the whole is a maddening jest.

"When I went home and had kissed my grandaughters good-night, who said—little witches!—that they had had a lovely evening at the comedy, I lighted my pipe (as I have done now)—Milton smoked a pipe, and meditated upon the sins of men, and why I was sorry the girls were there.

"I am afraid, Sir, I have discovered that many good things, from the beginning of the world, have people used to hear the comedies of Congreve and Wycherley, Sheridan and Goldsmith, and the most indecent now to mention their names. And not at the close of the century the same people who have had just a lovely evening at the 'Rivals' hail 'Tom Jones' and 'Peregrine Pickle.' How many thousands of people have read 'Tom Jones' and 'Peregrine Pickle.' Mr. Longer, isn't that somehow the reason I was sorry to have my daughters listen to the play?

"I will tell you, Sir, in strict privacy, now they are gone to bed, that there is one character introduced in the play at which the gentlemen laughed and applauded loudly, and then turned round and looked at the girls, as if they wished to see how they took them. I think, Sir, that must be the reason I should not take my grand-daughters again.

"Our manners are different from the old manners, Mr. Lounger. I say nothing of myself—but the difference of manners from the world make a young woman blush at hearing things which a hundred years ago would not have caused in the least improper.

"My pipe is out, Sir; so I fear is your patience. I thank you for listening me, Sir.

"And I am your very humble servant,

"NESTOR GOSSAMER."

THE NEW OCEAN CABLE.

THERE is but one topic in our paragraph. All the eloquence of last year, the illuminations, the orations, are not to be not. Mr. Field's expedition showed that the work could be done; and English capital, skill, and pluck are now going to do it. A cable is to be laid from the Land's-End in Cornwall to Blane Sablon, an island in the Straits of Belleisle, a little to the north of Newfoundland. Thence by proper connection, to Quebec, Montreal, and Canada in general—and from Montreal, of course, to Portland, and Burlington, and Boston, and New York.

It is very clear that our English cousins have not a profound admiration of our way of laying ocean telegraphs. They subscribed a great deal of money; we assumed a great deal of glory: and on common and speeches and letters in acres and forms. The Queen spoke, or was reported to have spoken, to the Presidents—the President tried to speak back again—then silence, rust, desolation, and rain settled upon the whole. Where is Dr Sauty? Does he still sit in that little cabin on the shore, getting movements, and vibrations, and signals from the Sea—and what not? Poor, dear, wayworn, unintelligible?

The English propose for a certain sum, under two millions of dollars, to make a wire, insure it, submerge it, and have it delivered ready to work. Apparently, the whole plan has been carefully matured, and the execution will be, at least, faithfully attempted. There will be no haste, no slenderness, no speculation upon the departures of the deck. Probably the report of the Government House in Canada will be spared from the House until it is settled that the wire can be of service. And when it is settled, the Government will calmly take its place in history, and justify all the abuse and praise and the good things that were said, before it was accomplished.

LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—Two friends write from Brooklyn that their paper is stolen regularly. They guess that we shall reason with the thief. We do not, as, therefore, regretted to the robbers that they should rather subscribe to the paper than steal it. We wish they would buy their own.

—Any Tee of Sparta, Georgia, wishes to know if it is right to say that "the English arched the Menzam at Kotch." The word is misspelled and the fact illegible of town; but as it means to steal and lay water, it may, not inappropriately, be used as above.

—September 1st, St. Louis, sends a number of questions to be proposed to any of the New York Weeklies. How is Dr. Bellows? Is it true that Mr. Beecher is still writing D. Dam?" and again, "of two rats, a long one with a long tail and a short one with a short tail, which is the swiftest?" and again, entera pondus, could get into his hole quickest? Inquiries of this serious, deep, and practical kind are a bit of useful knowledge from the answer to correspondents.

—J. W. G., Murfreesborough, Tennessee, wishes to understand how a brig that once saved Professor Wise in Lake Erie afterward lost in the Gulf. It must probably by the Welland Canal to Lake Ontario, thence by the river and across to the Gulf, or across the sea by St. Lawrence. There is a considerable trade in vessels between Quebec and Montreal.

—Why, asks Q. of Bradford, Vermont, is Prince Louis Napoleon called Plon-Plon? and why was the late King Louis Philippe called "Egalité?" Plon-Plon is a King term in French for Pudding-head. Prince Puddingface. Egalité? I don't know. But that Louis Napoleon replied to his other question as follows:

—Sir, Louis Napoleon was educated at Ital, a kind of prisoner's base, or what said formerly to be called in Italy "playing for keeps." Your knave is a term applied on allusion to this passing in the nickname; especially as Louis Napoleon was a prisoner at Ham. Plon is the prohibition for childish amusements besides, and the Plon-Plon is a game. But the nickname, for these causes, or its collective significance, is understood to have been given to Louis Napoleon by the Parisian populace for his display of having come to the throne by the votes of the people instead of their insurrections. Plon-Plon! Impudent fellow, shut up! Louis Napoleon is entitled to be sung: "Sweep them away—canonade 'em!" His nickname is the King Terrible, and he is a king known in the French for Pudding-head. Prince Pudding-face! Louis Napoleon! I will see that your letter is

THE WAR IN ITALY—THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON AT THE BATTLE OF MAGENTA.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON AT THE BATTLE OF MAGENTA.

We are happy to present herewith an original drawing of the Austrian attack on the Imperial Guard—the most striking scene at the battle of Magenta—by our own artist.

The accounts of the battle all concur in stating that, after the passage of the Ticino was forced, the whole available Austrian force was thrown upon the French van-guard, consisting exclusively of the Imperial Guard. They were led on by the Emperor in person. Those who know those admirable troops will not be surprised to hear that, though considerably outnumbered by the enemy, the Guard stood its ground firmly, and repelled the Austrians as a rock drives back the waves. The Emperor himself, we are told, sat calmly on his horse under fire, his iron features betraying as little emotion as usual. As the day advanced, however, and he saw his noble soldiers mowed down around him by the Austrian cannon, he was seen to give earnestly and repeatedly to the direction from which General MacMahon afterward advanced. No one knew his plans; and his anxious glances were not understood even by his staff. So one was aware that had MacMahon failed to execute the movement intended to him, it might have gone hard with the Rover of the French army. Luckily for them the Emperor's plans were sound, and his instruments well chosen. In the midst of the Austrian attack cannon were heard in the distance, and presently MacMahon's glorious attack relieved the Guard and won the day.

The artist has chosen as his theme the critical moment before MacMahon's appearance. A cannon shot has torn a furrow through the Guard, almost grazing the Emperor's horse. Napoleon sits unmoved, though his officers are almost ready to place him by main force in a position of less danger. The old grenadiers gaze grimly into the smoke, firing only when their shots are sure to tell.

The moment is sure to be selected by the French artists for elaborate illustration. We think it likely that our picture will bear a comparison with any thing they may produce.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

In Three Books.—Splendidly Illustrated.

Printed from every Proof-sheets, for which Messrs. Bradbury & Evelyn pay the Author

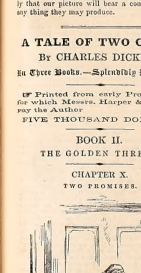
FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

BOOK II.

THE GOLDEN THREAD.

CHAPTER X.

TWO PROMISES.



MORE months, to the number of twelve, had come and gone, and Mr. Charles Darnay was established in England as a higher teacher of the French language who was conversant with French literature. In such a way he would have been a Professor; in the age in was a Tutor. He read with young men who could find any leisure and interest for the study of a living tongue spoken all over the world, and he cultivated a taste for its stores of knowledge and fancy. He could write of them, besides, in sound English, and render them into sound English. Such masters were not at that time easily found; Princes that had been, and Kings that were to be, were not yet of the Teacher's class, and no ruined nobility had dropped out of Tellson's ledgers to turn cooks and couriers.

As a tutor, whose attainments made the student's way unusually pleasant and profitable, and as an elegant translator, who brought something to his work besides mere dictionary knowledge, young Mr. Darnay soon became known and recommended. He was well acquainted, moreover, with the circumstances of his country, and was often worn of ever-growing interest. So, with great perseverance and unfailing industry, he prospered.

In London he had expected neither to walk on pavements of gold, nor to tie on beds of roses; if he had had any such exalted expectation he would not have prospered. He had expected labor, and he found it, and it did, and made the best of it. In this prosperity consisted.

A certain portion of his time was passed at Cambridge, where he read with undergraduates as a sort of tolerated smuggler who drove a contraband trade in European languages, instead of conveying Greek and Latin through the Custom-house. The rest of his time he passed in London.

Now, from the days when it was always summer in Eden, to these days when it is mostly winter in fallen latitudes, the world of a man has invariably gone one way—Charles Darnay's way—the way of the love of a woman.

He had loved Lucie Manette from the hour of his danger. He had never heard a sound so sweet and dear as the sound of her compassionate voice; he had never seen a face so tenderly beautiful as hers when it was encircled with his own on the edge of the grave that had been dug for him. But he had not yet spoken to her on any theme closer than commiseration at the accented chasm far away beyond the bearing of fate and the long, dusty roads—the solid stone chateaus which had itself become the mere nurt of a dream—had been down a year, and he had never yet, by so much as a single spoken word, disclosed to her the state of his heart.

That he had his reasons for this he knew full well. It was again a summer day when, lately arrived in London from his college occupation, he turned into the quiet corner in Soho, bent on seeking an opportunity of opening his mind to Doctor Manette. It was the close of the summer day, and he knew Lucie to be out with Miss Pross.

He found the Doctor reading in his arm-chair at a window. The energy which had at once supported him under his old sufferings and aggravated their sharpness, had been gradually restored to him. He was now a very energetic man indeed, with great firmness of purpose, strength of resolution, and vigor of action. In his recovered energy he was sometimes a little fitful and sudden, as he had at first been in the exercise of his recovered faculties; but of this had never been frequently observable, and grew less frequent as time went on.

He studied much, slept little, sustained a great deal of fatigue with ease, and was equably cheerful. To him now entered Charles Darnay, of a sight of whom he laid aside his book and held out his hand.

"Charles Darnay! I rejoice to see you. We have been counting on your return these three or four days past. Mr. Stryver and Sydney Carton were both here yesterday, and both made you out to be more than due."

"I am obliged to them for their interest in the matter," he answered, a little coldly as to them, though he was really so to the Doctor. "Miss Manette—"

"Is well," said the Doctor, as he stopped short; "and your return will delight us all. She has gone out on some household matters, but will soon be back."

"Doctor Manette, I knew she was from home. I took the opportunity of her being from home to beg to speak to you."

There was a blank silence.

"Yes," said the Doctor, with evident constraint. "Bring your chair here and speak on."

He complied as to the chair, but appeared to find the speaking on less easy.

"I have had the happiness, Doctor Manette, of being received by you into your house at length before, for some year and a half, that I hope the hope on which I then ventured to touch may not be lost."

He was stayed by the Doctor's putting out his hand to stop him. When he had kept it so a little while he withdrew it, and said,

"Is Lucie the topic?"

"She is."

"It is hard for me to speak of her at any time. It is very hard for me to hear her spoken of in the closest relations. Charles Darnay."

"It is a tone of fervent admiration, true honor, and dear love, Doctor Manette!" he said, deferentially.

There was another blank silence before her father replied,

"I believe it. I do you justice; I believe it."

His constraint was manifest, cold as it was manifest, too, that it originated in an unwillingness to approach the subject, that Charles Darnay felt very painfully.

"I shall I go on, Sir?"

Another blank.

"Yes, go on."

"You anticipate what I would say, though you can not know how earnestly I say it, how earnestly I feel it, without knowing my secret heart, and the hopes and fears and anxieties with which it has long been laden. Dear Doctor Manette, I love your daughter fondly, dearly, disinterestedly, devotedly. If ever there were love in the world I love her. You have seen how dear you are to me, and know what I can say for myself."

The Doctor sat with his face turned away and his eyes cast down on the ground. At the last words he stretched out his hand again hastily, and cried,

"Not that, Sir! Let that be! I adjure you, do not recall that!"

His cry was so like a cry of actual pain that it rang in Charles Darnay's ears long after he had ceased. He motioned with the hand he had extended, and it seemed to be an appeal to Darnay to pause. The latter so received it, and remained silent.

"I ask your pardon," said the Doctor, in a subdued tone, after some moments. "I do not doubt your honor, Charles Darnay; but remember what I said of it."

He turned toward him in his chair, but did not look at him or raise his eyes. His chin drooped upon his hand, and his white hair overshadowed his face.

"Have you spoken to Lucie?"

"No."

"Nor written?"

"Never."

"It would be ungenerous to affect not to know that your self-denial is to be referred to your consideration for her father. Her father thanks you."

He offered his hand; but his eyes did not go with it.

"I know," said Darnay, respectfully—"how can I fail to know, Doctor Manette, I who have seen you together from day to day?—that between you and Miss Manette there is an affection so unusual, so touching, so belonging to the circumstances in which it has been nurtured, that it can have few parallels, even in the tenderness between a father and child. I know, Doctor Manette—how can I fail to know? that, mingled with the affection and duty of a daughter who has become a woman, there is, in her heart toward you, all the love and reliance of infancy itself. I know that, as in her childhood she had no parent, so she is now devoted to you with all the constancy and fervor of her present years and character, united to the strength and attachment of the early days in which you were lost to her. I know perfectly well that if you had been restored to her from the world beyond this life you could hardly be invested, in her sight, with a more sacred character than that in which you are always with her. I know that when she is clinging to you the hands of baby girl, and woman, all in one, round your neck. I know that in loving you she sees and loves her mother at her own age, sees and loves you at my age, loves her mother broken-hearted, loves you through your dreadful trial and in your blessed restoration. I have known this, night and day, since I have known you in your home."

Her father sat silent, with his face bent down. His breathing was a little quickened; but he repressed all other signs of agitation.

"Dear Doctor Manette, knowing this, knowing what I know here and you with this hallowed light about you, I have forborne, and forborne as long as it was in the nature of man to do it. I have felt, and do even now feel, that to bring my love—even mine—between you, is to touch your history with something not quite so good as itself. But I love her. Heaven is my witness that I love her!"

"I believe it," answered her father, mournfully. "I have thought so before now. I believe it."

But do not believe," said Darnay, upon whose ear the mournful voice struck with a reproachful sound, "that if my fortune were not all that, being one day so happy as to make her my wife, I must at any time put my separation before her. If I had a thought of you being a word of wind I now say. Besides that I should know it to be worthless, I should know it to be baseness. If I had any such possibility, even at a remote distance of years, harbored in my thoughts and hidden in my heart—if ever had been there—if it ever could be there—I could not now touch her hand."

He laid his own upon it as he spoke.

"No, dear Doctor Manette. Like you, a voluntary exile from France; like you, driven from it by its distractions, oppressions, and miseries; like you, striving to live away from it by my own exertions, and trusting in a happier future, I look only to sharing your fortunes, sharing your life and home, and being faithful to you to the death. Not to divide with Lucie her privilege as your child, companion, and friend; but to come in aid of it, and bind her closer to you, if such a thing can be."

THE TUTOR'S REQUEST.

His touch still lingered on her father's hand. Answering the touch for a moment, but not coldly, the latter father rose and laid his hand upon the arms of his chair, and looked up for the first time since the beginning of the conference. A struggle was evident in his face; a struggle with that occasional look which had a tendency in it to dark doubt and dread.

"You speak so feelingly and so manfully, Charles Darnay, that I thank you with all my heart, and will open all my heart—or nearly so. Have you any reason to believe that Lucie loves you?"

"None. As yet, none."

"It is the immediate object of this confidence that you may at once ascertain that with my knowledge?"

"So I see.—No. I might not have the hopefulness to do it for weeks; I might (mistaken or not mistaken) have that hopefulness to-morrow."

"Do you seek any guidance from me?"

"I ask none, Sir. But I have thought it possible it at you might have it in your power, if you should deem it right, to give me some."

"Do you seek any promise from me?"

"I so seek that."

"What is it?"

"I well understand that, without you, I could have no hope. I well understand that, even if Miss Manette held me at this moment in her innocent heart—do not think I have the presumption to assume so much—I could retain no place in it against her love for her father."

"If that be so, do you see what, on the other hand, is involved in it?"

"I understand equally well that a word from her father in my favor would sweep away with it all doubts that now perplex me. Nothing but a word from her father will do this."

"I well understand that, without you, I could have no hope. I well understand that, even if Miss Manette held me at this moment in her innocent heart—do not think I have the presumption to assume so much—I could retain no place in it against her love for her father."

"If that be so, do you see what, on the other hand, is involved in it?"

"I understand equally well that a word from her father in my suitor's favor would sweep herself and all the world. For which reason, Doctor Manette, said Darnay, modestly but firmly, "I would not ask that word to save my life."

"I am sure of it. Charles Darnay, mysteries arise out of close love as well as out of wide division; in the former case they are subtle and delicate, and difficult to penetrate. My daughter Lucie is, in this one respect, such a mystery to me; I can make no guess at the state of her heart."

"May I ask, Sir, if you think she is—" As he hesitated, her father supplied the rest.

"Is sought by any other suitor?"

"It is what I meant to say."

Her father considered a little before he answered:

"You have seen Mr. Carton here, yourself. Mr. Stryver is here too, occasionally. If it be at all, it can only be by one of these."

"Or both," said Darnay.

"I had not thought of both; I should not think either of both. You must a prisoner from me. Tell me what it is."

"It is, that if Miss Manette should bring to you at any time, on her own part, such a confidence as I have ventured to lay before you, you will hear in favor of what I have told, and to your belief in it. I hope you may be able to think so well of me as to urge no influence against me. I say nothing more of my stake in this; this is what I ask. The condition on which I ask it, and which you have unbounded right to require, I will observe immediately."

"I give the promise," said the Doctor, "without any condition. I believe your object to be purely and truthfully, as you have stated it. I believe your intention is to perpetuate, and not to weaken, the ties between me and my other and far dearer self. If she should ever tell me that you are essential to her perfect happiness, I will give her to you. If there were—Sir, Charles Darnay, if there were—"

"The young man laid his hand grate-fully; their hands were joined as the Doctor spoke:

—"any fancies, any reasons, any apprehensions, any thing whatever, new or old, against the man she really loved—the most respectable, illiberal thereof not lying on his head—they should all be obliterated for her sake. She is very thing to me; more to me than suffering, more to me than wrong, more to me— Well! This is idle talk."

So strange was the way in which he faded into silence, and so strange his fixed look when he had ceased to speak, that Darnay felt his own hand turn cold in the hand that slowly released and dropped it.

"You said something to me," said Doctor Manette, breaking a silence. "What was it you said to me?"

He was at a loss how to answer, until he remembered himself to speak of a condition. Referred by his mind reverted to that, he answered:

"Your confidence in me ought to be returned with full confidence on my part. My present name, though but slightly changed from my mother's, is not, as you will remember, my own. I wish to tell you what that is, before I am in England."

"Stop!" said the Doctor of Beauvais.

"I wish it, that I may the better deserve your confidence, and have no secret from you."

"Stop!"

For an instant the Doctor even had his two hands at his ears; for another instant, they were on Miss Pross his good ones straight up stairs—and was surprised to find his reading chair empty.

"My father!" she called to him. "Father dear!"

Nothing was said in answer, but she heard a low hammering sound in his bedroom. Passing lightly across the immediate room, she looked in at his door and came running back frightened, cried, crying to herself, with her blood all chilled, "What shall I do! What shall I do!"

Her uncertainty lasted but a moment; she hurried back, and tapped at her father's door, softly called to him. The noise ceased at the sound of her voice, and he presently came out to her, and they went down together for a long time.

She came down from her bed to look at him in his sleep that night. He slept heavily, and his tray of shoemaking tools and his old unfinished work were all as usual.

CHAPTER XI.

A COMPANION PICTURE.

"Sydney," said Mr. Stryver, on that self-same night, or morning, to his jackal, "mix another bowl of punch; I have something to say to you."

Sydney had been working double tides that night, and the night before, and the night before that, and a good many nights in succession, making a grand clearance among Mr. Stryver's papers before the setting in of the long vacation. The clearance was effected at last; the Stryver messes were handsomely fetched up; every thing was got rid of, until November should come with its fogs atmospheric and fogs legal, and bring suit to the door.

Sydney was none the livelier and none the soberer for so much application. It was the way of his life to spend something to pull him through the night; a correspondingly extra quantity of wine had preceded the bowl-time of supper, and in a very damaged condition as he now pulled his trebon off and threw it into the heap in which he had steeped it at intervals for the last six hours.

"Are you mixing that other bowl of punch?" said Stryver the portly, with his hands in his waistband, glancing round from the sofa where he lay on his back.

"I am."

"Now, look here! I am going to tell you something that will rather surprise you, and that perhaps will make you think me not quite as shrewd as you usually think me. I intend to marry."

"Do you?"

"Yes. And not for money. What do you say now?"

"I don't feel disposed to say much. Who is she?"

"Guess."

"Do I know her?"

"Guess."

"I am not going to guess at five o'clock in the morning with my brain frying and spluttering in my head. If you want me to guess you must ask me to dinner."

"Well then, I'll tell you," said Stryver, coming slowly into a sitting posture. "Sydney, I rather despair of making myself intelligible to you, because you are such an insensible dog."

"And you," returned Sydney, busy concocting the punch, "are such a sensitive and poetical spirit."

"Come!" rejoined Stryver, laughing heartily, though I don't prefer any claim to being the soul of Hennaone (for I hope I know better), still I am a tenderer sort of fellow than you."

"You are a lucker, if you mean that."

"I don't mean that. I mean, I am a man of more—more—"

"Say gallantry, while you are about it," suggested Carton.

"Well! I'll say gallantry. My meaning is, that I am a man," said Stryver, inflating himself at his friend as he made the punch, "who are more to be agreeable, who takes more pains to be agreeable, who knows better how to be agreeable, in a woman's society, than you do."

"Go on," said Sydney Carton.

"No; but before I go on," said Stryver, looking hot and fiery in his bullying way, "I'll have this out with you. You have been at Doctor Manette's house as much as I have, or more than I have. Why, I have been ashamed of your monoscenes there! You go sneering and yawning out of that silent and sullen and lang-dog kind, that, upon my life and soul, I have been ashamed of your existence."

"It should be very beneficial to a man in your practice at the bar to be ashamed of anything," returned Sydney; "you ought to be much obliged to me."

"You shall not get off that way," rejoined Stryver, shouldering the repellent at him; "no, Sydney, it's my duty to tell you this, and I tell you to your face. You have been grossly remiss in your attendances there. You have slighted them positively. You have been insufferably dull. You have made no endeavour to please them. You have taken no trouble to please them. You have sat there, like a handsome piece of carved stone, instead of a living man. You have made no more of your distinguished position there, than any common lounger might have done. When you have been there, you have been there only because you were there, and for no other reason. You have been a living reproach to me, and I'll tell you so."

"Do you?" said Sydney Carton, with a careless air, and utter freedom from any sort of annoyance, as he looked at the punch and tasted it.

"Yes, I do. And mind, Sydney, I'll tell you what more. I am not the only person who has remarked upon your general behaviour. Miss Manette herself has remarked upon it."

"Did she?" said Sydney Carton, with a bright flush that quickly faded, as he turned his head towards the fire.

"She has said to me, more than once, that she thought you needed to be roused. That she hoped you would be roused. That she was sorry you were not roused. Now, Sydney, I don't mind telling you that I should be very sorry indeed to see any harm befall you while you are so intimately connected, however remotely, with me. I should be very sorry indeed to see you thrown away. You have fine talents, and might do fair things. You might take a fair station. You might authorize your friends to recommend you for preferment. You have wasted your opportunities, and have thrown away a chance that might never have been yours. You are in a bad way, you are in a very bad way. I am sorry for it, and I tell you so."

"Much obliged to you, I am sure," said Sydney Carton.

"Now, you know, I am not a man to bear malice or any thing of that sort. I am as free from it as a man can be. I am positively sorry that your way of life leads you to be thought ill of, and that you bring ill will upon yourself. I am sorry that we seem to be generally looked upon as a pair. I am sorry that I was at your chambers the night Mr. Darnay was arrested, and that you were pleased to be merry upon my being so cut by the arrest. I am sorry that you should be seen at all drunk or in any way disreputable. I am sorry that you have, as I have reason to know, an overpowering tendency towards the bottle. I am sorry that you have chosen to cultivate a habit of late hours and indolence. I am sorry that you don't go into Society. I am sorry that you don't keep better company when you do go. I am sorry that you don't read more than you do. I am sorry that you don't apply yourself better when you do read. But I am not sorry that I have remonstrated with you, and I am sorry that you don't take it in good part. I am sorry that you have made me say so much, and I am sorry to say it is time that you and I had an end of these confidences. Carton, I am sorry for you. There, I have said my say, and I am very glad it is over."

Carton, still drinking the punch, rejoined, "Have you said your say?"

"Yes, I have said my say."

"Then," said Carton, "I'll say something."

"I shall be happy to hear it."

"I don't feel disposed to say much. Who is she?"

"Guess."

"Do I know her?"

"Guess."

"I am not going to guess at five o'clock in the morning, with my brains frying and sputtering in my head. If you want me to guess you must ask me to dinner."

"Well then, I'll tell you," said Stryver, coming slowly into a sitting posture. "Sydney, I rather despair of making myself intelligible to you, because you are such an insensible dog."

"And you," returned Sydney, busy concocting the punch, "are such a sensitive and poetical spirit."

"Come!" rejoined Stryver, laughing heartily, though I don't prefer any claim to being the soul of Hennaone (for I hope I know better), still I am a tenderer sort of fellow than you."

"You are a lucker, if you mean that."

"I don't mean that. I mean, I am a man of more—more—"

"Say gallantry, while you are about it," suggested Carton.

"Well! I'll say gallantry. My meaning is, that I am a man," said Stryver, inflating himself at his friend as he made the punch, "who are more to be agreeable, who takes more pains to be agreeable, who knows better how to be agreeable, in a woman's society, than you do."

"Go on," said Sydney Carton.

"No; but before I go on," said Stryver, looking hot and fiery in his bullying way, "I'll have this out with you. You have been at Doctor Manette's house as much as I have, or more than I have. Why, I have been ashamed of your monoscenes there! You go sneering and yawning out of that silent and sullen and lang-dog kind, that, upon my life and soul, I have been ashamed of your existence."

"It should be very beneficial to a man in your practice at the bar to be ashamed of anything," returned Sydney; "you ought to be much obliged to me."

"You shall not get off that way," rejoined Stryver, shouldering the repellent at him; "no, Sydney, it's my duty to tell you this, and I tell you to your face. You have been grossly remiss in your attendances there. You have slighted them positively. You have been insufferably dull. You have made no endeavour to please them. You have taken no trouble to please them. You have sat there, like a handsome piece of carved stone, instead of a living man. You have made no more of your distinguished position there, than any common lounger might have done. When you have been there, you have been there only because you were there, and for no other reason. You have been a living reproach to me, and I'll tell you so."

"Do you?" said Sydney Carton, with a careless air, and utter freedom from any sort of annoyance, as he looked at the punch and tasted it.

"Yes, I do. And mind, Sydney, I'll tell you what more. I am not the only person who has remarked upon your general behaviour. Miss Manette herself has remarked upon it."

"Did she?" said Sydney Carton, with a bright flush that quickly faded, as he turned his head towards the fire.

"She has said to me, more than once, that she thought you needed to be roused. That she hoped you would be roused. That she was sorry you were not roused. Now, Sydney, I don't mind telling you that I should be very sorry indeed to see any harm befall you while you are so intimately connected, however remotely, with me. I should be very sorry indeed to see you thrown away. You have fine talents, and might do fair things. You might take a fair station. You might authorize your friends to recommend you for preferment. You have wasted your opportunities, and have thrown away a chance that might never have been yours. You are in a bad way, you are in a very bad way. I am sorry for it, and I tell you so."

"Much obliged to you, I am sure," said Sydney Carton.

"Now, you know, I am not a man to bear malice or any thing of that sort. I am as free from it as a man can be. I am positively sorry that your way of life leads you to be thought ill of, and that you bring ill will upon yourself. I am sorry that we seem to be generally looked upon as a pair. I am sorry that I was at your chambers the night Mr. Darnay was arrested, and that you were pleased to be merry upon my being so cut by the arrest. I am sorry that you should be seen at all drunk or in any way disreputable. I am sorry that you have, as I have reason to know, an overpowering tendency towards the bottle. I am sorry that you have chosen to cultivate a habit of late hours and indolence. I am sorry that you don't go into Society. I am sorry that you don't keep better company when you do go. I am sorry that you don't read more than you do. I am sorry that you don't apply yourself better when you do read. But I am not sorry that I have remonstrated with you, and I am sorry that you don't take it in good part. I am sorry that you have made me say so much, and I am sorry to say it is time that you and I had an end of these confidences. Carton, I am sorry for you. There, I have said my say, and I am very glad it is over."

Carton, still drinking the punch, rejoined, "Have you said your say?"

"Yes, I have said my say."

"Then," said Carton, "I'll say something."

"I shall be happy to hear it."

"I don't feel disposed to say much. Who is she?"

"Guess."

"Do I know her?"

"Guess."

"I am not going to guess at five o'clock in the morning, with my brains frying and sputtering in my head. If you want me to guess you must ask me to dinner."

"Well then, I'll tell you," said Stryver, coming slowly into a sitting posture. "Sydney, I rather despair of making myself intelligible to you, because you are such an insensible dog."

"And you," returned Sydney, busy concocting the punch, "are such a sensitive and poetical spirit."

"Come!" rejoined Stryver, laughing heartily, though I don't prefer any claim to being the soul of Hennaone (for I hope I know better), still I am a tenderer sort of fellow than you."

"You are a lucker, if you mean that."

"I don't mean that. I mean, I am a man of more—more—"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEUTRAL RIGHTS.

The Herald publishes the following: "The Important State Paper relative to the position of the United States upon the subject of neutral rights has been completed, and has been dispatched to all our Ministers in Europe by the Paris steamer of to-day. It will create a most profound impression, and demonstrate that the present Administration is not to be trifled with in the foreign policy or domestic politics of the United States. As one of the first consequences of the war in the north, we can no longer permit the grave questions which may arise affecting commerce to be disposed of without our participation, and we have heard and felt in their adjustment.

"The present war in Europe has been broad principles which will govern us in the maintenance of our rights as a neutral power, and there is every reason to believe that the principles we have laid down will be those of the great nations of Europe. The principal points are, of course, the non-interference of privateers, and the question of the blockade contraband of war. The United States holds that privateers are pirates, and that they are to be met as such on the high seas. The question of contraband of war is one not immediate munitions of warfare, such as powder, muskets, cannon, lead, and saltpetre, but also that which is the very foundation of manufacturing and commercial prosperity, and which, in the present war, is found to be contraband of war, and may subject to seizure a large proportion of the cargo of any merchantmen upon our commerce. So, also, in the blockade of neutral ports, the true international doctrine is also reiterated that a free ship makes free goods.

"While the dispatch makes no allusion to privateering, it is well understood that it is a settled principle of the American doctrine that under no circumstances will we sanction that piratical system."

THE ARCTIC VOYAGE IN THE "ATLANTIC."

We read in the Buffalo Courier: "The arrival voyage of the steamer Atlantic, from Liverpool, reached this city on the 1st inst. On the evening of the 23d of June, between 10 and 11 o'clock, Mr. Ludlow, the chief engineer reports that the Atlantic passed a large iceberg, which was first discovered by the officer attached to the balloon Atlantic, and was reported to the officer of the watch. The balloon was one of them as having been seen six miles north of Fort Wayne, Indiana, on the 4th day of July, and on the 5th of July. Three hours and a half later, at 73 A. M., the balloon was seen by the officer of the watch on board the steamer leading the name inscribed upon it. As it received it seemed to fall into the water. The balloon was picked up by James Nugent, Esq., and by him taken to Liverpool, where it was forwarded by the Cunard line to this city. The balloon landed at Adams, in Jefferson County, New York, three miles northeast of Oswego. Soon after the balloon landed at Adams, in Jefferson County, New York.

CONTENTS OF THE BALLOON.

"The 'Atlantic' balloon established itself into the upper deep about ten minutes after seven. It had been provided with a small quantity of ballast, which consisted of sand, and a small quantity of provisions, consisting of a few hundred pounds of biscuit, pork, butter, and cheese. It was also provided with a quantity of water. The balloon took charge of the balloon, Mr. Wise of the scientific kind, Mr. Lowe of the compass, and Mr. Hyde acted as historian. Wise occupied the wicker basket which was suspended from the lower circumference in the boat."

MR. HYDE'S ACCOUNT OF THE TRIP.

Mr. Hyde told the following story: "Their motion was very rapid throughout the night. The moonlight was magnificent, with calm and beautiful weather. The accurate instruments of the balloon enabled us to take our bearings during the darkness, and went to sleep, but Mr. Lowe, to whom we were indebted for watching, kept half awake to enjoy that luxury. Toward daylight the balloon began to descend, and continued to descend for two hours and three miles—rendered the cold quite severe, but by no means intense. We were well provided against cold with such a contingency.

"They found Lake Erie above Sandusky about seven in the morning of Saturday, and thence floated rapidly over the lake, at a height of about two miles, until they had attained the centre, when they commenced descending rapidly, until about 11 A. M., when the lake's current of air in which they were floating must have struck the earth, as the balloon several occasions their elevation did not exceed 500 feet. We enjoyed passing for the first time in any of this current rapidly increased, until they neared Buffalo's Harbor, when they were floating about two and thirty miles from its shore, it became a violent gale of wind, which continued for several hours.

"Every effort was made to keep the balloon up by throwing out ballast, but it continued descending, in spite of all their exertions, she made a tremendous dive, and struck the water with a force that threw the passengers about a total destruction of the voyage. Mr. Hyde was the first to swim toward the balloon, which was rescued from the waves by the steamer, which was then in sight. Mr. Hyde was picked up by the steamer, which was then in sight. Mr. Hyde was picked up by the steamer, which was then in sight. Mr. Hyde was picked up ter by the Emperor of Austria. General Niel has been appointed Marshal of France.

"NAPOLEON TO THE EMPEROR.

"CASTIGLIA, June 26—11 AM.

"The Austrians, who had crossed the Mincio for the purpose of attacking us with their whole body, have been obliged to abandon their positions and withdraw to the left bank of the river. They have blown up the bridge of Goito. The loss of the enemy is very considerable, but ours is much less. We have taken a great number more than 5000 prisoners, and three flags. General Canrobert and his corps d'armée have covered themselves with glory as well as the Guard. The Austrian army has suffered great loss on the enemy, after having embarked without great fury against the Austrian army.

THE AUSTRIAN ACCOUNT.

The following is the Austrian official account of the battle:

"VIENNA, June 25, 1859.

"The day before yesterday our troops were in the neighborhood of Pozzolengo, Solferino, and Cavriana, and had ground forward as far as Guidizzolo and Cas-Corlefredo, but were driven back by superior forces.

"A clear contest took place between the two entire armies at ten A. M. yesterday (24th), under which the battle was announced as far as Chiese. In the afternoon there was a concentrical attack of the victoriously-defended lines of Solferino. Our right wing repulsed the First, Second, and Fifth Corps on the left, the rest of our corps could not be restored, and our losses are extraordinarily large. The development of powder-smoke and the evening against our left wing, and the advance of his main body against Volta, caused our retreat, which began late in the evening."

NAPOLEON TO HIS TROOPS.

The following is the order of the day published by the Emperor Napoleon after the battle of Solferino:

"NAPOLEON TO THE ARMY.

"CASTIGLIA, June 25, 1859.

"SOLDIERS.—The enemy, who had long endeavored to be regular on from the Chiese, have recrossed the Mincio. You have overthrown the entire host of France. Solferino surpassed the recollection of Lonato and Castiglione. In that day there were assembled 120,000 of us at one hundred and fifty thousand Austrians, under the command of the Emperor in person. The victory of the enemy struggle of fifteen hours. Forty pieces of cannon have carried. Your country thanks to you for your courage and perseverance, and mourns the brave who fell.

"We have taken three flags, thirty cannon, and 6000 prisoners.

"The Sardinian army fought with the same valor against superior forces; and worthy is that army to march beside you. Soldiers, you have added a new ray to the glory of France and the happiness of the people."

POSITION OF THE ITALIAN FORCES.

A dispatch dated Cavriana, June 26, says: "The French troops have occupied Solferino, without having encountering having withdrawn therefrom.

A dispatch from Verona says that the stock of the French on Venice and Tagliamento, about forty-five miles northeast of Verona, was ordered to take place on the 26th of June.

Prince Napoleon arrived at Parma on the 25th, and was received with enthusiasm.

WAR ITEMS.

No circumstantial account of the battle had reached Paris. It was believed that the telegraph wires at the front had been suffered so severely that two days after the battle it was still unknown how it had ended.

There were vague rumors of 10,000 to 12,000 French troops having been killed and wounded.

A message from Cavriana announces that the Emperor Napoleon, on the day of the battle, was present at the incident of the fire. General Larry, who accompanied him, had his horse killed under him.

Official Austrian correspondence of the 27th of June, contains the following: "The Emperor Francis Joseph will soon return to Vienna on account of important business. For the commander-in-chief in the army, which is the place for battle, is given to General Benedek."

Austrian correspondence of the 26th contains the following: "The day before yesterday (24th) the Austrians were not only in the neighborhood, and had made a reconnoissance, but receive a bulletin in which such a disaster is more completely received.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says it was reported last night that battle would be fought between the siege operations would come on.

Forty thousand men were marching in Algeria for the Adriatic, and at Paris news was expected of the occupation of Ancona by the French.

The Austrian troops were embarking 25,000 men daily on their way to Italy. They are considered the flower of the Austrian army. The rest of the army will not at least until eight years.

The Austrians have sunk five small vessels, a large frigate, and three steamers, in the port of Malmocco, to prevent the passage of the French squadron.

The Paris Presse says that private messages from Rome express a wish that the battle would be fought on the anniversary number of 20,000 hors de combat and 15,000 taken prisoners, together with 40 pieces of cannon, and five pieces of cannon. This, however, lacks confirmation.

A single troop-transport from Constantinople had arrived at Corfu, Ancona, and other towns have been explored under the authority of the Austrian Government to receive the sick troops.

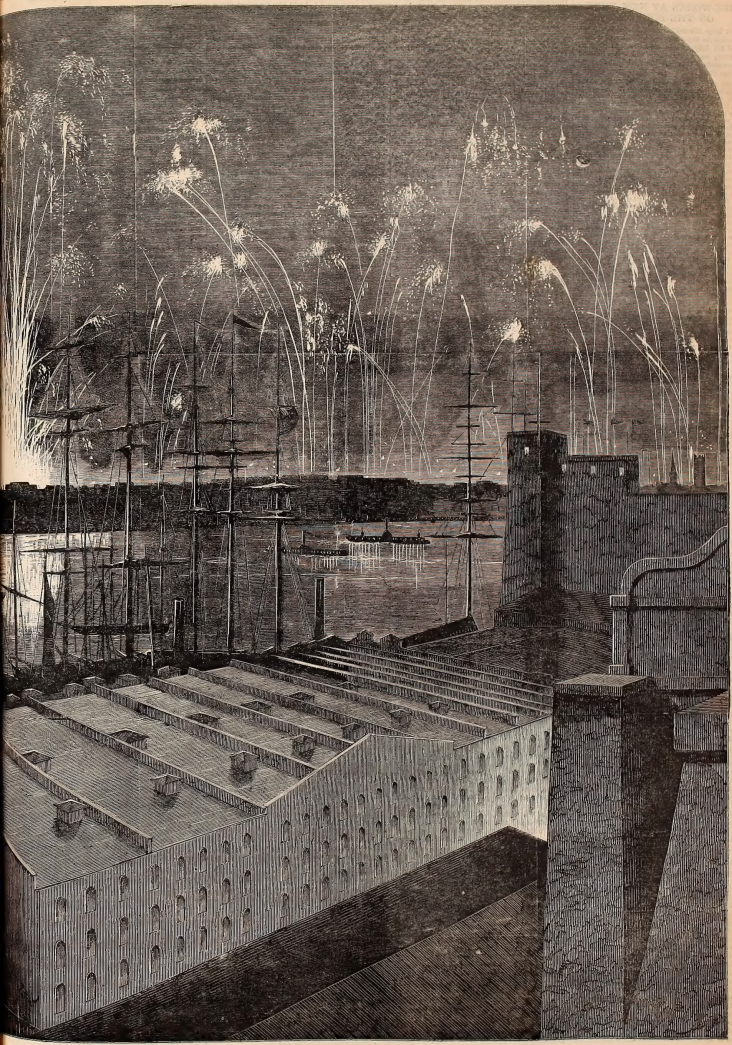
The officer who commanded the Swiss troops in the affair at Perugia is said to have been promoted.

APPEARANCE OF GARIBALDI.

A party of travelers visited Garibaldi at Como, and one of them has described the visit. We make a couple of extracts:

I could scarcely believe that the quiet, unaffected, simple-looking man before me was the famous leader of the Garibaldi. His head and body would not have thrown five feet seven or eight inches, and I should think a square shoulders, deep chested, and strongly built man. He is 52 in beauty. The face is handsome, with a fine forehead, large hazel and hazel eyes, clear light, with bright sparkle in them, and not very short. His head shows a very fine development, especially in the upper part of the head. It is good, though not remarkable to a casual observer. The mouth is one that you would expect to see under a dark moustache, and the nose is not remarkable. The chin

FIRE-WORKS AT NEW YORK ON THE EVENING OF T



RTH OF JULY, AS SEEN FROM BROOKLYN HEIGHTS.

FIRE-WORKS AT NEW YORK ON THE FOURTH.

The large illustration on the preceding pages represents the fire-works at New York on the evening of 4th July, as seen from Brooklyn Heights. The scene was very striking, and was witnessed by thousands. It is thus described by the reporter of the Times:

"After the first flight of rockets the delight of the multitude was first called forth by the Greek Burgoo Lights, the invention of which, according to Signor Edge, is attributed to Tippoo Sahb, and is the most powerfully brilliant light known to the pyrotechnist. Its rapid ascension, rockets and bombs intervening, the large brass mortars ever fond of the bursting shell, the illustration of the spectators, who cleared vehemently at each new and unexpected report, and the "Return of Corse" was the first of those wonders, following by the "Egyptian Mausoleum," which commenced with a red light, and ended in a brilliant Maltese, carmine, and Japanese revolving sun of the richest and most effective fire-works, mounting to the height. This piece was deservedly three hundred feet in height. It bore the Egyptian Quadrilles ed, long and lonely.

which was truly magnificent, and the 'Queen of the Mist,' an entirely new and original piece, resembling enormous fountains with dolphins spouting fire supposed to be water to the height of fifty feet. The representation of a Fire Engine and of a Steamer gave great satisfaction to the beholders. The 'Star of Independence' was more beautiful than any of the others. It commenced with a hexagon wheel of jessamine fires, with colored centres, emulating to the 'Star of Independence,' composed of red, blue, and green jets, which suddenly, in the centre, exploded in a magnificent representation of numerous stars and brilliance. The piece succeeding this was called a 'Cascade,' and it represented a basket of flowers containing roses, tulips, jessamines, pinks, and forget-me-nots, the whole being surrounded by a wreath of laurels. But the triumph of the pyrotechnists, and the source of the greatest delight on the part of the spectators, was reserved for the final and revealing piece, 'The Temple of Fame.' This beautiful exhibition commenced with a wheel of Chinese fire, emulating to a beautiful composed of a variety of colored lights and fires, with the most splendid effect. This beautiful wheel then ceased, and the whole fire-work was crowned with

"To-morrow you shall see Cecil, if you will," said Lucy Holmes, the eldest, to me. "It is a great favor to ask to him to know you are in the house, poor darling boy!" She ended with a heavy sigh.

Next day as I was lying on the sofa in her boudoir, Cecil Yorke was led in, with a deep-green shade over his eyes: Lucy Holmes met him at the door, and tenderly taking his disengaged hand placed it on my couch, placed a chair for him, and in silence she and her sister left the room.

"For some moments neither of us spoke, so intense was our emotion. At last I said, 'Cecil!'

"'Give me your hand—let me feel you.'

"I put it out to him, he stretched it—but in a direction of mine—but vaguely, gropingly.

"'Is the truth in an instant—he was blind!

"'Yes, utterly, hopelessly blind, in the full meaning and pride of his youth, his strength, his beauty, from all that might be of use to himself or mankind; from all life's best hopes, gifts, enjoyments.

"'I had hoped,' he said, '"to have asked the question of this little hand once—that is over now."

"'Why over?' I struggled to say.

"'Have they not told you—do you not see—what I have become? Never, never more shall I see the light of heaven, or the light of my life, your sweet face. Do not be angry with me now,' he added, with a faint smile, 'for calling it so.'

"'All? that all that separates us?'

"'Ah!'

"Yes, is there no other reason? no other consideration or obstacle? is it because that through me you have lost your sight you give me up?'

"Entirely—solely!'

"Then I swear—oh how joyfully!—to be yours as long as we both shall live.' I felt that my own dearest times better than I should have loved you strong, well, prosperous, happy! I, the mother of your wealth is as honorable as to borne. What! I, friendless, boundless, I may say, penniless, deprived of any good that many other women indeed you; I am not to esteem myself too proud, too blessed in being allowed to devote my life to one object of rendering yours as endurable as it may be made? No, if you reject me, all hope, all joy are taken from my existence. Take me, take my hands.'

He could not throw not off; his father, whatever might have been his feelings under other circumstances, had no objection to make under those sad circumstances, but (I suppose in order to prove us), and it was agreed that in a year—my darling brother's recent death would make demand that indeed—we should be married.

Meanwhile I was to return home as soon as my health should be sufficiently restored for the way to come and spend much of the time of his probation at Hollylands, his father's estate, to which my dearest Frank had been agent.

The spring and summer and autumn passed away, no matter how to Cecil.

There are passages in one's life that one can think of by hours together, but that can never more be described in words.

The memories of dead happinesses, like the memories of dead friends, may be dear to us, but they are not by the tongue. There is something awful in speaking to the dead silent.

Bailiol House was barely three-quarters of a mile from the cottage where Frank and I had lived since my childhood, and which Lord Somerleigh allowed me to remain in till the period of my marriage should arrive; and to me it appeared that I was so plain and straight, that after traversing it many times, Cecil learned to find his way to the village alone.

In summer I did not mind his coming so, but as winter drew on with storms and rain and sleet, I felt nervous about it. He only laughed.

"The blind magnet finds its way to the Pole in all weathers," he would answer.

Again

"The time drew near the birth of Christ,"

and in Christmas week we were to be married; and Somerleigh was most anxious every day to be present at the ceremony, and Cecil's sisters to be my bridesmaids.

The winter had set in very stormily, and heavy rain had swollen the hill-streams into torrents, and flooded the low lands, so extensively, that the road that entered in Christmas Eve was a terrible one.

Wait, thunder and lightning! I must not, I will not let my nearly all night waking; and I received what care the heart should arrive that could, at the earliest, bring Cecil to me. I was on my way to meet him, and prevented the possibility of his coming alone.

To me, hill-reared and hardy, weather was nothing; and before mid-day, despite wind and rain, I rolled forth in the direction of Bailiol House.

About half-way between it and my cottage one of the largest of our streams crossed over the road, and was spanned by an old stone bridge. As I neared it, looking up through the beating rain, I stood aghast—no current of the river was there. On either side the piers of the ruined arch gaped, and between them rolled and tore a mass of raging against the obstacle itself had formed in the mass of crumbled stone-work that encumbered its bed.

"Oh, well that I have come!" I thought. "Frederick could known not of this, and how can he or any one stand till I see him."

Near an hour I waited there, sheltering myself as best I might behind the parapet of the bridge, still looking through the blinding rain and fog toward the path by which he must advance.

At last I saw him, and springing up, and drawing my cloak to the edge of the chasm as I could with safety, I shouted a warning to him. He paused for a moment; but I could see that, from the roar of the water and the wind blowing in my face, he could not distinguish my words, and I doubted even if he recognized me, for he still advanced with a doubtful, puzzled air. Again I screamed to him to stop—to stop for God's sake! and again he paused and listened. Then, throwing myself on my hands and knees, I crawled to the very vibrating verge of the gulf, heedless of the stones and earth that crumbled down a few inches before me, and exerting all the force of my lungs in one supreme effort, I shrieked out once more my warning. This time he recognized my voice—but oh, to what purpose!—to shout my name, which the wind, that prevented his distinguishing my words, bore back to me—by a current ward with outstretched hands, and—O Father of Mercies!—he disappeared from my sight forever!

His lifeless body was found before night, miles below the broken bridge, and was buried the day but that Christ had risen.

I have often wondered that his father and sisters did not hate me; but they loved me more than ever after all that I had been the means, however innocently, of bringing on them.

But they know what I feel. I suppose that great sympathy is so irretrievable a calamity made them love me. Indeed, I think they do love me, for no one—God bless them!—hit— Well, well, thank God, we can none of us live forever!

THE WEEKLY FARMER.

SHOULD THE FARMER BE EDUCATED?

ATTENTION every farmer should not try to be geologist, mineralogist, botanist, or to study medicine to be his own doctor, or law to make it unnecessary to employ a lawyer, or study out the best view of doing his own preaching, still there is little doubt that all general information, and the more exact the better, is a great advantage, if well applied, to be useful to the farmer's best interests. Every cultivator should know rather from the soil, or natural system, large crops. He can not accomplish this without being familiar with general principles in the sciences connected of any considerable and understanding most thoroughly the art of agriculture. Without a general knowledge of science he cannot the nature of soils, which certainly includes more research than would enable him to ascertain the analysis of soils, or to be a chemist in another clayey, etc. Then what should to be expert of the chemist—a question often put to which is the question? One person is found fault with for being "too scientific;" another, for not being enough so. Now perhaps both are right. One may understand cast away prejudice, and seek to apply knowledge for its own close connection with the whole circle of sciences in mental acquisition, national wealth, and prosperity. If the farmer was not placed in such close relation with the practical improvement of science—in a word, with Nature's endlessly beautiful and evolutions—this inquiry would not be difficult to define what should be the extent of his education. Let us apply truths as fast as we discover them, and not hesitate to do so for fear of error, because he can not supplant the Divine Architect. It would be impossible to overestimate the value of this to study any one department bearing on his calling to its fullest extent; and, therefore, he may with propriety, and it is his duty to, seek to explore and grieve over the exhaustion of the realms of knowledge?

THEORY AND PRACTICE.

True theory is founded on correct observation. It can not, therefore, be at variance with practice. The usual supposition that it is in direct opposition to practice is not now, nor was it ever, so viewed by men of sense. All true theory is in accordance with Nature's laws, and they are unchangeable. When an experiment is tried, and fails to work out to what was desired, it shows that the necessary conditions were not present. If true theory, then, means anything, it means that the principles that can be no doubt as to the result if the conditions of the experiment are complied with. Practice is equally true to work whether the experiment be a failure or a success. If theory means pretended knowledge of the principles involved on such a basis, the result of which is a failure, should not be considered contrary to the truth of science, but a picture of the ignorance of men not familiar with the facts required to be known. The man who steamers would be considered somewhat insolent is sometimes called a theorist, but in reality his rank is that of a fool, and he should be known as such.

SCIENCE AND COMMON SENSE.

Some agricultural writers speak of "common sense unaided by science," which seems to be a desire to exalt the latter at the expense of a wonderful class of farmers. This is towards the dignity of a man who should be guided by truth. Science is expressive common sense is exceedingly indefinite. for every person, from the fool to the philosopher, has a common sense, and many of the best farmers from that of every other man; and as no two minds are exactly alike, the number of common sense is equal to the number of those members of the human family who admit such faulty expressions. Science is the result of the observation and classification of the truths or laws of nature. Common sense, then, is the result of these truths, as far as they have yet to be found. She has resolved the one mysterious soil into the constituents of nature, and explained the laws of their qualities and quantities. Common sense never said a word on the subject. Science has told us that "the roots of plants themselves go out in quest of that food which common sense, unaided by science, tells us is by them communicated to the plant?" To follow this style of argument would be very uncommon sense. Agricultural writers should not draw lines of distinction between the practical farmer and scientific man. Science and practice must go hand-in-hand together; for in exact proportion to the union between them will agriculture prosper. Only by practical science and in the same bonds say, "If we wish to make a youth a shoemaker, you must first send him to school in order that his mind may be expanded and prepared to receive the seeds of practical instruction." If the farmer is to depend so much on "common sense" and so little on science, why does not the shoemaker, feeling that there is nothing like leather, graduate with the wax-end in his hand? which would be carrying out the maxim, "No man alive respects." Let it not be forgotten that science has made the rough places smooth, and interlaced the hills and valleys with railroads, over which the commerce of nations is sent to and fro for the use of many men. It has prepared the way for and set the steam-engine through the trackless forest, disturbing the haunts of the red man and wild beast. It has civilized civilization, and, like Prometheus, brought the fire from heaven to be the ready-boy of the human race.

Professional men in certain spheres of life say that their collaborateurs should be men of common sense. Common sense in this class, be it their business to bottom kettles. A tinker need not know his mind with the science of mining, the manufacture of the useful metal which he hammers. The farmer who is averse to scientific education is but a superficial tinker. He is the cultivator of the soil aroun to the dignity of his calling.

AGRICULTURE A SCIENCE AND AN ART.

The science of agriculture relates to the nature of the soil, the plant it grows, and the food which nourishes it. The putting in practice truths discovered by science involves the art. It is an error to suppose that the science and art of culture can be severed from each other. Science is the soul; art the body.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

The following "notice" was pasted in the vicinity mentioned:

NOTICE.

In all hours it may concern anyone I profess to cure the following diseases to wit, viezes, & tissues of all kinds whatsoever & all complaints over head & ears, from the disease of all kind and nessey more too tedius to mention. I had his in London March 22 1858. I had practised wity at all Alsham Gorey & Mildy and to money after State of Ala. also in the Miy Missippy & in some misssey I practis so humbugy so quacky of all kinds any person wishing to be cured of any of the above diseases can call on me and I will be found as a doctor call on me and I will be found at the Mission House 18 miles South West of Selma on the Decatur Road.

DR. J. FARAH.

N.B. Age 60, 1859.

At one of the terms of the District Court of P——, County, Texas, a case was being tried in which a gentleman, who was very deaf, and a short, witty, quickspoken lawyer were engaged as counsel. The latter was also a witness in the case.

In an examination he saddled his side of the case in an extreme manner, which brought on a warm discussion between the two gentlemen, in which the deaf man did not hear himself when he gave in his own testimony.

In the immediate vicinity of Cincinnati is a village now rejoicing in the name of Commissioner, in consequence of the fact that the Hon. Mr. Smith, a public-house was kept by Mr. K——, who, in addition to the usual privilege of retailing all remnants of liquor left by practitioners in the bar.

This matter progressed for some ten years, keeping the gentry well supplied with "bitters," having succeeded to make a mixture for earning a thousand best, had need of a new supply of ingredients, and therefore sent for one of the ingredients of the tribe.

Mr. K—— received the order, and posting a sufficient quantity of said ingredient in a bag, leaving the bag in the care of a traveler as the sole accountant on the journey. He had no sooner passed a part of the town than Chunky Joe, and seeing, as he thought, a good opportunity to make money by the good to be wasted, immediately looked through the bottom, and, finding it "Copperas," and quickly fled to some outside of said liquor. He then went to his wood-shop, and, emptying out the remaining draught of the spirits. Shortly after Mr. K—— coming in, picked up the bottle, and, not with his medicinal properties, which was very much surprised on finding it empty. Inquiring of Chunky Joe what had become of the contents, the man describing Joe) had drank it. Mr. K—— was astonished at the description depicted on his countenance, he rushed out of the room in search of Joe, but he was dead body not many yards off. In passing close to the corpse of the deceased Mr. K—— gave a little exercition upon the back-legs, working as he thought, with a view to find out an extra quantity of liquor. After getting over his astonishment, the following colloquy ensued:

MR. K——"Joe, did you drink that stuff on the counter?"

JOE—"Why—yaas—I thought it didn't ought to be there, so I drank it. Was it yourn?"

MR. K——"I don't know. Here I had a bottle of copperas, and now it's gone."

JOE—"Well I feel—I feel—lively as a cricket, I'm sure, none of that you fetch from yesterday—we're even."

MR. K——"Well, Joe, but haven't you noticed anything odd about your appearance?"

JOE—"Any thing wrong? Well, no, not much—feel a little queer about the head—and—and—by the by, now, there's only one thing queer about it which I don't understand—I thought I drew the copperas at once under his nose; whenever I rope my head is where my feet ought to be."

Mr. K—— always after that, when he wished to speak of the peculiar qualities of his liquors, which could give a man a thousand dollars, even a dead man, would say that he had drinking he always kept a case in his pocket, which he would drop into the liquor bottle to drink to the strength. The last time I saw the case it was pretty well used up. It was a pocket-handkerchief case, and had been the property of Liberty's head, which was, with Joe, embroidered in the corner. Drinking when he died, and is still alive.

EFFECTUAL TREATMENT.—The Earl of Chatham, who was remarkable like his physician, jeered him on the treatment of his medicines, and the general inefficacy of his prescriptions. The doctor, to exonerate himself from the charge, said he doted any patients to find fault with him. "I believe you," replied the Earl, "for they are all dead."

NATIONAL DIFFERENCES.—Hichter, one of the most distinguished authors in Germany, used to assert that the English are no less allowed to England, the empire of the world, and the empire of the sea. One day, at the table of the noble Montague shewed, as the result of his observations, that the English are a nation of fools. "Ah," said Richter, "I am not surprised at it, for I know, by reason in, England to think in, and France to live in."

DOMESTIC.

HUSBAND.—What's bad light these candles give?"

WIFE.—Yes, they have just come in."

HUSBAND.—I should think they had just gone out."

The Fifth Parkes which undertook the following, from a correspondent of in St. Joseph, Missouri:

"Many thousand men started across the plains during the months of March and April, with wheel-barrows, and between party entertained, discussed and determined by the bad reports they had heard on the road, and had started with their minds made up accordingly. Many had plainly balanced their distance. The boy's dead!"

A good proprietor was here buried. He was a forbidden bread man, and was always feeding fault with his wife. "Mary, my dear, you must make more bread, and sprinkling as usual, when Farmer Briggs asked him if he hadn't enough?"

"Yes," muttered Sam, "enough, such as it is!"

"Eh, my dear?"

"Yes, granted Sam," good enough what there is of it."

Judge Jonson is especially noted for his bad spelling. Whether the judge was aware of the fact remains to be ascertained, but on one important case, in comment somewhat upon the character of the defendant, as developed by the testimony, the judge remarked that "the whole of his whole transaction is stamped with dishonesty and extortion. The defendant's statement of facts contained, or disguiseretyped in great before you, exhibits one of the most barefaced attempts at swindling that ever came before the bord of. Why, gentlemen, it is stamped with frauddishonesty and villainy." And the judge proceeded to go up to his full height, and darting a look of contempt at the defendant, which would have withered an individual, in a loud voice, exclaimed, "Why, gentlemen, the whole is stamped with it. Every where is written, in letters of plain to be seen of children, that which I will be found."

"Years ago," says a correspondent, "we had a 'clerk' setter' in this town in the shape of a negro preacher, known as Uncle Ben Brown. A number of boys and girls were accustomed to attend his preaching for the purpose of hearing him 'set the words.' He was very clever in his way, and was generally liked by all who knew him. He was a slave, and he had his 'eye' on them. He could, in a few words, 'set' the whole of the text with the same best 'starching our sociations.' I won't mention names, but you Dan Rice, you know you 'set' the text with eye on you."

At another time his congregation met and were kept waiting for the parson a considerable time, when he came in in a hurry, exclaiming, "I'm sorry I'm late, I'm very sorry, but circumstances, gentlemen, circumstances, you must excuse me for being late." Looking up, he said, "I'm not well. Bring a bucketing since, who took to following colgat and mouse."

In a certain school, when the scholars were parsing, the most vital interest in the subject. The youngest, who was up, a bright-eyed little fellow, paraded over the world for a few minutes, when he was asked to name birds, burst out with, "I can parse it. Positive, wait; comparative, wait; superlative, wait; wait."

A member of the Ministerial Legislature, at one of its late sessions, introduced a bill to change the name of Lincoln County to that State to that of Douglas. After the opposition myself, as an amendment, that the letter "s" be added to the name of the county. This motion created some laughter and confusion, and was withdrawn. The bill was finally decided, however, be seen in the end and the bill passed. Speaker, Douglas, Lincolnites that has come to my knowledge in which a member has had the opportunity of voting for the Little Dougleses to propose to name a county after himself."

In Hart County, Kentucky, the surface of the country is very much broken, and the roads are almost impassible by the natives "Sink-holes" scanned by the country. At the late term of the Circuit Court, Judge Jones, a well prominent citizen of the County, was charged to the Grand Jury, and delivered into a conversation with some gentlemen of the vicinity relative to the quality of roads in different portions of the State. One of the party inquired of Judge Jones how the law-abiding neighborhood would compare with that near to Lexington. "Why!" answered Judge Jones, "I can't answer that question myself right the same. But our law is not quite so relieved, and our roads are sink-holes of iniquity."

At —— College the Senior Class was under examination for degrees. The Professor of Natural Philosophy was belaboring the boys in option. The point under investigation was the force, velocity and indestructibility of projectiles. Professor—"Now, young gentlemen, we see that objects, but their images depicted on the retina of the eye. Suppose a cannon ball to be fired at the master plainer, said to the way of the class, "Mr. Jackson, how far will a cannon ball go?"

Jackson—"Don't know, sir."

Bill replied promptly, "No, Sir."

Professor—"Well, gentlemen, can anybody why you never your own father?"

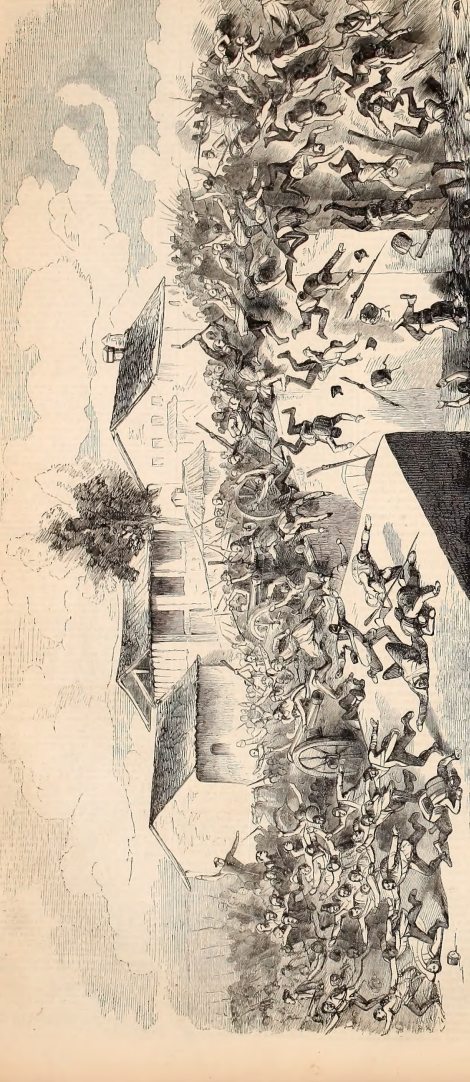
Bill replied promptly, Mr William Jackson, very gravely, "he died before I was born, Sir."

A TRIO OF CHILDREN.—Very few jovial blades, as they about "Hip, hip, hurrah" over their cups, in remembrance of the battle of Waterloo, but many are involuntarily commemorating the pious zeal of Peter the Hermit, who, in the year 1095, first urged, stirred up all Europe to the rescue of the Holy Sepulchre. Peter Goose may be a jocular, jovial soldier, but Peter the Hermit is a tutored pilgrim. Upon his return from Jerusalem, he brought from the Holy Land the germ of the idea from which sprung the Crusades—the crusades that took the lead as an expedition for the conquest of the Holy Land, and ended in the establishment of the Knights of Christ, and conversion of the Sacrament of the Eucharist, at the Council of Clermont, in France. The council assembled from all parts of Christendom, and Peter stood, like the great theologist Europe, and an army of 300,000 men, ready to march to the Holy Sepulchre. Numerous expeditions Peter have a banner inscribed with the three words, "Deus vult," "God wills it." Peter's motto was perdita—or Jerusalem is lost. The populace of some of the towns, where Peter preached, were so excited by the eloquence of the Hermit, that they could not speak Latin, and the three initials as one word, "Deus vult," which was adopted as the motto of the chivalry. They raised the cry, "Deus vult," "God wills it," and the cry was taken up by the rest, and took: "you know some pigs are deuces, and some pigs are kind."

A PRETTY IDEA.—A lover presented his lady-love with a small looking-glass, accompanied with the following impromptu:

Receive, in this glass you see
The object most beloved by me.
Oh, that I might see there too
The object most beloved by you!

A young physician asked permission of a lady to kiss her. She replied, "No, Sir; I never like to have a doctor's bill thrust in my face."



THE WAR IN ITALY—THE FIGHT AT THE MULINO BRIDGE, AT THE BATTLE OF PALESTRO.—[FROM A SKETCH BY M. PONTREMOLI.]

BATTLE AT THE MULINO BRIDGE.

THE accompanying engraving, which is from a very spirited sketch by M. Pontremoli, will convey to the beholder a better idea of the warfare now going on in Italy than whole columns of verbal description.

The moment chosen by the artist is that stage in the battle of Palestro when the French and Sardinians were ordered to carry the bridge of Mulino. The resistance of the Austrians, at first resolute, soon gave way under the impetuous shock of their assailants; and the throng being too dense to admit of a retreat, the unfortunate wretches were hurrooted upon the bodies of their comrades, crushed to death, or hurled headlong over the bridge into the stream beneath. The scene, as described by an eye-witness, was one from which men of peace will turn shudderingly away. Death on the battle-field, with its inevitable horrors in the shape of mangled limbs, hideous carnage, and deadly suffering, is always a shocking spectacle. A few such massacres as that depicted in our engraving are more powerful arguments in favor of the Peace Society's views than all the logic in the world.

One's thoughts involuntarily wander from the dying soldiers to their homes—for most of them, it may be fairly supposed, have parents, brothers, and sisters by whom they are loved, if not wives and children. The mind's eye raves to

"Where their rude huts by the Danube lay," and pictures the arrival there of the news of the terrible fight at the bridge. Can a just Providence overlook such scenes in passing judgment on them who rendered this war necessary?

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

GABRIEL AT HOME.

DURING all this time Gabriel Bennet is becoming a merchant. Every morning he arrives at the store with the porter or before him. He helps him sweep and dust, and it is Gabriel who puts Lawrence Newt's room in order, laying the papers in place, and taking care of the thousand nameless details that make up comfort. He reads the newspapers before the other clerks arrive, and sits upon chests of tea or bales of matting in the loft, that fill the air with strange, spicy, Oriental odors, and talks with the porter.

In the long, warm afternoons, when there is no pressure of business and the heat is overpowering, he sits also alone among those odors, and his mind is busy enough with all kinds of speculations and dreams and hopes.

Gabriel is not the first youth who makes himself in imagination the hero of his own romance. He lives over again the dear, dreadful days at Delsfield. He wonders—yes, in his secret soul he does—whether, after all, Ilsey Wayne did not love him. But it is only for a moment. The next instant he recalls every thing as it was, and he smiles and sighs together.

For he knows that it is all over. He is a man in a store now, and men of sixteen in stores know perfectly well that the journey is very long from dusting the chair in the inner office to sitting in it; that bright years go by while the man of sixteen is making that journey, and the same bright years conduct the woman of nineteen into the arms of somebody old enough to be father of the man of sixteen, and perhaps—perhaps—O sorrow and absurdity! when that man has finished his voyage and arrived at the chair in the inner office, he may actually marry one of the daughters of that still young and beautiful, but mature, woman.

The thought is ludicrous, but it is also alluring. Gabriel perceives the yawning gulf of time and opportunity and chance that separates the boy of sixteen from the woman of nineteen. He calculates the probabilities of his career, and smiles half bitterly as he thinks of them. Poor Gabriel! venerable man of sixteen, whom future Mrs. Gabriel is perhaps at this moment tottering by the side of her nurse, or painfully struggling with the alphabet in the valley of the shadow of the rod.

It is natural that, upon leaving school in the country and entering the mercantile career in town, Gabriel should have donned the garments of maturity. In these hey days he wears a hat and a frock-coat. He is not a dandy, although he passes dandies upon Broadway when he goes home at night, and chief of them all, to his eyes, is Abel Newt. The candid, smooth face of Gabriel moves through the throng, his clear, sweet eyes seeing every thing that floats by. He does not know the other side of the fine dresses he meets any more than of the fine houses, with the smiling, glittering windows. The sun shines bright in his eyes—the street is gay—he nods to his friends—he admires the pretty faces—he wonders at the fast men driving fast horses—he sees the flowers in the windows, the smiling faces between the muslin curtains—he gazes with a kind of awe at the funerals going by, and marks the white hands of the clergymen and the physicians—the elm-trees in the Hospital yard remind him of the woods at Deerfield—and here comes Abel Newt, laughing, chatting, smoking, with an arm in the arms of two other young men, who are also smoking.

They are dressed in the height of the fashion; they seem conscious and self-possessed to most who pass, but to Gabriel, whose eyes are involuntarily sharpened by knowledge, the easy grace appears to be airy insolence. There are plenty of other smooth-faced youths who pass the dandies, and envy as they behold them, and if they receive a nod of recognition, return it with the feeling of courtiers whom kings condescend to honor. A little successful tailoring goes a great way.

"HOW CAN YE BLOOM SAE FRESH AND FAIR?"

As Gabriel passes Abel their eyes meet. Abel nods coldly and Gabriel quietly; the next moment they are back to back again—one is going up street, the other down.

The daily spectacle of the bustling street, of the lively city, is agreeable and amusing to Gabriel. He thinks he came very near becoming his heart a little while ago—but he could almost write a sonnet upon it now, so sweet and fair is the world. What does the wood-thrush, lilting on the birch-tree and dropping its cool, gurgling note into the flood of May sunshine, know of the snakes that hide under the mossy stones—of the poisonous plants that spring beneath her?

It is not one of the splendid houses before which Gabriel stops when he has reached the upper part of the city. It is not a palace, nor a mural, with that kind of tender anxiety which softens vanity instead of hardening it. It has that look which, after she is dead, every affectionate son thinks he remembers to have seen in his mother's face; and the other is younger, brighter—a face of rosy cheeks and clustering hair and blue eyes—a bounding, loyal, loving, girlish face.

They both smile welcome to Gabriel, and the younger face, disappearing from the window reappears at the door. Gabriel naturally kisses those blooming lips, and then goes into the parlor and kisses his mother. Those sympathetic friends ask him what has happened during the day. They see if he looks especially fatigued; and if so, why so? they ask. Gabriel must tell the story of the unfolding of his Mary B., which has just come in—which is Lawrence Newt's favorite ship—but why called Mary B. not even Thomas Trail Pratt, who knows every thing else in the business, Thomas sitting on each side of him on the sofa, those women wonder and guess why the ship should be called Mary B. What Mary B.? Oh! dear, there might be a thousand women with those initials. And what has ever happened to Mr. Newt that he should wish to perpetuate a woman's name? Stop! remembers Thomas, his mother's name was Mary. Mary what? asks the daughter, with a touch of tenderness, of course.

Why, in the name of miracles, again, does mamma color? She merely replies that his mother's name was Daisy—Mary Daisy—a famous belle of the close of the last century—by whom she was the most beautiful woman in President Washington's levees, and to whom Aaron Burr paid his addresses in vain.

"Yes, mamma; but who was Aaron Burr?" Who those blooming lips, as the bright young eyes glance from mother to grandmother and to her mother.

"Ellen, do you remember this spring, as we were coming up Broadway, we passed a small old man with a keen, black eye, who was rather carelessly dressed, upon a good mare, people looked at and pointed out to each other, but nobody spoke to?—who gazed at you as we passed so peculiarly that you pressed nearer to me, and asked who it was, and why such an old man seemed to be so lonely, and in all that great throng, which evidently knew him, was so solitary as if he had been in a desert?"

"Perfectly—I remember it," replies Ellen.

"That fiendless old man, my dear, whom at this moment perhaps intensely a happy human being in the world loves, was the most brilliant it would have been! Aaron Burr, gentleman and accomplished, and brilliant; he coiled about many a woman, fascinating her by the bright eyes and his sinuous manner, but he stung."

Ellen shakes her head as her mother speaks, and Gabriel involuntarily says, "Poor Burr!"

"You think, mother," he says, "that the Mary B. was named in Burr's honor?"

Mother thinks it was. It was a filial and graceful remembrance.

But somehow Gabriel is not convinced. Why, then, not call it Mary Bonloy? Every body who knows any thing of his family knows that she was his mother.

When Mrs. Bennet goes out of the room to attend to the tea, Gabriel, in a low voice, says that for his part he doesn't believe in the hint that the ship was named after Mrs. Newt; people are not romantic about their mothers; and Miss Ellen, aged fourteen, agrees with him.

The room in which they sit is small, and very plain. There are only a few prints, a few and some chairs, with sheives of books, and a coarse carpet. Upon the wall hangs a portrait representing a young and beautiful woman, unlike Mrs. Bennet; but the beauty of the face is flashing passionate, and thoughtful and mild like that of Gabriel's mother.

But though every thing is very plain it is perfect. There is nothing faded or shabby about the aspect of the room. Roses in a glass upon the table, and the voice and manner of the mother and daughter, tell every thing.

Presently they go in to tea, and Mr. Bennet joins them. His face is pale, and of grave expression, and he stoops a little in his walk. He wears slippers and an old coat, and has the air of a clergyman who has made up his mind to be disappointed. But he is not a clergyman, although his white cravat, somewhat slightly tied, and his rusty black dress-coat, favor that theory. There is a little severity in his expression, and an involuntary, half-deferential smile, as if he fully assented to every thing that might be presented—not because he was personally interested in it or believes it, but because it is the discreet way of avoiding discussion and getting back to his own thoughts.

Gabriel, my son, I am glad to see you!" his father says, as he sees himself not opposite his wife, but at one side of the table. He inquires if Mr. Newt has returned, and learns that he has been at home for several days. He hopes that he has enjoyed his little journey: then sips his tea, and looks to see if the window-sash-cord shakes himself gently, and says he feels chilly: that the beginning evenings are always autumnal, and that the time is coming when we must begin to read aloud again after tea. And what book shall we read? Perhaps the best of all we can select is Irving's Life of Columbus; Mr. Bennet has never read it, and has not the new book he knows and loves. He puts down his knife as he speaks, and plays with his tea-spoon on the edge of the cup.

"I find myself enchanted with the description of the Islands in the Gulf, and the life of those soft-souled natives. As I read on, I smell the sweet warm odors of the land; I see the palm and the branches of green trees floating far out upon the water; I see the drifting sea-weed, and the lights at night upon the shore; then I land, and lie under the palm-trees, and hear the mellow tongue of the tropics; I taste the luscious fruits; I bask in that rich, eternal sun—" His eyes swim with tropical languor as he speaks. He still mechanically balances the spoon upon the cup, while his mind is clearly deep sunk in reverie. As his wife glances at him, both the look of tenderness and of anxiety in her face deepen. But the moment of silence rouses him, and with the nervous smile upon his face, he says, "Oh —ah!—I—yes—let it be Irving's Columbus!"

Toward his wife Mr. Bennet's manner is almost painfully thoughtful. His eye constantly seeks hers; and when he speaks to her, the mechanical smile which green every body else is replaced by a kind of indescribable, touching appeal for interests. It is conveyed in no particular thing that he says or does, but it pervades his whole manner toward her. As Gabriel and Ellen grow up toward maturity, Mr. Bennet observes that the same peculiarity is reflected in the manner toward them. As if he were involuntarily asking pardon for some past neglect which he unconsciously done them. And yet his mildness and sweetness and simplicity of nature are such, that this singular manner does not disturb the universal cheerfulness.

"You look a little tired to-night, father," says Gabriel, when they are all seated in the front room again, by the table, with the lamp lighted.

"Yes," replies the father, who sits upon the sofa, with his wife by his side—yes; Mr. Van Boozenberg was very angry to-day about some error he thought he had discovered, and he was quite short with the book-keeper, and spoke rather sharply."

A slight flush passes over Mr. Bennet's face, as if he recalled something extremely disagreeable. His eyes become dreamy again; but after a moment's cold smile returns, and, as if begging pardon, in a half-bewildered way, he resumes:

"However, his position is trying. Fortunately there wasn't any mistake except of his own."

He is silent again. After a little while he asks, "Couldn't we have some music? Ellen, dear, will you favor something?"

Ellen thinks she can, if Gabriel will sing second. Gabriel says he will try, with pleasure; but really—he is so overwhelmed—the sure of his voice—he feigns a little cough—if the crowded house—Gabriel's audience will excuse—as really—in fact, he will—but he is sure—

During this little banter Nellie cries, "Pooh, pooh! mamma looks pleased, and puts smiles gently. "Then the fresh young voices of the brother and sister, in "Bonnie Dundee."

The room is not very light, for there is but one lamp upon the table by which the singers sit. The parents sit together upon the sofa; and as the song proceeds the hand of the mother rests upon that of the father, which holds it closely, while his arm creeps noiselessly around her waist. Both parents faint far away upon that music. His eyes droop as when he was speaking of the tropic islands—as if he were hearing and feeling it almost again. As his wife looks at him she sees on his face, beneath the sentiment of the expression, the light which shone there in the days when the song is "Bonnie Doon" together. He draws her closer to him, and with head on her lap, and one hand holding it. Her eyes gradually fill with tears; and when the song is over her head is lying on his breast.

While they are still sitting in silence there is a ring at the door, and Lawrence Newt and Amy Waring enter the room.

CHAPTER XL.

BORN TO BE A BACHELOR.

"THE truth is, Madame," began Lawrence Newt, addressing Mrs. Bennet, "that I am ashamed of myself—I ought to have called a thousand times—I have your pardon, Sir," he continued, turning to Mr. Bennet, who was rising immediately by the sofa, half-leaning upon the arm.

"Oh!—oh! I am sure," replied Mr. Bennet, with the same smile fitting across his face, and apparently breaking out all over him—and there is almost always a speckled ass and bowing, while Mr. Newt hastened to seat himself, that every body else might sit down also.

Mrs. Bennet said that she was very glad to see the face of an old friend again whom she had not seen for so long.

"But I was over every day in Gabriel, my dear Madame," replied Lawrence Newt, with a quaint dignity, of one who celebrated Mr. Burr might have despaired of the remark had been addressed to him.

"I'm sure, Jeoges, Madame, we shall make a great mention for Gabriel. I'm only afraid he's too honest."

The whole party smiled again as the merchant turned toward Gabriel, who had somehow lost his tongue in the presence of his employer.

A great deal of conversation followed, a little excited, perhaps, as of every body were conscious of something or other, and wondered whether every body else knew. It was many years since Mrs. Bennet had seen Mr. Newt. She had heard of him from her niece, Amy Waring; but the shyness with which Mrs. Bennet at first heard of him when Amy began to mention him seemed now to have passed into Amy, who never spoke of him at all, or only with a peculiar reserve which her own aunt, Aunt Bennet look at her closely and wonder what was the occasion of that exquisitely delicate loss upon her niece's cheeks—a kind of universal flesh and if there were a down going on somewhere.

Amy seated herself by Gabriel and Ellen and talked very animatedly with them while the parents and Mr. Newt sat together. She praised the roses with which Gabriel had come, and whenever she did so her eyes, having nothing in particular to do at the moment, escaped, as it were, under her brows through the petals of the roses as she bent over them, and wandered toward Lawrence Newt, whose kind, inscrutable eyes, by the most extraordinary chance in the world, seemed to be expecting Amy's, and were ready to receive them with the warmest welcome, now a half-twinkle—or was it no twinkle at all?—which seemed to say, "Oh! you came—did you?" And every time his eyes seemed to say this Amy burst out into fresh praises of those beautiful roses to her younger cousins, and proceed them close to her cheek, as if she found their moist, creamy coolness peculiarly delicious and refreshing—pressed them so deep, indeed, that the crimson in sparese some of their color into her cheeks, which Gabriel and Ellen both thought, and afterward declared to their mother, to be quite as beautiful as roses.

Amy's conversation with her young cousins was very lively, indeed, but it had also continuous interest which is self-perpetuating in conversation. It seemed to be a kind of brilliant parade, banks, and columns, and squadrons of animated words wheeled into line and deployed and united—but it was mechanical, after all. There was a great deal of halting and standing at ease, during which the eyes slipped away again across the room, and fell as softly as before, plump into the same welcome and the same little interrogation in the other eyes, twinking with that annoying "did you?"

Amy Waring was certainly twenty-five, although Gabriel laughed and peered at any such statement. But mamma and the Emily Bible were too much for him. Lawrence Newt was certainly more than forty. But the Newt Family Bible was under a lock of which the key lay in Mrs. Bonloy Newt's bureau, by the merchant tradition, which she could judiciously guide, to interpret, in the matter of age. For when Bonface Newt led Nancy Magot to the altar he received from a large business hand, both the date of his marriage and his wife's birth. He protested it was vulgar. And when the bridegroom inquired whether he was vulgarer on the fact of being born or in recording it—he said: "Mr. Newt, I am ashamed of you," and locked up the record.

There was a vague impression in the Newt family—Bonface had already succeeded to his son Abel—that there was something that Uncle Lawrence never talked about—many things indeed, of course, but still something. Outside the family nothing was respected. Lawrence Newt was simply one of those incomprehensibly pleasant, eccentric, benevolent men, whose mercantile credit was as good as Jacob Van Boozenberg's, but who perversely went his own way. To begin with, he wore just such clothes as he pleased, and he pleased to be a little quaint in his dress. Then he read just such books, and entertained such opinions as he chose. That last was the heinous thing. That a man's credit should be unimpeachable—that he should own large ships which were constantly making successful voyages—that he should be so sagacious as to be a proverb in South Street and in Boston harbors, and yet all the while persist in having his own opinions in politics and religion, and doing just as he chose, was anomalous—it was bewildering—it was dangerous.

SAMARITANS.

His brother Boniface labored with him, in the intervals of selling goods to Blackstone, Hadley, & Merrimack, and others. He urged upon him the decency of attending Dr. Strong's church. He pressed him to read that divine's sermon upon "Christianity in Commerce." He remonstrated, and said he preferred practice to preaching, and when he wanted to learn how, he would step into brother Boniface's store. Whereupon brother Boniface grew very red, and said that if men preferred in acting as if Providence had already arrived, they did it at their own risk. But when brother Lawrence said that he would advise brother Boniface to repent and those misguided individuals, and should they begin with Jacob Van Brocenberg or Peter Stuyvesant & Co., brother Boniface laughed nervously, and said he knew that it was a dreadful thing; it was a shocking thing. But was not would you do? Brother Lawrence, with the inscrutable eyes, said he could go and eat six oysters now for it was one o'clock.

Old Van Broenenberg was also terribly exercised by the fact that Lawrence Nevt would have his own opinions, and one day after a meeting of directors of which he called him to account in his generally leveling and dangerous principles. He even said, in a half-groan way, that he believed he was a Whig Wright man, and that he had better look out for himself. The directors laughed, and thought when they were gone, Lawrence Nevt remarked in a dry, quiet way, with a singular light in his eyes, that as long as the Lord made everybody who had deserted their daughters to live in peace, he had no great fear for himself. Old Van Broenenberg turned very pale and went out. The directors, who were wise men, and were therefore directors of goods seven-eighths wide, for full yard wide prints, to write to the same poor consumptive clergyman and offer a paltry dollar to write a letter of fifty pages to be entitled "Indiscriminate Giving a Crime." But they kept it to themselves. Lawrence had died of despair three months previously, and Dr. Moundy had preached a beautiful funeral sermon from the text "He died in a good fight." It was called "The Christian Warrior," and was printed, and sent round in a black Juvenile-colored paper with black edges, and was advertised as a very neat and appropriate ornament to any centre table. But the fact that the sermon a collection was taken up for the afflicted and destitute widow and family of Lawrence, which amounted to nine dollars and thirty-seven and a half cents.

It was upon visit to this widow that Lawrence Nevt had first met Amy Waring. As he was leaving with the poor woman and her sister rent, Amy came in with a basket of comfortable sugars and teas. She carried the flowers in her face. Lawrence Nevt remembered blushing at being caught in the act, and as he was sliding out her to get out he happened to look at her face, and stopped.

"Bless my soul! my dear young lady, surely your name is Barrow!"

The dear young lady smiled and colored, and replied,

"No, mine is not, but my mother's was."

"Of course it was. Those eyes of yours—I the Darro eyes. Do you think I do not know the Darro eyes when I see them?"

And he took Amy's hand, and said, "Whose daughter are you?"

"My name is Amy Waring."

"Oh! then you Cornina's daughter. Your aunt Lucia married Mr. Bennet, and—and—" Lawrence Nevt's voice paused and faltered for a moment, "and—there was another."

There was something in tenderness reflected in the tone of Amy, with only a graver face, replied,

"Yes, there was my aunt Martha."

"I remember all. She is gone; my dear young lady, you will forgive me, but your face recalls other years." Then turning to the widow, he said, "Mr. Simmer, I am sure that you could have no kinder, no better friend than this young lady."

The young lady looked at him with a gentle inquiry in her eyes as who should say, "What do you know about it?"

Lawrence Nevt's eyes understood in a moment, and he answered:

"Oh, I know it as I know that a rose smells sweet."

He bowed as he said it, and took her hand.

"Will you remember to ask your mother if she remembers Lawrence Nevt, and if he may come and see her?"

Amy Waring said Yes, and the gentleman bending and touching the tips of her fingers with his lips, said, "Good-by, Mrs. Simmer," and departed.

He called at Mrs. Waring's within a few days afterward. He had known her as a child, but his incessant absence from home when he was younger had prevented any great intimacy with any acquaintances. But the Darros were old dancing-girl friends and partners. Since those days they had become women and mothers. He had parted with Corinna Darro, a black-eyed little girl in short white frock and short curling hair and red ribbons. He met her as Mrs. Delmer Waring, a large, maternal, good-hearted woman.

Airy yacht that, joyous, skims the sea, twenty-five years hence will you be heavy-timbered, slow sailing, freighted deep with cotton and with corn?

It was two years before, and during all the time Lawrence Nevt had often met and dined Amy in the street on many errands—had met her at halls whenever he found she was going. He did not say that he was with him, he did not send her costly gifts. He did nothing that could enable the attendants of servants men. But sometimes a basket of flowers came for Miss Waring—without a card, without a clew. The quick-hearted mother thought of various young men, candidates for degrees in Amy's favor, who had undoubtedly sent the flowers. The good-hearted mother, who knew that Amy was in love with none of them, also thought it was a great shame that Amy should lose their time in such an utterly profitless business as being in love with Amy—and when any of them called said, with a good-humored sigh, that she believed her daughter would never be any thing but a Sister of Charity.

Sometimes also a new book came, and on the fly-leaf was written, "To Miss Amy Waring, from her friend Lawrence Nevt." Then the good-hearted mother exclaimed that Amy were absolutely faithful to old associations, and that it was really beautiful to see Amy in the church. In her own room, where she opened the new book and read in it for half an hour at a time, but always turned to the first page. It was such a profound work. It was so full of weighty matter. When would Amy get read it thoroughly at this rate, for the page over which she pored had less on it than any other page in the book. For Amy had fastened on it but that very commonplace and familiar form of words, "To Miss Amy Waring, from her friend Lawrence Nevt."

Amy was entirely of her mother's opinion. Lawrence was a remarkable man in his way, she knew. Some men are born to be as noble as the heroes of romance—simple, strong, brave, true to truth, intelligent, generous, with an experience that has hellowed by constant and genuine intercourse with God. She knew also that that intercourse has never clulled, and a faith which that experience has only strengthened. Some men are born to every quality of heart and mind and person that can awaken and satisfy the love of a woman. Such, exceptionally, said Amy Waring in her mind, which was so cool, so impartial, so merely judicial, was her estimate of Lawrence Nevt. But when a young woman is in no doubt at all when she knows perfectly well that such a man is not intended by nature to be a marrying man, and therefore never thinks of him "in love," but only with a sense of generosity and delicacy beyond expression offers his general homage to the sex by paying a little court to her, "who—thus—then," thought Amy, and she was thinking so at the very moment when she met with Cousin Ellen, Ellen Darro, who, as well, lively, incoherent way, "why, then—then," and her eyes leaped across the room to Amy, who at once set the arms of Lawrence Nevt's, which caressed them with soft light, and half-laughing, half-serious gaze, "why, then—then—then," and Amy buried her face in the cool, damp room, and did not dare to look again, when she had better go and be Sister of Charity.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, July 9, 1859.

THE Wholesale Dry-Goods Market has been active for the principal kinds of Breadstuffs. Flour and Corn Meal, forward. Tuesday the Cotton Market has been sought after.... Cotton has been rather sparingly supplied; prices have not varied materially. Sales of 3,000 bales have been extensively dealt in, though buyers have shown a waiting disposition. Sugars, Coffees, and Beef are unsteady lately.... Coffee has been in fair demand, and prices have been steady. Teas, also, have been quiet. Sugars opened heavily at easier rates, but have since ruled firm. Molasses, Rice, Fish, Fresh Meats, Hops, Seeds, Linseed, Tobacco, Lumber, and Wool have generally been inactive.... Hay has been late standard, and the demand for it has been restricted.... Naval Stores have been in moderate request, closing more firmly than they opened.... The trade in Dry Goods has been quite limited. Buyers of Fall Stocks have not purchased freely as yet. The importations continue heavy. The total value of the week's imports of Foreign Dry Goods is $2,695,549 against $2,192,273 same week last year. Imports of Foreign Dry Goods at this port since Jan. 1st, amount to the large sum of $66,000,000 in 1859. The exports of domestic manufactures and other commodities are quite productive of any remarkable activity. The following is a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Standard Super State Flour, per barrel	$5 05	@ $5 20
Extra State Flour	5 60	@ 5 80
Superfine Western	5 00	@ 5 00
Low to Choice Extra Ohio	6 25	@ 10 00
Low to Choice Extra Genesee	6 50	@ 7 00
Common Southern	5 00	@ 7 00
Extra Southern	7 10	@ 8 75
Superfine Rye Flour	4 00	@ 4 75
Jersey Corn Meal	3 75	@ 3 90
Extra Michigan Wheat, per bushel	1 55	@ 1 60
White Southern Wheat	1 55	@ 1 60
Red Western Wheat	1 40	@ 1 45
Milwaukee Club	1 35	@ 1 38
Mixed Western	1 30	@ 1 35
New Yellow Corn	85	@ 88
Extra Western Corn	88	@ 90
Oats	48	@ 50
Canada Barley	60	@ 65
Canada Oats	42	@ 45
Jersey and Pennsylvania Oats	42	@ 45
Common cotton yarn	08	@ 10
Cotton, middlings, per pound	11	@ 11
New Mess Pork, per barrel	17 50	@ 17 50
Prime Pork	15 00	@ 15 00
Country Mess Beef	9 00	@ 9 00
Hams, per pound	11	@ 11
Shoulders	08	@ 08
Lard	11	@ 11
Prime to Extra State Butter, new	14	@ 18
Ohio Butter, new	11	@ 14
Cheese	5	@ 7
Eggs, per dozen	3 50	@ 4 00
Rio Coffee, per pound	10	@ 12
Java Coffee, per pound	24	@ 25
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	28	@ 42
Cuba Muscovado Sugar	6	@ 7
Loaf Sugar	10	@ 11
Manhattan Whisky, per gallon	24	@ 25
Hogs, Corp of 1-95, per pound	6	@ 6
Sheep, Southern, per pound	4	@ 5
Tallow, per pound	9	@ 9
Clear Pitch Pine, per 250 pounds	3 75	@ 4 00
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	45	@ 46
Common Resin, per 310 pounds	1 75	@ 1 80
Ash Hemp, dressed, per ton	210 00	@ 210 00
Am. Hemp, undressed	130 00	@ 130 00
Manilla Hemp, per pound	10	@ 10
Pulled Wool	30	@ 50

Stocks of several Articles in New York about July 1.

	1858.	1859.
Ashes, barrels	1,000	1,000
Cotton, bales	40,347	117,373
Flour, barrels	67,479	68,479
Hay, pounds	1,605	1,605
Hops, pounds	248	248
Hemp, bales	19,333	19,333
Hides, number	167,000	167,000
Leather, Sole, sides	100,500	77,300
Molasses, hogsheads	6,593	12,729
Molasses, barrels and barrels	4,582	4,582
Oils:
Turpentine, crude, barrels		800
Turpentine, refined, barrels		3,000
Tar, barrels		2,000
Linseed, Boiled, barrels		3,000
Provisions:
Pork, barrels	46,199	90,017
Beef, tierces and barrels	14,799	23,586
Lard, tierces	6,711	6,741
Rice, bags		375
Saltpetre, hogsheads	19,346	83,503
Sugars, bags	15,000	86,000
Sugars, hogsheads	1,000	1,000
Tobacco, Crude, hogsheads	12,115	10,515
Tobacco, Crude, packages	6,435	10,500
Tobacco, Manufactured, pkgs.	28,061	28,061

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were less freely supplied with Beeves, which were in fair demand at former prices. Milch Cows were also less plentiful, yet met with a limited request at former rates. Veal Calves were rather sparingly offered, and were a dull and drooping market. Sheep and Lambs have been actively inquired for at advanced prices.... Swine were in moderate request.... The following are the Live Stock at all the City Markets during each of the last two weeks past than:

	Week ending July 4.	Week ending July 11.
Beeves	2,400	2,400
Milch Cows	118	162
Veal Calves	339	739
Sheep and Lambs	12,925	8,823
Swine	11,000	11,000

The range of prices according to the actual sales at the Bull's Head Market during the week ending July 11 was as follows:

Quality to be fully Beeves, per pound	$ 5 @ $ 12
Fair to very good Milch Cows, per head	35 @ 60
Veal Calves, per pound	7 @ 9
Sheep and Lambs, per head	2 75 @ 6 00
" per pound	4½ @ 6½
Live Swine	5 @ 6½
Dressed "	6½ @ 7½
Roasting Pigs, each	75 @ 1 75

The Country Produce Markets have been supplied with the principal kinds of Produce. The demand has been to the usual extent.... Fruits and Vegetables. Prices have favored buyers.

PRICES CURRENT OF VEGETABLES AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Cherries, per pound	$ 3	@ $ 7
Gooseberries, per bushel	1 75	@ 2 25
Huckleberries, per 16 quarts	4 00	@ 5 00
Currants, per pound	4	@ 5
Strawberries, first quality	6 00	@ 8 00
Peaches, per bushel	3 00	@ 7 00
Apples, old, per bushel	1 00	@ 2 00
Apples, new, per bushel	1 50	@ 2 25
Apples, new, Orleans, per pound	3	@ 5
Potatoes, old, per bushel	87	@ 1 00
Potatoes, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Onions	87	@ 1 00
Onions, new, per 100 bunches	2 00	@ 3 00
Turnips, per 100 bunches	2 00	@ 3 00
Beets, per 100 bunches	3 00	@ 4 00
Carrots, per bunch	75	@ 1 00
Carrots, new, per 100 bunches	2 75	@ 4 00
Cabbages, per 100	4 00	@ 6 00
Salad, per 100 heads	1 00	@ 2 00
Parsley, per 100 bunches	1 00	@ 2 00
Spinach, per basket	50	@ 75
Garlic, per 100 heads	50	@ 1 00
String Beans, per barrel	1 00	@ 2 00
Green Peas, per bushel	2 00	@ 3 00
Cucumbers, per 100	1 00	@ 2 00
Tomatoes, per bushel	1 75	@ 2 00
Cauliflowers, per 100	2 00	@ 3 00
Bulbules, per 100 bunches	50	@ 75
Squashes, per barrel	1 00	@ 1 50
Rhubarb, per 100 bunches	2 50	@ 4 00
Cranberries, per bushel	2 00	@ 3 00
Watermelons, per 100	12 00	@ 40 00
Corn, N. Y. and N. J., per dozen	17	@ 18
Chickens, per pair	50	@ 1 00
Geese, per pair	75	@ 1 00
Turkeys, per pound	10	@ 14
Ducks, per pair	75	@ 1 00
Pigeons, per dozen	1 75	@ 2 75
Wild Pigeons	50	@ 1 00

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The Oriental Fruit Paste, or Aromatic Jelly of Figs and Senna,

Combines all the laxative properties of pure extract of Senna, in a delicious sugar-coated paste. In the natural and most agreeable form. Is the best remedy for habitual costiveness and all irregularities caused by neglect of duties, and is the most valuable aperient for Ladies, Children, and Invalids generally. J. W. NORCROSS & CO., Wholesale Agents, 91 Fulton Street, New York.

!! DEATH TO ALL VERMIN !!!

—IT IS TRULY WONDERFUL WITH WHAT CERtainty Rats, Roaches, Mice, Moths, Ground Mice, Bed-bugs, Ants, Moths, Mosquitoes, Fleas, Insects on Animals, in short every species of Vermin, are utterly destroyed by

"Costar's" Rat, Roach, &c Exterminator.
"Costar's" Bed-bug Exterminator.
"Costar's" Electric Powder for Insects

THE

[only infallible remedies known.]

PRINCIPAL DEPOT 419 Broadway, New York. All Wholesale Agents in the United States.
Wholesale Agents in all the large cities.
Depot of Agencies 48 Ann Street, New York.
10,000 Dozen sold per week in N. Y. alone.
If I Swear!!! of equivalent value to Rats, Roaches, Bedbugs, Ants, Moths, and take nothing but "COSTAR'S" Rat, Roach, &c. Exterminator.
Each Package has my private signature on the wrapper.
Price $2,00 per box, (small size, 1 doz.) by Exp. to Dealers.
For Agencies, and for Circular, Terms, &c.

Burnett's Kalliston.

As a wash for the complexion, it has no equal: it is distinguished for its soothing and purifying effect, allaying all tendency to inflammation. It is also a perfect cleanser of the skin, removing tan, freckles, pimples, and all discolorations, and, with its refreshing and invigorating properties, renders it an indispensable requisite for the toilet of every lady.

Prepared only by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,

Boston.

For sale by all the principal Druggists.

Fifty Cents a Bottle.

The Best is always Cheapest.

ROTHE'S

New and Improved Hair Dye.

From the large number of testimonials daily coming to hand in Europe and America to test my remarkable Hair Dye, I have the pleasure of announcing to all families, both as a companion to the toilet and for restoring the hair, that it is now to be obtained.

And purchasers should see that the maker's name are impressed on each side of the box.

Sole Agents for the United States,

J. W. NORCROSS & CO.,
Wholesale Dealers and Druggists,
91 Fulton Street, New York,
81 Milk Street, Boston.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED.

A FIRST CLASS PICTORIAL FAMILY NEWSPAPER, designed to encourage a spirit of HOPE, MANLINESS, ENDEAVOR, and PROGRESS, and to furnish a Weekly Record of Life in all its phases. Under the appropriate headings of Editorial Literature, Science, Mechanics, Agriculture, Pictorial, Biographical, and Descriptive.—Editorial, City and Vicinity, Rural, Fashion, Scientific, Notes of Travel, Miscellaneous, we shall endeavor to give such matter as will not fail to be of interest to all.

With the number for July 16, we commenced a series of articles entitled,

THE BUILDER,

In which we shall give practical directions, with all necessary illustrations, for the erection of buildings of all material—stone, wood, brick, and concrete. These articles will be written by a practical architect, and will embrace instructions in Designs, Drawing, Masonry, Carpentry, Roofing, Plumbing—and in fact, every thing connected with building.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED will be published weekly, at $2 a year, or two copies for $3. Specimen sent free. ADDRESS WANTED. FOWLER & WELLS,
303 Broadway, N. Y.

361 BROADWAY 539
Tucker's Flowers, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items. Next to the St. Nicholas Hotel.

FINKLE & LYON'S

SEWING MACHINES,

For Family Use, Tailoring Purposes, Saddlery, &c. Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other machine in market, or money refunded. Agents wanted.

503 BROADWAY,
Next to the St. Nicholas Hotel.

Yesterday, look to your Interests!!

HOW TO MANAGE AGENTS, and the INVENTOR'S INSTRUCTOR. New Edition. Sent by FIRST CLASS MAIL for 25 cents. Address FOWLER & WELLS, 303 Broadway, N. Y.

The Greatest Wonder of the Age.—THE EAU ATHENIENNE, OR HAIR RESTORER OF JOHN HARRIS' Invigorates, restores, and promotes the growth and change gray hair and whiskers to their original color in just one day, and will not soil the skin or linen. Sold by all Druggists, and at the Laboratory of JOHN HARRIS & CO., No. 76 North Second Street, Philadelphia.

THE AMERICAN PREEMASON'S

New Monthly Magazine, edited by ALBERT PIKE, Esq., assisted by other prominent Masonic writers. For sale by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. The trade supplied by

HENDRICKSON, BLAKE & LONG,
24 and 25 Ann Street, New York.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND "GET PAID FOR IT."—Take an Agency for our Publications. The most popular terms ever offered. Pamphlet sent FREE. FAMILY BIBLES will be glad to obtain some. Address FOWLER & WELLS, For particulars address 303 Broadway, N. Y.

JULY.

Oh, month of beauty! month of bloom!
Month of the sweetest twilight skies,
Of richest color and perfume,
Of most melodious harmonies!
The meadow lark springs up to heaven,
The mellow tiltbird through the air,
And all of Flora's wealth means given
To deck the radiant month she bears.

The poppy tints its red cup high,
The wild grape scents its rustic hedge;
And the bright-bodied dragon fly
Skims o'er the water's glassy edge.
The bobolink now perch beneath the corn,
The quail among the shorn husk wads of fire;
To shady nooks the catfish run,
And coolness is the first desire.

Coolness for body and for brain,
Because of toil and zephyr clothes,
Which seeks the cool in any shade—
The Sirrim, whose gallant banner flows
From three luxurious marmoreal piles.
In FLYING STREET—their store behold
Whose Summer Clothes "is all the styles,"
FOR MEN AND BOYS ARE CHEAPEST SOLD!

"Twin Families of Fashion."

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140

Fulton Street,

Between Broadway & William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK.

R'THUR'S

PATENT SELF-SEALING

Fruit Cans & Jars,

"These celebrated Cans and Jars," says the editor of the Lady's Book, "are the best introduced, and, by all odds, the most economical for canning fruits general use. Thousands of housekeepers, we in put directions, were baffled by other Cans and Jars, and who lost more or less of their fruit in consequence, will be glad to learn that ARTHUR'S never fail."

They are made of Tin, Glass, and Earthenware.

ARTHUR, BURNHAM, & GILROY,
Manufacturers and Importers,
Nos. 117 and 119 S. Tenth St. Philadelphia.

Also, unanimously awarded the Medal for the Tightest Stitch, of the celebrated "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE & TEA-POTS.

RIMMEL'S BOUQUET — ALL THE YEAR ROUND, and WOOD VIOLET, are the leading Perfumes at the Paris Exhibition.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

LECTURES FOR 1859—60.—TO MANAGERS OF YOUNG MEN'S ASSOCIATIONS, INSTITUTES, LYCEUMS, &c., &c.

As the Subscriber is desirous of soon making his arrangements for Lectures to be delivered in this country the next Autumn and Winter season, 1859-60, he respectfully requests the Committees of any other Cities and Towns interested,

FRANK BUCKMAN, 54 West 17th Street, New York.
June 16, 1859.

RIMMEL'S TOILET VINEGAR is far superior to Eau de Cologne as a lotion for the head or bath, a reviving Perfume and a powerful Disinfectant.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.
DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.
DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM.
The Remedy of the Times.
The Remedy of the Day.
The Remedy of the Season.

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma,
Bronchitis, Whooping Cough, Croup,
Inflammation of the Throat, Lungs, and Chest,
and Consumption, are all cured by this invaluable remedy.

Beware of Counterfeits, and purchase only that having the written signature of "I. BUTTS," as well as the printed one of the Proprietors, BUTH. W. FOWLE & SON, 138 Tremont Street, Boston, on the outer wrapper.

BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.
BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.
BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY.
Sold everywhere.

RIMMEL'S WHITE ALMOND SOAP and FAMILY BAR SOAP are confidently recommended for their emollient properties and delightful scent.
Sold by all the Trade.
E. RIMMEL, Perfumer, London and Paris.

$2 50 PER QUARTER. ASHLAND INST. MUSICAL ACADEMY, Catskill Mountains. Both sexes. Students can enter any time. For particulars, address Mrs. HEYER & FAY, A.M., Ashland, N. Y., or D. G. HUBBARD, 581, 62 Broadway.

COZZENS'

West Point Hotel

is

NOW OPEN.

LA TOURETTE HOUSE,
BERGEN POINT, HUDSON CO., N. J.
Wesley W. Hitt, Gen'l Manager, late of Metropolitan.

This fashionable Summer Hotel is beautifully situated on the borders of the Bay, and opposite Staten Island. Excellent bathing, boating, fishing, and farming in the immediate vicinity. Convenient with their families visiting New York, will find this House as convenient as a hotel in town, as it is distant no longer time (only 35 minutes by Steamboat) to reach it, than to go from South Ferry to Union Square.

LAKE HOPATCONG HOUSE, AT LAKE HOPATCONG, NOW OPEN.

Gentlemen with their families, or single gentlemen, can make arrangements for Summer Board at reasonable rates. Parties wishing that fine amusement, viz. "GOOD FISHING," can enjoy it at this beautiful place to perfection; also, GOOD BATHING. It is but a short half hours' ride from New York, by Morris and Essex Railroad, to Lake Hopatcong station, where stages will be in waiting to convey passengers to the House, a distance of three miles. Post Office address—Jefferson, Morris county, N. J. H. DAVIS.

CONGRESS HALL,

Saratoga Springs.

This well-kept and fashionable HOTEL IS NOW OPEN for the Season. Apartments can be engaged by addressing the Proprietors,

HATHORN & MARCHIAL.

Long Branch, N. J.

Howland's Hotel,

is

Now Open for the Season.

Ohio White Sulphur Springs,

OPEN TO VISITORS SEEKING HEALTH OR PLEASURE,
ON AND AFTER THE 1st OF JUNE NEXT.

ACCOMMODATIONS for OVER 600 VISITORS.

THE OHIO WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS are situated in Delaware County, Ohio, 15 miles from Columbus, the Capital of Ohio, on the Scioto River.

The medicinal qualities of these Springs are warranted by those of any other Mineral Waters in the United States.

For Rooms or other Information, address
ANDREW WELCH,
White Sulphur Springs, Ohio.

INTERNATIONAL HOTEL, NIAGARA FALLS.

ROBERT A COLEMAN, late of the firm of COLEMAN & STETSON, of the Astor House, New York, is finally engaged in the above Hotel, and will be pleased to receive his friends. FREDERICK W. COLEMAN, opened the above-named elegant house, which, having been enlarged and refitted, is now considered by travelers to visitors at this the grandest of watering places.

TRENTON FALLS.

This most picturesque of the WATER FALLS OF AMERICA can now be reached at a small expense from Utica by Railroad.

N. B. Three trains a day.

EASTMAN'S

White Mountain Guide-Book.

Ross & Touset, Wholesale Agents, N. Y.

MOORE'S IRISH MELODIES—With Symphonies and accompaniments by Sir John Stephenson. In one volume, 8vo. Cloth, gilt edges, $1 50. Cloth, $2 50.
Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

Grover & Baker's

CELEBRATED

Noiseless Family Sewing Machines,

At Reduced Prices.

Offices of Exhibition and Sale—495 Broadway, New York; 18 Bummer Street, Boston; 180 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; and 181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; and 58 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati.

☞ SEND FOR A CIRCULAR. ☜

$30 PER MONTH.—Wanted in every State, good Canvassers and Agents at $30 per month and expenses paid.
For particulars send full address to S. F. FRENCH & CO., 151 Nassau Street, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,

THE GREAT AMERICAN REMEDY

FOR PURIFYING THE BLOOD.

An unfailing remedy for Scrofula, cutaneous and biliary disorders.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

Lord Byron's Worcestershire Sauce.

Is the TRUE Worcestershire Sauce. Is excellent for all purposes.
ASK FOR, and HAVE ONLY LORD BYRON'S.
Cast at every Hotel, and sold by all Grocers and Provision Dealers.
Wholesale and for Exportation by
CROSSE, BLACKWELL, JONES & CO.,
Soho Square, and 21 Broad Street, New York.
Sold Retail by the Grocers and Fruit Houses. Half Pints, 25 cents per bottle; Pints, 50 cents per bottle.

American Guano,

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano. This Guano from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale and retail at the office of the Company, 44 Wall Street, New York. For particulars address Jos. HESS, Secretary. For purchasers address C. S. MARSHALL, Prest. American Guano Co., 44 William Street, New York.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S
PLESSE & LUBIN
THE FLOWER OF THE DAY
KISS-ME-QUICK
FRANGIPANNI
Sold Everywhere.
from every flower that breathes a fragrance
SWEET SCENTS
THE FLOWER OF THE DAY
KISS-ME-QUICK
FRANGIPANNI
Sold Everywhere.
2 New Bond St. London.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S, PERFUMERY,

Sold by all Druggists in every city.

Wholesale Agent,
J. PHILLIPS,
87 Pearl St.
New York.

THE ECONOMIST

COOKING STOVE,
FOR WOOD OR COAL,
WITH OR WITHOUT OVEN.

This is the most valuable improvement that has been made in Cooking Stoves during the past twenty years.

THE SAND OVEN

Equalizes the heat on the same principle as the Bake Oven of ancient owners.

THE SAND OVEN

Retains the heat much longer than the fire gone out.

THE ECONOMIST

Warmers the Sand Oven, in shead of all competitors!

THE ECONOMIST

Will Roast, Bake and Steam Meats in the most perfect manner.

THE ECONOMIST

Is the most economical and durable Stove in the world.

THE ECONOMIST

Has a most perfect arrangement for broiling.

THE ECONOMIST

Heats water for the Bathing Room, &c., as quickly as any Stove, and at half the cost for fuel.

Do not fail to examine it! It is manufactured by W. & J. TREADWELL, PERRY & NORTON,
ALBANY, N. Y.,
And for sale everywhere.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

New Styles.
From $50 to $125.

SINGER'S FAMILY MACHINE, the prize of which is only $50, is a light and elegantly ornamented Machine, capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

SINGER'S STANDARD MACHINES for manufacturing purposes are known to be without any successful rival in the market. Much has recently been published in regard to various Sewing Machines; Singer's Machines make the best stitch ever invented, and do it in the best manner. A great discount is made to clergymen.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

Charles Grobe's New Method

FOR THE

PIANO FORTE.

Mr. Grobe is so well known, that any remarks as to his qualifications would be superfluous. Suffice it to say, that he has produced in his New Method a work for instruction unsurpassed superior to any other. It is evidently the Book for the People, and as the result of the rips experience of the author, it is invaluable to Teacher or Pupil. Nothing is anticipated, nothing hurried. The Pupil is led by pleasant, attractive steps from easy to the desired end. The Exercises so often complained of in other Methods are entirely avoided, and the Pupil scholars believe it to be the most simple, clear, progressive, and judicious system of instruction extant. The work contains its engraved hymns, illustrating the different positions of the hands and fingers. The type is new and unusually beautiful and distinct. The paper is of the finest quality. Price, in boards, $2 50; in cloth, $3 00; in cloth, gilt edges, $3 50; mail, postage paid, on receipt of the marked price. The trade supplied. A handsome discount to Teachers and Seminaries.

FIRTH, POND & CO., 547 Broadway, New York.
LEE & WALKER, Philadelphia.

PROTESTANT FRENCH INSTITUTE for YOUNG GENTLEMEN, in New York, No. 48 East Fourth street, near Madison Park. Boarding and Day School, Classical and Commercial. This Institution is now engaged on the following terms. It presents a thorough course of instruction in all its branches, especially in the Spanish and German languages. The French is the language of the school. Comfortable accommodations for boarders. Terms moderate. Circulars, with testimonials, the manner of my pupils and of their parents entitled to the same, may be had. Prof. ELIE CHARLIER, Director.

References: Rev. Dr. F. Stowell,
Geneva, Rev. Dr. Morin d'Aubigné,
Washington, Hon. Lewis Cass, Secretary of State.
Boston, Prof. L. Agassiz.
Princeton, Prof. Henry.
New York, C. King, President of Columbia College.
New York, C. King, President of Columbia College.
New York, Rev. Dr. Adams, Pastor of the N. Y. University.
Rev. Dr. F. Hawks.

Ladies', Children's, and Infants' Summer Clothing, at

GENIN'S BAZAAR.

CHILDREN'S BLOUSES,
MARSEILLES CLOTH DRESSES,
LADIES' PRINTED MUSLIN ROBES,
RICH EMBROIDERED LAWN ROBES,
LADIES' BATHING DRESSES,
MISSES' MUSLIN DRESSES,
BOYS' MARSEILLES PANTS,
And a large and fashionable SUMMER CLOTHING.

Dress-making in all its branches, in greater variety than can be found elsewhere in the City.

GENIN'S BAZAAR, 513 Broadway.

Dr. S. P. Townsend's Sarsaparilla

IS THE

ONLY SARSAPARILLA

which will effectually eradicate disease from the body, restore a healthy action to the system, cleanse the blood, and thus cure the bowels.

BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

Be very careful to see that each wrapper bears the name of DR. S. P. TOWNSEND.
Certificate on the outside wrapper of each bottle.
Principal Depot 212 Broadway, New York.

TIFFANY & CO,

Importers & Manufacturers,
No. 550 Broadway, New York,
And Rue Richelieu, No. 79 Paris,
DIAMONDS, AND OTHER PRECIOUS STONES.
FINE JEWELRY, WATCHES.
SILVER WARE, PLATED WARE, TABLE CUTLERY;
CLOCKS, BRONZES, ARTISTIC CAST STATUETTES,
DESKS, DRESSING-CASES, WORK-BOXES, WRITING-DESKS,
PENS, DIAMOND PENCILS,
And many other Articles of Art and Luxury.

The only Agents in New York for the well known Chas. Frodsham's Watches, whose superiority over any other pocket time-piece ever made, has been universally established.

Every article is marked in plain figures the Lowest Price at which it will be sold.

The attention is called to strangers an invitation to examine stock, assuring all that a call will incur not the least obligation to purchase.

THE SUPERIOR QUALITY, long tested and delicious flavored

Mountain COFFEE,

Is for sale by
CUTHELL & CO
No. 8 Beaver
NEW YORK.

ELLIOT & PATTEN—Examine Inventions and procure Americ and Foreign Patents. Patent and Mechanical Agency, main entrance of Patent Office Building, Washington City, D. C.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

ABBOTT'S FRENCH REVOLUTION. The French Revolution of 1789, as viewed in the Light of Republican Institutions. By Jous S. C. Abbott, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "Napoleon at St. Helena," &c. With numerous Engravings. 8vo, Muslin, $2 00.

WALTER THORNLEY; or, A Peep at the Past. By the Author of "Allen Prescot" and "Alida." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE COMPLETION OF

MISS STRICKLAND'S QUEENS OF SCOTLAND. Lives of the Queens of Scotland and English Princesses connected with the Royal Blood of the Stuarts. Edited By AGNES STRICKLAND. Vol. VIII. completing the work. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Sets in Muslin, $8 00; Half Calf, $14 00.

ANTHON'S CICERO DE OFFICIIS. M. T. Ciceronis de Officiis Libri Tres. With Marginal Analysis and an English Commentary. Edited for the Syraies of the University of New York, by the Rev. CHARLES ANTHON, LL.D., Vice-Principal of Christchurch College, Oxford, and Author of "A Classical Dictionary," &c. Cambridge. First American Edition, Corrected and Enlarged. By CHARLES ANTHON, LL.D. 12mo, Sheep extra, 75 cents.

THE WARS OF THE ROSES; or, Stories of the Struggle of York and Lancaster. By G. Lewis, Author of "The Boyhood of Great Men." "The Footprints of Famous Men," "Heroes of the Bye," &c. Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

COPLAND'S MEDICAL DICTIONARY. Complete in Two Volumes. 8vo, Muslin. Price, $6 00 per volume; Sheep, $8 00 per Volume.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States not over 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 96 to 98 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

A Splendid Number.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR JULY.

Unquestionably it is the most sustained work of the kind in the language; that is to say, in the world. The splendid monthly steel plate from the Editor's Table are above price. The present number is equal to any yet issued, and will be found a most valuable key-note of prosperity to the work.—N. Y. Christian Advocate and Journal.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE is the favorite periodical of people's magazine. Sound in religion, conservative in politics, strong in taste, varied in its contents, brimming with sympathy and humor, and guided all the time by a purely common sense, it has won its way to the first rank. We rejoice in its prosperity.—New Orleans Christian Advocate.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . . 2 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.
HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.
The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-five Cents a year.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER—$2 A YEAR.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S New Serial, entitled "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," Splendidly Illustrated by HOLMAN HUNT, commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

COPIES SENT GRATIS to Postmasters at Clubs Rates of Advertising, if only Cards a Line.

A Club of Five Persons will be entitled to a Copy gratis for three Months or more.

Any Persons living in the City of New York wishing HARPER'S WEEKLY left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of PUBLICATION.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

MRS. COLUMBIA AND HER HIRED MAN, LEWIS CASS.

MRS. COLUMBIA. "What's this I hear, Lewis, about your refusing to protect my Children when they're away from home?"

HIRED MAN LEWIS. "If you please, ma'm, I was afraid of getting you into difficulties."

MRS. COLUMBIA. "Afraid! Ah! I thought so. My poor Lewis! you are growing old, and I fear I must get a younger man for your place."

NOT A BAD NOTION.

AUGUSTUS. "Hallo! Fwed. What have you got on your leg?

FREDERICK. Fact is, my dear fellah, I've got to do the duhfel, and take my sistaws to a flowa-show. So—sw—you see, I've just been twying to invent a sawt of leg-guard, to—sw—ket as a pwotection of one's twousaws from the hoops!"

THE CITY MILK BUSINESS.

MARY, THE KITCHEN-MAID. "Why, John, what's the matter?"

MILKMAN. "Ah, Mary! if we don't have rain soon, I don't know what we'll do for Milk!"

"PRECISELY THE KIND OF BOOKS I WE SEEK WHEN GOING ON AN EXCURSION TO THE COUNTRY—TO BE READ UNDER THE COOL SHADE OF A TREE, WITH A BROOK GURGLING AT YOUR FEET, AND THE LEAVES WHISPERING OVER HEAD."

ACADIA. By Fred. S. Cozzens. 1 vol., cloth. $1.

FRUITS, FLOWERS, AND FARMING. By Henry Ward Beecher. $1.25.

PICTURES OF COUNTRY LIFE. By Alice Cary. $1.

NOTES FROM BEECHER'S DISCOURSES. $1.

MME. LE VERT'S SOUVENIRS OF TRAVEL. $2.

THE METHODIST. By Miriam Fletcher. 2 vols. $2.

THE SPARROWGRASS PAPERS. New Edition. $1.

DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers,
New York.

Love (L'Amour).
Translated from M. Michelet's great French work. 1 vol. 12mo. 75 cents.

Is an excellent retelling more lively interest and curiosity throughout the book than in this. Praised by some, and condemned by others, it is a treatise to be read by all. A 60th edition printing. One volume, bound in cloth, $1. ☞ Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of the price, by RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers,
130 Grand Street, New York.

BININGER'S
OLD LONDON DOCK GIN

Established in 1720.

Designed for the use of the Medical Profession and the Family, possessing those intrinsic medicinal properties which belong to an old and Pure Gin. Put up in quart bottles, and sold by all prominent Druggists.

A. M. BININGER & CO.,
SOLE PROPRIETORS,
No. 343 Broadway, N. Y.

Curtis' Cure for Baldness.
This remedy is reliable; contains no oil, lead, or sulphur; it has been tested in Boston, Providence, and the City of New York. CURTIS, Proprietor, Providence, R. I. Sold by S. M. Gates, 121 Bowery; J. & J. Coddington, 715 Broadway; W. H. Lewis, 537 Greenwich street; John Jones, 123 Hudson street, New York; Mrs. Hayes; G. P. Miles; and Reynolds & Co., Brooklyn; P. Sellew, Jersey City; L. T. Merrell, Newark.

BARNES & PARK, Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row,
And all Druggists. General Agents.

Vest not inflated.

Vest inflated.

DELANO
Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.
Incorporated Jan. 1859.
Capital $120 000

MANUFACTURERS OF ALL KINDS OF
Life-Preserving Garments
FOR ORDINARY WEAR,
Safety Bathing Dresses, Children's Swimming Jackets, &c. &c.

OFFICE and SALESROOM, 256 BROADWAY, (Opposite City Hall)
NEW YORK.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
CELEBRATED
UTERINE CATHOLICON
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

With such universal distress and suffering as saddens the female life, a really good Medicine must be their best friend. Obstructions, Irregularities, Painful Menstruations, Discharges, Uterations, Falling Womb, Leucorrhœa, &c., constantly effected by Dr. Marchisi's Catholicon, gives it a reputation and popularity never obtained by any other article. It does what it promises, and can be relied upon. When every thing has been tried, the best physicians consulted, years spent in anguish, and fortunes wasted, this Catholicon has restored health to the patient and gladness to the female. It is active and efficient in any form of disease peculiar to the female sex, and should never be dispensed with previous to and after confinement. Numerous letters testify that it is

NEVER TAKEN WITHOUT BENEFIT.

Daughters, Wives and Mothers! this medicine will entail no ill health, but will restore your system, and as evidence of its efficacy, the money will be refunded where results are not as indicated. A pamphlet, with symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered at the counter of any agent. Do not confound Dr. Marchisi with any other name. It can be had in most every town. If not found, it can be sent by express. Price $2 per bottle, or 3 bottles for $5. Notice Removal Address,

BARNES & PARK, General Agents,
13 and 15 PARK ROW, N. Y.

E. A. BROOKS,
575 Broadway & 150 Fulton Street.
A splendid Assortment of Ladies', Gentlemen's, and Children's Boots, Shoes and Gaiters.

☞ Something New!!! ☜
A Gift Enterprise conducted upon a Liberal and Impartial Plan!!!!!

The most Liberal, Punctual, and Reliable
GIFT BOOK ENTERPRISE
IN EXISTENCE.

The best evidence of this is the fact of its being the only one that stands endorsed by the Press of the City in which it is located.

We are not only known as the LEADING Firm of our own city, but by many of the most respectable and influential papers throughout the country.

H. E. HOYT & CO.'S
GREAT
GIFT BOOK STORE,
No. 41 Baltimore Street,
Baltimore, Md.
Headquarters for Southern and Western Orders.
WRITE FOR A CATALOGUE FOR 1859,
IT CONTAINS THE
LARGEST LIST of Useful, Ornamental and Valuable Gifts ever Published!
☞ GREATER INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS than ever before offered by any other establishment in the United States.

A Gift worth from Fifty Cents to
One Hundred Dollars
ACCOMPANIES EVERY BOOK.

Postmasters, Country Merchants, Booksellers, Librarians of Universities, Academies, Private and Circulating Libraries, Schools,

And all others whose business will enable them, are respectfully solicited to BECOME OUR AGENTS.

Catalogues giving full particulars mailed free to any address.

WHAT THE PRESS SAY.

They have a magnificent assortment of Books and have prepared them to meet with immediate sale. Gifts to be distributed among their c'ronge of friends and customers at large."—Balt. Sun.

Not only may a selection be made of any class work, but with it the purchaser is sure to receive some article of Jewelry, which in many cases proves quite valuable.—Balt. Daily Exchange.

They make no promises that are not performed strictly to the letter, and by their punctuality entailing new obligations, have gained the entire confidence of all our country friends with whom they deal.—Balt. Patriot.

To a young lady acquaintance of ours postmarked by a Book of this establishment, a few days since, and received a double-toned Gold Watch, valued at one hundred dollars.—Balt. Clipper.

The success which attends the Gift Book House of Messrs. H. E. Hoyt & Co. has no precedent in the annals of Gift Enterprises.—Republican and Argus.

Call and see them, and our word for it, you will not regret your visit.—Balt. Sunday Mercury.

The inducements to the Southern and Western people to make their purchases of Messrs. Hoyt & Co. are much greater than can be offered by any house of the kind in the United States. Freight from Baltimore is not heavy, packing free, and the immense order they have done by this firm is a guarantee of their fulfillment of promise.—Family Journal.

It is, in a moral, guiding books for nothing and have paid to take them away.—Examiner.

All orders will be promptly and impartially filled, and forwarded within one day after being received, with Gifts, in all cases, will accompany the Books, with a written certificate to the person sending the order.

Remember, no Gifts distributed of less value than 50 cents, or more than $100 00.

Address H. E. HOYT & CO.,
No. 41 Baltimore Street, Baltimore, Md.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—NO. 134.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MAGENTA.

I.

UNDER the willows; in the trampled maize;
Midst up-torn vines, and shatter'd mulberry rows;
In vine-fields, corn-fields, ditches by dusty ways,
And cottage-crofts, where the gold gourd-flower blows—
Swathes of Death's scythe, wielded for two long days—
The dead lie thick and still: foes all at peace with foes.

II.

So many nameless dead! no meed of glory
For all this blood, so freely pour'd, is theirs;
Yet each life was dear to many in its story
Of hopes and loves and hates, of joys and cares.
Of these unhonor'd sleepers, grim and gory,
Who knows out of the world how much each with him bears?

III.

These were all sons or sires; husbands or brothers;
Bread-winners, most of them, for homes afar.
This a sick father's stay; that a blind mother's;
For him in Paris, 'neath the evening star,
A loving heart its care in labor smothers,
Till taught by arms of price, how far they strike—how far!

IV.

Cry! let the poor soul wrestle with the woe
Of that bereavement. Who takes thought of her?
Through the illumined streets the triumphs go;
Under her window waving banners stir,
And shouting crowds to Nôtre Dame that flow.
Hide, mourner, hide the tears which might such triumphs blur!

A GOOD FIGHT.

BY CHARLES READE.

AUTHOR OF "LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

Not a day passes over the earth but men and women of no note do great deeds, speak great words, and suffer noble sorrows. Of these obscure heroes, philosophers, and martyrs, the greater part will never be known till their names are read out aloud. Their records will be small, and the small great: but of others the world's knowledge may be said to sleep. Their lives and characters lie hidden from nations in the very annals that record them. The general reader can not feel them, they are presented so curtly and coldly: they are not life breathing stories upspringing in his mind, but little historic bulk-stones striking him only to glance off his bosom: nor can he understand them; for epitomes are not narratives, as skeletons are not human figures.

This records of prime truths sometimes remain a dead letter to plain folk; the writers have little power to rise to the imagination, and imagination is so rare a gift. Here, then, the writer of fiction may be of use to the public—as interpreter.

There is a musty chronicle, written in tolerable Latin, and in it a chapter where every sentence holds a fact. Here is told, with harsh brevity, the strange history of a pair, who lived untrumpeted, and died unsung, four hundred years ago; and lie now, as unpriced, in that stern page, as fossils in a rock. Thus living or dead, fate is still unjust to them. Yet if I can but show you what is involved in that dry chronicler's words, methinks you will correct the indifference of centuries, and give those two sore-tried souls a place in your heart for a few weeks.

It was past the middle of the fifteenth century, Louis XI. was sovereign of France; Edward IV. was wrongful King of England; and Philip "the Good," having by force and cunning dispossessed his cousin Jacqueline, and broken her heart, reigned unobstructed this many years in Holland, where our tale begins.

Gerard, and Catherine his wife, lived in the little town of Tergou. He traded, wholesale and retail, in cloth, silk, brown holland, and, above all, in carried leather, a material highly valued by the middling people, because it would stand twenty years' wear, and turn a knife if not fresh sharpened; no small virtue in a jerkin of that century, in which folk were so liberal of their stuff; even at dinner a man would leave his meat a while, and carve you his neighbor, on a very moderate difference of opinion.

The couple were well to do, and would have been free from all earthly care, but for sins children. When these were coming into the world, one per annum, each was hailed with rejoicings, and the Saints were thanked, not expostulated with; and when parents and children were all young together, the latter were looked upon as lovely little playthings invented by Heaven for the amusement, joy, and evening solace, of people in business.

But as the olive branches shot up, and the parents grew older, and saw with their own eyes the fate of large families, misgivings and care mingled with their love. They belonged to a singularly wise and prudent people: in Holland readers parents were as rare as disobedient children. So now when the huge loaf came in on a gigantic trencher, looking like a fortress in its most, and, the tour of the table once made, seemed to have melted away, Gerard and Catherine would look at one another and say, "Who is to find bread for them all when we are gone?"

At this observation the younger ones needed all their filial respect to keep their little faces countenanced; for their mother's opinion dinner and supper came by nature like sunrise and sunset, and, so long as that luminary should travel round the earth, so long must the brown loaf go round their family circle, or the little stomachs only to rise again in the family oven. But the remark awakened the deeper forethought in Gerard and Catherine, and being often repeated set several of the family thinking, some of them good thoughts, some of them bad ones, according to the nature of the thinkers.

"Kate, the children grow on, this table will be too small."

"We can not afford it, Gerard," replied Catherine, answering not his words, but his thought, after the manner of wives.

Their anxiety for the future took at times a less dismal but more mortifying turn. The free burghers had their pride as well as the nobles; and these two would not hear that any of their blood should go down in the burgh after their decease.

So by gentilesse, and skilful trade they managed to clothe all the little bodies, and feed all the great mouths, and yet put by a small hoard to meet the future; and, as it grew, and grew, they felt a pleasure like that of successful authorship in doing it.

One day the eldest boy but one, aged nineteen, came to his mother, and, with that natural composure which has so misled some persons as to the real nature of this people, begged her to intercede with his father to send him to Amsterdam, and place him with a merchant. "It is the way of life that likes me: merchants are wealthy; I am good at numbers; prithee, good mother, take my part in this, and I shall owe you all I can now, good mother."

Catherine threw up her hands with dismay and incredulity. "What, leave Tergou!"

"What is one street to me more than another? If I can leave the folk of Tergou, I can surely leave the stones."

"What! abandon your poor father when he is no longer young?"

"Mother, if I can leave you, I can leave him."

"What, leave your poor brothers and sisters that love you to dear?"

"There are enough in the house without me."

"What mean you, Richard? Who is more thought of than you? Stay, have I spoken sharp to you? Have I been unkind to you?"

"Never that I know of; and if you had, you should never hear of it from me. Mother," said Richard proudly, but the tear was in his eye, "it all lies in a word. And nothing can change my mind. There will be one mouth less for you to feed."

"There now, see what my tongue has done," said Catherine, and the next moment she began to cry. For she saw her first young bird on the edge of the nest trying his wings to fly into the world. Richard had a calm, strong will, and she knew he never wasted a word.

It ended as nature has willed all such discourse shall end: young Richard went to Amsterdam with a face so long and sad as it had never been seen before, and a heart like granite.

That afternoon at supper there was one mouth less. Catherine looked at Richard's chair and wept silently. On his Gerard comforted roughly and angrily to the children, "Sit wider! can't ye: sit wider?" and turned his head away over the back of his seat a while, and was silent.

Richard was launched; and never cost them another penny: but to him out, and back to him left Tergou directly after dinner, which meant, took all the little hoard but one gold crown. They began again. Two years passed. Richard found a niche in commerce for himself near Amsterdam. And left Tergou directly after dinner, which was at eleven in the forenoon. At supper that day Gerard remembered what had happened the last time; so he said in a low whisper, "Sit wider, dears!" Now, until that moment, Catherine would not see the gap at table, for her daughter Catherine had besought her not to grieve to-night, and she had said, "No, sweet-heart, I promise I will not, since it vexes my children." But when Gerard whispered "sit wider!" says she, "Ay! the table will soon be too big for the children; and you thought it would be too small;" and having delivered this with forced calmness, she put up her apron the next moment and wept sore.

"'Tis the best that leave us," sobbed she; "that is the cruel part."

"Nay! nay!" said Gérard, "our children are good children, and all are dear to us alike. Hesh her not! What God takes from us still seems better than what he spares to us; that is to say, men are by nature unthankful—and women silly."

"And I say Richart and Jacob were the flower of the flock," sobbed Catherine.

The little coffer was empty again, and to fill it they gathered like ants. In these days speculation was pretty much confined to the card-and-dice business. Gerard knew no way to wealth but the slow and sure one. "A penny saved is a penny gained," was his humble creed. All that was not required for the business, and the necessaries of life, went into the little coffer with steel bands and florid key. They denied themselves in turn the humblest luxuries, and then, catching one another's looks, smiled; perhaps with a greater joy than self-indulgence has to bestow. And so in three years more they had gleaned enough to set up their fourth son as a master tailor, and their eldest daughter as a robe-maker, in Tergou. Here were two more provided for: their own trade would enable them to throw work into the hands of this pair. But the coffer was drained to the dregs, and this time the step too bled a little in goods if not in coin.

Alas! there remained on hand two that were unable to get their bread, and two that were unwilling. The unable ones were: 1. Giles, a dwarf, of the wrong sort, half stability half malice, all head and claws and vows, run from by dogs and unprejudiced females, and sided with through thick and thin by his mother; 2. Little Catherine, a poor girl that could only move on crutches. She lived in pain, but smiled through it, with her marble face and violet eyes and long silky lashes; and fretful or reposing word never came from her lips. The unwilling ones were Sylvandi, the youngest, a never-do-well, too much in love with play to work, and Cornelie, the eldest, who had made calculations of his own, and stuck to the hearth, waiting for dead men's shoes. Almost worn out by their repeated efforts, and above all dispirited by the moral and physical infirmities of those they now remained on hand, the anxious couple would often say, "What will become of all these when we shall be no longer here to take care of them?" But when they had said this a good many times, suddenly the domestic horizon cleared, and then they used still to say it, because a habit is a habit, but they uttered it half mechanically now, instead of despondingly, and added brightly and cheerfully, "but thanks to St. Bavon and all the saints, there's Gerard!"

CHAPTER II.

YOUNG Gerard was for many years of his life a ton apart and distinct; object of no fears and no great hopes. No fears; for he was going into the Church; and the Church could always maintain her children by book or by crook in those days: no great hopes, because his family had no interest with the great to get him a benefice, and the young man's own habits were frivolous, and, indeed, such as our cloth merchant would not have put up with in any son but a clerk that was to be. His two main trivialities were reading and penmanship, and he was so wrapped up in them that often he could hardly be got away to his meals. The day was never long enough for him: and he carried even a tinder-box and brimstone matches, and begged ends of candles of the neighbors, which he lighted at unreasonable hours—ay, even at eight of the clock at night in winter, when the very Burgomaster was abed. Endured at home, his practices were encouraged by the monks of a neighboring convent. They had taught him penmanship, and continued to teach him, until one day they discovered, in the middle of a lesson, that he was teaching them. They pointed this out to him in a merry way; he hung his head and blushed: he had vowed it to none himself, but mistrusted his judgment in that matter. "But, my son," said an elderly monk, "how is it that you, to whom God has given an eye so true, a hand so supple yet firm, and a love of these beautiful crafts, how is it you do not color as well as write? a scroll looks but tarnen unless a border of fruit, and leaves, and rich arabesques surround the part of words, and charm the sense when done do the soul and understanding; to say nothing of the picture of holy men and women depicted, with their robes of several colors adorned, and not alone the eye soothed with the brave and noble figures of God's son, but the heart lifted by effigies of the Saints in glory. Answer me, my son."

At this Gerard was confused, and muttered that he had made several trials at illuminating, but had not succeeded well, and then the matter ended.

Soon after this a fellow-enthusiast came on the scene in the unwonted form of an old lady. She was a widow, and the survivor of the beautiful Van Eyck, left Flanders, and came to end her days in her native country. She bought a small house near Tergou. In course of time she heard of Gerard, and saw some of his handiwork: it pleased her so well that she sent for the young servant, Richt Heynes, to ask him to come to her. This led to an acquaintance, which could hardly be expected in little Tergou had never held so many as two subjects of this sort before. At each visit she pulled out of holes and corners drawings and paintings, some of them by her own hand, which seemed to him unapproachable; but if the artist overpowered him, the woman took his heart by storm. She and Richt soon turned him inside out like a glove. Among other things, they drew from him what his parents could hardly tell her, that the reason why he did not illuminate, viz., that he could not afford the gold, the lapis, and the red, but only the cheap carbo; and that he was afraid to ask his mother to buy the choice colors, and was sure to shrink from such a task. The widowed Van Eyck gave him a little brush-gold, and some vermilion, and ultramarine, and a gentle but incisive lecture on his sins. He almost adored her. As he left the house Richt ran after him with a candle and a quarter; he quite declined the last but better even than the gold and lapis lazuli to the illuminator was sympathy in one of his own enthusiasm. That sympathy was always ready, and, as he returned it, an affection sprung up between the pupil and the young woman of genius that was doubly characteristic of the time. For this was a century in which the line which parted higher mechanical arts were not separated by any distinct boundary, nor were those who practiced them; and in an age in which architecture was cut and loved one another. Should this last statement stagger a reader, he or writer of such a view be remind him that Christians loved one another at first starting.

Backed by an acquaintance so venerable, and strengthened by female sympathy, Gerard advanced in learning and skill. His spring, his "Annunciation," his well looked behind him when dragged to dinner in the middle of an initial G; but once seated between social qualities I shall be a poor gossip, that hot hilarity but peeped in him, those coy, and often so fat to us, were not to his taste. He sat there, sometimes with his own wit, sometimes with jests which were glossy new to his family, being drawn with antiquity.

As a return for all he owed his friends the monks, he made them exquisite copies from the best and choicest MSS., viz., the life of their founder, and their Consolies of Terence, the "monastery finding the vellum.

The high and puissant Prince, Philip "the Good," Duke of Burgundy, Lucsenburg, and Brabant, Earl of Holland and Zealand, Lord of Friesland, Count of Flanders, Artois, and Burgundy, Lord of Salins and Mackyn—was versatile.

He could fight as well as any king; and he could lie as well as any except the King of France. He was a mighty hunter, and could read and write. His tastes were wide and high. He delighted jewels like a woman, and gorgeous apparel. He dearly loved a suite of learned and intriguing generally; in proof of which he ennobled Jon Van Eyck. He had also a particular fancy for giants, dwarfs, and fools. These last he had at his court about him, turbaned, and blazing with jewels. His agents took them from Islamism and the Latin provinces; but the moment he had got them he baptized them by brute force in a large tub; and, this done, let them squat with their fellow-lovers Mecca, and invoke Mahound as much as they pleased. Another of his vices or odd complexity in fancying they were still infidels. He had long in cages, and fed leopards trained by Orientals to run down human game. In short, he patronized all curities, except human virtues. For any thing slightly angelic or diabolically wise he had his spear-cutter. The best of him was, he was open-handed to the poor; and the next best was, he fostered genius to turnout: whether it was a good a signal proof. He offered prizes for the best specimens of "gothering" in iron-work, religious and secular; item for the best paintings in white of egg, oils, and tempera; there to be on point, silk, or metal, as the artists chose: item for the best transparent painting on glass: item for the best illuminating and border-painting on vellum: item for the fairest writing on vellum. The Burgomasters of the several towns were commanded to aid all the poorer competitors by receiving their specimens and sending them with due care to Rotterdam at the expense of their several burghs. When this was tried by the helluan through the streets of Tergou, a thousand mouths opened, and one heart beat—Gerard's. He told his family he should try for two of those prizes. They stared in silence, for their breath was gone at his cruel and audacity; but one horrid laugh exploded on the floor like a pistol. Gerard looked down, and there was the scurf, whom very whisper was a bassoon, all convulsed from end to end of his fat person, and laughing like a lion. Nature relenting at having made Giles so small, had given him as a set-off the biggest voice on record. He was like those stunted wile-mouthed pieces of ordnance we see on fortifications; they are more like a forcemeat than a cannon; but oils tympana how they bellow!

Gerard turned red with anger, the more so as the others began to titter. "Master Cathedine saw, with a pink face, your perceptible contempt for Giles. She said softly, "Why do you laugh? Is it because he is our brother? Giles is not to be laughed at." Gerard, try with the rest. Many are you are skilful; and mother and I will pray the Virgin to give you luck."

"Thank you, little Kate. You shall pray to our Lady, and our mother shall buy vellum and the colors to illuminate with."

"What will they cost?"

"Two gold crowns" (about three shillings and fourpence English money).

"What?" screamed the housewife; "when the "landed at ports to get a groat." What! me spend a month's meal and meat and fire on such vanity as that! the lighting from heaven is not for you, me, and my children would all be beggars."

"Mother!" sighed little Catherine, reproachfully.

"Oh! it is vain, Kate," said Gerard, with a sigh. "I shall have to give it up, or ask the dame Van Eyck. She would give it me, but I think shame to be forever taking favors from her."

"It is not her wife," said Catherine, very softly: "what has she to do coming between me and my son?" And she left the room with a red face. Little Giles smiled. Nature's balance-master, who returned with a gracious, affectionate air, and the two little gold pieces in his hand.

"There, neighbors," said she, "you won't have to trouble dame or domicile for two paltry crowns."

But on this Gerard fell a thinking how he could spare her purse.

"One will do, mother. I will ask the good monks to let me send my copy of their 'Terence:' it is on paper now, and I can have it on vellum; so then I shall only need six sheets of vellum for my borders and miniatures, and not seven, as now, perhaps seven—one even will do."

"Never spoil the ship for want of a bit of tar, Gerard," said his housewife sharply. "You are skilled, I "Well, there, I will put the crown in my pocket. That won't be like putting it in the purse. But I ought to be back to take out instead of putting in —it is like going to my heart with a knife for so many days! Ah, Gerard, you are a cruel son to your mother."

Gerard. The house is never built for less than the builder counted on."

Sure enough, when the time came, Gerard longed to go to Rotterdam and see the Duke, and looked on to the work he had done, and hoped to get a lesson from defeat. And the crown came out of the housewife's pocket with a little more reluctance. Gerard would soon be a priest. It seemed hard if he might not enjoy the world a little before separating forever from it.

The day before he went, Jacqueline Van Eyck asked him to take a letter for her, and as she gave it to him said, in answer to his surprise he found it was addressed to the Princess Marie, at the Stadthaus, in Rotterdam.

The day before the prizes were to be distributed, Gerard started for Rotterdam thus equipped; he had a double suit of clothes, and his hair cut short in a jerkin of the same over it, but without sleeves. From his waistband to his knees he was clad in the tight-hitting buckskin hose fastened by laces (called points) to his doublet. His shoes were pointed, in slenderness, and secured by a ring of polished steel der the hollow of the foot. On his head and the back of his neck he wore his flowing hair, long, pinned to his back between his shoulders was his hat; it was further secured by a purple silk ribbon little Kate had passed through the slits of the crest of the hat, and knotted neatly on his breast; below his hat, attached to the crown of the hat, was a broad veil, but, with leathern wallet. When he got within a league of Rotterdam he was pretty tired, but he had kept up with a party that were on foot. He found an old man sitting by the roadside quite worn out, and relieved him of his knapsack, taking his hand, with a face full of concern. The country people trudged by and noticed nothing amiss; but when they had passed, three women, three dress tells a tale to those who study it so closely as our illuminator. He went to Mass, and was worn a gown, and a fur tippet, and a velvet cap, rare signs of dignity; but the triangular parts of his hose were cut away in such a way as to show rare signs of poverty. The young woman was dressed in plain woman's attire, but Gerard soon perceived that part of her neck the gown left visible, and coiled half-way up her white throat in a little band of fine embroidery; and that the material of the gown was of the best. Gerard, instead of hiding her hair in a pile of lace or horn, as most women were obliged to accord with silver spangles at the interstices; in the her glossy auburn hair was rolled in front into a wave, and was supported behind by a barbaric and shapely mass. His quick eye took in all this, and the old man's deadly pallor, and the tears in the young woman's eyes. So when he had passed them a few yards, he reflected, and turned back, and came toward the old man.

"Father, I fear you are tired."

"Ah, son, I am sick," replied the old man "and faint for lack of food."

Gerard's address did not appear so agreeable to the girl as to the old man. She seemed ashamed, and with much reserve in her manner said, that it was her fault; she had unfortunate the distance, and imprudently allowed her father to start too late in the day.

"No! no!" said the old man; "it is not the distance, it is the want of nourishment."

At this hint her arm came round his neck, with tender concern, but took that opportunity of whisper-ing. "Father, a stranger—a young man!"

But it was too late. Gerard, with great simplicity, and quite as a matter of course, fell to gathering sticks with great expedition. This done, he took down his wallet, cut with the munched a bread and the iron flask his careful mother had put up, and his everlasting tinder-box; lighted a match, then a candle end, then the sticks; and put his iron flask on it. Then down he went on his stomach and blew a good blow at them himself, up, he saw the girl's face had thawed, and she was looking down on him and his proceedings with interest.

He laughed back to her: "Mind the pot," said he, "and don't let it spill, for Heaven's sake! there's a deal of good in that pot." He was busy with this he set off running toward a corn-field at some distance. While he was gone, the girl, who, as a male with rich purple housings, an old man reclolen with wealth. He gazed at his girdle and purse jubilee, for on his left hand was a broad and new.

It was Gerard-Van Swieten, the Burgomaster of Tergou. He was old, and his face fortrowed. He was a notorious miser, and looked grave enough. But the idea of presenting the Duke raised him just now into manifest complacency. He turned sight of the field of old men and his bright daughter sitting by a fire of sticks, the smile died out of his face, and he wore a strange look of anguish and wrath. He rejoined his mule.

"Why, Peter—Margaret—" said he, almost fiercely, "what scoundrel is this?" The girl answered in answer, but Margaret interposed hastily, and said: "My father was exhausted, so I am warmthing something to give him strength before he can on." "What, reduced to feed by the roadside like the Bohemians," said the Burgomaster, in a voice of thunder. "Into your purse; but it did not seem at home there, it fumbled uncertainly, afraid too large a coin might stick to a finger and betray it.

At this moment who should come bounding up but Gerard! He had two crowns in his hand, and he threw himself down by the fire, and relieved Margaret of the cooking part; then suddenly remembering the Burgomaster, he pulled away Glyshrecht Van Swieten started and glared at him, and took his hand out of his purse. "Gerard Wright of Berlin. In that dispatch, Mr. Wright is directed to claim the release of a native of Hanover, who has been arrested and imprisoned by the United States, returned lately to Hanover, and was there deprived of his liberty and compelled to do military duty. Such is the dispatch to Mr. Wright, Mr. Cass observes:

"What right do our laws confer upon a foreigner residing in the United States? Clearly none. All the privileges, and immunities which belong to a native citizen, in the exercise of his political functions, that under the Constitution 'no person except a naturalized citizen is eligible to the office of President.' With the exception the naturalized citizen from and afterwards of naturalization, both in peace and war, is placed upon the very same footing with the native citizen."

"The moment a foreigner becomes naturalized, he acquires all the native citizen. Residence for a few experiences a new political birth. A bread and important line separates him from his former status. It is no more responsible for any thing he may say or do, or omit to say or do, than the native citizen by his side, if he had been born in the United States. Should he return to his native country, he returns as an American citizen, and in no other character."

"A future liability to serve in the army will not be sufficient (to entitle his original government to call him), because, although he may arrive for such service, he has changed his allegiance, and has become a citizen of the United States, and has acquired a national stand that a boy, brought to this country from a foreign country with his father's consent, but before the years of age and naturalized here, who should afterward visit his country of his birth with the father's consent, might then be seized and compelled to perform military service, because the father's consent was given during intervening years and his title had been spurred, he would have been born to perform military service. Such a right to such a principle would be to make an odious distinction between naturalized and native citizens."

As far as this goes, it is excellent and admirable. If the Secretary had taken this stand at first, there would have been no trouble. But he would have compromised his dignance. It is true that Mr. Cass does not go quite far enough; he says nothing, for instance, about a naturalized citizen returning to Prussia who, when left their country, were old enough to belong to the landwehr, yet were not drafted into the regular army. Allegiance, as is clearly bound to protect as any other class of citizens. But we must not be too critical. It is a great point to get Mr. Cass to have retracted the Leclerc and Hofer letters. It is something to have got him to admit that the naturalized citizen is born citizen, when, only two months ago, he was for abandoning them all. Old men are likely, however, to be slow, and to take a little further down, and will get upon the ground American platform of complete protection to citizens of whatever country. Let us be thankful for what we have got.

The satisfaction which we feel at the completion of Mr. Cass's views is greatly enhanced by the remembrance that we were the first, and for a long period the only journal in the country which met the pretensions of Leclerc and Hofer letters. When we first assailed the doctrine set forth in those letters we found ourselves in influential paper opposed to us. Within the past month articles have appeared in the New York Herald, Times, Tribune, Journal of Commerce, and Commercial Advertiser, and in leading papers published at Boston, Philadelphia Baltimore, and Cincinnati, sustaining the views which Mr. Cass has now been compelled to abandon, and controverting those which we condemned and which have been abandoned.

We trust we may be pardoned if we take

Summer Resorts.

Cozzens' Hotel, West Point, N. Y.
La Fourche House, Bayou La Fourche, La.
Hopatcong House, Lake Hopatcong, N. J.
Congress Hall, Saratoga Springs, N. Y.
Howland's Hotel, Long Branch, N. J.
White Sulphur Springs, Delaware Co., O.
International Hotel, Niagara Falls.
Trenton Falls Hotel, Trenton Falls, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1859.

THE CONVERSION OF CASS.

JUST two months have elapsed since the venerable Secretary of State wrote a letter to Mr. Leclerc of Memphis, Tennessee, informing him that his "naturalization in this country would not exempt him from any claim of military service made upon him by the French Government, if voluntarily returning to France. The promulgation of this novel and alarming doctrine naturally created anxiety among foreign residents, especially among that large class whose business requires them to visit their native land from time to time; other letters of inquiry were dispatched to the State Department, and the answer received was in all cases the same—that where a naturalized citizen, returning voluntarily to his native country, was claimed by the Government of that country for military service, the United States could not interfere. In the case of a Prussian, Mr. Hofer, who proposed to visit Prussia this year, Mr. Cass wrote:

"The position of the United States, as communicated to the Minister at Berlin for the information of the Prussian Government, is that native-born Prussians naturalized in the United States and returning to the country of their birth are liable to any military service which, except such as were existing at the period of their emigration. If at that time they were in the army or actually called into it, such emigration and naturalization do not exempt them from the legal penalty which a deserter by their absence from the country may be inflicted against them whenever they shall return to their native country, and shall be proceeded against according to law."

The distinction attempted to be drawn here was imaginary rather than real. Every Prussian between boyhood and old age is "in the army," either actually or in the reserve. According to the Prussian law, every citizen is a soldier from the time he can carry arms to the age at which the strength fails him, and he is able to be called out on any emergency that the rulers may see occurred. When Mr. Cass attempted, therefore, to discriminate between Prussians who "were in the army or called into it at the time of their emigration," and Prussians who were not "in the army, or called into it" at that time, he uttered a palpable absurdity, as to the practical operation of the edict. In fact, by saying that "emigration and naturalization do not exempt Prussians from any legal penalty they may incur by the voluntary return of their native country, Mr. Cass abandoned at once the whole Prussian-born population of the United States. The letter to Leclerc had abandoned the French.

This was the position of the Government of the United States when we left Washington, and it affords us unmixed satisfaction to be able to declare that the position of the United States is now the very reverse of what it was. Mr. Wright has been reason to "back square down" from the views set forth in the Leclerc and Hofer letters—and, indeed, from the whole line of secretary can be relied upon, there is, once more, some prospect of protection for the naturalized citizen of foreign birth.

We make these assertions on the strength of a dispatch from the State Department, dated 15 July, 1859, addressed to Gerard C. Wright at Berlin. In that dispatch, Mr. Wright is directed to claim the release of a native of Hanover, who has been arrested and imprisoned by the United States, returned lately to Hanover, and was there deprived of his liberty and compelled to do military duty. Such is the dispatch to Mr. Wright, Mr. Cass observes:

"The moment a foreigner becomes naturalized, he acquires all the native citizen. Residence for a few experiences a new political birth. A broad and important line separates him from his former status. It is no more responsible for any thing he may say or do, or omit to say or do, than the native citizen by his side, if he had been born in the United States. Should he return to his native country, he returns as an American citizen, and in no other character."

"A future liability to serve in the army will not be sufficient (to entitle his original government to call him), because, although he may arrive for such service, he has changed his allegiance, and has become a citizen of the United States, and has acquired a national stand that a boy, brought to this country from a foreign country with his father's consent, but before the years of age and naturalized here, who should afterward visit his country of his birth with the father's consent, might then be seized and compelled to perform military service, because the father's consent was given during intervening years and his title had been spurred, he would have been born to perform military service. Such a right to such a principle would be to make an odious distinction between naturalized and native citizens."

some credit to ourselves for the result, and give publicity to the following extract from one of many similar letters received:

"I hope you will persevere in your attacks on Mr. Cass until you drive him off his mean, personally un-American platform on the naturalization question. I can add nothing to your arguments; you are right all through. But keep at the subject. Especially do I entreat you to keep publishing caricatures upon it. A thousand people see and study a caricature who hardly one will read an argumentative article. One single good comic cut—with truth at the bottom of the joke—will convince more people than a whole library of heavy reasoning. If I were forced to assign one special cause for the victorious action of Democracy, I should say, I should instantly mention your comic cut of Mr. Talmadge and the Governor's office. If a citizen is ashamed, as stuffed, and so deservedly reproved as Mr. Belmont can be seized by foreign soldiers and outraged with impunity, it is high time to inquire whether there is any use in maintaining the dishonest farce entitled Naturalization."

THE LOUNGER.

OF THE EMPEROR OF FRANCE.

WHEN Dick Turpin says that he is going out upon the road to exercise his horse, perhaps he is. Dick Turpin is a man; he is honorably open in his villainies; and the very vilest sinner, we are assured, has his chances. But who can take Richard at his word? Do we not suppose that he is going out upon his own business—to lift a purse or two? His not Richard certain disguise under which none is highly probable that, while he may indeed exercise his horse, he will not exercise his conscience. Dick may have turned over a new leaf; but nothing his horse does not prove it. He may have resolved to live cleanly; but his horse is the only one to show it. He may have resolved to give all he has to the poor; but no charity to the poor can exercise his horse does not fully establish it. The truth is, that so long as his professions and conduct are consistent with highway robbery, Dick is to write what he says and does. Mr. Richard Turpin will be considered a highway robber.

So Louis Napoleon may be a great and good man; but the proclamation to the Army of Italy does not prove it. He may be a benefactor of the human rights; but the battles of Montebello, of Magenta, and of Solferino do not establish it. He may be, as is claimed by some enthusiasts, the truest democrat and republican in Europe; but his counsels to the Lombards do not show it.

That is to say, there is nothing in his Italian campaign which is not consistent with the most selfish personal ambition of an unscrupulous ruler. Louis Napoleon is not less a despot simply because he apprehends the consequences of a war of liberty as impossible. He is not less an arbitrary monarch because he does not consider the Italians fit subjects for Austria. He is no more a friend of popular liberty, when he is expelling Austria from Lombardy and proclaiming Italian independence, than he is when having sworn to the Republic, he swept the Bourbon oath with grape to shatter the Bourbon throne.

There is as yet nothing in his practice or professions in Italy which is inconsonant with his evident conduct at every step in the progress to the throne of France. The key to his campaign is in its manifesto from Milan. As he says in that, he undertakes his time. He knows that thrones can now be founded only in the assent of the nationality; which is by no means the assent of the consent of the governed. For a national assent to imperial or royal power like that in France, where even the constitution like the English, and without representation, is merely a toleration of an absolute government, no administration of which the people of Europe that provokes revolution, and resting always upon an unreasoning military force, composing a distinct interest and class in the State.

Louis Napoleon seems to be the only Continental monarch that sees this. He is the only one who perceives that legitimacy has lost its power—unless it is confirmed by the popular assent. He perceives to bears the treaties of Vienna, which make him an outlaw; therefore he marries a commoner, because popular alliances are more secure; and therefore he marches to expel the Austrians from Lombardy, because the United Italian popular revolution would have kindled France, because an independent Italy would be more influenced to France than by any other power. With profound quietness he saw that a national cause, with which the sympathies of the world sympathized, was coincident with the attainment of his own ends. He has not falsely exclaimed that the glory which surrounds power gives it no permanence; that in a country struggling to be free, would blind the memory of the world to his own private crimes.

Certainly the absence of the Pope from Rome, therefore, shall not for an instant bind us to the great fact that the freedom of a people is best achieved; and that it is Louis Napoleon who is rebuilding the modern Attila, Austria, from Italy. Only we have yet to see that he is a popular leader, to bears free popular governments. It seems to be simply in pursuance of a aggressive political philosophy that shows nationality to be at present the only possible basis of peaceful monarchy.

When, peace being restored, he shall find his influence to constructing and consolidating a free and popular government in the peninsula, under whatever form it may be—when at home we see him unmuzzling the press—recalling the patriots who have France as well as he loves it—establishing by legislatures which shall represent the real will of the people and honestly executing its laws, when universal surveillance and tyranny and terror have ceased in France, we shall heartily confess that we had not appreciated the love of constitutional freedom which animated Louis Napoleon.

Until that day, however cunning, and silent, and able the may allow him to be, he will win the perjury and the butchery and the imprisonments and the exile of the 2d December, with the sycophancy of a Legislature of his servants: with the universal silence and the innumerable spies yet fresh in fact and memory—he will win for the Louis Napoleon of the 2d December, which, however successful—as it shall still believe that if Dick escapes Tyburn it will not be because he does not deserve to be hanged.

YANKEE DOODLE REJOICING.

THAT the great and glorious Yankee Doodle has conquered a situation, and is now in possession of art, science, literature, morals, commerce, manufactures, and horse-flesh, has outstripped all politics in nations that ever were, is the fact that fills the pages of those admitted facts of history which take place on the side of the Battle of Marathon and the discovery of America. It is beyond question.

Yankee Doodle is first, and the rest are nowhere.

Not there is any reason for this fact. It is not unmeet, but none the less a fact. It is that Yankee Doodle has not the remotest conception of enjoyment. To offer him a celebration, a fenst, a festival, is to put a fish at a five-barred gate. He can not appreciate any of it. He grows and does. Yankee Doodle on a holiday does likewise. He drinks and spouts. His idea of festive delight is burning gunpowder with the loudest explosion he can get—gunpowder in Chinese crackers and in the twelve-pounder in proper time, and with muskets—gunpowder in small cannon and large cannon—gunpowder in the air, in the water, in whatever bursts, bangs, hisses, sports, spits, or shoots, is dear to the soul of Yankee Doodle, when he puts on his coat and goes out to play.

Hence the "gayleerious" anniversary of the birth of this glorious Republic is always the most horrible day in the year. It makes a great noise and a bad smell. Instead of a peaceful, pleasant, rejoicing day, it is a day of danger, fright, or chaos come again. Every year the number of accidents increases. Every year the quantity of great and glorious arms, legs, and noses that are blown off, and free and enlightened eyes that are put out, is multiplied. Yankee Doodle, for the good Doodle, however patriotic he may be, can put no vent into his body and powder into his nose, but at the same time he is a fool. Because. It leads, at least, to wanton cruelty, as the Lounger has had occasion to observe of evening when, in a huge, lazy, lollopping booby discharge a pistol full in the face of a quiet house-dog, lying within a gate or door.

When these amusements have been carried a little further, Yankee Doodle has discharged cannon in his hands, to settle his little differences with his fellow-Doodles, and has left on the Lee will try to lead him in the paths of pleasure, and instruct him that the Fourth of July is a day which was intended to be, and ought to be, loved and desired instead of abhorred.

THE CAMPANA MUSEUM.

NOTWITHSTANDING the fact which we have elsewhere noted that the great and glorious Yankee Doodle has been, and will be, what he is and was in past, present, or future individual, there is still one odd Gothic circumstance—he does not own the Campana Museum.

Of course he knows what it is, because he knows all about everything. It is not unreasonable to remind him that it is a museum collected by the Marquis Campana, and including among an entirely unique gallery of Greek and Roman sculptures—of terra cotta—of vases, Etruscan and other ancient pottery, bronzes, and ancient jewelry, etc.—of Pompeiian and Roman glass, etc.

It is unnecessary to remind him of this, because he knows it all. He knows that it is one of the most famous and most complete museums in the world. That it contains many of the most curious relics of ancient statues, including those of celebrated men; that it contains the most complete set of all the most complete series of the Cæsars, from Augustus to Constantine, sarcophagi, historical altorelievos, etc.

Yankee Doodle knows all this, because he knows every thing, and knows that the private property of this extraordinary collection, he answers you at once that twenty-five years ago, when it was in process of collection, it was purchased at once by a competent judge in the interest of the purchaser at a million of dollars.

Now the last thing that frightens Yankee Doodle is a million of dollars. He is perfectly aware that the article is dear. He is perfectly aware that half a million would buy the sculptures—for he is familiar with the little dispute between the Marquis Campana, the buying agent for the Roman Mondi Pietas—the great Papal savings' bank—"appropriated" the whole of the Campana Museum for the Vatican museum! Our friend knows that Wolff, the famous Prussian sculptor, and Gibson, the famous English sculptor, resident in Rome, are the American expert in antiquities, have made calculations, or have had calculations made for them, and are present in the interest of the Prussian, English, and Papal Governments, which thought of purchasing.

All you need say to Y. D., and ask him, upon his honor, how he happens to know all this, he will tell you, that he has it from a friend who is, he writes for a newspaper, always burns to give proper credit, and that he read it in the Lounger's letter to the Evening Post. That gentleman says, apparently upon good authority, that the sculptures could be bought for something considerably less than half a million, and urges that they be bought.

Yankee Doodle calls New York a metropolis, and he knows—for what does he not know?—that a metropolis is a great central city, full of galleries, libraries, museums, to which the authors, the artists, the merchants, the manufacturers, the farmers all resort for assistance, instruction, and education. He knows that a city is not a metropolis because it is very large and very full; that acres of masonry and millions of people are not enough to make it; that a metropolis is itself a museum of all that is most desirable and admirable in every department of human interest.

Yankee Doodle knows it all perfectly. Meanwhile he presents his compliments to Mr. Bigelow and begs to say that, as he has been for some six years vainly trying to raise thirty thousand dollars to buy the best Egyptian museum in the world, which may, after all, slip through his exceedingly metropolitan fingers, he has grave doubts whether he shall raise two hundred thirty thousand to purchase the Campana collection.

MUSIC IN THE PARK.

ONE of our great enterprises is proving a great and memorable success, notwithstanding that it is in New York, and is partially patronized by the Common Council. Of course that is the Central Park. As we have never been there, we are more in detail. Just now we wish to mention merely that there is music there once or twice during the week—music for the hard-working people who have a few hours of leisure in the warm evening—unbeckoned for those who can and are farther from town than the Park, and to whom such refreshment is invaluable. Music in a beautiful resort, among green trees and pleasant walks, upon a summer evening, is humanizing.

Now the plans of such music we are not contemplated in the appropriation for the construction of the Park. It is a purely private generosity. Mr. Jay Gould, an architect and member, the architect in chief of the Park, Mr. Olmsted, then whom is no laboring man of New York is more faithful or intelligent friend, and a few other gentlemen, have moved the matter. Of course it was most supported when the subscription came, probably enjoy this music. It is a gift of enjoyment to others. It is spending for a day or two to make somebody you never saw or heard of happy.

The object is so perfectly worthy and important that the subscription has been naturally very small. But this is perfect because it is open and widely enough known. Who will give five, ten, or twenty dollars to be turned into sweet sounds on the Central Park for the benefit of those who do not hear or see too many of the sweet things in the world? If any lady, for kindhead the sum to the Lounger, at this office, and the magic transformation shall be made.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—S. S. C., Grand Rapids, Michigan. You will find the best account from Lamartine, and in its true form in "Hamlet," I., 5:

"The glow-worm shows the matin to be near,
And gins to pale his uneffectual fire."

—ALIEN CAPPER, Philadelphia, says that a friend of his—Mr. Lewis—has a collection of the old Revolutionary Franco spoks, and to whom the editor of the Weekly addressed a note some days ago, must have Colonel Dodge, of "Homeward Bound" memory. But does Alien's friend know that the Lounger has a letter from Napoleon as to interest that an American could not look on in his life? Is he sure any thing more remarkable in the fact that Louis Napoleon spoke to an American "with whom he was on intimate terms," as the editor of the Weekly.

—C. A. B.'s poem, "The Improvisatore," is declined.

—J. E. wishes to know if the Lounger thinks that women should learn boxing. He does not think that they behave like ladies or not. The Lounger thinks there can be no doubt but gentlemen ought always to behave like gentlemen. What that conduct requires every gentleman will decide on each occasion.

—J. E. also inquires why the "Yorkers" reckon twelve and a half cents to the shilling, and the Yankees sixteen and two-thirds. The shilling was the Spanish piece of three cents of our money. The coin and the name both come with our accustomed currency; but it depended in New England and Virginia one-fourth, or to six cents and two-thirds, and in New York and North Carolina to twelve and a half. It is now a varying value in the United States.

—R. L. writes:

"The last chapters of 'The Virginians' brought freshly to my mind the birth of the two children of Lord Castlewood added one of the finest jewels of the British crown to its possessions.

"Upon one side of the monument the following inscription:

HERE RESTS
W. V. F. E.,
VICECOMES,
October 15, 1705,

appears to be sublime in its simplicity. Whether Justice to the memory of the originators of a new nation no longer requires the man who so truly fights for his country to be buried by his friends, or if there is any other object in

"It is surely a century now since Waifs died. At the countryman of a poet celebrate the hundredth anniversary of his birth, and shall the countrymen of a hero keep the hundredth anniversary of his death day? Does not the Canadian Directory state that Wolfe and Montcalm were equally distinguished in the service of England? The Governor of Wolfe's remains being interred at Greenwich. Where are those of Montcalm?

"The Lounger can not agree that merely fighting for one's country is the highest claim to the gratitude of posterity. And as to the burial-place of Wolfe, he is very sure that his remains were conveyed to England, as Parkinson says, while the common monument upon the battle-field may have misled the Directory. Montcalm was buried in Quebec, in a cavity of earth formed by the bursting of a bombshell.

—Inquiries are made:

"Do you think I would be free if I went to Germany?" "Is great grandfather left a cousin who married a lawyer?" "Do you know at this account I may own shipmates in France?"

—We can only refer him to the Secretary of State.

—VIRGINIA asks where does the expression occur, "Flesh is wax," etc., and adds:

"John Marshall, who moved the resolutions in which this memorable eulogium is contained, written by General Lee, gives it, in his Life of General Washington, vol. v. p. 758, Wayne's ed. 1807. Time in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his fellow-citizens."

—The first edition of the second volume of *Bleeding Kansas, Bleeding Kansas, Bleeding Kansas,

VENICE AND VERONA.

It is now evident that the next great conflicts in the pending war will be waged at the cities of Venice and Verona, and we therefore anticipate events by laying before our readers correct plans of these cities as they are at present.

The city of Venice, which contains about 250,000 inhabitants — say one fourth more than Brooklyn, New York, is built on seventy or eighty islands and sand-banks at the head of the Adriatic Sea. The town is about fifteen hundred years old. It was originally occupied as a refuge by the people of Northern Italy, who were flying from the attacks of the barbarians. Eight hundred years ago, being much annoyed by the piracies of the natives of other islands in the Adriatic, they undertook to build a navy to extirpate the pirates. This led to their maritime supremacy. In the course of two centuries they managed to seize the most valuable islands of the Mediterranean archipelago; in two centuries more they were the foremost trading nation of Europe. In the year 1500 they monopolized the trade of India, and to be a Venetian was to be not only free, but rich, intelligent, and powerful. The finest ships of the day were Venetian; the best editions of the classics were printed at Venice; the Venetians wove and were the richest fabrics of silk and costly stuffs; the Venetian arms were the most highly prized by soldiers; the Venetian traders were the type of the "merchant prince." Venice's prosperity culminated when the passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope was discovered. This cost her the monopoly of the European trade with India. Then followed exhaustive wars with Genoa, with the Turks, with Germany. In 1797, when the French took Venice, it was the ghost of its former self. In 1814 it relapsed into the hands of Austria, and has ever since—with the exception of a brief interval in 1848, when the republic was restored—remained subject to the empire.

The great peculiarity of Venice is the absence of streets, and the substitution of canals in their place. Besides the great canal, which, as our plan shows, divides the city into two parts, there are 140 smaller canals, which are navigated in gondolas. These canals are crossed by 306 bridges. The principal promenade and place of assembly for the people is the famous Place of St. Mark, which will readily be discovered on our plan. The houses in Venice are built on piles driven into the sand and mud of the islands. A recent occurrence shows how, of late years, the prosperity of the city has declined. An American from Chicago, visiting Venice, was curious to know how the Venetian pile-driver compared with those used at his home, and desired his guide to show him one.

The cicerone was puzzled; at length he contrived to understand what the traveler desired to see, and took him to the Museum, where he showed him an ancient machine covered with dust and rust and mould.

"That, Signor," said he, "is the Venetian pile-driver."

"That!" cried the American; "why that thing hasn't been used for centuries. Where is the pile-driver now in use?"

"Ah! Signor," answered the Venetian, with a sigh, "we don't need any pile-drive now; there has not been a house built in Venice for three hundred years."

The port of Venice has been blockaded by the French, and it is understood that they are about to effect a landing there. The fortifications, which have lately been strengthened, are said to be formidable; and without experienced pilots the French will find it difficult to navigate the intricate and shallow channels leading to the port. However, the thing can be done, and Napoleon is not the man to fail. He is sure of active sympathy among the Venetians, who hate Austria as intensely as the Milanese, and with even better reason, for the Austrians have deliberately done their worst to destroy Venice for the benefit of Trieste.

Verona, of which we subjoin a plan, has already been described in the Weekly (No. 139). It is a superb city, fortified at every point, and, at the present time, crammed with Austrian soldiers. It is the northeast corner of the historical square, and, with Mantua, will undoubtedly be the last place abandoned by the Austrians in Italy. The only question which remains to be determined with regard to its fortifications is, whether they can accommodate the large army which the Austrians now have in Lombardy.

VENICE
CANALE GIUDECCA
GIUDECCA
Le Zitelle
Canale di S. Marco
Bacino di S. Marco
Isola di S. Giorgio
Fondamenta nuove
Canale della Grazia
Canale di Cannaregio
Ponte di Rialto
Ponte della Paglia
Ponte di Canonica
Ponte di Ferro
Ponte di Calatrava
Ponte della Scalzi
Ponte di Rivoltella
Ponte di Libertà
Ponte di Cavalletto
Ponte di Cannaregio
Ponte di Giustinian
Ponte di Giustinian
Ponte di Paglia
Ponte di Canonica
Ponte di Ferro
Ponte di Calatrava
Ponte della Scalzi
Ponte di Rivoltella
Ponte di Libertà
Ponte di Cavalletto
Ponte di Cannaregio

SHOPPING, ET CÆTERA.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XLI.

THE ANCIENT FAMILY OF NEWT.

MR. ADAM NEWT did not devote all his time to selling dry goods upon commission. He had tastes and desires that even Pearl Street could not satisfy; and under the guidance of Cæsar Van Boozenberg, who had made Abel's acquaintance because he was an admirer of Abel's sister Fanny (rather than because she senior Van B. desired, young Mr. Newt soon became well known in the bar-room of the Washington Hotel, at Cato's upon the island, and at a certain house which shall be nameless, as also the lively mistress thereof, not ten thousand miles from Canal Street, which in those days was well up town.

As the senior of Mr. Newt, Jun., in years, Cæsar Van Boozenberg naturally commenced his Mentorship with a kind of patronizing manner, indicating general superiority, which was, however, gradually ameliorated in tone by the astonishing progress which his pupil made, and an air of secret sarcasm which stole into his pupil's manner toward him. The same air was observable in his treatment of all his other companions.

Indeed, as the world returned to town and the late autumnal festivities began, the handsome person and self-possessed style of Mr. Abel Newt became the fashion. Invitations showered upon him. Mrs. Dagon proclaimed every where that there had been nobody so fascinating since the days of the brilliant youth of Aaron Burr, whom she declared that she well remembered, and added, that if she could say it without blushing, or if any reputable woman ought to admit such things, she should confess that in her younger days she had received flowers and even notes from that fascinating man.

A CHASTE SALUTE.

For then it was quite different you know, my dears. In my day and my sister Mary's, Colonel Burr was the thing. Why, dear me! a girl who had dined at the same table with him was envied. But if, my precious! Colonel Burr had handed her out, the woman took airs upon it. Yes, my dears, she positively did. It was dreadful, you know; and he folded his notes so neatly! But after the duel and the treason, dear me! dear me! of course it was all over. You should have seen him make a bow. He had just the same easy, careless grace that Abel has. It was full of a kind of consciousness that it was worth while to know him and kiss him. I don't envy my dears, that he was a happy man. But I can tell you one thing, all the naughty men are not in disgrace yet, though they are. And, if you please, Miss Fanny, with all your virtuous sniffs, dear, and all your hugging of met in whining, darling, Colonel Burr was not sent to Coventry because he was naughty. He might have been naughty all the days of his life and Mrs. Jacob Van Boozenberg, and all the rest of 'em, would have been quite as glad to have him at their houses. No, my dears, Society doesn't punish men for being naughty—only women. I am older than you, and I know—that society likes spice in character. It doesn't harm a man to have stories told about him.

Aunt Dagon was garrulous, and spice were a little afraid of her; for she was old enough to say just what she thought, and clever enough to think things that people did not care to hear. It may be very true that the spoons are German silver, and every body may be aware of it, but what is the use of saying so? How can any body who cries hush! at table, and seems interested every body's attention, then raises a spoon, and holding it conspicuously, says distinctly, "This is German silver"? Ought to be invited to dinner? Sometimes, indeed, society must ask such people—if you give balls in France, you must invite French people to dance —but it does not forgive them. Every body had to ask Mrs. Dagon, and every body dreaded her. Naturally, said Fanny Newt, because she eats every body up.

No ball, however, was complete without Abel Newt. Ladies, meditating parties, engaged him before they issued a single invitation. At dinners he was sparkling and agreeable, with tact enough not to extinguish the other men, who yet felt his superiority and did not feel like it. They imitated his manner; but what was easy, on gilded assurance, in him, was open insolence, or assurance with the gilt rubbed off, in them. The charm and secret of his manner lay in an utter devotion which said to every woman, "There's not a woman in the world who can resist me, except you. Have you the heart to do it?" Of course this manner was assisted by personal magnetism and beauty. Wilkes said he was only half an hour behind the handsomest man in the world. But he would never have overtaken him if the handsome man had been Wilkes.

In his dress Abel was costly and elegant. With the other men of his day he read "Pelham," with an admiration of which his life was the witness. Pelham was the Byronic hero made practicable, purged of romance, and adapted to society. Mr. Newt, Jun., was one of a small but influential set of young men about town who did what they could to repair the misfortune of being born Americans, by imitating the habits of foreign life. They all had a secret contempt of what they called the democratic tendencies of the country. They were the higher class—the snobbity. They were, above all, "gentlemen."

It was precisely close to one friend that independence under the parent roof was incompatible with the habits of a strictly fashionable man.

"There are many, you know, mother, such habits, which make a separate lodging much more agreeable to all parties: I have friends to smoke, or to drink a glass of punch, or to play a game of whist; and we must sing and laugh and make a noise, as young men will, which is not seemly for the paternal mansion, mother mine."

With which he took his admiring mother affably under the chin and kissed her—not having mentioned every reason which made a separate residence desirable. But "a few remarks" are not an omission.

So Abel Newt hired a pleasant set of rooms in Grand Street, near Broadway, in the neighborhood of elder youth of proper tone. He furnished them sumptuously, with the softest carpets, the most luxurious easy-chairs, the most costly curtains, and pretty, bizarre little tables and bureaus, and shelves. Various engravings hung upon the walls—a profile-head of Bulwer, with a large Roman nose and bushy whiskers, and one of his Majesty George IV., in that famous cloak which Lord Chesterfield bought at the sale of his Majesty's wardrobe for eleven hundred dollars, and of which the sable lining alone originally cost four thousand dollars. It was perhaps the finest article in that dandy's wardrobe, which had altogether cost almost half a million of dollars. Then there were little vases and boxes and caskets standing upon all possible places, with a rare flower in some one of them often, sent by some kind dowager who wished to make sure of Abel at a dinner or a select soiree. Pipes, of course, and boxes of choice cigars were at hand, and in a convenient closet such a beautiful set of English cut glass for the use of a gentleman!

It was no wonder that the income of Abel Newt became a kind of club-room and elegant lounge for the gay gentlemen about town. He even gave little dinners there to quiet parties, sometimes including two or three extremely vivacious and pretty, as well as fashionable, lady dressed, young women, whom he was not in the habit of meeting in society, but who were known quite familiarly to Abel and his friends.

Upon other occasions these little dinners took place out of town, whither the gentlemen drove alone in their buggies by daylight, and, meeting the ladies there, had the pleasure of driving them back to the city in the evening. The "buggy" of Abel's day was an open gig without a top, very easy upon its springs, but dangerous with stumbling horses. The drive was along the old Boston road, and the rendezvous Cato's—Cato Alexander's—near the present shot-tower. If the gentlemen returned alone, they finished the evening at Bertone's, in Ann Street, where they played a pretty game of billiards; or at Thiel's retired rooms over the celebrated Stewart's, opposite the Park, where they indulged in fare. Abel Newt lost and won his money with careless grace—always a little glad when he gained, for somebody had to pay for all this luxurious life.

Boniface Newt remonstrated. His son was late at the office in the morning. He drew large sums out of his large expenses. Several times, instead of instantly filling out the checks as Abel directed, the book-keeper had delayed, and said quietly to Mr. Newt during Abel's absence at lunch, which was usually prolonged, that he supposed it was all right to fill up a check of this amount to Mr. Abel's order? Mr. Boniface Newt replied, in a dogged way, that he supposed it was.

But one day when the sum had been large, and the paternal temper more than usually ruffled, he addressed the junior partner upon his return from lunch and his noontide glass with his friends at the Washington Hotel, to the effect that matters were going on much too rapidly.

"To what matters do you allude, father?" inquired Mr. Abel, with composure, as he picked his teeth with one hand, and surveyed a cigar which he held in the other.

"I mean, Sir, that you are spending a great deal too much money."

A PROMENADE, EN VOITURE.

"Why, how is that, Sir?" asked his son, as he called to the boy in the outer office to bring him a light.

"By Heavens! Abel, you're enough to make a man crazy! Here I have put you into my business, over the heads of the clerks who are a hundred-fold better fitted for it than you; and you not only come down late and go away early, and destroy all kind of discipline by smoking and lounging, but you don't manifest the slightest interest in the business; and, above all, you are living at a frightfully ruinous rate! Yes, Sir, ruinous! How do you suppose I can pay, or that the business can pay, for such extravagance?"

Abel smoked calmly during this energetic discourse, and blew little rings from his mouth, which he watched with interest as they melted in the air.

"Certain things are inevitable, father."

His parent, frowning and angry, growled at him as he made this remark, and muttered,

"Well, suppose they are."

"Now, father," replied his son, with great composure, "let us proceed calmly. Why should we pretend not to see what is perfectly plain? Business nowadays proceeds by credit. Credit is based upon something, or the show of something. It is represented by a bank-bill. Here now—" And he opened his purse leisurely, and drew out a five-dollar note of the Bank of New York, "here is a promise to pay five dollars—in gold or silver, of course. Do you suppose that the Bank of New York has gold and silver enough to pay all those promises it has issued? Of course not."

Abel knocked off the ash from his cigar, and took a long contemplative whiff, as if he were about making a plunge into views even more profound. Mr. Newt, half pleased with the show of philosophy, listened with less frowning brows.

"Well, now, if, by some bona-poco, the Bank of New York hadn't a cent in coin at this moment, it could redeem the few claims that might be made upon it by borrowing, could it not?"

Mr. Newt shook his head affirmatively.

"And, in fine, if it were entirely bankrupt, it could still do a tremendous business for a very considerable time, could it not?"

Mr. Newt assented.

"And the managers, who knew it to be so, would have plenty of time to get off before an explosion, if they wanted to?"

"Abel, what do you mean?" inquired his father.

The young man was still placidly blowing rings of smoke from his mouth, and answered,

"Nothing terrible. Don't be alarmed. It is only an illustration of the practical value of credit, showing how it covers a retreat, so to speak. Do you see the moral, father?"

"No, certainly not. I see no moral at all."

"Why, suppose that nobody wanted to retreat, but that the Bank was only to be carried by a dangerous place, then credit is a bridge, isn't it? If it were out of money, it could live upon its credit until it got the money back again."

"Clearly," answered Mr. Newt.

"And suppose it extended its operations, it would acquire even more credit?"

"Yes."

"Because people, believing in the solvency of the Bank, would suppose that it extended itself because it had more means?"

"Yes."

"And would not feel any dust in their eyes?"

"No," said Mr. Newt, following his son closely.

"Well, then; don't you see?"

"No, I don't see," replied the father; "that is, I don't see what you mean."

"Why, father, look here! I come into your business. The fact is known. People look. Nature's no whisper against the house. We extend ourselves; we live liberally, but we pay the piper. Every body says, 'Newt & Son are doing a thumping business.' Perhaps we are—perhaps we are not. We are crossing the ledger of credit. Before people know it, we have been living up to our income—quite up, father dear!—Mr. Newt frowned an entire assent—"we have plenty of money!"

"How, in Heaven's name!" cried Beatrice Newt, springing up and in so loud a tone that the clerks looked in from the outer office.

"Hush, my child," returned Alfred, coldly.

"With whom?" asked Mr. Newt, earnestly. "With no heiress?"

"What's her name?"

"Just what I am trying to find out," replied Abel, lighting a new his cigar anew. "And now I put it to you, father, as a man of the world and a scandal, sagacious, accessed mercantile, am I not more likely to meet and marry such a girl—losing her, of course, that's understood—if I live generously in society, than if I shut myself up to a mere digger?"

Mr. Newt was not sure. Perhaps it was so. Upon the whole, it probably was so.

"But, Abel, to marry merely for money, merely, you know is this?"

"Oh, Sir, of course, not merely for money. Money is a happy accident. At the same time, I do feel as if I could dispense with the necessities of life more easily than the luxuries." Alfred's father and mother laughed. "I do not believe I was made for love in a cottage. And yet, with the woman one loves—"

Abel smiled curiously. The woman of whom he spoke might have been frightened by such a smile.

"However, father, it is not the Millennium. When that comes, I suppose we shall all be cottages with the women we love. Only the cottages will have all the modern conveniences, and each cottager has to marry at it's door the Millennium now. It's very sad—very sad indeed," said Abel, hopelessly in his tone.

That gentleman shook his head as if he were quite of the same opinion, but not at all as if he perceived that he was very imprudently worshipping his little peculiarities of style in conversation.

Nor did Mr. Abel suspect his heresy, that for the purpose of marrying an heiress, it is indeed a good deal safer to be fortunate as to meet one, and, having met her, to become enamored as that he might, if he were not fortunate in his wife—that for all these contingencies it was a good thing for a young man to have a regular business connection and apparent employment—and very advantageous indeed that that connection should be with a man six and known as a commercial and fashionable circles as his father. That of itself was one of the great conveniences of office. It was a frequent joke of Abel's with his father, after the recent conversation, that credit was the most essential thing going.

During these brilliant days of young bachelorhood Abel, by the most curious chance, had not met Hope Wayne, who was passing the winter in New York with her Aunt Dinks, and had hitherto declined all society. It was well known that she was in town. The boudoirs of those heiress was often enough the theme of discourse among the youth at Abel's rooms.

"Is she really going to marry Dinks? Why, the man's a donkey!" said Corlear Van Boozenberg.

"And are there no donkeys among your married friends?" inquired Abel, with the air of a man pursuing his researches.

One day, indeed, as he was passing Stewart's, he saw her alighting from a carriage. He was not alone, and as he passed their eyes met. He bowed profoundly. She bent her head without speaking, and was recognized by a slight acquaintance. It was not a "cut," as Abel said to himself, not at all. It was simply making way with her head.

"By Jove, she's handsome!" said Herbert Carstyne, who was with him, and who had engaged to Miss Lucy Shrimp. "Why the deuce didn't she come to New York before?"

Mr. Ortcrow said that, had she had the good fortune to do so, he would have honored her parts with a hand raised to Miss Miss Shrimp's.

"Why's that stopping to speak with her?" asked Corlear, as he turned back to see her.

"That's Arthur Merlin. Don't you know? He's a painter. I wonder how the deuce he came to know her."

In fact, it was the painter. It was the first time he had met her since the summer days of Saratoga; and as he stood talking with her upon the sidewalk and observed that she looked had an unusual flush, and her manner a slight excitement, he could not help feeling a certain pleasure—feeling, in truth, so deep a delight as he looked into that lovely face, that he found himself stuttering, as he walked away with her.

Fortunate it was that he was so entirely devoted to his art. It was very fortunate indeed, though he. And yet it might be a pity, too, if I should chance to meet some beautiful and sympathetic woman; knowing so utterly as I do my own temper, it would be impossible for me to fall in love with her! Quite impossible! Quite out of the question!

Just as he thought this he bumped against some one, and looked up suddenly. A calm, half-amused face met his glance, as Arthur said, hastily, "I beg your pardon."

"My pardon is granted," returned the gentleman; "but still you had better look out for yourself."

"Oh! I shall not hit any body else," said Arthur, as he bowed and was passing on.

"I am not speaking of other people," replied the other, with a look which was very friendly, but very puzzling.

"Whom do you mean, then?" asked Arthur Merlin.

"Yourself, of course," said the gentleman with the self-amused face.

"How?" inquired Arthur.

"To guard against Venus rising from the foelk sea, or Hope descending from a carriage," rejoined his companion, putting out his hand.

Arthur looked surprised, and, could he have resisted the force of his new acquaintance, he would have added indignation to his expression. But it was impossible.

"Ye wiseth, I see! I owe such excellent advice?"

"To Lawrence Newt, of the India trade," answered that gentleman, putting out his hand. "I am glad to make your acquaintance, Mr. Arthur Merlin."

The painter shook the merchant's hand cordially, but with a sense of embarrassment, and finally Mr. Merlin turned, and the two men strolled together down town. While they talked Arthur Merlin had observed that the eyes of his companion studied every carriage that passed. He was in a very natural, artless way; but Lawrence Newt smiled with his eyes, and at length said, as if Arthur had asked him the question, "There she comes!"

Arthur was a little bit annoyed, and said, suddenly, and with a fine air of indifference, "Who?"

Lawrence turned and looked him full in the face; upon which the painter, who was so fanatically devoted to his art that many things were clearly impossible, said "Oh!" at the same body had answered his question.

The next moment both gentlemen bowed to Hope Wayne, who looked shy, and Mrs. Dinks in her carriage.

Fanny Kent, of course, had heard from Alfred of the interview with his mother on the same evening, as they sat in Mrs. Newt's parlor before going into the ball. Fanny was surprised in a charming evening costume. It was low behind the waist and sloping, except that a very white, descended like a hard, round beach from the low shrubery of her back hair to the sheen of the dress. It was very low—but then she was a gentle ripple of laces and ribbons that covered the point of division. Fanny, therefore, had taken a little refreshment since the conversation with his mother, and felt at the moment quite equal to the ball.

"The fact is, Fanny dear," said he, "that mother has always wished me to marry Miss Hope Wayne. Now Hope Wayne is a very pretty girl, a decent pretty girl; but, by George! she's not the sort of girl I should like."

At this point Mr. Dinks made free with the step of Miss Hope.

"Poh! Alfred, my dear, you have been drinking wine," said she, moving gently away from him.

"Of course I have, darling; haven't I dined?" replied Alfred, returning to entanglement.

Now Fanny's costume was too careful, her hair too absolutely arranged, to withstand successfully these approaches.

"Alfred, dear, we may as well understand these little matters at the outset," said she.

"What little matters, darling?" inquired Mr. Dinks, with interest. He was unwontedly animated, but, as he believed, he didn't drink.

"Why, this kissing business."

"You are cruel cried Alfred, impetuously committing a fresh breach of the peace.

